xlix. 1). Gad is afterward mentioned in Ez. xlviii. 27 ff. and Rev. vii. 5).—2. "Gad, the seer," or "the king's seer," i. e. David's (1 Chr. xxix. 29; 2 Chr. xxix. 25; 2 Sam. xxiv. 11; 1 Chr. xxi. 9), was a "prophet" who appears to have joined David when in the hold (1 Sam. xxii. 5). He reappears in connection with the punishment inflicted for the numbering of the people (2 Sam. xxiv. 11-19; 1 Chr. xxi. 9-19). He wrote a book of the Acts of David (xxix. 29), and also assisted in the arrangements for the musical service of the "house of God" (2 Chr. xxix. 25).—3. Properly "the Gad." In the A.V. of Is. lxx. 11, the clause "that prepare a table for that troop" has in the margin, instead of the last word, the proper name "Gad," evidently = some idol worshipped by the Jews in Babylon, though it is impossible positively to identify it. (MEXI.) That Gad was the deity Fortune, under whatever outward form it was worshipped, is supported by the etymology, and by the common assent of commentators. Gesenius is probably right in his conjecture that Gad was the planet Jupiter, regarded by the astrologers of the East as the star of greater good fortune. Movers is in favor of the planet Venus. Vitringa considers it the sun. Illustrations of the ancient custom of placing a banquet table in honor of idols will be found in the table spread for the sun among the Ethiopians (Ildt. iii. 17, 18), and in the feast made by the Babylonians for their god Bel (B. & D.; compare also Ildt. i. 181, &c.). A trace of the worship of Gad remains in the proper name BAAL-GAD.

Gad'a-ra (Gr. fr. Heb. = GEDER? Wr.), a strong city situated near the river Hieromax, E. of the Sea of Galilee, over against Scythopolis and Tiberias, and sixteen Roman miles distant from each of those places. Josephus calls it the capital of Perca. A large district was attached to it. Gadara itself is not mentioned in the Bible, but it evidently gives name to the "country of the Gadarenes" (Mk. v.

1; Lk. viii. 26, 37). Of the site of Gadara, thus so clearly defined, there cannot be a doubt. On a partially isolated hill, at the N.W. extremity of the mountains of Gilead, about sixteen miles from Tiberias, lie the remarkable ruins of Um Keis, embracing two theatres, traces of the ancient wall, a city gate, a straight main street with its pavement nearly perfect, but its columns on each side all prostrate, &c. The whole space occupied by the ruins is about two miles in circumference. The first historical notice of Gadara is its capture, along with Pella and other cities, by Antiochus the Great, B. C. 218. Destroyed during the Jewish civil wars, it was rebuilt by Pompey (B. C. 63), and made the capital of a district by Gabinius. The territory of Galara, with the adjoining one of Hippos, was subsequently added to the kingdom of Herod the Great. Gadara is regarded by Mr. Porter, Lange (on Mat.), &c., as having been the scene of our Lord's miracle in healing the DEMONIACS (Mat. viii. 23-34; Mk. v. 1-21; Lk. viii. 26-40). (GERASA; GERGESENS.) The most interesting remains of Gadara are its tombs, which dot the cliffs for a considerable distance round the city. They are excavated in the limestone rock. (TOMB.) The present inhabitants of Um Keis all "dwell in tombs." Galara was captured by Vespasian on the first outbreak of the war with the Jews; all its inhabitants massacred; and the town itself, with its surrounding villages, reduced to ashes. Afterward it was the seat of a bishop; but it fell to ruins at, or soon after, the Mohammedan conquest.

Gad-di (Heb. fortunate, Ges.), son of Susi; the Manassite spy sent by Moses to explore Canaan (Num. xiii. 11).

Gad-di-el (Heb. fortune of God, i. e. sent from God, Ges.), a Zebulonite, one of the twelve spies (Num. xiii. 10).

Gad-di (Heb., a Gadite, Ges.), father of King Menahem (2 K. xv. 14, 17).

Gad-ham (Heb. probably = sunburnt, or swarthy), son of Nahor, Abraham's brother, by his concubine Reumah (Gen. xxii. 24).

Gad-har (Heb. lurking-place, Ges.), ancestor of a family of Nethinim who returned from the Captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 47; Neh. vii. 49).

Gad-us [ga'yus] (L. = Caius, a common Roman first name). JOHN, SECOND AND THIRD EPISTLES OF.

Gad'a-ad (1 Mc. v. 9, 55; Jd. i. 8, xv. 6; and "the country of Galaad," 1 Mc. v. 17, 20, 25, 27, 36, 45, xiii. 22), the Greek form of GILEAD.

Gad-lal (Heb. perhaps weighty, worthy, Ges.). 1. A Levite, of the sons of Asaph (1 Chr. ix. 15).—2. A Levite, son of Jeduthun (ix. 16; Neh. xi. 17).

Ga-la'tia [-she-a, or, less formally, -sha] (Gr., literally = the Gallia, or Gaul, of the East). The GALATIANS were in their origin a stream of that great Celtic torrent which poured into Greece in the third century B. C. Some of these invaders moved on into Thrace, and appeared on the shores of the Hellespont and Bosphorus, when Nicomedes I., king of Bithynia, then engaged in a civil war, invited them across to help him. Once established in Asia Minor, they became a terrible scourge. The neighboring kings succeeded in repulsing them within the general geographical limits to which the name of Galatia was given. At the end of the Roman Republic, Galatia appears as a dependent kingdom; at the beginning of the empire, as a province (A. D. 26). The Roman province of Galatia may be roughly described as the central region of the peninsula of Asia Minor, with the provinces of ASIA on the W., CAPPADOCIA on the E., PAMPHYLIA and CILICIA on the S., and BITHYNIA and PONTUS on the N. It would be difficult to define the exact limits. In fact, they were frequently changing. At one time this province contained Pisidia and Lycaonia, and therefore ANTIOCH 2, Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe, which are conspicuous in the narrative of St. Paul's travels. But the characteristic part of Galatia lay N. from those districts. These Eastern Gauls preserved much of their ancient character, and something of their ancient language. The prevailing speech, however, of the district was Greek. The inscriptions found at Ancyra are Greek, and St. Paul wrote his Epistle in Greek. It is difficult at first sight to determine in what sense the word Galatia is used by the writers of the N. T., or whether always in the same sense. In Acts xvi. 6, xviii. 23, the journeys of St. Paul through the district are mentioned in very general terms. Most probably Galatia is used by St. Luke as an ethnographical term, and not for the Roman province of that name. (See also 1 Cor. xvi. 1; Gal. i. 2; 2 Tim. iv. 10; 1 Pet. i. 1.) Böttger maintains that the Galatia of the Epistle (GALATIANS, EPISTLE TO THE) is entirely limited to the district between Derbe and Colosse, i. e. the extreme southern frontier of the Roman province.

* Ga-la'tians [-she-anz or -shanz] = natives or inhabitants of GALATIA, originally from Gaul or ancient France (L. Gallia) (1 Mc. viii. 2; 2 Mc. viii. 20; Gal. iii. 1). Some suppose that in 1 Maccabees "Galatians" = the Gauls or ancient inhabitants of France.

Ga-la'tians (see above), The Epistle to the, was written by the Apostle PAUL not long after his journey through GALATIA and Phrygia (Acts xviii. 23), and probably in the early portion of his two and a half years' stay at Ephesus, which terminated with the Pentecost of A. D. 57 or 58. The Epistle appears to have been called forth by the machinations of Judaizing teachers, who, shortly before the date of its composition, had endeavored to seduce the churches of this province into a recognition of circumcision (v. 2, 11, 12, vi. 12 ff.), and had openly sought to depreciate the apostolic claims of St. Paul (compare i. 1, 11). The Epistle vindicates his own apostolic authority, and aims to bring back the Galatians to the simplicity of the Gospel, that they may be justified and saved through faith in Christ. The scope and contents of the Epistle are thus—(1.) apologetic (i., ii.) and polemical (iii., iv.); and (2.) hortatory and practical (v., vi.): the positions and demonstrations of the former portion being used with great power and persuasiveness in the exhortations of the latter. With regard to the genuineness and authenticity of this Epistle, no writer of any credit or respectability has expressed any doubts. The testimony of the early Church is most decided and unanimous. Besides express references to the Epistle, we have one or two direct citations found as early as the time of the Apostolic Fathers, and several apparent allusions. (CANON; INSPIRATION.) Two historical questions require a brief notice:—1. The number of visits made by St. Paul to the churches of Galatia previous to his writing the Epistle. These seem certainly to have been two. The apostle founded the churches of Galatia in the visit recorded Acts xvi. 6, during his second missionary journey, about A. D. 51, and revisited them at the period and on the occasion mentioned Acts xviii. 23, when he went through the country of Galatia and Phrygia. On this occasion probably he found the leaven of Judaism beginning to work in the churches of Galatia. 2. Closely allied with the preceding question is that of the date, and the place from which the Epistle was written. Conybeare and Howson, and more recently (1857) Lightfoot, urge the probability of its having been written at about the same time as Romans. They would therefore assign Corinth as the place where the Epistle was written, and the three months that the apostle stayed there (Acts xx. 2, 3), apparently the winter of A. D. 57 or 58, as the exact period. But it seems almost impossible to assign a later period than the commencement of the prolonged stay in Ephesus (A. D. 54). The subscription, "written from Rome," the best critics pronounce spurious.

Gal'ba-num (L.; Heb. helbânâh or chelbânâh), one of the perfumes employed in the preparation of the sacred incense (Ex. xxx. 34). The galbanum of commerce is brought chiefly from India and the Levant. It is a resinous gum of a brownish-yellow color, and strong, disagreeable smell, usually met with in masses, but sometimes found in yellowish tear-like drops. But, though galbanum itself is well known, the plant which yields it has not been exactly determined. Sprengel is in favor of the Ferula Ferulago, Linn., which grows in North Africa, Crete, and Asia Minor. It was for some time supposed to be the product of the Bulbon Galbanum, Linn., a native of the Cape of Good Hope. The Opoidia galbanifera of Lindley, a Persian plant, has been adopted by the Dublin college in their Pharmacopœia as that which yields the galbanum. But the question remains undecided.

Gal'e-ed (Heb. heap of witness), the name given by Jacob to the heap which he and Laban made on Mount GILEAD in witness of the covenant then entered into between them (Gen. xxxi. 47, 48; compare 23, 25). JEGAR-SAHADUTHA.

Gal'ga-la (Gr. = GILGAL), the ordinary equivalent in the LXX. for GILGAL; in the A. V. only in 1 Mc. ix. 2, = either the upper Gilgal near Bethel, or the lower one near Jericho.

* Gal'le'an = a native or inhabitant of GALILEE (Mk. xiv. 70; Lk. xiii. 1, 2, xxii. 59, xxiii. 6; Jn. iv. 45; Acts ii. 7).

Gal'lee (fr. Heb. gûlîl = a circle or circuit). This name, in the Roman age applied to a large province, seems to have been originally confined to a little "circuit" of country round Kedesh-Naphtali, in which were situated the twenty towns given by Solomon to Hiram, king of Tyre, as payment for his work in conveying timber from Lebanon to Jerusalem (Josh. xx. 7, xxi. 32; 1 K. ix. 11). They were then, or subsequently, occupied by strangers, and for this reason Isaiah gives to the district the name "Galilee of the Gentiles" (Is. ix. 1; Mat. iv. 15). Probably the strangers increased in number, and became during the Captivity the great body of the inhabitants; extending themselves also over the surrounding country, they gave to their new territories the old name, until at length Galilee became one of the largest provinces of PALESTINE. In the Maccabean period Galilee contained only a few Jews living in the midst of a large heathen population (1 Mc. v. 20-23). In the time of our Lord, all Palestine was divided into three provinces, JUDEA, SAMARIA, and Galilee (Acts ix. 31; Lk. xvii. 11; Jos. B. J. iii. 3). The latter included the whole northern section of the country, including the ancient territories of Issachar, Zebulun, Asher, and Naphtali. On the W. it was bounded by the territory of Ptolemais, which probably included the whole plain of 'Akka (Acco) to the foot of Carmel. The southern boundary ran along the base of Carmel and of the hills of Samaria to Mount Gilboa, and then descended the valley of Jezreel by Scythopolis to the Jordan. The river Jordan, the Sea of Galilee, and the upper Jordan to the fountain at Dan, formed the eastern border; and the northern ran from Dan westward across the mountain ridge till it touched the territory of the Phenicians. Galilee was divided into two sections, Lower and Upper. Lower Galilee included the great plain of Esdraelon with its offshoots, which run down to the Jordan and the Lake of Tiberias; and the whole of the hill-country adjoining it on the N. to the foot of the mountain-range. It extended as far as the village of Ginea, the modern Jenin, on the extreme southern side of the plain, and included the whole region from the plain of 'Akka, on the W., to the shores of the lake on the E. It was thus one of the richest and most beautiful sections of Palestine. The chief towns of Lower Galilee were Tiberias, Tarichea, at the southern end of the Sea of Galilee, and Sepphoris. The towns most celebrated in N. T. history are Nazareth, Cana, and Tiberias (Lk. i. 26; Jn. ii. 1, vi. 1). Upper Galilee embraced the whole mountain-range lying between the upper Jordan and Phenicia. Its southern border ran along the foot of the Safed range from the north-west angle of the Sea of Galilee (GENNESARET) to the plain of 'Akka. To this region the name "Galilee of the Gentiles" is given in the O. and N. T. (Is. ix. 1; Mat. iv. 15). Capernaum, on the N.W. shore of the lake, was in Upper Galilee. Galilee was the scene of the greater part of our Lord's private life and public acts. His early years were spent at Nazareth; and when He entered on His great work He made Capernaum His home (Mat. iv. 13, ix. 1). It is a remarkable fact that the first three gospels are chiefly taken up with our Lord's ministrations in this province, while the Gospel of John dwells more upon those in Judea. The nature of our Lord's parables and illustrations was greatly influenced by the peculiar features and products of the country. The apostles originally were all either Galileans by birth or residence (Acts i. 11), and as such were despised, as their Master had been, by the proud Jews (Jn. i. 46, vii. 52; Acts ii. 7). It appears also that the pronunciation of the Jews in Galilee had become peculiar, probably from contact with their Gentile neighbors (Mat. xxvi. 73; Mk. xiv. 70). (SHEMITIC LANGUAGES, § 15, a; GREEK.) After the destruction of Jerusalem, Galilee became the chief seat of Jewish schools of learning, and the residence of their most celebrated Rabbins. EDUCATION.

Gal'lee, Sea of. GALILEE; GENNESARET.

Gall, the A. V. translation of—1. Heb. nîrérâh, or mîrôrâh, etymologically = that which is bitter; translated in Job xiii. 26, "bitter things;" in Deut. xxxii. 32, "bitter;" hence applied to the bile or "gall" from its intense bitterness (Job xvi. 13, xx. 25); also = the poison of serpents (Job xx. 14), which the ancients erroneously believed was their "gall."—2. Heb. rôsh, generally translated "gall" by the A. V., is in Hos. x. 4 rendered "hemlock;" in Deut. xxxii. 33, and Job. x. 16, "poison" or "venom" (of serpents). From Deut. xxix. 18, and Lam. iii. 19, compared with Hos. x. 4, it is evident that the Hebrew denotes some bitter, and perhaps poisonous plant. Celsius thinks poison "hemlock," Conium maculatum, is intended.

Gesenius understands "poppies." The various species of this family (Papaveraceæ) spring up quickly in corn-fields, and the juice is extremely bitter. A steeped solution of poppy-heads may be "the water of gall" (Jer. viii. 14).—The passages in the Gospels which relate the circumstance of the Roman soldiers offering our Lord, just before His crucifixion, "vinegar mingled with gall" (Gr. cholê; Mat. xxvii. 34), and "wine mingled with myrrh" (Mk. xv. 23), require some consideration. "Matthew, in his usual way," as Hengstenberg remarks, "designates the drink theologically: always keeping his eye on the prophecies of the O. T., he speaks of gall and vinegar for the purpose of rendering the fulfilment of the Psalms more manifest. Mark again, according to his way, looks rather at the outward quality of the drink." "Gall" is not to be understood in any other sense than as expressing the bitter nature of the draught. Notwithstanding the almost concurrent opinion of ancient and modern commentators that the "wine mingled with myrrh" was offered to our Lord as an anodyne, we cannot readily come to the same conclusion. Had the soldiers intended a mitigation of suffering, they would doubtless have offered a draught drugged with some substance having narcotic properties. The drink in question was probably a mere ordinary beverage of the Romans (so Mr. Houghton). The Gr. cholê (in LXX. = No. 1 and 2) is also translated "gall" in Acts viii. 23, where "gall of bitterness" (i. e. bitter gall) = malignant, aggravated depravity (Hackett), or a poisonous moral condition (Rev. I. Jennings in Kitzo). BITTER HERBS.

Galler-y, an architectural term, describing the porticos or verandas, which are not uncommon in Eastern houses. It is doubtful, however, whether the Hebrew words, so translated, have any reference to such an object. (1.) In Cant. i. 17 the Heb. rahû or râchû (translated in plural "rafters," margin "galleries") = carved or fretted ceiling, Gesenius.—(2.) In Cant. vii. 5 (Heb. 6), the Heb. rahat, translated "gutters" (Gen. xxx. 38, 41), and "troughs" (Ex. ii. 16), is applied to the hair, the regularly arranged, flowing locks being compared by the poet to the channels of running water seen in the pasture-grounds of Palestine.—(3.) In Ez. xli. 15, 16, xlii. 3, 5, the Heb. atik seems = a pillar used for the support of a floor (so Mr. Bevan, Villalpandus, &c.; but Gesenius, Fürst, Hävernick, &c., translate terrace, or gallery).

Gall'ey. SHIP.

Gall'im (Heb. heaps, or possibly springs), a place mentioned in the Bible—(1.) As the native place of the man to whom Michal, David's wife, was given—"Phalti the son of Laish, who was from Gallim" (1 Sam. xxv. 44).—(2.) In the catalogue of places terrified at the approach of Sennacherib (Is. x. 30). It was perhaps a short distance N. of Jerusalem. The name of Gallim has not been met with in modern times.

Gall'io (L. giving suck, milky, Walton's Polyglott). Junius Annæus Gallio, the Roman proconsul of Achaia when St. Paul was at Corinth, A. D. 53, under the Emperor Claudius. He was brother to Lucius Annæus Seneca, the philosopher, and was originally named Marcus Annæus Novatus, but got the above name from his adoption into the family of the rhetorician Lucius Junius Gallio. Seneca says he was universally beloved. The idea that Gallio was indifferent to all religion is not conveyed by the Scriptures, though he refused to take cognizance of the Jews' charges against the apostle, and did not interfere with the Greeks who assaulted Sosthenes in his presence (Acts xviii. 12–17). He is said to have been put to death by Nero, "as well as his brother Seneca, but not at the same time" (Winer); but there is apparently no authority for this. Jerome, in the Chronicle of Eusebius, says that he committed suicide, 65 A. D.

Gall'ows. PUNISHMENTS.

Gam'a-el (Gr.) = DANIEL 2 (1 Esd. viii. 29).

Ga-ma'li-el (Gr. and L. fr. Heb. = reward of God, benefit of God, Ges.). 1. Son of Pedahzur; prince or captain of Manasseh at the census at Sinai (Num. i. 10, ii. 20, vii. 54, 59), and at starting on the march through the wilderness (x. 23).—2. A Pharisee and celebrated doctor of the law, who gave prudent worldly advice in the Sanhedrim respecting the treatment of the followers of Jesus of Nazareth (Acts v. 34 ff.). He was the preceptor of St. Paul (xxii. 3). He is generally identified with the very celebrated Jewish doctor Gamaliel. This Gamaliel was son of Rabbi Simeon, and grandson of the celebrated Hillel; he was president of the Sanhedrim under Tiberius, Caligula, and Claudius, and is reported to have died eighteen years before the destruction of Jerusalem. The Jewish accounts make him die a Pharisee. Ecclesiastical tradition (improbably) makes him become a Christian, and baptized by St. Peter and St. Paul.

Games. The notices of juvenile games are very few. It must not, however, be inferred from this that the Hebrew children were without the amusements adapted to their age (Zech. viii. 5). The only sports, recorded in the Bible, are keeping tame birds (Job xli. 5), and imitating the proceedings of marriages or funerals (Mat. xi. 16). Manly games were not much followed up by the Hebrews; the natural earnestness of their character and the influence of the climate alike indisposed them to active exertion. The chief amusement of the men appears to have consisted in conversation and joking (Jer. xv. 17; Prov. xxvi. 19). A military exercise seems to be noticed in 2 Sam. ii. 14. In Jerome's day the usual sport consisted in lifting weights as a trial of strength, as also practised in Egypt. Dice are mentioned by the Talmudists, probably introduced from Egypt. Public games were altogether foreign to the spirit of Hebrew institutions: the great religious festivals supplied the pleasurable excitement and the feelings of national union which rendered the games of Greece so popular, and at the same time inspired the persuasion that such gatherings should be exclusively connected with religious duties. Accordingly, the erection of a gymnasium by JASON 4 was looked upon as a heathenish proceeding (1 Mc. i. 14; 2 Mc. iv. 12–14). The entire absence of verbal or historical reference to this subject in the Gospels shows how little it entered into the life of the Jews. Among the Greeks, the rage for theatrical exhibitions was such, that every city of any size possessed its theatre and stadium. At Ephesus an annual contest was held in honor of Diana. (ASTARCHS.) Probably ST. PAUL was present when these games were proceeding. A direct reference to the exhibitions that took place on such occasions is made in 1 Cor. xv. 32. St. Paul's Epistles abound with allusions to the Greek contests, borrowed probably from the Isthmian games, at which he may well have been present during his first visit to Corinth. These contests (2 Tim. iv. 7; 1 Tim. vi. 12) were divided into two classes, the pancratium, consisting of boxing and wrestling, and the pentathlon, consisting of leaping, running, quoit (Discus), hurling the spear, and wrestling. The competitors (1 Cor. ix. 25; 2 Tim. ii. 5) required a long and severe course of previous training (1 Tim. iv. 8), during which a particular diet was enforced (1 Cor. ix. 25, 27). In the Olympic contests these preparatory exercises extended over a period of ten months, during the last of which they were conducted under the supervision of appointed officers. The contests took place in the presence of a vast multitude of spectators (Heb. xii. 1), the competitors being the spectacle (1 Cor. iv. 9; Heb. x. 33). The games were opened by the proclamation of a herald (1 Cor. ix. 27), whose office it was to give out the name and country of each candidate, and especially to announce the name of the victor before the assembled multitude. the prize (2 Tim. ii. 5). The judge was selected for his spotless integrity (2 Tim. iv. 8): his office was to decide any disputes (Col. iii. 15), and to give the prize (1 Cor. ix. 24; Phil. iii. 14), consisting of a crown (2 Tim. ii. 5, iv. 8) of leaves of wild olive at also placed in the hands of the victors (Rev. vii. 9). St. Paul alludes to two only out of the five contests, boxing and running, most frequently to the latter. In boxing (compare 1 Cor. ix. 26), the hands and arms were bound with the cestus, a band of leather studded with nails. The foot-race (2 Tim. iv. 7) was run in the stadium (1 Cor. ix. 24), an oblong area, open at one end and rounded in a semicircular form at the other, along the sides of which were the raised tiers of seats on which the spectators sat. The judge was stationed by the goal (Phil. iii. 14), which was clearly visible from one end of the stadium to the other. St. Paul brings vividly before our minds the earnestness of the competitor, having cast off every encumbrance, especially any closely-fitting robe (Heb. xii. 1), holding on his course uninterrupted (Phil. iii. 12), his eye fixed on the distant goal (Heb. xii. 2, xi. 26), unmindful of the space already past, and stretching forward with bent body (Phil. iii. 12), his perseverance (Heb. xii. 1), his joy at the completion of the course (Acts xx. 24), his exultation as he not only receives (Phil. iii. 12), but actually grasps (not "apprehend" as A.V. in Phil.; 1 Tim. vi. 12, 19) the crown which had been set apart (2 Tim. iv. 8) for the victor.

GAMMA-DIM (Heb. pl., see below), or GAMMA-DIMS. This word occurs only in Ez. xxvii. 11, and has been translated—(1.) Pigmies (Vulgate, Kimchi, &c.).—(2.) As a geographical or local term = Ancon, Cappadocians, &c. (Grotius, Chal., &c.).—(3.) In a more general sense, brave warriors, Ges.; deserters, Hitzig. After all, the rendering in the LXX., guards, furnishes the simplest explanation.

GAMUL (Heb. veaned, Ges.), a priest; the leader of the twenty-second course in the service of the sanctuary (1 Chr. xxiv. 17).

GAR. "Sons of Gar" are named among the "sons of the servants of Solomon" in 1 Esd. v. 34, not in Ezr. and Neh.

GARDEN (Heb. gan, gannâh, ginnâh; Gr. kēpos). Gardens in the East, as the Hebrew indicates, are enclosures, on the outskirts of towns, planted with various trees and shrubs. From the allusions in the Bible, we learn that they were surrounded by hedges of thorn (Is. v. 5), or walls of stone (Prov. xiv. 31). For further protection, lodges (Is. i. 8; Lam. ii. 6) or watchtowers (Mk. xii. 1) were built in them, in which sat the keeper (Job xxvii. 18) to drive away the wild beasts and robbers, as is the case to this day. The gardens of the Hebrews were planted with flowers and aromatic shrubs (Cant. vi. 2, iv. 16), also trees yielding olives, figs, nuts (vi. 11), pomegranates, and other fruits for domestic use (Ex. xxiii. 11; Jer. xxix. 5; Am. ix. 14). Gardens of herbs, or kitchen-gardens, are mentioned in Deut. xi. 10, and 1 K. xxi. 2. Cucumbers were grown in them (Is. i. 8; Bar. vi. 70), and probably also melons, leeks, onions, and garlic (Num. xi. 5). (AGRICULTURE; Food.) The rose-garden in Jerusalem, said to have been situated existed within the city walls. But of all the gardens of Palestine none is possessed of associations more sacred and imperishable than the garden of GETHSEMANE. In addition to the ordinary productions of the country, we are tempted to infer from Is. xvii. 10 that in some gardens care was bestowed on rearing exotics. In a climate like that of Palestine, the neighborhood of water was an important consideration in selecting the site of a garden. To the old Hebrew poets, "a well-watered garden," or "a tree planted by the waters," was an emblem of luxuriant fertility and material prosperity (Is. lviii. 11; Jer. xvii. 8, xxxi. 12). (EDEN 1.) From a neighboring stream or cistern were supplied the channels or conduits, by which the gardens were intersected, and the water was thus conveyed to all parts (Ps. i. 3; Eccl. ii. 6; Ecclus. xiv. 30). On the expression "to water with the foot" in Deut. xi. 10, see AGRICULTURE; EGYPT. The orange, lemon, and mulberry groves which lie around and behind Jaffa, supply perhaps the most striking peculiarities of Oriental gardens—gardens which Maundrell describes as "a confused miscellany of trees jumbled together, without either posts, walks, arbors, or any thing of art or design, so that they seem like thickets rather than gardens." The kings and nobles had their country houses surrounded by gardens (1 K. xxi. 1; 2 K. ix. 27), and these were used on festal occasions (Cant. v. 1). The garden of Ahasuerus was in a court of the palace (Esth. i. 5), adjoining the banqueting-hall (vii. 7). In Babylon (BABEL) the gardens and orchards were enclosed by the city walls. In large gardens, the orchard was probably, as in Egypt, the enclosure set apart for the cultivation of date and sycamore trees, and fruit-trees of various kinds (Cant. iv. 13; Eccl. ii. 5). The ancient Hebrews made use of gardens as places of BURIAL (Jn. xix. 41). Manasseh and his son Amon were buried in the garden of their palace, the garden of Uzza (2 K. xxi. 18, 26). The retirement of gardens rendered them favorite places for devotion (Mat. xxi. 36; Jn. xviii. 1). In the degenerate times of the monarchy they were selected as the scenes of idolatrous worship (Is. i. 29, lxv. 3, lxvi. 17), and images of the idols were probably erected in them. Gardeners are alluded to in Job xxvii. 18 and Jn. ix. 15. But how far the art of gardening was carried among the Hebrews we have few means of ascertaining. That they were acquainted with grafting is evident from Rom. xi. 17, 24, as well as from the minute prohibitions of the Mishna; and propagating plants by layers or cuttings was not unknown (Is. xvii. 10). The traditional gardens and pools of Solomon, supposed to be alluded to in Eccl. ii. 5, 6, are shown in the Wady Urtas (i. e. Hortus, L. = garden), about one and a quarter hours S.W. of Bethlehem (compare Jos. viii. 7, § 3). (POOL.) The "king's garden," mentioned in 2 K. xxv. 4; Neh. iii. 15; Jer. xxxix. 4, lii. 7, was near the pool of Siloam, at the mouth of the Tyropæon, N. of Bir Eyûb (EX-ROGEL), and was formed by the meeting of the valleys of Jehoshaphat and Hinnom. JERUSALEM.

W. of the temple mount, is remarkable as one of the few gardens which, from the time of the prophets,

* Gar'den-house (Heb. béyth-haggan), a place by the way of which King AHAZIAH 2 fled from Jehu; probably at EN-GANNIM, the modern Jenin (2 K. ix. 27).

Gar'eb (Heb. scabby, Ges.), "the ITHRITE," one of the heroes of David's army (2 Sam. xxi. 38; 1 Chr. xi. 40).

Gar'eb (Heb. scabby, Ges.), the HILL, in the neighborhood of Jerusalem (Jer. xxxi. 39 only), supposed to have been the place to which lepers were sent from the city (Kitto).

Gar'i-zim = GERIZIM (2 Mc. v. 23; vi. 2).

* Gar'land = a wreath (Acts xiv. 13). CROWN.

Gar'ile (Heb. shûm) (Num. xi. 5), a vegetable allied to the onion; the Allium sativum, Linn., which abounds in Egypt.

Gar'ment. DRESS; MANTLE.

Gar'mite (fr. Heb. = descendant of Gerem; bony, Ges.; strong, Fû.), the. Keilah the Garmite is mentioned in the obscure genealogical lists of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 19).

* Gar'ner. BARN; TREASURY.

Gar'ri-son. The Hebrew words so rendered in the A. V. are derivatives from the root nâtsab, to place, erect, which may be applied to a variety of objects. 1. Matseab and matsebbâh undoubtedly = a "garrison," or fortified post (1 Sam. xiii. 23, xiv. 1, 4, 6, 11, 12, 15; 2 Sam. xxiii. 14).—2. Netsib also = "garrison" (1 Chr. xi. 16), but elsewhere (so Mr. Bevan, after the LXX.) = a column erected in an enemy's country as a token of conquest (1 Sam. xiii. 3, A. V. and Ges. "garrison"). The same word elsewhere (so Mr. Bevan) = officers placed over a vanquished people (2 Sam. viii. 6, 14; 1 Chr. xviii. 13; 2 Chr. xvii. 2); Gesenius agrees with the A. V. in most of these in translating "garrison".—3. Matsebbâh in Ez. xxvi. 11 (A. V. "garrison") = a PILLAR. Mr. Bevan, Fairbairn, &c., give the Hebrew here its more usual meaning.—4. In 2 Cor. xi. 32, the Greek verb phroureô (= to keep watch or guard, L. & S.) is translated "kept with a garrison."

Cash'mu (Heb.) = GESHEM (Neh. vi. 6).

Ga'tam (Heb. one puny and thin, Ges.), fourth son of Eliphaz the son of Esau (Gen. xxxvi. 11; 1 Chr. i. 36), and one of the "dukes" of Eliphaz (Gen. xxxvi. 16).

Gate (Heb. sha'ar, usually translated "gate;" petlah or pelhach, "entering," "entrance," "entry," "door," "gate;" saph, "threshold," "door-post," "post," "door," "gate," "BASIN," &c.; deleth, usually "door," also "gate," "two-leaved gate," &c.; Chal. thra', twice only, in Dan. ii. 49, iii. 26, "gate," "mouth," margin "door;" Gr. thura, usually translated "door," once "gate" of the temple; pulê, uniformly "gate;" pulon, "gate," once "porch"). The gates and gateways of Eastern cities anciently held and still hold an important part, not only in the defence but in the public economy of the place. They thus sometimes represent the city itself (Gen. xxii. 17, xxiv. 60; Deut. xii. 12; Judg. v. 8; Ru. iv. 10; Ps. lxxxvii. 2, cxxii. 2). Among the special purposes for which they were used may be mentioned—1. As places of public resort, for business, conversation, news (Gen. xix. 1, xxiii. 10, xxxiv. 20, 24; 1 Sam. iv. 18, &c.). 2. Places for public deliberation, administration of justice, or of audience for kings and rulers, or ambassadors (Deut. xvi. 18, xxi. 19, xxv. 7; Josh. xx. 4, &c.). 3. Public markets (2 K. vii. 1). In heathen towns, the open spaces near the gates appear to have been sometimes used as places for sacrifice (Acts xiv. 13; compare 2 K. xxiii. 8). Regarded, therefore, as positions of great importance, the gates of cities were carefully guarded and closed at nightfall (Deut. iii. 5; Josh. ii. 5, 7; Judg. ix. 40, 44, &c.). They contained chambers over the gateway (2 Sam. xviii. 24). The gateways of Assyrian cities were arched or square-headed entrances in the wall, sometimes flanked by towers. The doors themselves, of the larger gates mentioned in Scripture, were twoleaved, plated with metal, closed with locks, and fastened with metal bars (Deut. iii. 5; Judg. xvi. 3; Ps. cvii. 16; Is. xlv. 1, 2, &c.). Gates not defended by iron were of course liable to be set on fire by an enemy (Judg. ix. 52). The gateways of royal palaces, and even of private houses, were often richly ornamented. Sentences from the Law were inscribed on and above the gates (Deut. vi. 9, xi.

Egyptian Door-pins.—1. Upper pin, on which the door turned. 2. Lower pin.—(Wilkinson.)

20). The gates of Solomon's Temple were very massive and costly, being overlaid with gold and carvings (1 K. vi. 34, 35; 2 K. xviii. 16). Those of the Holy Place were of olive-wood, two-leaved, and overlaid with gold; those of the Temple of fir (1 K. vi. 31, 32, 34; Ez. xli. 23, 24). The figurative "gates" of pearl and precious stones (Is. liv. 12; Rev. xxi. 21) may be regarded as having their types in the massive stone doors in some of the ancient houses in Syria. These are of single slabs several inches thick, sometimes ten feet high, and turn on stone pivots above and below. (HINGE.) Egyptian doorways were often richly ornamented. The parts of the doorway were the threshold (Judg. xix. 27);

the side-posts, the lintel (Ex. xii. 7). Levites were the hereditary "porters" (i. e. door-keepers) in the Temple; and in houses of the wealthier classes, and in palaces, persons were especially appointed to keep the door (Jer. xxxv. 4; 2 K. xii. 9, xxv. 18, &c.). "Gates" are figuratively ascribed to HEAVEN (Gen. xxviii. 17), also to DEATH (Job xxxviii. 17, &c.), &c. In Mat. xvi. 18, "the gates of hell" = the power of the kingdom of Satan. ANTIOCH; CITY; COMMERCE; CURTAIN; FENCED CITY; HOUSE; JERUSALEM; JUDGE; PORCH; PORTER; TEMPLE.

Gath (Heb. vine-press), one of the five royal cities of the Philistines (Josh. xiii. 3; 1 Sam. vi. 17); and the native place of the giant GOLIATH (1 Sam. xvii. 4, 23). The site of Gath for many centuries remained unknown. After a careful survey of the country in 1857, and a minute examination of the several passages of Scripture in which the name is mentioned, Mr. Porter came to the conclusion that it stood upon the conspicuous hill now called Tell es-Sifeh, where are the foundations of an old castle, with other traces of ancient buildings, and a modern village. This hill, irregular in form, and about 200 feet high, stands upon the side of the plain of Philistia, at the foot of the mountains of Judah, ten miles E. of Ashdod, about the same S. by E. of Ekron, and six miles N. of ELEUTHEROPOLIS. Thomson (ii. 360) regards Gath as = Eleutheropolis, now Beit Jibrin (= house of giants). He says the name Khurbet Geth (= ruins of Gath) is now applied to one of the heaps of rubbish a short distance W. of the castle of Beit Jibrin. He makes MARESHAH (Josh. xv. 44) a suburb of Gath; hence MORESHETH-GATH (Mic. i. 14). Gath occupied a strong position (2 Chr. xi. 8) on the border of Judah and Philistia (1 Sam. xxi. 10; 1 Chr. xviii. 1); and from its strength and resources, forming the key of both countries, was the scene of frequent struggles, and was often captured and recaptured (2 Chr. xi. 8, xxvi. 6; 2 K. xii. 17; Am. vi. 2). It was near Shocoh and Adullam (2 Chr. xi. 8), and appears to have stood on the way leading from the former to Ekron; for when the Philistines fled on the death of Goliath, they went "by the way of Shaaraim, even unto Gath and unto Ekron" (1 Sam. xvii. 1, 52). DAVID fled twice to ACHISH, king of Gath. IRTAI 1 was from Gath. The ravages of war to which Gath was exposed appear to have destroyed it at a comparatively early period, as it is not mentioned among the other royal cities by the later prophets (Zeph. ii. 4; Zech. ix. 5, 6). GITTITES.

Gath-he'pher, or Git'tah-he'pher (both Heb. = wine-press of the well), a town on the border of Zebulun, not far from Japhia (Josh. xix. 12, 13), celebrated as the native place of the prophet JONAH (2 K. xiv. 25). Porter identifies it with el-Meshhat, a village two miles E. of Sefûrieh (Sepphoris). Jonah's tomb is still shown there.

Gath-rim'mon (Heb. press of the pomegranate, Ges.). 1. A city of Dan given to the Levites (Josh. xxi. 24; 1 Chr. vi. 69), situated on the plain of Philistia, apparently not far from Joppa (Josh. xix. 45); supposed by Robinson (ii. 67) to be at the modern Deir Dabbân. (ADULLAM.)—2. A town of Manasseh W. of the Jordan, assigned to the Levites (Josh. xxi. 25); = BILEAM.

Ga'za (L. fr. Heb. 'Azzâh = the strong, Ges.; see AZZAH), one of the five chief cities of the Philistines. It is remarkable for its continuous existence and importance from the very earliest times. It is the last town in the S. W. of Palestine, on the road between Syria and the valley of the Nile. This peculiarity of situation has made Gaza important in a military as well as commercial sense. Its name (= the strong) was well elucidated in its siege by Alexander the Great, which lasted five months.

This city was one of the most important military positions in the wars of the Maccabees (1 Mc. xi. 61, 62, xiii. 43). By the Romans it was assigned to the kingdom of Herod, and afterward to the province of Syria. Some of the most important campaigns of the crusaders took place in the neighborhood. The Biblical history of Gaza may be traced through the following stages. In Gen. x. 19 it appears, even before the call of Abraham, as a "border" city of the Canaanites. In the conquest of Joshua, the territory of Gaza is mentioned as one which he was not able to subdue (Josh. x. 41, xi. 22, xiii. 3). It was assigned to Judah (Josh. xv. 47), and that tribe did obtain possession of it (Judg. i. 18); but they did not hold it long; for soon afterward we find it in the hands of the Philistines (Judg. iii. 3, xiii. 1, xvi. 1, 21); indeed, it seems to have been their capital; and, notwithstanding the efforts of SAMSON, who died here, Gaza apparently continued, through the times of Samuel, Saul, and David, to be a Philistine city (1 Sam. vi. 17, xiv. 52, xxxi. 1; 2 Sam. xxi. 15). Solomon became master of it (1 K. iv. 24, A. V. "AZZAH"). But in after-times the same trouble with the Philistines recurred (2 K. xviii. 8; 2 Chr. xxi. 16, xxvi. 6, xxviii. 18; Am. i. 6, 7; Zeph. ii. 4; Zech. ix. 5). Gaza is mentioned in the N. T. (Acts viii. 26) in the account of the baptism of the Ethiopian eunuch on his return from Jerusalem to Egypt. The words "which is desert" have given rise to much discussion. The probability is, that they refer to the road, and are used by the angel to inform PHILIP, who was then in Samaria, on what route he would find the eunuch. Besides the ordinary road from Jerusalem by Ramleh to Gaza, there was another, more favorable for carriages (Acts viii. 28), further to the S. through Hebron, and thence through a district comparatively without towns, and much exposed to the incursions of people from the desert. The modern town, called Ghuzzeh, contains about 15,000 inhabitants. It is situated partly on an oblong hill of moderate height and partly on the lower ground. The climate of the place is almost tropical, but it has deep wells of excellent water. There are a few palm-trees in the town, and its fruit-orchards are very productive. But the chief feature of the neighborhood is the wide-spread olive-grove to the N. and N. E. GAZATHITES; GAZITES.

Gaz'a-ra (Gr. = GAZER or GEZER), a place frequently mentioned in the wars of the Maccabees, and of great importance in the operations of both parties (1 Mc. ix. 52; xiii. 53, xiv. 7, 33, 34, 36, xv. 28, xvi. 1; 2 Mc. x. 32-36); probably = GEZER or GAZER.

Gazath-ites, the = the inhabitants of GAZA (Josh. xiii. 3); elsewhere GAZITES.

Gazer (Heb.) = GEZER (2 Sam. v. 25; 1 Chr. xiv. 16).

Gaz'era (Gr.). 1. GAZARA (1 Mc. iv. 15; vii. 45). —2. GAZZAM (1 Esd. v. 31).

Gaz'ez (Heb. shearer, Ges.), a name which occurs twice in 1 Chr. ii. 46; (1.) as son of Caleb by Ephah his concubine; (2.) as son of Haran, the son of the same woman; the second is possibly only a repetition of the first.

Gazites, the = the inhabitants of GAZA (Judg. xvi. 2). GAZATHITES.

Gaz'am (Heb. devouring, Ges.), ancestor of certain Nethinim who returned from the Captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 48; Neh. vii. 51).

Geba [g as in get] (Heb. the hill). 1. A city of Benjamin, allotted to the priests (Josh. xxi. 17; 1 Chr. vi. 60). It is named in the first group of Benjamite towns, apparently those lying near to and along the N. boundary (Josh. xviii. 24, A. V. "GABA"). During the wars of the earlier part of the reign of Saul, Geba was held as a garrison by the Philistines (1 Sam. xiii. 3), but they were ejected by Jonathan. (GARRISON 2.) Later, in the same campaign, in defining the position of the two rocks, which stood in the ravine below the garrison of MICHMASH, the terms fix Geba on the S. and Michmash on the N. of the ravine (1 Sam. xiv. 5, A. V. "GIBEAH"). Exactly in accordance with this is the position of the modern village of Jeba, which stands picturesquely on the top of its steep, terraced hill, on the very edge of the great Wady Suweinil, looking N. to the opposite village, which also retains its old name of Mukhmas. Geba was fortified by Asa (1 K. xv. 22; 2 Chr. xvi. 6), and was the N. limit of the kingdom of Judah (2 K. xxiii. 8). It was occupied by the Benjamites after the Captivity (Neh. xi. 31). —2. The Geba named in Jd. iii. 10 must be the modern village Jeba, on the road between Samaria and Jenin (En-gannim), about three miles from the former.

Gebal (Heb. mountain, Ges.), a proper name, occurring in Ps. lxxxiii. 7, in connection with Edom and Moab, Ammon and Amalek, the Philistines and the inhabitants of Tyre. Mr. Ffoulkes maintains that the Gebal of the Psalm = the Gebal of Ez. xxvii. 9, a celebrated maritime town of Phenicia, the "Biblus" (or Byblus) of profane literature, celebrated as the birth-place and principal sanctuary of Adonis. It is called Jebel by the Arabs, and situated on the Mediterranean, about twenty miles N. of Beirút. (GIBLITES.) But Gesenius, Fürst, Fairbairn, Porter (in Kitto), &c., make the Gebal of Ps. lxxxiii. 7 = Gebalene (now Jebel), the district round Petra. EDOM.

Geber (Heb. a man). 1. The "son of Geber" (margin "BEN-GEBER") was Solomon's commissary, who resided in Ramoth-Gilead, and had charge of Havoth-Jair, and the district of Argob (1 K. iv. 13). —2. Geber the son of Uri, also Solomon's commissary, had a district S. of the former—the "country of Gilead," probably the modern Lelka (1 K. iv. 19). Perhaps "the land" in this verse = the country over which the two kings, Sihon and Og, formerly reigned, excluding the parts assigned to two other commissaries (ver. 13, 14); or this Geber may have been a superior officer or superintendent of the three districts, as "the only officer" in the A. V. is literally "one officer."

Ge'blm (Heb., probably = the ditches, Mr. Grove; cisterna or locuste, Ges.), a village N. of Jerusalem (Is. x. 31), apparently between ANATHOTH and the ridge on which NOB was situated. El-'Isawiyyeh occupies about the right spot (so Mr. Grove).

Ged-a-l'lah (fr. Heb. = whom Jehovah has made great or powerful, Ges.). 1. Son of Ahikam (Jeremiah's protector), and grandson of Shaphan, the secretary of King Josiah. After the destruction of the Temple, b. c. 588, Nebuchadnezzar departed from Judea, leaving Gedaliah with a Chaldean guard (Jer. xl. 5) at Mizpah, to govern the vine-dressers and husbandmen (lii. 16) who were exempted from captivity. Jeremiah joined Gedaliah; and Mizpah became the resort of Jews from various quarters (xl. 6, 11). Gedaliah's gentle and popular character, his hereditary piety, the prosperity of his brief rule (xl. 12), the reverence which revived and was fostered under him for the ruined Temple (xli. 6), fear of the Chaldean conquerors whose officer he was—all proved insufficient to secure Gedaliah from BAALIS and ISHMAEL 6. He was murdered by Ishmael two months after his appointment. —2. A Levite, one of the six sons of Jeduthun who played the harp in the service of Jehovah (1 Chr. xxv. 8, 9). —3. A priest in Ezra's time (Ezr. x. 18). —4. Son of Pashur (Jer. xxxviii. 1), one of those who caused Jeremiah to be imprisoned. —5. Grandfather of Zephaniah the prophet (Zeph. i. 1).

Ged'dar (fr. Gr.) = GAHAR (1 Esd. v. 30).

Ged'e-on (Gr. = GIDEON). 1. Ancestor of Judith (Jd. viii. 1). —2. GIDEON (Heb. xi. 32).

Geder (Heb. wall, Ges.). The king of Geder was one of the thirty-one kings overcome by Joshua on the W. of the Jordan (Josh. xii. 13). Gesenius makes Geder perhaps = GEDERAH. Possibly (so Mr. Grove) it may = GEDOR 5 in 1 Chr. iv. 39.

Ged'e-rah (Heb. wall, enclosure, fold, Ges.), a town of Judah in the lowland country (Josh. xv. 36), apparently in its eastern part; not identified; perhaps (so Gesenius) = BETU-GADER.

Ged'e-rath-ite, the = the native or inhabitant of a place called GEDERAH, apparently in Benjamin (1 Chr. xii. 4).

Geder-ite, or Ged'e-rite, the = the native or inhabitant of some place named GEDER or GEDERAH (1 Chr. xxvii. 28).

Ged'e-roth (Heb. pl. of GEDERAH = sheep-cotes), a town in the low country of Judah (Josh. xv. 41; 2 Chr. xxviii. 18); identified by Wilton (in Fairbairn, under Kithlish) with el-Judideh, W. of Tell el-Hazy, and S. of 'Ajlán (Eglon).

Ged'e-ro-tha'im (Heb. dual of GEDERAH = two sheep-folds), a town in the low country of Judah (Josh. xv. 36), named next in order to GEDERAH.

Ged'or (Heb. wall, Ges.). 1. A town in the mountains of Judah (Josh. xv. 58), a few miles N. of Hebron; probably at the ruined village Jed'ur, half way between Bethlehem and Hebron, about two miles W. of the road (Robinson). —2. The town, apparently of Benjamin, to which "Jehoram of Gedor" belonged (1 Chr. xii. 7).—3. An ancestor of Saul (1 Chr. viii. 31, ix. 37).—4. "Penuel the father of Gedor" and "Jered the father of Gedor" are mentioned in the genealogies of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 4, 18).—5. In 1 Chr. iv. 39, certain chiefs of Simeon are said to have gone, in the reign of Hezekiah, "to the entrance of Gedor, unto the E. side of the valley," and expelled thence the Hamites, &c. (GEDER.) If what is told in verse 42 was a subsequent incident in the same expedition, then we should look for Gedor between the S. of Judah and Mount Seir, i. e. Petra. No place of the name has yet been met with in that direction. The LXX. read Gerar for Gedor.

Ge-ha-zi (Heb. valley of vision, Ges.), the servant or boy of Elisha. He was sent as the prophet's messenger on two occasions to the good Shunammite (2 K. iv.); obtained fraudulently money and garments from Naaman, was miraculously smitten with incurable leprosy, and was dismissed from the prophet's service (v.). Afterward he is mentioned as relating to King Joram all the great things which Elisha had done, when the Shunammite appeared (viii.).

Ge-hen-na (L. fr. Heb. gáy-hinnóm = valley of Hinnom), in A. V. the "valley of Hinnom" or "of the son (or 'children') of Hinnom;" a deep, narrow glen S. of Jerusalem, where, after the introduction of the worship of the fire-gods by Ahaz, the idolatrous Jews offered their children to Molech (2 Chr. xxviii. 3, xxxiii. 6; Jer. vii. 31, xix. 2-6). It became in later times the image of the place of everlasting punishment. ETERNAL; HELL; HINNOM, VALLEY OF; TOPHET.

Gel'loth (Heb. pl. = circles, circuits, regions, Ges.), a place named on the S. boundary line of Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 17). Mr. Grove supposes Gilgal is the right reading. Or Geliloth may be another name = GILGAL 1.

Ge-mal'il (Heb. camel-driver or camel-rider, Ges.), father of Ammiel, the Danite spy (Num. xiii. 12).

Gem-sa-r'iah (Heb. whom Jehovah has perfected, Ges.). 1. Son of Shaphan the scribe, and father of Michaiah. He was one of the nobles of Judah, and had a chamber in the house of the Lord, from which Baruch read Jeremiah's alarming prophecy in the ears of all the people, b. c. 606 (Jer. xxxvi.).—2. Son of Hilkiah, and bearer of Jeremiah's letter to the captive Jews (xxix.).

Gems [jemz]. STONES, PRECIOUS.

Gen-e-al-o-gy (fr. Gr. = an account or record of pedigree, or lineage; or the lineage itself). In Hebrew the term for a genealogy or pedigree is "the book of the generations;" and because the oldest histories were usually drawn up on a genealogical basis, the expression often extended to the whole history. Nor is this genealogical form of history peculiar to the Hebrews, or the Shemitic races. The earliest Greek histories were also genealogies. The promise of the land of Canaan to the seed of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob successively, and the separation of the Israelites from the Gentile world; the expectation of Messiah as to spring from the tribe of Judah; the exclusively hereditary priesthood of Aaron with its dignity and emoluments; the long succession of kings in David's line; and the whole division and occupation of the land upon genealogical principles by the tribes, families, and houses of fathers, gave a deeper importance to the science of genealogy among the Jews than perhaps in any other nation (Gen. iv., v., x., xi., &c.). With Jacob, the founder of the nation, the system of reckoning by genealogies was much further developed. In Gen. xxxv. 22-26, we have a formal account of the sons of Jacob, the patriarchs of the nation, repeated in Ex. i. 1-5. In Gen. xlv. we have an exact genealogical census of the house of Israel at the time of Jacob's going down to Egypt. When the Israelites were in the wilderness of Sinai, their number was taken by Divine command "after their families, by the house of their fathers" (Num. i., iii.). (CENSUS.) According to these genealogical divisions they pitched their tents, and marched, and offered their gifts and offerings, chose the spies, and divided the land of Canaan. The tribe of Levi was probably the only one which had no admixture of foreign blood. (CHRONOLOGY.) In many of the Scripture genealogies it is quite clear that birth was not the ground of their incorporation into their respective tribes (so Lord A. C. Hervey, original author of this article). (BECHER; CALEB.) However, birth was, and continued to be throughout their whole national course, the foundation of all the Jewish organization, and the reigns of the more active and able kings and rulers were marked by attention to genealogical operations. When David established the temple services on the footing which continued till the time of Christ, he divided the priests and Levites into courses and companies, each under the family chief. In Rehoboam's reign we have Iddo's work concerning genealogies (2 Chr. xii. 15). When Hezekiah reopened the Temple, and restored the temple services which had fallen into disuse, he reckoned the whole nation by genealogies (1 Chr. iv. 41, ix. 1; 2 Chr. xxxi. 16-19). In Jotham's reign we find a genealogical reckoning of the Reubenites (1 Chr. v. 17). When Zerubabel brought back the captivity from Babylon, one of his first cares seems to have been to take a census of those that returned, and to settle them according to their genealogies (1 Chr. iii. 19-24, ix.; Ezr. ii.; Neh. vii., xi., xii.). Passing on to the time of Christ's birth, we have a striking incidental proof of the continuance of the Jewish genealogical economy in the fact that when Augustus ordered the census of the empire to be taken, the Jews in the province of Syria immediately went each one to his own city. Another proof is the existence of our Lord's genealogy in two forms as given by Matthew and Luke. (GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST.) The mention of Zacharias, as "of the course of Abia," of Elizabeth, as "of the daughters of Aaron," and of Anna the daughter of Phanuel, as "of the tribe of Aser," are further indications of the same thing. And this conclusion is expressly confirmed by the testimony of Josephus. From all this it is abundantly manifest that the Jewish genealogical records continued to be kept till near the destruction of Jerusalem. But there can be little doubt that the registers of the Jewish tribes and families perished at the destruction of Jerusalem, and not before. Some partial records probably survived that event, but the Jewish genealogical system then came to an end. Just notions of the nature of the Jewish genealogical records are of great importance with a view to the right interpretation of Scripture. Let it only be remembered that these records have respect to political and territorial divisions, as much as to strictly genealogical descent, and it will at once be seen how erroneous a conclusion it may be, that all who are called "sons" of such or such a patriarch, or chief father, must necessarily be his very children. If any one family or house became extinct, some other would succeed to its place, called after its own chief father. (BECHER 1.) Hence a census of any tribe, drawn up at a later period, would exhibit different divisions from one drawn up earlier (Neh. xii., compare 1 Chr. xxiv.). The same principle must be borne in mind in interpreting any particular genealogy. Again, when a pedigree was abbreviated, it would naturally specify such generations as would indicate from what chief houses the person descended. But then as regards the chronological use of the Scripture genealogies, it follows from the above view that great caution is necessary in using them as measures of time, though they are invaluable for this purpose whenever we can be sure that they are complete. (CHRONOLOGY; FATHER; GENERATION; SON, &c.) Another feature in the Scripture genealogies which it is worth while to notice is the recurrence of the same name, or modifications of the same name, such as Tobias, Tobit, Nathan, Mattatha, and even of names of the same signification, in the same family. The Jewish genealogies have two forms, one giving the generations in a descending, the other in an ascending scale. Examples of the descending form may be seen in Ru. iv. 18-22; 1 Chr. iii.; Mat. i. Of the ascending, 1 Chr. vi. 33-43; Ezr. vii. 1-5; Lk. iii. 23 ff. Females are named in genealogies when there is any thing remarkable about them, or when any right or property is transmitted through them. See Gen. xi. 29, xxii. 23, xxv. 1-4, xxxv. 22-26; Ex. vi. 23; Num. xxvi. 33; 1 Chr. ii. 4, 19, 50, 35, &c.

Genealogy of Jesus Christ. The N. T. gives us the GENEALOGY of but one person, our Saviour (Mat. i.; Lk. iii.). In regard to these two genealogical records respecting our Lord Jesus Christ, two main theories have been held with various modifications:—the first, presented below, that both Matthew and Luke give the genealogy of JOSEPH 11, the reputed and legal father of Jesus (so Calvin, Grotius, Hug, Alford, Ellicott, Lord A. C. Hervey, Fairbairn, &c.); the second that Matthew gives Joseph's genealogy, and Luke that of Mary (MARY, THE VIRGIN), the mother of Jesus (so Luther, Calmet, Lightfoot, Michaelis, Kuinoel, Olshausen, Lange, Hales, Kitto, Robinson, &c.). The following propositions will explain the true construction of these genealogies (so Lord A. C. Hervey):—1. They are both the genealogies of Joseph, i. e. of Jesus Christ, as the reputed and legal son of Joseph and Mary. 2. The genealogy of Matthew is, as Grotius asserted, Joseph's genealogy as legal successor to the throne of David. That of Luke is Joseph's private genealogy, exhibiting his real birth, as David's son, and thus showing why he was heir to Solomon's crown. The simple principle that one evangelist exhibits that genealogy which contained the successive heirs to David's and Solomon's throne, while the other exhibits the paternal stem of him who was the heir, explains all the anomalies of the two pedigrees, their agreements as well as their discrepancies, and the circumstance of their being two at all. 3. Mary, the mother of Jesus, was probably the daughter of Jacob, and first cousin to Joseph her husband.—But besides these main difficulties, as they have been thought to be, there are several others which cannot be passed over in any account, however concise, of the genealogies of Christ. The most startling is the total discrepancy between them both and that of ZERUBBABEL in the O. T. (1 Chr. iii. 19-24). In this last, of seven sons of Zerubbabel, not one bears the name, or any thing like the name, of Rhesa or Abiud; and of the next generation not one bears the name, or any thing like the name, of Eliakim or Joanna, which are in the corresponding generation in Matthew and Luke. Rhesa (so Lord A. C. Hervey) is not a name, but the Chaldee title of the princes of the Captivity. It is very probable therefore that this title was placed against the name of Zerubbabel by some early Christian Jew, and thence crept into the text. If this be so, then Luke gives Joanna as the son of Zerubbabel. But Joanna is the very same name as HANANIAH 8, the son of Zerubbabel according to 1 Chr. iii. 19. In Matthew this generation is omitted. In the next generation Lord A. C. Hervey identifies Matthew's Abjud (ABIUD) with Luke's JUDA 2, and both with HODALAH of 1 Chr. iii. 24, by supposing the SHEMAIAH 2 of 1 Chr. iii. 22 = the SHIMEI 5 of verse 19. The next difficulty is the difference in the number of generations between the two genealogies. Matthew's division into three fourteens gives only 42, while Luke, from Abraham to Christ inclusive, reckons 56, or, which is more to the point (since the generations between Abraham and David are the same in both genealogies), while Matthew reckons 28 from David to Christ, Luke reckons 43, or 42 without Rhesa. But the genealogy itself supplies the explanation. In the second 14, including the kings, we know that three generations are omitted—Ahaziah, Joash, Amaziah—in order to reduce the generations from 17 to 14: the difference between these 17 and the 19 of Luke being very small. So it is obvious that the generations have been abridged in the same way in the third division to keep to the number 14. Another difficulty is the apparent deficiency in the number of the last 14, which seems to contain only 13 names; but Lord A. C. Hervey's explanation of this is, that either in the process of translation, or otherwise, the names of Jehoikim and Jehoiachin are confused and expressed by the one name Jechonias. The last difficulty of sufficient importance to be mentioned here is a chronological one. In both the genealogies there are but three names between Salmon and David—Boaz, Obed, Jesse. But, according to the common chronology, from the entrance into Canaan (when Salmon was come to man's estate) to the birth of David was 405 years, or from that to 500 years and upward. Now, for about an equal period, from Solomon to Jehoiachin, Luke's genealogy contains 20 names. Lord A. C. Hervey maintains that therefore either the chronology or the genealogy is wrong, and asserts that shortening the interval between the Exodus and David by about 200 years, which brings it to the length indicated by the genealogies, does in the most remarkable manner bring Israelitish history into harmony with Egyptian, with the traditional Jewish date of the Exodus, with the fragment of Edomitish history preserved in Gen. xxxvi. 31-39, and with the internal evidence of the Israelitish history itself. (CHRONOLOGY.) The following pedigree will exhibit the successive generations as given by the two Evangelists:—

According to	Adam	Lk. Enoch
Lk.	Seth	Methusala
	Enos	Lamech
	Cainan	Noah
	Malchiel	Shem
	Jared	Arphaxad

Thus it will be seen that the whole number of generations from Adam to Christ, both inclusive, is 74, without the second CAINAN and Rhesa.

Gen'er-a-tion (fr. L.), the A. V. translation of Heb. dôr; Chal. dâr; Gr. genea, genesis in Mat. i. 1, gennéma in the phrase "generation (i. e. offspring, progeny) of vipers," genos in 1 Pet. ii. 9. 1. Abstract :—time, either definite or indefinite. The primary meaning of the Heb. dôr is revolution: hence period of time. From the general idea of a period comes the more special notion of an age or generation of men, the ordinary period of human life. In the long-lived Patriarchal age, a generation seems to have been computed at 100 years (Gen. xv. 16; compare 13, and Ex. xii. 40); the latter reckoning, however, was the same which has been adopted by other civilized nations, viz., from thirty to forty years (Job xlii. 16). For generation = a definite period of time, see Gen. xv. 16; Deut. xxiii. 3, 4, 8, &c. As an indefinite period of time :—for time past, see Deut. xxxii. 7; Is. lviii. 12; for time future, see Ps. xlv. 17, lxxii. 5, &c. "Generation" sometimes = history (Gen. v. 1, vi. 9; Mat. i. 1, &c.); in Genesis ii. 4, a history of the origin (of the heavens and earth). 2. Concrete :—the men of an age, or time. So generation = contemporaries (Is. liii. 8); posterity, especially in legal formulæ (Lev. iii. 17, &c.); fathers, or ancestors (Ps. xlix. 19). Dropping the idea of time, generation = a race, or class of men.—In N. T. for the abstract and indefinite, see Lk. i. 50, Eph. iii. 21 (A. V. "ages"), future: Acts xv. 21 (A. V. "of old time"), Eph. iii. 5 (A. V. "ages"), past. For concrete, see Mat. xi. 16. CHRONOLOGY; GENEALOGY.

Ge-nes'a-reth [g as in get] (L. = GENESARET) appears in the edition of the A. V. of 1611, in Mark vi. 53, and Luke v. 1, following the spelling of the Vulgate. In Mat. xiv. 34 the A. V. originally followed the Received Greek Text—Genesaret. GENESARET.

Gen'e-sis [jen'e-sis] (Gr. origin, generation; Heb. Bereshith = "in the beginning"), the first book of the Law or PENTATEUCH. A. The book of Genesis has an interest and an importance to which no other document of antiquity can pretend. If not absolutely the oldest book in the world, it is the oldest which lays any claim to being a trustworthy history. If the religious books of other nations make any pretensions to vie with it in antiquity, in all other respects they are immeasurably inferior. Genesis is neither like the Hindoo Vedas, a collection of hymns more or less sublime; nor like the Persian Zendavesta, a philosophic speculation on the origin of all things; nor like the Chinese Yih-king, an unintelligible jumble whose expositors could twist it from a cosmological essay into a standard treatise on ethical philosophy. It is a history—a religious history. The earlier portion of the book, so far as the end of chapter xi., may be properly termed a history of the world; the latter is a history of the fathers of the Jewish race. But from first to last it is a religious history. It is very important to bear in mind this religious aspect of the history if we would put ourselves in a position rightly to understand it. Of course the facts must be treated like any other historical facts, sifted in the same way, and subjected to the same laws of evidence. But if we would judge of the work as a whole we must not forget the evident aim of the writer. It is only in this way we can understand, e. g., why the history of the Fall is given with so much minuteness of detail, whereas of whole generations of men we have nothing but a bare catalogue. And only in this way can we account for the fact that by far the greater portion of the book is occupied not with the fortunes of nations, but with the biographies of the three patriarchs, ABRAHAM; ISAAC; JACOB 1.—B. Unity and Design. That a distinct plan and method characterize the work is now generally admitted. What, then, is the plan of the writer? First, we must bear in mind that Genesis is after all but a portion of a larger work. The five books of the PENTATEUCH form a consecutive whole: they are not merely a collection of ancient fragments loosely strung together, but a well-digested and connected composition. The great subject of this history is the establishment of the Theocracy. Its central point is the giving of the Law on Sinai, and the solemn covenant there ratified, whereby the Jewish nation was constituted “a kingdom of priests and a holy nation to Jehovah.” The book of Genesis (with the first chapters of Exodus) describes the steps which led to the establishment of the Theocracy. Abraham is the father of the Jewish nation; to Abraham the Land of Canaan is first given in promise. It is a part of the writer’s plan to tell us what the Divine preparation of the world was, in order to show, first, the significance of the call of Abraham, and next, the true nature of the Jewish theocracy. He begins with the CREATION of the world, because the God who created the world and the God who revealed Himself to the fathers is the same God. The book of Genesis has thus a character at once special and universal. It embraces the world; it speaks of God as the God of the whole human race. Its design is to show how God revealed Himself to the first fathers of the Jewish race, that He might make to Himself a nation who should be His witnesses in the midst of the earth. Five principal persons are the pillars, so to speak, on which the whole superstructure rests, ADAM, NOAH, ABRAHAM, ISAAC, and JACOB. A specific plan is preserved throughout. The main purpose is never forgotten. God’s relation to Israel holds the first place in the writer’s mind. It is this which it is his object to convey. The history of that chosen seed, who were the heirs of the promise and the guardians of the Divine oracles, is the only history which interprets man’s relation to God. By its light all others shine, and may be read when the time shall come. Meanwhile, as the different families drop off here and there from the principal stock, their course is briefly indicated. Beyond all doubt, then, we may trace in the book of Genesis in its present form a systematic plan.—C. Integrity. Granting that this unity of design, already noticed, leads to the conclusion that the work must have been by the same hand, are there any reasons for supposing that the author availed himself in its composition of earlier documents? and if so, are we still able by critical investigation to ascertain where they have been introduced into the body of the work? 1. Now it is almost impossible to read the book of Genesis with a critical eye without being struck with the great peculiarities of style and language which certain portions of it present. Thus, e. g., chapter ii. 3–iii. 24 is quite different both from chapter i. and chapter iv. Again, chapter xiv. and (according to Jahn) chapter xxiii. are evidently separate documents transplanted in their original form without correction or modification into the existing work (so Mr. J. J. S. Perowne, original author of this article). In fact there is nothing like uniformity of style till we come to the history of Joseph. 2. We are led to the same conclusion by the inscriptions which are prefixed to certain sections, as ii. 4, v. 1, vi. 9, x. 1, xi. 10, 27, and seem to indicate so many older documents. 3. Lastly, the distinct use of the Divine names, JEHOVAH in some sections, and Elohim (God) in others, is characteristic of two different writers. Astruc, a Belgian physician, was the first who broached the theory that Genesis was based on a collection of older documents. Of these he professed to point out as many as twelve, the use of the Divine names, however, having in the first instance suggested the distinction. Subsequently Eichhorn adopted this theory, so far as to admit that two documents, one (the earlier) Elohistic, and the other Jehovistic, were the main sources of the book, though he did not altogether exclude others. Since his time the theory has been maintained, but variously modified, by one class of critics (De Wette, Knobel, Tuch, Delitzsch, Ewald, Hupfeld, Davidson, &c.), whilst another class (Hengstenberg, Keil, Baumgarten, Hävernick, Ranke, Kurtz, Turner, &c.), has strenuously opposed it. Hupfeld in 1853 thinks that he can discover traces of three original records, an earlier Elohist, a Jehovist, and a later Elohist. These three documents were, according to him, subsequently united and arranged by a fourth person, as editor of the whole. The advocates of the various theories in regard to documents disagree widely among themselves, some of them (e. g. De Wette, Ewald) having modified their views essentially at different times. (PENTATEUCH.)—D. Authenticity. Luther used to say, “Nihil pulchrius Genesi, nihil utilius,” i. e. “Nothing is more beautiful, nothing more useful, than Genesis.” But hard critics have tried all they can to mar its beauty and to detract from its utility. No book has met with more determined and unsparring assailants. To enumerate and to reply to all objections would be impossible. We will only refer to some of the most important. (1.) The story of CREATION, as given in chapter i., has been set aside in two ways: first, by placing it on the same level with other cosmogonies which are to be found in the sacred writings of all nations; and next, by asserting that its statements are directly contradicted by the discoveries of modern science. (a.) Now, when we compare the Biblical with all other known cosmogonies, we are immediately struck with the great moral superiority of the former. There is no confusion here between the Divine Creator and His work. God is before all things, God creates all things: this is the sublime assertion of the Hebrew writer. All the cosmogonies of the heathen world are either Dualistic, i. e. they regard God and matter as two eternal coexistent principles; or they are Pantheistic, i. e. they confound God and matter, making the material universe a kind of emanation from the great Spirit which informs the mass. (b.) In regard to the objections which have been urged from the results of modern discovery against the literal truth of this chapter, see CHRONOLOGY; CREATION; DAY; EARTH; FIRMAMENT; MAN, &c. (2.) To the description of PARADISE, and the history of the Fall and of the Deluge, very similar remarks apply. All nations have their own version of these facts. But if there be any one original source of these traditions, any root from which they diverged, we cannot doubt where to look for it. The earliest record of these momentous facts is that preserved in the Bible. (ADAM; EDEN; NOAH; SATAN; SERPENT, &c.) (3.) When we come down to a later period in the narrative, where we have the opportunity of testing the accuracy of the historian, we find it in many of the most important particulars abundantly corroborated. One of the strongest proofs of the bona fide historical character of the earlier portion of Genesis is to be found in the valuable ethnological catalogue contained in chapter x. (4.) As to the fact implied in the dispersion (xi. 1 ff.; BABEL, TOWER OF), that all languages had one origin, philological research has not as yet been carried far enough to lead to any very certain result. The most that has been effected is a classification of languages in three great families. (TONGUES, CONFUSION OF.) (5.) Another fact, which rests on the authority of the earlier chapters of Genesis, the derivation of the whole human race from a single pair, has been abundantly confirmed by recent investigations. (ADAM; MAN.) (6.) Suspicion has been cast upon the credibility of the narrative, because three stories are found in three distinct portions of the Book, which in their main features no doubt present a striking similarity to one another (xii. 10-20, xx., xxvi. 1-11). These, it is said, are clearly only three different versions of the same story. But all men repeat themselves, and even repeat their mistakes. ABRAHAM might have been guilty twice of the same sinful cowardice; and ISAAC might, in similar circumstances, have copied his father's example, calling it wisdom. There is a further difficulty about the age of Sarah at the time of the first occurrence (xii. 11, 14). But as she lived to the age of 127, she was then only in middle life, corresponding to a woman now at 35 or 40. It is a minute criticism, hardly worth answering, which tries to cast suspicion on the veracity of the writer, because of difficulties such as these. The positive evidence is overwhelming in favor of his credibility. The patriarchal tent beneath the shade of some spreading tree, the wealth of flocks and herds, the free and generous hospitality to strangers, the strife for the well, the purchase of the cave of Machpelah for a burial-place—we feel at once that these are no inventions of a later writer in more civilized times. So again, what can be more lifelike, more touchingly beautiful, than the picture of Hagar and Ishmael, the meeting of Abraham's servant with Rebekah, or of Jacob with Rachel at the well of Haran? There is a fidelity in the minutest incidents which convinces us that we are reading history, not fable. Or can any thing more completely transport us into patriarchal times than the battle of the kings and the interview between Abraham and MELCHIZEDEK? Passing on to a later portion of the Book, we find the writer evincing the most accurate knowledge of the state of society in EGYPT. (BIBLE; CANON; INSPIRATION; MIRACLES.)

Gen-ne'sar [g as in get] (Gr. = GENNESARET), The Water of (1 Mc. xi. 87). GENNESARET.

Gen-nes'a-ret [g as in get] (Gr. fr. Heb. = gardens of the prince, Stanley, &c.; but probably from CHINNERETH), Land of. After the miracle of feeding the five thousand, our Lord and His disciples crossed the Lake of Gennesaret and came to the other side, at a place which is called "the land of Gennesaret" (Mat. xiv. 34; Mk. vi. 53). It is generally believed that this term was applied to the fertile crescent-shaped plain on the western shore of the lake, extending from Khan Minyeh on the N. to the steep hill behind Majdel on the S., and called by the Arabs el-Ghuweir, "the little Ghôr." (ARABIA.) Mr. Porter gives the length as three miles, and the greatest breadth as about one mile; Thomson (i. 336) makes it about four miles by two. Additional interest is given to the land of Gennesaret, or el-Ghuweir, by the probability that its scenery suggested the parable of the Sower. Josephus says the soil was so rich that every plant flourished; but it "is now preëminently fruitful in thorns" (Thomson). GENNESARET, SEA OF.

Gen-nes'a-ret (see above), Sea of, called in the O. T. "the sea of CHINNERETH," or "CHINNEROTH" (Num. xxxiv. 11; Josh. xii. 3), from a town of that name on or near its shore (Josh. xix. 35). At its N. W. angle was a beautiful and fertile plain called "the land of Gennesaret" (see above) (Mat. xiv. 34), from which the name of the lake was taken. The lake is also called in the N. T. "the sea of GALILEE," from the province of Galilee which bordered on its western side (Mat. iv. 18; Mk. vii. 31; Jn. vi. 1); and "the sea of TIBERIAS," from the celebrated city (vi. 1). Its modern name is Bahr Tubariyeh = Sea of Tiberias. Most of our Lord's public life was spent at or near the Sea of Gennesaret. This region was then the most densely peopled in all Palestine. Nine cities stood on the shores of the lake, but seven of them are now uninhabited ruins. (BETHSAIDA; CAPERNAUM; MAGDALA; TIBERIAS, &c.) The Sea of Gennesaret is of an oval shape, about thirteen geographical miles long, and six broad. (See the cut on p. 330.) The river JORDAN enters it at its N. end, and passes out at its S. end. In fact, the bed of the lake is just a lower section of the great Jordan valley. Its most remarkable feature is its deep depression, being no less than seven hundred feet below the level of the ocean. The scenery is bleak and monotonous. The great depression makes the climate of the shores almost tropical. This is very sensibly felt by the traveller in going down from the plains of Galilee. In summer the heat is intense, and even in early spring the air has something of an Egyptian balminess. The water of the lake is sweet, cool, and transparent; and as the beach is everywhere pebbly it has a beautiful sparkling look. It abounds in FISH now as in ancient times. The fishery, like the soil of the surrounding country, is sadly neglected. One little crazy boat is the sole representative of the fleets that covered the lake in N. T. times.

Gen'tiles [jen'tilez]. I. Old Testament. The Heb. pl. gôyim, translated "Gentiles" (Gen. x. 5; Judg. iv. 2, 13, 16; Is. xi. 10, xlii. 1, 6, &c.), "nations" (Gen. x. 5, 20, 31, 32, xiv. 1, 9, xvii. 4 ff., &c.), "heathen" (Neh. v. 8; Ps. ii. 1, 8, &c.), = the nations, the surrounding nations, foreigners as opposed to Israel. It acquired an ethnographic and also an invidious meaning, as other nations were idolatrous, rude, hostile, &c., yet the Jews were able to use it in a purely technical, geographical sense, when it is usually translated "nations." The Heb. sing. gôy, usually translated "nation," is applied to the Jewish nation among others.—II. New Testament. 1. The Gr. ethnos in sing. = a people or "nation" (Mat. xxiv. 7; Acts ii. 5, &c.), and even the Jewish people (Lk. vii. 5, xxiii. 2, &c.). In the pl. it = "heathen," "gentiles." 2. The Gr. Hellen (= Greek) is usually translated "Greek" (Jn. xii. 20; Acts xiv. 1, xvii. 4; Rom. i. 16, x. 12, &c.), sometimes "Gentile" as opposed to "Jew" (Jn. vii. 35; Rom. ii. 9, 10, iii. 9; 1 Cor. x. 32, xii. 13). The latter use of the word seems to have arisen from the almost universal adoption of the Greek language. GREECE; compare BARBARIAN.

Ge-nu bath [g as in get] (Heb. theft, Ges.), son of the Edomite HADAD 4 by the sister of Tahpenes, queen of the Pharaoh who governed Egypt in the latter part of David's reign. Genubath was born in Pharaoh's palace, and became a member of the royal establishment (1 K. xi. 20; compare 16).

* Ge-og'ra-phy [-jee-]. EARTH; PALESTINE, &c.

Ge'on [g as in get] (Gr.) = GIRON, one of the four rivers of Eden (Ecclus. xxiv. 27).

Ge'ra (Heb. a grain, Ges.), one of the "sons" (i. e. descendants) of Benjamin, enumerated in Gen. xlv. 21, as already living at the time of Jacob's migration into Egypt. He was son of Bela (1 Chr. viii. 3). Lord A. C. Hervey regards the text of this last passage as corrupt, and the different Geras named in verses 3, 5, 7, as = the son of Bela. He also supposes Gera the ancestor of Ehud (Judg. iii. 15), and of Shimei (2 Sam. xvi. 5) to be the same person (compare AHAH 3; NAAMAN 2).

Ge'rah (Heb. a grain, berry, Ges.). WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

Ge'zer (Heb. a sojourn, lodging-place, Sim.), a very ancient city S. of Gaza. It occurs chiefly in Genesis (x. 19, xx. 1, xxvi. 16); also incidentally in 2 Chr. xiv. 13, 14. In Genesis the people are spoken of as Philistines; their king was ABIMELECH, and PITCHOL "the chief captain of his host." Their territory must have stretched on the "South" or "South country" of later Palestine. From a comparison of Gen. xxi. 32 with xxvi. 23, 26, Beersheba seems to be just on the verge of this territory, perhaps its limit toward the N. E. For its southern boundary, though very uncertain, none is more probable than the Wady El 'Arish ("River of Egypt") and El 'Ain, about forty-five miles from Gaza; S. of which the neighboring "wilderness of Paran" (xx. 15, xxi. 22, 34) may be probably reckoned to begin. Isaac was probably born in Gerar. The great crops which he subsequently raised attest the fertility of the soil. ABRAHAM and ISAAC both denied their wives in Gerar. A large mound or ancient site, with traces of an extensive city, is said to exist near Wady Sherfah, three hours S. S. E. of Gaza, and this place, called Khirbet el Jerar, sometimes Jorif el Jerar, Mr. Hayman supposes may indicate the N. limit of the territory, if not the site of the town. Rowlands (in Fairbairn, art. Rehoboth) identifies it positively with the ancient city of Gerar, and considers the region S. and S. E. of Gaza, to the base of Jebel Rakkaneh (a range of mountains, extending from N. E. to S. W., at about forty miles S. E. of Gaza), as constituting the land of Gerar. Wilton (The Negeb) believes that, though the metropolis may have been at Khirbet el Jerar, "the valley of Gerar" = Wady el-Jerar about sixty miles S. of Gaza. Robinson and Kitto favor Wady Sherfah or one of its branches as = the valley of Gerar; Mr. Hayman prefers the Wady el-'Ain, about forty-five miles south of Gaza.

Ger'a-sa [g as in get] (Gr.). This name does not occur in the O. T., or in the Received Text of the N. T. But some MSS. and critical editions have, in Mat. viii. 28, "GERASENES" instead of "GADARENES" or "GERGASENES." Gerasa was a celebrated city on the eastern borders of Peræa. It is situated amid the mountains of Gilead, twenty miles E. of the Jordan, and twenty-five miles N. of Philadelphia, the ancient Rabbath-Ammon. It is not known when or by whom Gerasa was founded. It is first mentioned by Josephus as captured by Alexander Janneus (cir. B. C. 85). It is indebted for its architectural splendor to the age and genius of the Antonines (A. D. 138-180). The ruins of Gerasa (modern Jerash) are by far the most beautiful and extensive E. of the Jordan. They are situated on both sides of a shallow valley that runs from N. to S. through a high undulating plain, and falls into the Zurka (the ancient Jabbok) at the distance of about five miles. The form of the city is an irregular square, each side measuring nearly one mile. Within the city upward of 230 columns remain on their pedestals; heavy masses of masonry distinguish the positions of the great theatres; three gateways are still nearly perfect.

* Ger-a-se-nez [ger-a-seenz] (fr. Gr.) = natives or inhabitants of GERASA. GERASENES.

Ger-ge-senes [g as in get; -seenz] (fr. Gr. = inhabitants of the city of Gergesa, on the E. shore of the Sea of Galilee [so Origen]), (Mat. viii. 28 in A.V., and Received Greek Text). Thomson (ii. 34) identifies Gergesa with ruins at Kerza or Gersa, about the middle of the eastern shore of the Sea of Galilee. GADARA and GERASA.

Ger-ge-sites [g as in get], the = the GIRGASHITES (Jd. v. 16).

Ger'l-zim [g as in get] (fr. Heb. = mountain of the GERIZITES, Ges.), a mountain designated by Moses, in conjunction with Mount EBAL, to be the scene of a great solemnity upon the entrance of the children of Israel into the promised land. High places had a peculiar charm attached to them in these days of external observance. The law was delivered from Sinai: the blessings and curses affixed to the performance or neglect of it were directed to be pronounced upon Gerizim and Ebal (Deut. xxvii.; Josh. viii.). The next question is, Has Moses defined the localities of Ebal and Gerizim? Standing on the E. side of the Jordan, in the land of Moab (Deut. i. 5), he asks: "Are they not on the other side Jordan, by the way where the sun goeth down (i. e. at some distance to the W.), in the land of the Canaanites, which dwell in the champaign over against Gilgal, beside the plains of Moreh?" There is no room for doubting the Scriptural position of Ebal and Gerizim to have been—where they are now placed—in the territory of the tribe of Ephraim; the latter of them overhanging the city of SHECHEM. JOTHAM 1, standing on the crest of one of the cliffs, uttered his parable in the hearing of the people below (Judg. ix. 7 ff.), the ascent being so difficult that he could escape before any of Abimelech's followers could climb the hill (Porter, in Kitto). Mr. Ffoulkes and Dean Stanley (247 f.) are inclined to accept the Samaritan tradition that Gerizim was that "one of the mountains" in "the land of MORIAH" 1 (= MOREH 1 in their view) on which Abraham was directed to offer his son Isaac (Gen. xxii. 2 ff.). But Mr. Porter (in Kit.) and Dr. Thomson (ii. 212) reject this tradition, the eighty to one hundred miles from Beer-sheba (compare xxi. 33, xxii. 4) to Gerizim being altogether too great a distance to be traversed in that country in less than three days by the ass and men on foot, burdened, as they all were (ver. 3 ff.). Another tradition, that Mount Gerizim was the spot where MELCHIZEDEK met Abraham (xiv. 18), is accepted by Stanley (246), but rejected by Mr. Ffoulkes, Porter, Thomson, &c., as too far from Abraham's route by the Jordan Valley and from Sodom (Gen. xiv. 15 ff.). (SALEM 1.)—The altar which Jacob built was not on Gerizim, as the Samaritans contend, though probably about its base, at the head of the plain between it and Ebal, "in the parcel of a field" which that patriarch purchased from the children of Hamor, and where he spread his tent (xxxiii. 18-20). Here was likewise his well (Jn. iv. 6), and the tomb of his son Joseph (Josh. xxiv. 32), both of which are still shown.—We now enter upon the second phase in the history of Gerizim. According to Josephus, a marriage contracted between Manasseh, brother of the high-priest JADDUA, and the daughter of SANBALLAT, having created a great stir amongst the Jews, who had been strictly forbidden to contract alien marriages (Ezr. ix. 2; Neh. xiii. 23), Sanballat, in order to reconcile his son-in-law to this unpopular affinity, obtained leave from Alexander the Great to build a temple upon Mount Gerizim, and to inaugurate there a rival priesthood and altar to those of Jerusalem. "SAMARIA thenceforth," says Prideaux, "became the common refuge and asylum of the refractory Jews." Hyrcanus destroyed the temple on Gerizim, after it had stood there 200 years. Massive existing foundations are regarded by Thomson (ii. 213 f.) as the remains of the temple, the main building being 241 feet by 255. Robinson (ii. 278) and Porter (in Kitto) suppose them to belong to a fortress erected by the Emperor Justinian round a Christian church built there after the Samaritans (SAMARIA 3) were driven from Gerizim A. D. 487. The Samaritans have now no temple or altar on the mountain, but they still worship there, and their holiest place is a little S. of the ruins just mentioned. Gerizim is still to the Samaritans what Jerusalem is to the Jews, and Mecca to the Moham-medans.

Ger'l-zites. GERZITES.

Ger-rhe-ni-ans (fr. Gr., see below), the (2 Mc. xiii. 24 only), according to Grotius = inhabitants of the town Gerrhon or Gerra, between Pelusium, in Egypt, and Wady el-Arish. Ewald, with greater probability, conjectures that the inhabitants of the ancient city of GERAR are meant.

Ger'shom (Heb., see below). 1. The first-born son of Moses and Zipporah (Ex. ii. 22, xviii. 3). The name is explained in these passages as = "a stranger there" (margin), in allusion to Moses' being a foreigner in Midian—"For he said, I have been a stranger (Gér) in a foreign land." Its true meaning, taking it as a Hebrew word, is "expulsion" (so Mr. Grove, after Gesenius); Fürst interprets banishment, exile; Josephus, Kitto, Fairbairn, &c., agree with Exodus. The circumcision of Gershom is probably related in Ex. iv. 25. Gershom was ancestor of JONATHAN 5 and SHEBUEL 1.—2. GERSHON, the eldest son of Levi (1 Chr. vi. 16, 17, 20, 43, 62, 71, xv. 7).—3. The representative of the priestly family of Phinehas, among those who accompanied Ezra from Babylon (Ezr. viii. 2); = GERSON.

Ger'shon (Heb. expulsion, Ges.), the eldest of the three sons of Levi, born before the descent of Jacob's family into Egypt (Gen. xlii. 11; Ex. vi. 16). But the families of Gershom were outstripped in fame by their younger brethren of Kohath, from whom sprang Moses and the priestly line of Aaron.

At the census in the wilderness of Sinai, the whole number of the males of the sons of Gershon was 7,500 (Num. iii. 22), midway between the Kobathites and the Merarites. Gershon's sons were LIBNI 1 and SHIMI 1. ASAPH 1 "the seer" was descended from Gershon. The sons of Gershon had charge of the fabrics of the Tabernacle—the coverings, curtains, hangings, and cords (iii. 25, 26, iv. 25, 26); for the transport of these they had two covered wagons and four oxen (vii. 3, 7). In the encampment their station was behind the Tabernacle, on the W. side (iii. 23). In the apportionment of the Levitical cities thirteen fell to the Gershonites. These were in the northern tribes—two in Manasseh beyond Jordan, four in Issachar, four in Asher, and three in Naphtali. GERSHOM 2; GERSHONITES; LEVITES.

Gershon-ites (fr. Heb.), the = the family descended from GERSHON or GERSHOM, the son of Levi (Num. iii. 21, 23, 24, iv. 24, 27, xxvi. 57; Josh. xxi. 33; 1 Chr. xxiii. 7; 2 Chr. xxix. 12). "The Gershonite" (= descendant of GERSHON or GERSHOM), as applied to individuals, occurs in 1 Chr. xxvi. 21 (Laadan), xxix. 8 (Jehiel).

Gerson (Gr.) = GERSHOM 3 (1 Esd. viii. 29).

Gerzites (fr. Heb. = dwelling in a shorn or desert land, Ges.), the, a tribe who, with the Geshurites and the Amalekites occupied the land between the S. of Palestine and Egypt in the time of Saul (1 Sam. xxvii. 8, margin). (GEZRITES.) In the name of Mount GERIZIM we have (so Mr. Grove and Stanley, after Gesenius) the only remaining trace of the presence of this old nomadic tribe in central Palestine.

Ge'sem (Gr. = GOSHEN), the Land of, the Greek form of GOSHEN (Jd. i. 9).

Ge'sham (fr. Heb. = filthy, Ges.; properly "Geshan," as in A. V. of 1611), one of the sons of JAHDAI, in the genealogy of Judah (1 Chr. ii. 47).

Ge'shem (Heb. = rain, Ges.), and Cash mu, an Arabian (Neh. ii. 19, vi. 1, 2, 6); probably an inhabitant of Arabia Petraea, or of the Arabian Desert, and chief of a tribe. Geshem, like SANBALLAT and TOBIAH, seems to have been one of the "governors beyond the river," to whom Nehemiah came, whose mission "grieved them exceedingly" (Neh. ii. 7, 10). The endeavors of these confederates and their failure are recorded in chapters ii., iv., vi.

Ge'shur (Heb. a bridge), a little principality in the N. E. corner of BASHAN, adjoining the province of ARGOB (Deut. iii. 14), and the kingdom of Aram ("Syria" in the A. V.; 2 Sam. xv. 8; compare 1 Chr. ii. 23). It was within the allotted territory of Manasseh, but its inhabitants were never expelled. Probably Geshur was (so Porter) a section of the wild and rugged region now called el-Lejah. King David married the daughter of TALMAI 2, king of Geshur. GESHURI.

Gesh'u-ri (Heb. = Geshurite, or inhabitant of Geshur, Ges.), and Gesh'u-rites. 1. The inhabitants of GESHUR (Deut. iii. 14; Josh. xii. 5, xiii. 11, 13). —2. An ancient tribe which dwelt in the desert between Arabia and Philistia (Josh. xiii. 2; 1 Sam. xxvii. 8).

Ge'ther (Heb. fear, Miller, Sim.; drugs? Ayre), the third in order of the sons of Aram (Gen. x. 23). No satisfactory trace of the people sprung from this stock has been found.

Geth-sem'a-ue (Gr. fr. Aram. = oil-press? Rbn. N. T. Lex.), a small "farm" (A. V. "place;" Mat. xxvi. 36; Mk. xiv. 32), situated across the brook Kidron (Jn. xviii. 1), probably at the foot of Mount Olivet (Lk. xxii. 39; OLIVES, MOUNT OF), to the N. W., and about one-half or three-fourths of a mile English from the walls of JERUSALEM. There was a "GARDEN," or rather orchard, attached to it, to which the olive, fig, and pomegranate doubtless invited resort by their hospitable shade. And we know from Lk. xxii. 39 and Jn. xviii. 2 that our Lord oftentimes resorted thither with his disciples. According to Josephus, the suburbs of Jerusalem abounded with gardens and pleasure-grounds. But Gethsemane has not come down to us as a scene of mirth; its inexhaustible associations are the offspring of a single event—the Agony of the Son of God on the evening preceding His Passion. A modern garden, in which are eight venerable olive-trees, and a grotto to the N., detached from it, and in closer connection with the Church of the Sepulchre of the Virgin—both securely enclosed and under lock and key—are pointed out by the Latins, as making up the true Gethsemane. Against the contemporary antiquity of the olive-trees, it has been urged that Titus cut down all the trees round about Jerusalem. Probably they were planted by Christian hands to mark the spot; unless, like the sacred olive of the Acropolis, they may have reproduced themselves. The Greeks claim that they have the true site of Gethsemane a little N. of that held by the Latins. Thomson (ii. 483-4) believes both these sites are too near the city and too close to the great thoroughfare to the E., and would place the garden in the secluded vale several hundred yards N. E. of them.

Gen'el (Heb. majesty of God, Ges.), son of Machi; the Gadite spy (Num. xiii. 15).

Ge'zer (Heb., probably = a steep place, precipice, Ges.), an ancient city of Canaan, whose king, Horam, coming to the assistance of Lachish, was killed with all his people by Joshua (Josh. x. 33, xii. 12). The town, however, is not said to have been destroyed. It formed one of the landmarks on the S. boundary of Ephraim, between the lower Beth-horon and the Mediterranean (xvi. 3), the W. limit of the tribe (1 Chr. vii. 28). It was allotted with its suburbs to the Kohathite Levites (Josh. xxi. 21; 1 Chr. vi. 67); but the original inhabitants were not dispossessed (Judg. i. 29); and even down to the reign of Solomon the Canaanites were still dwelling there, and paying tribute to Israel (1 K. ix. 16). Ewald takes Gezer = GESHUR. In one place GOS is given as = Gezer (1 Chr. xx. 4; compare 2 Sam. xxi. 18). The exact site of Gezer has not been discovered. Perhaps the strongest claims for identity with Gezer are put forward by a village called Yasur, four or five miles E. of Joppa, on the road to Ramleh and Lydd. GAZARA; GAZER; GAZERA; GEZrites.

Gez'rites (from Heb. sing. Girzi, probably = inhabitant of GEZER, Ges.), in the text of the A. V., corresponds to the Keri or marginal reading of the Heb. Bible, the Heb. text having Girzi translated "GERZITES" in the A. V. margin (1 Sam. xxvii. 8).

* Ghost = spirit, applied especially to the Holy Spirit. SPIRIT, THE HOLY.

G'ah (Heb. breaking forth, sc. of a fountain, Ges.), a place named only in 2 Sam. ii. 24, to designate the position of the hill AMMAH.

G'iants [g as j]. 1. They are first spoken of in Gen. vi. 4, under the Heb. name nephilim. The Heb. word is derived either from palah or pala (= marvellous), or, as is generally believed, from naphal, either in the sense to throw down, or to fall (= fallen angels; compare Is. xiv. 12; Lk. x. 18). Gesenius prefers to rush into or fall upon. That the word means "giant" is clear from Num. xiii. 32, 33. But in Gen. vi. 1-4, we are told that "there were nephilim (A. V. "giants") in the earth," and that afterward the "sons of God" mingling with the beautiful "daughters of men" produced a race of violent and insolent gibborim (A. V. "mighty men," see No. 2 below). The genealogy of the nephilim, or at any rate of the earliest nephilim, is not recorded in Scripture, and the name itself is so mysterious that we are lost in conjecture respecting them.—2. The sons of the marriages mentioned in Gen. vi. 1-4 are called in Hebrew gibborim, a general name = powerful (A. V. "mighty men.") (NIMROD.) They were not necessarily giants in our sense of the word. Yet, as was natural, these powerful chiefs were almost universally represented as men of extraordinary stature. But who were the parents of these giants? who are "the sons of God"? The opinions are various:—(1.) Men of power, or of high rank (Targum of Onkelos, Samaritan Version, Symmachus, Selden, &c.). (2.) Men with great gifts "in the image of God" (Ritter, Schumann). (3.) Descendants of Cain arrogantly assuming the title (Paulus). (4.) The pious descendants of Seth (compare Gen. iv. 26) (Augustine, Chrysostom, Theodoret, and a host of modern commentators). (5.) Worshipers of false gods (R. S. Poole). (6.) Devils or demons (Cabbalists). (ASMODEUS.) (7.) Angels (LXX., Josephus, Philo, most of the older Church Fathers, &c.). The rare expression "sons of God" = angels in Job xxxviii. 7, i. 6, ii. 1, and that such is the meaning in Gen. vi. 4 also, was the most prevalent opinion both in the Jewish and early Christian Church. Probably this very ancient view gave rise to the spurious Book of Enoch (ENOCH, BOOK OF), and the notion supposed to be quoted from it by St. Jude (ver. 6), and alluded to by St. Peter (2 Pet. ii. 4; compare 1 Cor. xi. 10). Milton alludes to the interpretation in Paradise Regained, ii. 179.—The next race of giants mentioned in Scripture is, 3. "The REPHAIM," a name which frequently occurs, and in some remarkable passages. The earliest mention of them is the record of their defeat by Chedorlaomer and some allied kings at Ashteroth-karnaim (Gen. xiv. 5). Extirpated, however, from the E. of Palestine, they long found a home in the W. (2 Sam. xxi. 18 ff.; 1 Chr. xx. 4). Probably they had possessed districts W. of the Jordan in early times, since the "Valley of Rephaim" (2 Sam. v. 18; 1 Chr. xi. 15; Is. xvii. 5), a rich valley S. W. of Jerusalem, derived its name from them. They were probably one of those aboriginal people, to whose existence the traditions of many nations testify, and of whose genealogy the Bible gives us no information. Some suppose them to be descendants from Japheth. In A. V. the words used for it are "Rephaim," "giants," and "the dead." That it has the latter meaning in many passages is certain (Ps. lxxxviii. 10; Prov. ii. 18, ix. 18, xxi. 16; Is. xxvi. 14, 19). An attentive consideration seems to leave little room for doubt that the dead were called Rephaim, from some notion of Shi'ol (A. V. "HELL") being the residence of the fallen spirits or buried giants. Branches of this great unknown people were called EMIM, ANAKIM, and ZUZIM (GOLIATH; OG; RAPHA I, &c.).—No one has yet proved by experience the possibility of giant races materially exceeding in size the average height of man. There is no great variation in the ordinary standard. The most stunted tribes of Esquimaux are at least four feet high, and the tallest races of America (e. g. the Guayaquilists and people of Paraguay) do not exceed six and a half feet. The general belief (until very recent times) in the existence of fabulously enormous men arose from fancied giant-graves, and above all, from the discovery of huge bones, which were taken for those of men, in days when comparative anatomy was unknown. On the other hand, isolated instances of monstrosity (seven, eight, to ten feet high) are sufficiently attested to prove that beings like Goliath and his kinsmen may have existed.

Gib'bar [g as in get] (Heb. mighty man, hero, warrior, Ges.). Ninety-five "children of Gibbar" (GIBEON in Neh. vii.) returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Ezr. ii. 20).

Gib'be-thon (Heb. a height, hill, Ges.), a town allotted to the tribe of Dan (Josh. xix. 44), and afterward given to the Kohathite Levites (xxi. 23). The Philistines held it when Nadab, and afterward Omri besieged it (1 K. xv. 27, xvi. 15, 17). In the Onomasticon (Gabbathon) it is quoted as a small village called Gabe, in the seventeenth mile from Cesarea. No name at all resembling it has, however, been discovered in that direction.

Gib'e-a (Heb. hill, Ges.). Sheva, "the father of Macbenah," and "father of Gibeah," is mentioned with other names unmistakably those of places, and not of persons, among the descendants of Judah (1 Chr. ii. 49, compare 42). This would seem to point out Gibeah as = GIBEAH 1. On the other hand, Madmannah (ver. 49) recalls Madmenah, a town named in connection with GIBEAH 4 (Is. x. 31).

Gib'e-ah (Heb. hill), like most words of this kind, gave name to several towns and places in Palestine, doubtless generally on or near a hill. They are—1. A city in the mountain-district of Judah, named with Maon and the southern Carmel (Josh. xv. 57; and compare 1 Chr. ii. 49, &c.), identified by Robinson, Wilson, and Porter with the little village of Jeb'ah, on an isolated hill, six or seven miles S. S. W. of Bethlehem. Mr. Grove thinks it must have been S. E. of Hebron at some undiscovered site.—2. Gib'e-ath, enumerated among the last group of the towns of Benjamin, next to Jerusalem (Josh. xviii. 28), is generally taken to be = "Gibeah of Benjamin" or "of Saul." But this was five or six miles N. of Jerusalem. The name being in the Hebrew "construct state"—Gibeath and not Gibeah—Mr. Grove asks, may it not belong to the following name Kirjath, and denote the hill adjoining that town?—3. The place in which the ark remained from the time of its return by the Philistines till its removal by David (2 Sam. vi. 3, 4; compare 1 Sam. vii. 1, 2; see No. 2 above).—4. Gib'e-ah of Ben'ja-min does not appear in the lists of the cities of Benjamin in Josh. xviii. (1) We first encounter it in the tragical story of the Levite and his concubine (Judg. xix., xx.), where in many particulars of situation Gibeah agrees very closely with Tulcil el-Ful, a conspicuous eminence, with a heap of ruins on its summit, just four miles N. of Jerusalem, to the right of the road (Rbn. i. 577 ff.). It was then a "city," with the usual open street or square (Judg. xix. 15, 17, 20), and containing 700 "chosen men," probably slingers (xx. 15, 16). (2.) We next meet with Gibeah of Benjamin during the Philistine wars of Saul and Jonathan (1 Sam. xiii., xiv.). The Philistines were in possession of the village of GEB 1, the present Jeba, on the south side of the Wady Suweinil. S. of the Philistine camp, and about three miles in its rear, was JONATHAN 1, in Gibeah of Benjamin, with a thousand chosen warriors (xiii. 2). (3.) As "Gibeah of Benjamin" this place is referred to in 2 Sam. xxiii. 29 (compare 1 Chr. xi. 31), and as "Gibeah" it is mentioned by IIOSEA (v. 8, ix. 9, x. 9), but it does not again appear in the history. It is, however, almost without doubt identical with—5. Gib'e-ah of Saul. This is not mentioned as Saul's city till after his anointing (1 Sam. x. 26), when he is said to have gone "home" to Gibeah. In the subsequent narrative the town bears its full name (xi. 4). The name of Saul has not been found in connection with any place of modern Palestine, but it existed as late as the days of Josephus, and an allusion of his has fortunately given the clew to the identification of the town with the spot which now bears the name of Tulcil el-Ful. Josephus, describing Titus's march from Cesarea to Jerusalem, gives his route as through Samaria to Gophna, thence a day's march to a valley "called by the Jews the Valley of Thorns, near a certain village called Gabathsaul, distant from Jerusalem about thirty stadia," i. e. just the distance of Tulcil el-Ful. Here he was joined by a part of his army from Emmaus (Nicopolis), who would naturally come up the road by Beth-horon and Gibeon, the same which still falls into the northern road close to Tulcil el-Ful. In both these respects therefore the agreement is complete, and Gibeah of Benjamin must be taken as = Gibeah of Saul. In 1 Sam. xxii. 6, xxiii. 19, xxvi. 1, "Gibeah" doubtless = Gibeah of Saul.—6. Gib'e-ah in the Field, named only in Judg. xx. 31, as the place to which one of the "highways" led from Gibeah of Benjamin; probably = GEB 1.—7. There are several other names compounded of Gibeah, which are translated in the A. V.; (1.) the "hill of the foreskins" (Josh. v. 3) (GILGAL 1); (2.) the "hill of Phinehas" in Mount Ephraim (xxiv. 33); (3.) the "hill of Moriah" (Judg. vii. 1); (4.) the "hill of God" (1 Sam. x. 5); (5.) the "hill of HACHILAH" (xxiii. 19); (6.) the "hill of ANNAH" (2 Sam. ii. 24); (7.) the "hill GARKB" (Jer. xxxi. 39).

Gib'e-ath (Heb.) = GIBEAH 2 (Josh. xviii. 28).

Gib'e-ath-le (fr. Heb.), the = the native of GIBEAH (1 Chr. xii. 3).

Gib'e-on (Heb. hill-city, i. e. built on a hill, Ges.), one of the four cities of the Hivites, "a great city" (Josh. x. 2), the inhabitants of which, by an artifice, made a league with Joshua (ix. 3–15), and thus escaped the fate of JERICHO and AI (compare xi. 19). (GIBONITES.) Gibeon lay within the territory of Benjamin (xviii. 25), and was allotted to the priests (xxi. 17), of whom it became afterward a principal station. We next hear of it at the encounter between David's men under JOAB and Ish-bosheth's under ABNER (2 Sam. ii. 12 ff.). (HELKATH-HAZZURIM.) Here Joab killed AMASA (xx. 5–10), and here he was afterward slain (1 K. ii. 28 ff.). In David's reign the Tabernacle was "in the high place at Gibeon" (1 Chr. xvi. 39, 40, xxi. 29). Here Solomon sacrificed 1,000 burnt-offerings and asked wisdom of God (1 K. iii. 4 ff., ix. 2; 2 Chr. i. 3). Here Johanan overtook Ishmael after the assassination of Gedaliah (Jer. xli. 12). "Children of Gibeon" (GIBBAR) returned after the Captivity (Neh. vii. 25). The situation of Gibeon has fortunately been recovered with as great certainty as any ancient site in Palestine. The traveller who pursues the northern camel-road from Jerusalem, turning off to the left at Tulcil el-Ful (Gibeah), on that branch of it which leads westward to Jaffa, finds himself, after crossing one or two stony and barren ridges, in a district of a more open character. The hills are rounder and more isolated than those through which he has been passing, and rise from broad undulating valleys of tolerable extent and fertile soil. This is the central plateau of the country, the "land of Benjamin;" and these round hills are the Gibeahs, Gebas, Gibeons, and Ramahs, whose names occur so frequently in the records of this district. Retaining its ancient name almost intact, the modern village of el-Jib stands on the top of a low, round, rocky hill, just at the place where the road to the sea parts into two branches, the one by the lower level of the Wady Suleiman, the other by the heights of the Beth-horons, to Gimzo, Lydda, and Joppa. The "wilderness of Gibeon" (2 Sam. ii. 24)—i. e. the waste pasture-grounds (DESERT 2)—must have been to the E., beyond the circle or suburb of cultivated fields, and toward the neighboring swells, which bear the names of Jedireh and Bir Neballah. Its distance from Jerusalem by the main road is as nearly as possible six and a half miles; but there is a more direct road reducing it to five miles.

Gib'e-on-ites (fr. Heb.), the = the people of GIBRON, and perhaps also of the three cities associated with Gibeon (Josh. ix. 17)—Hivites; and who, on the discovery of the stratagem by which they had obtained the protection of the Israelites, were condemned to be perpetual bondmen, hewers of wood and drawers of water for the congregation, and for the house of God and altar of Jehovah (Josh. ix. 23, 27). Saul appears to have broken this covenant, and in a fit of enthusiasm or patriotism to have killed some and devised a general massacre of the rest (2 Sam. xxi. 1, 2, 5). This was expiated many years after by giving up seven men of Saul's descendants to the Gibeonites, who hung them or crucified them "before Jehovah"—as a kind of sacrifice—in Gibeah, Saul's own town (4, 6, 9). (NETHINIM.) Individual Gibeonites named are Ismaiah (1 Chr. xii. 4), Melatiah (Neh. iii. 7), the false prophet HANANIAH (Jer. xxviii. 1 ff.).

Gib'ites (fr. Heb. = natives or inhabitants of GEBAL). The "land of the Giblites" is mentioned in connection with Lebanon among the portions of the Promised Land remaining to be conquered by Joshua (Josh. xiii. 5). GEBAL.

Gid-dal'ti (Heb. I have made great), one of the sons of Heman, the king's seer (1 Chr. xxv. 4).

Gid'del (Heb. perhaps = too great, giant, Ges.).

1. Children of Giddel were among the Nethinim who returned from the Captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 47; Neh. vii. 49).—2. Children of Giddel were also among the "servants of Solomon," who returned to Judea in the same caravan (Ezr. ii. 56; Neh. vii. 58).

Gid'e-on (Heb. perhaps = tree-feller, i. e. impetuous warrior, Ges.), a Manassite, youngest son of Joash of the Abiezrites, an undistinguished family who lived at OPHRAH 2 (Judg. vi. 15). He was the fifth recorded JUDGE of Israel, and for many reasons the greatest of them all. When we first hear of him he was grown up and had sons (vi. 11, viii. 20), and from the apostrophe of the angel (vi. 12), we may conclude that he had already distinguished himself in war against the roving bands of nomadic robbers who had oppressed Israel for seven years, and whose countless multitudes (compared to locusts from their terrible devastations, vi. 5) annually destroyed all the produce of Canaan, except such as could be concealed in mountain-fastnesses (vi. 2). When the angel appeared, Gideon was threshing wheat with a flail in the winepress, to conceal it from the predatory tyrants. His call to be a deliverer, and his destruction of Baal's altar, and the "grove" (ASHERAH), are related in Judg. vi. After this begins the second act of Gideon's life. Clothed by the Spirit of God (Judg. vi. 34; compare 1 Chr. xii. 18; Lk. xxiv. 49), he blew a trumpet, and, joined by Zebulun, Naphtali, and even the reluctant Asher, encamped on the slopes of Mount Gilboa. Strengthened by a double sign from God, he reduced his army of 32,000 by the usual proclamation (Deut. xx. 8; compare 1 Mc. iii. 56). By a second test at "the spring of trembling" (HAROD) he again reduced the number of his followers to 300 (Judg. vii. 5 ff.). The midnight attack upon the Midianites, their panic, and the rout and slaughter that followed, are told in Judg. vii. (LAMP 2; MIDIAN.) The memory of this splendid deliverance took deep root in the national traditions (1 Sam. xii. 11; Ps. lxxxiii. 11; Is. ix. 4, x. 26; Heb. xi. 32). After this there was a peace of forty years, and we see Gideon in peaceful possession of his well-earned honors, and surrounded by the dignity of a numerous household (Judg. viii. 29-31). It is not improbable that, like Saul, he had owed a part of his popularity to his princely appearance (viii. 18). In this third stage of his life occur alike his most noble and his most questionable acts, viz. the refusal of the monarchy on theocratic grounds, and the irregular consecration of a jewelled ephod formed out of the rich spoils of Midian, which proved to the Israelites a temptation to idolatry, although it was doubtless intended for use in the worship of Jehovah. CHRONOLOGY; JUDGES, BOOK OF.

Gid-e-o'ni (Heb. a cutting down, Ges.), a Benjamite, father of Abidan (Num. i. 11, iii. 22, vii. 60, 65, x. 24).

Gid'om (Heb. a cutting down, Ges.), a place named only in Judg. xx. 45; apparently situated between Gibeah (Tuleil el-Fûl) and the cliff Rimmon; but no trace of the name has yet been met with.

Gler'-e-a-gle [jer'ee-gl] (Heb. râhâm or râchâm, râhâmâh or râchâmâh), an unclean bird mentioned in Lev. xi. 18 and Deut. xiv. 17. There is no reason to doubt that it = the racham of the Arabs, viz. the Egyptian VULTURE (Neophron percnopterus).

Egyptian Vulture (Neophron percnopterus, Savign.).

Gift. The giving and receiving of presents has in all ages been not only a more frequent, but also a more formal and significant proceeding in the East than among ourselves. We cannot adduce a more remarkable proof of the important part which presents play in the social life of the East than the fact that the Hebrew language possesses no less than fifteen different expressions for the one idea. Many of these expressions have specific meanings: e. g. minhâh or mînchâh = a "present" from an inferior to a superior, as from subjects to a king (Judg. iii.

15; 1 K. x. 25; 2 Chr. xvii. 5) (MEAT-OFFERING): masêth = a present from a superior to an inferior, as from a king to his subjects (Esth. ii. 18); nissêth has very much the same sense (2 Sam. xix. 42, Heb. 43); shôhad or shôchad is a gift for the purpose of escaping punishment, presented either to a judge (Ex. xxiii. 8; Deut. x. 17, A. V. "reward;" BRILE) or to a conqueror (2 K. xvi. 8, A. V. "present"); other terms, as matân (Gen. xxxiv. 12; Prov. xviii. 16, &c.), matânâh (Gen. xxv. 6; Ex. xxviii. 38, &c.), mettâh (Prov. xxv. 14; Eccl. iii. 13, &c.), were used more generally. In the N. T. the Gr. donna (Mat. vii. 11, &c.), dôrea (Jn. iv. 10, &c.), dôrêma (Rom. v. 16; Jas. i. 17), are translated "gift" uniformly; dôron (Mat. ii. 11, v. 23, 24, &c.) is usually translated "gift," once (Lk. xxi. 4) "offering;" anathêma (= that which is set up, especially a votive offering in the temple, L. & S.) is translated "gift" (Lk. xxi. 5 only); charisma, uniformly translated "gift" (Rom. i. 11, v. 15, 16, vi. 23; 1 Cor. xii. 4, 9, 28, 30, 31, &c.), = a gift bestowed through the grace of God; charis, usually translated "grace" (Lk. ii. 40; Rom. i. 5, 7, iii. 24; 2 Cor. viii. 1, 6 ff., &c.), also translated "favor" (Lk. i. 30, &c.), "thank" (Lk. vi. 32 ff., &c.), is once translated "gift" (2 Cor. viii. 4). It is clear that the term "gift" is frequently used where we should substitute "tribute," or "fee." The tribute (TAXES) of subject states was paid not in a fixed sum of money, but in kind, each nation presenting its particular product; and hence the expression "to bring presents" = to own submission (Ps. lxxviii. 29, lxxvi. 11; Is. xviii. 7). Friends brought presents to friends on any joyful occasion (Esth. ix. 19, 22), those who asked for information or advice to those who gave it (2 K. viii. 8), the needy to the wealthy from whom any assistance was expected (Gen. xliii. 11; 2 K. xv. 19, xvi. 8); on the occasion of a MARRIAGE, the bridegroom not only paid the parents for his bride (A. V. "dowry"), but also gave the bride certain presents (Gen. xxxiv. 12; compare Gen. xxiv. 22). The nature of the presents was as various as were the occasions. The mode of presentation was with as much parade as possible. The refusal of a present was regarded as a high indignity. No less an insult was it, not to bring a present when the position of the parties demanded it (1 Sam. x. 27).

Gil'ho (Heb. stream, river, Ges.). 1. The second river of Paradise (Gen. ii. 13). (EDEN 1.)—2. A place near JERUSALEM, memorable as the scene of the anointing and proclamation of Solomon as king (1 K. i. 33, 38, 45); mentioned also in 2 Chr. xxxii. 30, xxxiii. 14. CONDUIT 2; FULLER'S FIELD.

Gil'a-lal (Heb. perhaps = dingy, Ges.; weighty, Fû.), one of the priest's sons at the consecration of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. xii. 36).

Gil-bo'a (Heb. bubbling fountain; see HARON, WELL or), a mountain range on the eastern side of the plain of ESRAËLON, rising over the city of JEZREEL (compare 1 Sam. xxiii. 4 with xxix. 1). It is only mentioned in Scripture in connection with the defeat and death of Saul and Jonathan by the Philistines (1 Sam. xxxi. 1; 2 Sam. i. 6, 21, xxix. 12; 1 Chr. x. 1, 8). That Gilboa = the ridge which stretches eastward, from the ruins of Jezreel, no doubt can be entertained. The village on the top of the mount is now called Jelbôn. The range of Gilboa extends in length some ten miles from W. to E. The sides are bleak, white, and barren. The greatest height is not more than 500 or 600 feet above the plain. Their modern local name is Jebel Fuku'a.

region E. of the Jordan; bounded on the N. by BASHAN, on the E. by the Arabian plateau, and on the S. by MOAB and AMMON (Gen. xxxi. 21; Deut. iii. 12-17). It is sometimes called "Mount Gilead" (Gen. xxxi. 25), sometimes "the land of Gilead" (Num. xxxii. 1); and sometimes simply "Gilead" (Ps. lx. 7; Gen. xxxvii. 25); but a comparison of the several passages shows that they all mean the same thing. The name Gilead = a hard rocky region. The statements in Gen. xxxi. 48 are not opposed to this etymology. The old name of the district was Gilead, but by a slight change in the pronunciation, the radical letters being retained, the meaning was made beautifully applicable to the "heap of stones" Jacob and Laban had built up. (GALEED = the heap of witness.) Those acquainted with the modern Arabs and their literature will see how intensely such a play upon the word would be appreciated by them. The extent of Gilead we can ascertain with tolerable exactness from incidental notices in the Scriptures. The Jordan was its western border (1 Sam. xiii. 7; 2 K. x. 33). A comparison of a number of passages shows that the river Hieromax, the modern Sheriat el-Mandhūr or Yarmūk, separated it from Bashan on the N. On the E. the mountain range melts away gradually into the high plateau of Arabia. The boundary of Gilead is here not so clearly defined, but it may be regarded as running along the foot of the range. The valley of Heshbon was probably (so Porter) the S. boundary of Gilead. Gilead thus extended from the parallel of the S. end of the Sea of Galilee to that of the N. end of the Dead Sea—about sixty miles; and its average breadth scarcely exceeded twenty. "Gilead" in Deut. xxxiv. 1; Josh. xxii. 9; and Judg. xx. 1, seems = the whole territory of the Israelites beyond the Jordan; but this is only a vague way of speaking, in common use everywhere. (Compare "England" = England and Wales.) The section of Gilead lying between the Jabbok and the Hieromax is now called Jebel Ajlūn; while that to the S. of the Jabbok constitutes the modern province of Bitka. One of the most conspicuous peaks in the mountain range still retains the ancient name, being called Jebel Jil'ad, "Mount Gilead." (MIZPAH 1; RAMOTH GILEAD.) The mountains of Gilead have a real elevation of from two thousand to three thousand feet; but their apparent elevation on the W. side is much greater, owing to the depression of the Jordan valley, which averages about one thousand feet. Their outline is singularly uniform, resembling a massive wall running along the horizon. The rich pasture-land of Gilead—"a place for cattle" (Num. xxxii. 1)—presents a striking contrast to the pasture-land of W. PALESTINE. At the invasion of the country by the Israelites, one half of Gilead was in the hands of SHON, king of the Amorites; Og, king of Bashan, had the other section N. of the Jabbok. Afterward Gilead was allotted to REUBEN and GAD. Their wandering tent-life and almost inaccessible country made them the protectors of the refugees and the outlaw (2 Sam. ii. 8 ff., xvii. 22 ff.). (BARZILLAI.) ELIJAH the Tishbite, JAIR 2, and JEPHTHAH were GILEADITES. Gilead was a frontier land, exposed to the first attacks of the Syrian and Assyrian invaders, and to the unceasing raids of the desert tribes. The name Galaad occurs several times in the history of the Maccabees (1 Mc. v. 9 ff.). Under the Roman dominion the country became more settled and civilized; under Mohammedan rule the country has again lapsed into semi-barbarism.

(BALM; GADARA; GERASA; GILEADITE; MAHANAIM; RABBAH 1; SPICES.)—2. Possibly the name of a mountain W. of the Jordan, near Jezreel (Judg. vii. 3). Porter is inclined, however, to agree with the suggestion of Clericus and others, that the true reading in this place should be Gilboa.—3. Son of Machir, and grandson of Manassch (Num. xxvi. 29, 30).—4. Father of Jephthah (Judg. xi. 1, 2). It is difficult to understand (compare ver. 7, 8) whether this Gilead was an individual or a personification of the community (so Porter).

Gil'e-ad-ites (fr. Heb.), the = a branch of the tribe of Manassch, descended from GILEAD 3, or inhabitants of the country of GILEAD 1 (Num. xxvi. 29; Judg. x. 3, xi. 1, 40, xii. 4, 5, 7; 2 Sam. xvii. 27, xix. 31; 1 K. ii. 7; 2 K. xv. 25; Ezr. ii. 61; Neh. vii. 63). There appears to have been an old standing feud between them and the Ephraimites, who taunted them with being deserters. See Judg. xii. 4, which may be rendered, "And the men of Gilead smote Ephraim, because they said, Runagates of Ephraim are ye (Gilead is between Ephraim and Manassch);" the last clause being added parenthetically (so Mr. Wright).

Gil'gal (Heb. a circle, or a rolling away, Ges.). 1. The site of the first camp of the Israelites on the W. of the Jordan, the place at which they passed the first night after crossing the river, and where the twelve stones were set up which had been taken from the bed of the stream (Josh. iv. 19, 20, compare 3); where also they kept their first passover in the land of Canaan (v. 10). It was in the "end of the E. of JERICHO" (A. V. "in the E. border of Jericho"), apparently on a hillock or rising ground (v. 3, compare 9), in "the plains of Jericho," i. e. the hot depressed district between the town and the Jordan (v. 10). (PLAIN 5.) Here the Israelites born on the march through the wilderness were circumcised, and the reproach of Egypt "was rolled away." (CIRCUMCISION.) The camp established at Gilgal remained there during the early part of the conquest (ix. 6, x. 6 ff.), and probably Joshua retired thither at the conclusion (xiv. 6, compare 15). See Judg. iii. 19. We again encounter Gilgal in the time of Saul, when it seems to have become the chief sanctuary of the central portion of the nation (1 Sam. vii. 16, x. 8, xi. 14, 15, xiii. 4 ff., xv. 12, 21, 33; compare Judg. ii. 1). We again have a glimpse of it, some sixty years later, in the history of David's return to Jerusalem (2 Sam. xix.). Afterward it (this Gilgal?) was appropriated by the kingdom of Israel to a false worship (Hos. iv. 15, ix. 15, xii. 11; Am. iv. 4, v. 5). Beyond the general statements above quoted, the sacred text contains no indications of the position of Gilgal. Neither in the Apocrypha nor in the N. T. is it mentioned. No modern traveller has succeeded in eliciting the name, or in discovering a probable site. By Josephus the encampment is given as fifty stadia (rather under six miles) from the river, and ten from Jericho, which would place it at or near the modern village of Riha (Robinson, Porter). But this was certainly a distinct place from—2. the Gilgal which is connected with the last scene in the life of Elijah, and with one of Elisha's miracles (2 K. ii.). The mention of Baal-shalisha (iv. 42) gives a clue to its situation, when taken with the notice of Eusebius (Onom. Bethsaris) that that place was fifteen miles from Diospolis (Lydda) toward the N. In that very position stand now the ruins of Jiljuleh,

i. e. Gilgal.—3. The “king of the nations of Gilgal,” or rather perhaps the “king of Goim (Heb. nations, GENTILES) at Gilgal,” is mentioned in the catalogue of the chiefs overthrown by Joshua (Josh. xii. 23). The name occurs next to Dor (22) in an enumeration apparently proceeding S., and therefore the position of the Jiljuleh just named is not wholly inappropriate. A village of Jiljilia has also been discovered nearer the centre of the country, to the left of the main N. road, four miles from Shiloh (Seilün), and six miles N. from Bethel (Beitin). It may be the Beth-Gilgal of Neh. xii. 29 (A. V. “house of Gilgal”); while the Jiljuleh N. of Lydd may be that of Josh. xii. 23.—4. A Gilgal is spoken of in Josh. xv. 7, in describing the N. border of Judah; probably = No. 1. (GELILOTH.)

Gi'loh (Heb. ezile, Ges.), a town in the mountains of Judah, named with Debir and Eshtemoah (Josh. xv. 61); it was the native place of Ahithophel (2 Sam. xv. 12). The site has not yet been met with.

Gi'lon-ite (fr. Heb.), the = the native of GILOH (2 Sam. xv. 12, xxiii. 34).

* Gi'mel (Heb. gimel = camel, Ges.), the third letter of the Hebrew alphabet (Ps. cxix.). WRITING.

Gim'zo (Heb. place fertile in sycamores, Ges.), a town which, with its dependent villages, was taken possession of by the Philistines in the reign of Ahaz (2 Chr. xxviii. 18). The name (Jimzu) still remains attached to a large village between two and three miles S. W. of Lydda, S. of the road between Jerusalem and Jaffa.

Gil [jin] = a trap for birds or beasts: it consisted of a net (Is. viii. 14), and a stick to act as a spring (Am. iii. 5). HUNTING.

Gi'nath [g as in get] (Heb. protection, Fñ.), father of Tibni (1 K. xvi. 21, 22).

Gi'n'e-tho (fr. Heb. = GINNETHON, Ges.), a chief of the priests who returned to Judea with Zerubbabel (Neh. xii. 4); doubtless the same as

Gi'n'e-thon (Heb. = gardener, Ges.), a priest who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 6).

Gi'r'dle (Heb. hugôr or chugôr, hügôrâh or chügôrâh, ezôr, mêzah or mêzâch, mêzâh or mêzâch, abnêt; Gr. zônê), an essential article of dress in the East, and worn both by men and women. The common girdle was made of leather (2 K. i. 8; Mat. iii. 4), like that worn by the Bedouins of the present day. A finer girdle was made of linen (Jer. xiii. 1; Ez. xvi. 10), embroidered with silk, and sometimes with gold and silver thread (Dan. x. 5; Rev. i. 13, xv. 6), and frequently studded with gold and precious stones or pearls. The manufacture of these girdles formed part of the employment of women (Prov. xxxi. 24). The girdle was fastened by a clasp of gold or silver, or tied in a knot, so that the ends hung down in front, as in the figures on the ruins of Persepolis. It was worn by men about the loins (Is. v. 27, xi. 5). The girdle of women was generally looser than that of the men, and was worn about the hips, except when they were actively engaged (Prov. xxxi. 17). The military girdle was worn about the waist; the sword or dagger was suspended from it (Judg. iii. 16; 2 Sam. xx. 8; Ps. xlv. 3). Hence “girding up the loins” denotes preparation for battle or for active exertion. In times of mourning, girdles of sackcloth were worn as marks of humiliation and sorrow (Is. iii. 24, xxii. 12). In consequence of the costly materials of which girdles were made, they were frequently given as presents (1 Sam. xviii. 4; 2 Sam. xviii. 11). They were used as pockets, as among the Arabs still, and as purses (PURSE), one end of the girdle being folded back for the purpose (Mat. x. 9; Mk. vi. 8). The girdle (Heb. abnêt) worn by the priests about the close-fitting tunic (Ex. xxviii. 39, xxxix. 29) is described by Josephus as made of linen so fine of texture as to look like the slough of a snake, and embroidered with flowers of scarlet, purple, blue, and fine linen. (EMBROIDERER.) It was about four fingers broad, and was wrapped several times round the priest's body, the ends hanging down to the feet. The “curious girdle” (Heb. heshb or chêsheb, Ex. xxviii. 8) was made of the same materials and colors as the ephod, i. e. of “gold, blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine twined linen.” Josephus describes it as sewn to the breast-plate. After passing once round, it was tied in front upon the seam, the ends hanging down. “Girdle” is used figuratively in Ps. cix. 19; Is. xi. 5; compare 1 Sam. ii. 4; Ps. xxx. 11, lxxv. 12; Eph. vi. 14.

Gi'r-ga-shites (fr. Heb. sing. = dwelling in clayey or loamy soil, Ges.), the, one of the Canaanite nations who were in possession of Canaan before the entrance thither of the children of Israel; apparently (so Mr. Grove) on the W. of Jordan (Gen. x. 16 [A. V. “Girgasite”], xv. 21; Deut. vii. 1; Josh. iii. 10, xxiv. 11; 1 Chr. i. 14; Neh. ix. 8).

Gi'r-ga-site (fr. Heb. = GIRGASHITES), the (Gen. x. 16). See the foregoing.

Gi's'pa (Heb. carcas, fatigues, Ges.; attentive listening, Fñ.), one of the overseers of the Nethinim, in Ophel, after the return from captivity (Neh. xi. 21).

Gi't'ab-he'pher (Heb.) = GATH-HEPHER (Josh. xix. 13).

Gi't'a-im (fr. dual of Heb. gath, = two wine-presses), a place to which the Beerothites fled (2 Sam. iv. 3). Gittaim is again mentioned in the list of places inhabited by the Benjamites after the Captivity (Neh. xi. 33). Its site is unknown.

* Gi't'ite (fr. Heb. = one from GATH, &c.). GITTITES.

Gi't'ites (fr. Heb. = natives or inhabitants of Gath), the six hundred men who followed David from Gath, under Ittai the GITTITE (2 Sam. xv. 18, 19), and who probably acted as a kind of body-guard. Obed-edom “the Gittite” (vi. 10, 11) may have been so named from GITTAIM or from GATH-RIMMON.

Gi't'ith (Heb.) = a musical instrument, by some supposed to have been used by the people of Gath, and thence introduced by David into Palestine; and by others to have been employed at the festivities of the vintage (Heb. gath = wine-press) (Ps. viii., lxxxi., lxxxiv.). It may signify some joyous air or style of musical performance (J. A. Alexander, on Ps. viii.).

Gi'zon-ite (fr. Heb. = one from Gizon [perhaps = quarry, Ges.; pass, ford, Fñ.], a place otherwise unknown, Ges.), the. “The sons of Ha-hem the Gizonite” are named among the warriors of David's guard (1 Chr. xi. 34). Kennicott concludes that Gizonite should be GOUNI, a proper name, not an appellation.

Glass. The Heb. zêchûchîth, which, according to the best authorities, means a kind of glass anciently held in high esteem, occurs only in Job xxviii. 17, where in A. V. it is rendered “crystal.” It seems that Job xxviii. 17 contains the only allusion to glass found in the O. T., and even this reference is disputed. In spite of this absence of specific allusion to glass in the sacred writings, the Hebrews must have been aware of the invention. From paintings representing the process of glass-blowing which have been discovered at Beni-Hassan, and in tombs at other places, we know that the invention is at least as remote as the age of Osirtasen I. (perhaps a contemporary of Joseph), 3,500 years ago.

Egyptian Glass-blowers.—(Wilkinson.)

Fragments of wine-vases as old as the Exodus have been discovered in Egypt. The art was known to the ancient Assyrians. There is little doubt that the honor of the discovery belongs to the Egyptians. Glass was not only known to the ancients, but used by them (as Winckelmann thinks) far more extensively than in modern times. The Egyptians knew the art of cutting, grinding, and engraving it, and they could even inlay it with gold or enamel, and "permeate opaque glass with designs of various colors." Besides this they could color it with such brilliancy as to be able to imitate precious stones in a manner which often defied detection. In the N. T. glass is alluded to as an emblem of brightness (Gr. hualos, adj. hualinos; Rev. iv. 6. xv. 2, xxi. 18, 21). For "glasses" in Is. iii. 23, and "glass" in 1 Cor. xiii. 12; 2 Cor. iii. 18; Jas. i. 23, see MIRROR.

Glean'ing. The remarks under CORNER on the definite character of the rights of the poor, or rather of poor relations and dependants, to a share of the crop, are especially exemplified in the instance of Ruth gleaning in the field of Boaz (Ru. ii. 6, 8, 9). The gleaning of fruit-trees, as well as of cornfields, was reserved for the poor.

Glede (gleed) (Heb. râdh), the old name for the common kite of the Eastern continent (Milvus ictinus, or vulgaris), occurs only in Deut. xiv. 13, among the unclean birds of prey.

Gnat [nat] (Gr. kônops), a small, winged insect, regarded as unclean, and mentioned only in the proverbial expression used by our Saviour in Mat. xxiii. 24—"strain at (an error for 'strain out') a gnat and swallow a camel."

Goad. The equivalent terms in the Hebrew are (1.) malnad (Judg. iii. 31) and (2.) dorbân, dorbonôth (1 Sam. xiii. 21; Eccl. xii. 11). The goad, as still used in S. Europe and W. Asia, consists of a rod about eight feet long, brought to a sharp point, and sometimes cased with iron at the head. Its long handle might be a formidable weapon. The kicking of unruly oxen against the sharp points of the goads (Gr. pl. kentra, A. V. "pricks") is alluded to in Acts ix. 5, xxvi. 14. AGRICULTURE; PRICK.

Goat. Of the Hebrew words translated "goat," "he-goat," and "she-goat" in A. V., the most common is 'ez, which=either a he-goat (Ex. xii. 5; Lev. iv. 23, 28, &c.) or a she-goat (Gen. xxx. 35, xxxi. 38, xxxii. 14 [Heb. 15], &c.). The Heb. plural 'attûdim, translated "rams" (Gen. xxxi. 10, 12), "goats" (Ps. l. 13, &c.), "he-goats" (Num. vii. 17 ff.; Ps. l. 9, &c.), = he-goats; tsûphir (2 Chr. xxix. 21; Dan. viii. 5, &c.), and tayish (Gen. xxx. 35, &c.) = "he-goat;" sâ'ir (Lev. iv. 24, ix. 15, xvi. 7 ff., &c.), often translated "kid" (iv. 23, ix. 3, xvi. 5, &c.), = he-goat (DEVIL 3; SATYRS); gêdî and fem. gêdiyâh are uniformly translated "kid" (Gen. xxvii. 2, 16; Cant. i. 8, &c.); the plural yê'êlîm = "wild goats," or mountain goats (1 Sam. xxiv. 2; Job xxxix. 1, and Ps. civ. 18); akkô (Deut. xiv. 5), translated "wild goat" in A. V. after the Targum, Arabic, and Syriac, = the tragelaphus or goat-deer (so Mr. Drake after Shaw; but Gesenius and Fürst translate roe-buck or roe, others prefer chamois, and others gazelle). On scape-goat (Heb. 'azâzêl), see ATONEMENT, DAY OF. In the N. T. the Gr. eriphion (= young kid, Rbn. N. T. Lex.) is translated "goat" in Mat. xxv. 33; eriphos (= kid, young goat) is translated "goat" in verse 32, and "kid" in Lk. xv. 29; tragos (= he-goat) is translated "goat" in Heb. ix. 12, 13, 19, x. 4. There appear to be two or three varieties of the common goat (Hircus agagrus) at present bred in Palestine and Syria, but whether they are identical with those which were reared by the ancient Hebrews it is not possible to say. The most marked varieties are the Syrian goat (Capra Mambrica, Linn.), and the Angora goat (Capra Angorensis, Linn.), with fine long hair. There is also a variety that differs but little from British specimens. Goats have from the earliest ages been considered important animals in rural economy both for their milk and the excellent flesh of the young animals. Goats were offered as sacrifices (Lev. iii. 12, &c.; SACRIFICE); their MILK was used as FOOD (Prov. xxvii. 27); their flesh was eaten (Gen. xxvii. 9; Deut. xiv. 4); their hair was used for the curtains of the tabernacle (Ex. xxvi. 7; xxxvi. 14), and for stuffing bolsters (1 Sam. xix. 13; BED; SACK-CLOTH); their skins were for bottles, and sometimes as clothing (Heb. xi. 37). (BOTTLE; DRESS.) The ye'elim ("wild goats," A. V.) not improbably = some species of ibex, perhaps the goat of Mount Sinai (Capra Sinaitica), the Beden or Jacla of Egypt and Arabia.

Goat, Scap. ATONEMENT, DAY OF.

Go'ath (fr. Heb. = loving, Ges.), a place apparently in the neighborhood of Jerusalem, and named, in connection with the hill GAREB, only in Jer. xxxi. 39.

Gob (Heb. pit, cistern, Ges.), a place mentioned only in 2 Sam. xxi. 18, 19, as the scene of two encounters between David's warriors and the Philistines. In 1 Chr. xx. 4, the name is given as GEZER. On the other hand the LXX. and Syriac have GATH in the first case, a name which in Hebrew somewhat resembles Gob.

Gob'let (Heb. aggân), a circular vessel for wine or other liquid (Cant. vii. 2). BASIN; CUP.

* God, the A. V. translation of—1. Heb. el, plural elim (= strong, mighty, Ges.), applied to "mighty" ones (Ps. xxix. 1, &c.), false gods (Ex. xv. 11? xxxiv. 14, &c.), and idols (Is. xlv. 10 ff., &c.), as well as the true God (Gen. xiv. 18 ff., xvi. 13, xvii. 1, &c.).—2. Heb. ilôah, plural ilôhim. The singular form occurs only in poetry (especially Job), and in the later Hebrew (Neb., Dan., &c.), applied to any god (2 Chr. xxxii. 15; Dan. xi. 37 ff.; Hab. i. 11, &c.), as well as to the living God (Deut. xxxii. 15; Neh. ix. 17; Job iii. 4; Ps. l. 22; Hab. iii. 3, &c.). The plural is used of deities or gods in general, and translated "gods" (Gen. xxxi. 30, 32, xxxv. 2, 4; Ex. xii. 12; Ps. lxxxvi. 8, &c.), but principally, as a plural of excellency or majesty, of the true God throughout the O. T. (Gen. i. 1 ff., &c., &c.). The use in the PENTATEUCH sometimes of Elôhim, sometimes of JEHOVAH, to designate the true God, has given rise to the document theories respecting the origin of the books of Moses. In Ps. viii. 6 the Heb. elôhim is translated "angels" in the A. V., Targum, Syriac, LXX., Vulgate, &c.; but here Gesenius, Fürst, Dr. W. L. Alexander in Kitto, &c., would translate God; and Dr. J. A. Alexander (on Ps.) translates divinity, as vaguely and abstractly referring to all conditions of existence higher than our own.—3. Heb. Yhōvîh (= JEHOVAH; LOHN), when another Hebrew word translated "Lord" precedes it. In this case "GOD" is printed in capitals in the A. V.—4. Gr. theos. This, like No. 1 and 2, for which the LXX. use it, is applied to any god (Acts vii. 43, xii. 22, &c.) or idol (vii. 40), as well as throughout the N. T. to the true God (Mat. i. 23, iii. 9, 16, &c.); also to SATAN "the god of this world" (2 Cor. iv. 4).—5. Gr. kurios once (Acts xix. 20). This is usually translated "Lord" (Mat. i. 20 ff. &c.), and in the LXX. = Jehovah. It is also applied to a human "lord" (Mat. x. 24, 25, &c.), or "master" (vi. 24, &c.), and is sometimes translated "sir" (xiii. 27, &c.).—6. Gr. daimonion (= DEMON) in plural once (Acts xvii. 18).—The existence of God is assumed in the Scriptures as abundantly evident (Ps. xiv. 1, xix. 1; Rom. i. 20, 21, &c.). The BIBLE, the volume of His revealed truth (INSPIRATION), sets forth His infinite attributes and perfect excellence (Ex. xxxiv. 6, 7), His works of CREATION and providence, His government and requirements, the provisions of His grace, and the retributions of eternity (Gen. xvii. 1; Ex. xx. 3-17; Ps. cxxxix., cxlv.; Mat. xix. 18, 19, xxv. 31-46; Mk. xii. 29-31; Jn. iii. 16, 17; Rom. ii. 5-11, iii. 20-31, vi. 23, xii. 1, 2, xiii. 9, 10; 2 Cor. v. 10; 1 Tim. i. 17, &c. (ALMIGHTY; ATONEMENT; DEATH; EARTH; ETERNAL; FOOT; HAND; HEAVEN; HELL; IDOL; IDOLATRY; JESUS CHRIST; LIFE, &c.).

Gog (Heb. mountain, i. e. Caucasus, Föl.). 1. A Reubenite (1 Chr. v. 4), son of Shemaiah.—2. See MAGOG.

Golan (Heb. exile, Ges.), a city of BASHAN (Deut. iv. 43) allotted out of the half-tribe of MANASSEH to the Levites (Josh. xxi. 27), and one of the three cities of refuge E. of the Jordan (xx. 8). Its very site is now unknown. The city of Golan is several times referred to by Josephus; he, however, more frequently speaks of the province which took its name from it, Gaulanitis. It seems that when Golan rose to power it became the head of a large province, the extent of which is pretty accurately given by Josephus. It lay E. of Galilee, and N. of Gadarithis. (GADARA.) The river Hieromax may be regarded as the S. border of Gaulanitis. The Jordan, from the Sea of Galilee to its fountains at BEN and Cesarea-Philippi, formed the western boundary. It is important to observe that the boundaries of the modern province of Jaulân (which is the Arabic form of the Hebrew Golan) correspond so far with those of Gaulanitis; we may, therefore, safely assume that their northern and eastern boundaries are also identical. Jaulân is bounded on the N. by Jadîr (the ancient Jurra), and on the E. by HATRAN. The greater part of Gaulanitis is a flat and fertile table-land, well watered, and clothed with luxuriant grass. (PLAIN 4.) The western side of Gaulanitis, along the Sea of Galilee, is steep, rugged, and bare, upward of 2,500 feet in height. Gaulanitis was once densely populated, but is now almost completely deserted.

Gold (Heb. usually zāhāb; Gr. chrusion, chrusos), the most valuable of metals, from its color, lustre, weight, ductility, and other useful properties. Hence it is used as an emblem of purity (Job xxiii. 10) and nobility (Lam. iv. 1). Gold was known from the very earliest times (Gen. ii. 11). It was at first chiefly used for ornaments, &c. (Gen. xxiv. 22). Coined money was not known to the ancients till a comparatively late period; and on the Egyptian tombs gold is represented as being weighed in rings for commercial purposes (compare Gen. xliii. 21). Gold was extremely abundant in ancient times (1 Chr. xxii. 14; 2 Chr. i. 15, ix. 9; Nah. ii. 9; Dan. iii. 1); but this did not depreciate its value, because of the enormous quantities consumed by the wealthy in furniture, &c. (1 K. vi. 22, x.; Cant. iii. 9, 10; Esth. i. 6; Jer. x. 9). The chief countries mentioned as producing gold are Arabia, Sheba, and OPHIR (1 K. ix. 28, x. 1; Job xxviii. 16). Other gold-bearing countries were Uphaz (Jer. x. 9; Dan. x. 5) and Parvaim (2 Chr. iii. 6). Metallurgic processes are mentioned in Ps. lxxvi. 10; Prov. xvii. 3, xxvii. 21; and in Is. xlvi. 6, the trade of goldsmith (compare Judg. xvii. 4) is alluded to in connection with the overlaying of idols with gold-leaf. ALTAR, B. II.; CALF; DRESS; EMBROIDERER; HANDICRAFT; METALS; MINES; ORNAMENTS, PERSONAL.

* Gold'en Bowl (Ecc. xii. 6). MEDICINE.

* Gold'smith (Neb. iii. 8, &c.). GOLD; HANDICRAFT.

Gol-go-tha (Gr. form of the Heb. or rather Chal. gulgaltā = skull), the name of the spot at which our Lord was crucified (Mat. xxvii. 33; Mk. xv. 22; Jn. xix. 17). By these three evangelists it is interpreted to mean the "place of a skull." St. Luke's words are really as follows—"the place which is called 'a skull'"—not, as in the other gospels, "of a skull," thus employing the Greek term exactly as they do the Hebrew one. Two explanations of the name are given: (1.) that it was a spot where executions ordinarily took place, and therefore abounded in skulls. Or (2.) it may come from the look or form of the spot itself, bald, round, and skull-like, and therefore a mound or hillock, in accordance with the common phrase—for which there is no direct authority—"Mount CALVARY." Whichever of these is the correct explanation, Golgotha seems to have been a known spot. JERUSALEM.

Gol-i'ath (fr. Heb. = exile, an exile, Ges.), a famous giant of Gath, who "morning and evening for forty days" defied the armies of Israel, and was slain by DAVID (1 Sam. xvii.). He was possibly descended from the old REPHAIM, of whom a scattered remnant took refuge with the Philistines after their dispersion by the Ammonites (Deut. ii. 20, 21; 2 Sam. xxi. 22). His height was "six cubits and a span," which, taking the cubit at twenty-one inches, would make him ten and a half feet high. But the LXX. and Josephus read "four cubits and a span." (GIANTS.) The scene of his combat with David was the Valley of the Terebinth. (ELAH, VALLEY OF.) For an explanation of 2 Sam. xxi. 19, see ELHANAN 1.

Gomer (Heb. completion, or perhaps heat, Fū.). 1. The eldest son of JAPHETH, and the father of ASHEKENAZ, RIPHATH, and TOGARMAH (Gen. x. 2, 3). His name is subsequently noticed but once (Ez. xxxviii. 6) as an ally or subject of the Scythian king Gog. He is generally recognized as the progenitor of the early Cimmerians, of the later Cimbri and the other branches of the Celtic family, and of the modern Gael and Cymry, the latter preserving with very slight deviation the original name. (TONGUES, CON-FUSION OF.)—2. The daughter of Diblaim, and concubine of Hosea (Hos. i. 3).

Go-mor'rah (Heb. 'amōrdh, prob. = submersion), one of the five "cities of the plain" (PLAIN 5) or "vale of SIDDIM," that under their respective kings joined battle there with Chedorlaomer (Gen. xiv. 2-8) and his allies, by whom they were discomfited till Abraham came to the rescue. Four out of the five were afterward destroyed by the Lord with fire from heaven (xix. 23-29). Of these Gomorrah seems to have been only second to Sodom in importance, as well as in the wickedness that led to their overthrow (x. 19, xiii. 10; Deut. xxxii. 32, &c.). What that atrocity was may be gathered from Gen. xix. 4-8. ARABAH; SEA, THE SALT.

Go-mor'ra (Gr. fr. Heb.), in the A. V. of the Apoc. and N. T., = GOMORRAH.

Gopher (Heb. literally = pitch, Ges.; a hard, strong tree, Fū.) wood, the wood of which Noah's ark was made (Gen. vi. 14 only). The Hebrew word does not occur in the cognate dialects. Two principal conjectures have been proposed:—1. That "trees of Gopher" = any trees of the resinous kind, such as pine, fir, &c. (Isaac Vossius). 2. That Gopher is CYPRESS (Fuller, Bochart, Celsius, Gesenius).

Gorg'i-as [gor'je-as] (Gr.), a general in the service of Antiochus Epiphanes (1 Mc. iii. 38), who was appointed by his regent Lysias to a command in the expedition against Judea (B. C. 166), in which he was defeated by Judas Maccabeus with great loss (iv. 1 ff.). At a later time (B. C. 164) he held a garrison in Jamnia, and defeated the forces of Joseph and Azarias, who attacked him contrary to the orders of Judas (v. 56 ff.; 2 Mc. xii. 32). The account of Gorgias in 2 Mc. viii. 9, x. 14, xii. 32 ff., is very obscure.

Gor-ty'na (L. fr. Gr.), a city of CRETE, and in ancient times its most important city, next to Cnossus. It appears to have contained Jewish residents (1 Mc. xv. 23). It was nearly half way between the eastern and western extremities of the island, and seems to have been the capital under the Romans.

Go'shen (Heb., perhaps fr. Egyptian = boundary of Hercules, Fū.), the name of a part of EGYPT where the Israelites dwelt during their sojourn in that country; usually called the "land of Goshen," but also "Goshen" simply. It appears to have borne another name, "the land of Rameses" (Gen. xlvii. 11), unless this be the name of a district of Goshen. It was between the residence of Joseph's Pharaoh and the frontier of Palestine, and apparently the extreme province toward that frontier (xlv. 10, xlv. 29). Gen. xlv. 33, 34, shows that Goshen was scarcely regarded as a part of Egypt Proper, and was not peopled by Egyptians—characteristics that would positively indicate a frontier province. The next mention of Goshen confirms the previous inference that its position was between Canaan and the Delta (xlvii. 1, 5, 6, 11). Goshen was a pastoral country where some of Pharaoh's cattle were kept. The clearest indications of the exact position of Goshen are those afforded by the narrative of the Exodus. (EXODUS, THE.) The Israelites set out from the town of Rameses in Goshen, made two days' journey to "the edge of the wilderness," and in one day more reached the RED SEA. At the starting-point two routes lay before them, "the way of the land of the Philistines . . . that [was] near," and "the way of the wilderness of the Red Sea" (Ex. xiii. 17, 18). From these indications Mr. R. S. Poole infers that the land of Goshen was in part near the eastern side of the ancient Delta, Rameses lying within the valley now called the Wādi-t-Tumeylāt, about thirty miles in a direct course from the ancient western shore of the Arabian Gulf. The results of his examination of Biblical evidence are that the land of Goshen lay between the eastern part of the ancient Delta and the western border of Palestine, that it was scarcely a part of Egypt Proper, was inhabited by other foreigners besides the Israelites, and was in its geographical names rather Shemitic than Egyptian; that it was a pasture land, especially suited to a shepherd-people, and sufficient for the Israelites, who there prospered, and were separate from the main body of the Egyptians; and lastly, that one of its towns lay near the western extremity of the Wādi-t-Tumeylāt. These indications seem (so Mr. R. S. Poole) decisively to indicate the Wādi-t-Tumeylāt, the valley along which anciently flowed the canal of the Red Sea. Mr. Poole regards this tract, the whole cultivable part of which is probably under sixty geographical square miles, as sufficient for the sustenance of the Israelites, and argues that the extraordinary fertility of Egypt anciently supported an immense population as compared with its very small superficial extent, that probably the Israelites, like the Arabs, led their flocks into fertile tracts of the deserts around, that for the greater part of the sojourn their number must have been far lower than at the Exodus, and that before the Exodus they were partly spread about the oppressor's territory. Robinson (i. 52) supports the usual view of scholars at the present day, that the land of Goshen was the part of Egypt nearest to Palestine, and lay along the Pelusiatic arm of the Nile, on the E. of the Delta, in the modern province esh-Shurkiyeh, which includes the above-mentioned valley of the ancient canal; but that Goshen probably extended further W. and more into the Delta than has usually been supposed.

—2. The "land" or the "country of Goshen" is twice named as a district in southern Palestine (Josh. x. 41, xi. 16), apparently between the south country and the lowlands of JUDAH.—3. A town mentioned with Debir, Socoh, &c., as in the mountains of Judah (Josh. xv. 51); not identified.

Gos'pels. Gospel (fr. Anglo-Saxon god and spell = good message or news) is the A.V. translation in the N. T. of the Gr. euangelion (= good news, glad tidings; compare EVANGELIST), denoting especially the message of divine mercy in respect to JESUS CHRIST and the salvation of sinners (Acts xx. 24, &c.); hence, the scheme of grace and truth made known in this message, i. e. Christian doctrine in general, embracing the truths and duties taught by Jesus Christ and His apostles (Rom. ii. 16, &c.), or the making known of this message and whatever is involved in this (Rom. i. 1, 9, 16, &c.). The name Gospel, or the Gospels, is also applied in common language to the four inspired histories of the life and teaching of Christ (Matthew, Mark, Luke, John) contained in the N. T., of which separate accounts will be given in their place. They were all composed during the latter half of the first century: Matthew and Mark some years before the destruction of Jerusalem; Luke probably about A. D. 64; and John toward the close of the century. Before the end of the second century, there is abundant evidence that the four Gospels, as one collection, were generally used and accepted. For this we have the testimony of Irenæus, Tertullian, Origen, Theophilus, and Tatian. The Muratorian fragment describes the Gospels of Luke and John; but time and carelessness seem to have destroyed the sentences relating to Matthew and Mark. Another source of evidence is open to us in the citations from the Gospels found in the earliest writers. Barnabas, Clemens Romanus, and Polycarp, quote passages from them, but not with verbal exactness. The testimony of Justin Martyr (born about A. D. 99, martyred A. D. 165) is much fuller; many of his quotations are found verbatim in Matthew, Luke, and John, and possibly Mark also, whose words it is more difficult to separate. Besides these, Matthew appears to be quoted by the author of the Epistle to Diognetus, by Hegesippus, Irenæus, Tatian, Athenagoras, and Theophilus. Eusebius records that Pantænus found in India (the S. of Arabia?) Christians who used the Gospel of Matthew. All this shows that long before the end of the second century the Gospel of Matthew was in general use. From the fact that Mark's Gospel has few places peculiar to it, it is more difficult to identify citations not expressly assigned to him; but Justin Martyr and Athenagoras appear to quote his Gospel, and Irenæus does so by name. Luke is quoted by Justin, Irenæus, Tatian, Athenagoras, and Theophilus; and John by all of these, with the addition of Ignatius, the Epistle to Diognetus, and Polycrates. From these we may conclude that before the end of the second century the Gospel collection was well known and in general use. There is yet another line of evidence. The heretical sects, as well as the Fathers of the Church, knew the Gospels; and as there was the greatest hostility between them, if the Gospels had become known in the Church after the disension arose, the heretics would never have accepted them as genuine from such a quarter. But the Gnostics and Marcionites arose early in the second century; and therefore it is probable that the Gospels were then accepted, and thus they are traced back almost to the times of the apostles. As a matter of literary history, nothing can be better established than the genuineness of the Gospels. On comparing these four books one with another, a peculiar difficulty claims attention, which has had much to do with the controversy as to their genuineness. In the fourth Gospel the narrative coincides with that of the other three in a few passages only. Putting aside the account of the Passion, there are only three facts which John relates in common with the other Evangelists. Two of these are, the feeding of the five thousand, and the storm on the Sea of Galilee (ch. vi.). The third is the anointing of His feet by Mary. Whilst the others present the life of Jesus in Galilee, John follows him into Judea; nor should we know, but for him, that our Lord had journeyed to Jerusalem at the prescribed feasts. The received explanation is the only satisfactory one, namely, that John, writing last, at the close of the first century, had seen the other Gospels, and purposely abstained from writing anew what they had sufficiently recorded. In the other three Gospels there is a great amount of agreement. If we suppose the history that they contain to be divided into sections, in 42 of these all the three narratives coincide, 12 more are given by Matthew and Mark only, 5 by Mark and Luke only, and 14 by Matthew and Luke. To these must be added 5 peculiar to Matthew, 2 to Mark, and 9 to Luke; and the enumeration is complete. But this applies only to general coincidence as to the facts narrated; the amount of verbal coincidence, i. e. the passages either verbally the same, or coinciding in the use of many of the same words, is much smaller. Without going minutely into the examination of examples, which would be desirable if space permitted, the leading facts connected with the subject may be thus summed up:—The verbal and material agreement of the three first Evangelists is such as does not occur in any other authors who have written independently of one another. The verbal agreement is greater where the spoken words of others are cited than where facts are recorded; and greatest in quotations of the words of our Lord. But in some leading events, as in the call of the four first disciples, that of Matthew, and the Transfiguration, the agreement even in expression is remarkable: there are also narratives where there is no verbal harmony in the outset, but only in the crisis or emphatic part of the story (Mat. viii. 3 = Mk. i. 41 = Lk. v. 13, and Mat. xiv. 19, 20 = Mk. vi. 41–43 = Lk. ix. 16, 17). The language of all three is Greek, with Hebrew idioms: the Hebraisms are most abundant in Mark, and fewest in Luke. In quotations from the O. T., the Evangelists, or two of them, sometimes exhibit a verbal agreement, although they differ from the Hebrew and from the LXX. (Mat. iii. 3 = Mk. i. 3 = Lk. iii. 4. Mat. iv. 10 = Lk. iv. 8. Mat. xi. 10 = Mk. i. 2 = Lk. vii. 27, &c.). Except as to twenty-four verses, Mark contains no principal facts not found in Matthew and Luke; but he often supplies details omitted by them, and these are often such as would belong to the graphic account of an eye-witness. There are no cases in which Matthew and Luke exactly harmonize, where Mark does not also coincide with them. In several places the words of Mark have something in common with each of the other narratives, so as to form a connecting link between them, where their words slightly differ. The examples of verbal agreement between Mark and Luke are not so long or so numerous as those between Matthew and Luke, and Matthew and Mark; but as to the arrangement of events, Mark and Luke frequently coincide, where Matthew differs from them. These are the leading particulars; but they are very far from giving a complete notion of a phenomenon well worthy of that attention and reverent study of the sacred text by which alone it can be fully and fairly apprehended. The harmony and the variety, the agreement and the differences, form together the problem with which Biblical critics have occupied themselves for 150 years. The attempts at a solution are so many, that they can be more easily classified than enumerated. The first and most obvious suggestion would be, that the narrators made use of each other's work. Accordingly Grotius, Mill, Wetstein, Griesbach, and many others, have endeavored to ascertain which Gospel is to be regarded as the first; which is copied from the first; and which is the last, and copied from the other two. Each of the six possible combinations has found advocates. But the theory in its crude form is in itself most improbable; and the wonder is that so much time and learning have been devoted to it. It assumes that an Evangelist has taken up the work of his predecessor, and, without substantial alteration, has made a few changes in form, a few additions and retrenchments, and has then allowed the whole to go forth under his name.—The supposition of a common original from which the three Gospels were drawn, each with more or less modification, would naturally occur to those who rejected the notion that the Evangelists had copied from each other. It appeared to Eichhorn that the portions common to all the three Gospels were contained in a certain common document, from which they all drew. He considers himself entitled to assume that he can reconstruct the original document, and also that there must have been four other documents to account for the phenomena of the text. Thus he makes—1. The original document. 2. An altered copy which St. Matthew used. 3. An altered copy which St. Luke used. 4. A third copy, made from the two preceding, used by St. Mark. 5. A fourth altered copy, used by St. Matthew and St. Luke in common. As there is no external evidence worth considering that this original or any of its numerous copies ever existed, the value of this elaborate hypothesis must depend upon its furnishing the only explanation, and that a sufficient one, of the facts of the text. Bishop Marsh, however, finds it necessary, in order to complete the account of the text, to raise the number of documents to eight, still without producing any external evidence for the existence of any of them; and this, on one side, deprives Eichhorn's theory of the merit of completeness, and, on the other, presents a much broader surface to the obvious objections. He assumes the existence of—1. A Hebrew original. 2. A Greek translation. 3. A transcript of No. 1, with alterations and additions. 4. Another, with another set of alterations and additions. 5. Another, combining both the preceding, used by St. Mark, who also used No. 2. 6. Another, with the alterations and additions of No. 3, and with further additions, used by St. Matthew. 7. Another, with those of No. 4 and further additions, used by St. Luke, who also used No. 2. 8. A wholly distinct Hebrew document, in which our Lord's precepts, parables, and discourses were recorded, but not in chronological order; used both by St. Matthew and St. Luke. It will be allowed that this elaborate hypothesis, whether in the form given it by Marsh or by Eichhorn, possesses almost every fault that can be charged against an argument of that kind. For every new class of facts a new document must be assumed to have existed. The "original Gospel" is supposed to have been of such authority as to be circulated everywhere: yet so defective, as to require annotation from any hand, so little revered that no hand spared it. If all the Evangelists agreed to draw from such a work, it must have been widely if not universally accepted in the Church; and yet there is no record of its existence. The force of this dilemma has been felt by the supporters of the theory: if the work was of high authority, it would have been preserved, or at least mentioned; if of lower authority, it could not have become the basis of three canonical Gospels: and various attempts have been made to escape from it.—There is another supposition to account for these facts, of which perhaps Gieseler has been the most acute expositor. Probably none of the Gospels was written until many years after the day of Pentecost on which the Holy Spirit descended on the assembled disciples. From that day commenced at Jerusalem the work of preaching the Gospel and converting the world. Prayer and preaching were the business of the apostles' lives. Now, their preaching must have been, from the nature of the case, in great part historical; it must have been based upon an account of the life and acts of Jesus of Nazareth. They had been the eye-witnesses; there was no written record to which the hearers might be referred for historical details; and therefore the preachers must furnish not only inferences from the life of our Lord, but the facts of the life itself. The preaching, then, must have been of such a kind as to be to the hearers what the reading of lessons or chapters from the Gospels is to us. There is no improbability in supposing that in the course of twenty or thirty years' assiduous teaching, without a written Gospel, the matter of the apostolic preaching should have taken a settled form. Not only might the apostles think it well that their own accounts should agree, as in substance so in form; but the teachers whom they sent forth, or left behind in the churches they visited, would have to be prepared for their mission; and, so long as there was no written Gospel to put into their hands, it might be desirable that the oral instruction should be as far as possible one and the same to all. The guidance of the Holy Spirit supplied for a time such aid as made a written Gospel unnecessary; but the apostles saw the dangers and errors which a traditional Gospel would be exposed to in the course of time; and, whilst they were still preaching the oral Gospel in the strength of the Holy Ghost, they were admonished by the same Divine Person to prepare those written records which were hereafter to be the daily spiritual food of all the Church of Christ. Nor is there any thing unnatural in the supposition that the apostles intentionally uttered their witness in the same order, and even, for the most part, in the same form of words. The language of their first preaching was the Syro-Chaldaic, which was a poor and scanty language; and though Greek was now widely spread, and was the language even of several places in Palestine, though it prevailed in Antioch, whence the first missions to Greeks and Hellenists, or Jews who spoke Greek, proceeded (Acts xi. 20, xiii. 1-3), the Greek tongue, as used by Jews, partook of the poverty of the speech which it replaced; as, indeed, it is impossible to borrow a whole language without borrowing the habits of thought upon which it has built itself. It is supposed, then, that the preaching of the apostles, and the teaching whereby they prepared others to preach, as they did, would tend to assume a common form, more or less fixed; and that the portions of the three Gospels which harmonize most exactly owe their agreement not to the fact that they were copied from each other, although it is impossible to say that the later writer made no use of the earlier one, nor to the existence of any original document now lost to us, but to the fact that the apostolic preaching had already clothed itself in a settled or usual form of words, to which the writers inclined to conform without feeling bound to do so; and the differences which occur, often in the closest proximity to the harmonies, arise from the feeling of independence with which each wrote what he had seen and heard, or, in the case of Mark and Luke, what apostolic witnesses had told him. The harmonies begin with the baptism of John; that is, with the consecration of the Lord to His Messianic office; and with this event probably the ordinary preaching of the apostles would begin, for its purport was that Jesus is the Messiah, and that as Messiah He suffered, died, and rose again. They are very frequent as we approach the period of the Passion, because the sufferings of the Lord would be much in the mouth of every one who preached the Gospel, and all would become familiar with the words in which the apostles described it. But as regards the Resurrection, which differed from the Passion in that it was a fact which the enemies of Christianity felt bound to dispute

(Mat. xxviii. 15), it is possible that the divergence arose from the intention of each Evangelist to contribute something toward the weight of evidence for this central truth. Accordingly, all the four, even Mark (xvi. 14), who oftener throws a new light upon old ground than opens out new, mention distinct acts and appearances of the Lord to establish that He was risen indeed. The verbal agreement is greater where the words of others are recorded, and greatest of all where they are those of Jesus, because here the apostolic preaching would be especially exact; and where the historical fact is the utterance of certain words, the duty of the historian is narrowed to a bare record of them. That this opinion would explain many of the facts connected with the text is certain. Whether, besides conforming to the words and arrangement of the apostolic preaching, the Evangelists did in any cases make use of each other's work or not, it would require a more careful investigation of details to discuss than space permits.—How does this last theory bear upon our belief in the INSPIRATION of the Gospels? Supposing that the portion of the three first Gospels which is common to all has been derived from the preaching of the apostles in general, then it is drawn directly from a source which we know from our Lord Himself to have been inspired (Mat. x. 19; Lk. xii. 11, 12; Mk. xiii. 11; Jn. xiv., xv., xvi.). Now, the inspiration of an historical writer will consist in its truth, and in its selection of events. Every thing narrated must be substantially and exactly true, and the comparison of the Gospels one with another offers us nothing that does not answer to this test. There are differences of arrangement of events; here some details of a narrative or a discourse are supplied which are wanting there; and if the writer had professed to follow a strict chronological order, or had pretended that his record was not only true but complete, then one inversion of order, or one omission of a syllable, would convict him of inaccuracy. But if it is plain—if it is all but avowed—that minute chronological data are not part of the writer's purpose—if it is also plain that nothing but a selection of the facts is intended, or, indeed, possible (Jn. xxi. 25)—then the proper test to apply is, whether each gives us a picture of the life and ministry of Jesus of Nazareth that is self-consistent and consistent with the others, such as would be suitable to the use of those who were to believe on His Name—for this is their evident intention. About the answer there should be no doubt. We have seen that each Gospel has its own features, and that the divine element has controlled the human but not destroyed it. But the picture which they conspire to draw is one full of harmony. The histories are true according to any test that should be applied to a history; and the events that they select—though we could not presume to say that they were more important than what are omitted, except from the fact of the omission—are at least such as to have given the whole Christian Church a clear conception of the Redeemer's life, so that none has ever complained of insufficient means of knowing Him. A perverted form of the theory we are considering pretends that the facts of the Redeemer's life remained in the state of an oral tradition till the latter part of the second century, and that the four Gospels were not written till that time (Strauss, &c.). The latter theory was invented to accord with the assumption that MIRACLES are impossible, but upon no evidence whatever; and the argument, when exposed, runs in this vicious circle:—There are no miracles, therefore the accounts of them must have grown up in the course of a century from popular exaggeration; and as the accounts are not contemporaneous, it is not proved that there are miracles. (BIBLE; CANON; NEW TESTAMENT.) That the present Gospels were post-apostolic inventions, would be the greatest of miracles.

TABLE OF THE HARMONY OF THE FOUR GOSPELS.

BY ABP. THOMSON, ORIGINAL AUTHOR OF THE PRECEDING ARTICLE.—WITH CORRECTIONS BY THE AMERICAN EDITOR.

N. B.—In the following Table, where all the references under a given section are printed in thick type, as under "Two Genealogies," it is to be understood that some special difficulty besets the harmony. Where one or more references under a given section are in thin, and one or more in thick type, it is to be understood that the former are given as in their proper place, and that it is more or less doubtful whether the latter are to be considered as parallel narratives or not.

Goth-e-l'as (Gr. = ATHALIAN). Josias, son of Gotholias, was one of the sons of Elam who returned from Babylon with Esdras (1 Esd. viii. 33).

Go-tho'ni-el (Gr. = OTHNIEL), father of Chabris (Jd. vi. 15).

Gourd, the A. V. translation of—1. Heb. kikayôn, only in Jon. iv. 6-10. A difference of opinion has long existed as to the plant intended by this word; but Mr. Houghton, with Jerome, Celsius, Bochart, Rosenmüller, Gesenius, Dr. Royle in Kitto, Prof. Stowe, &c., maintains that the plant which afforded shade to the prophet Jonah before Nineveh is the Ricinus communis, or castor-oil plant, which, formerly a native of Asia, is now naturalized in America, Africa, and Southern Europe. This plant varies considerably in size, being in India a tree, but in England seldom more than three or four feet high. The leaves are large and palmate, with serrated lobes, and would form an excellent shelter for the sun-stricken prophet. (See cut on p. 348.) The seeds contain the oil so well known under the name of "castor-oil," which has for ages been in high repute as a medicine. The Mohammedan, Christian, and Jewish inhabitants of Mosul, opposite ancient Nineveh, all agree (so Dr. H. Lobdell in B. S. xii. 397) that Jonah's "gourd" was the ker'a, a kind of pumpkin peculiar to the East, of astonishingly rapid growth, and very abundant on the banks of the Tigris. Its leaves are large, and its fruit somewhat like the squash.—2. Heb. pl. pakku'ôth (2 K. iv. 39), a fruit gathered ignorantly by one of "the sons of the prophets," who supposed them to be good for food; doubtless (so Mr. Houghton) a species of the gourd tribe (Cucurbitaceæ), which contains some plants of a very bitter and dangerous character. The leaves and tendrils of this family of plants bear some resemblance to those of the vine. Hence the expression "wild vine," and as several kinds of Cucurbitaceæ, such as melons, pumpkins, &c., are favorite articles of refreshing food amongst the Orientals, we can easily understand the cause of the mistake. The etymology of the Hebrew word from pdka', "to split or burst open," has been thought to favor the identification of the plant with the Ecba-

lium elaterium or "squirting cucumber," so called from the elasticity with which the fruit, when ripe, opens and scatters the seeds when touched. Celsius, Rosenmüller, Winer, and Gesenius favor this explanation. The old versions, however, understand the colocynth, the fruit of which is about the size of an orange. The drastic medicine in such general use is a preparation from this plant. Since the dry gourds of the colocynth, when crushed, burst with a crashing noise, there is much reason for being satisfied with an explanation which has authority, etymology, and general suitableness in its favor. In 1 K. vi. 18 the Heb. plural (pakd'im = pakku'oth, Ges.), used as an architectural ornament, is translated in the margin "gourds," but in the A. V. text there and in vii. 24 "knops."

Govern-or, in the A. V. the representative of—1. Heb. alluph, the chief of a tribe or family (Zech. ix.

7, xii. 5, 8), translated "דוכא" in Gen. xxxvi. and 1 Chr. i.—2. Heb. hokék or chokék (Judg. v. 9), and 3. mehokék or mehokék (v. 14), = a ruler in his capacity of lawgiver and dispenser of justice, also translated "lawgiver" (Gen. xlix. 10; Num. xxi. 18, &c.).—4. Heb. môshel = a ruler considered especially as having power over the property and persons of his subjects; = JUDGE (Gen. xlv. 26; Ps. xxii. 28 [Heb. 29]; Jer. xxx. 81), also translated "rule" or "ruler" (Josh. xii. 2; Ps. cv. 20; Gen. xxiv. 2). The "governors of the people," in 2 Chr. xxiii. 20, appear to have been the king's body-guard (so Mr. Wright; compare 2 K. xi. 19).—5. Heb. nâgid = a prominent personage, whatever his capacity (2 Chr. xxviii. 7). It is also translated "captain," "ruler," "leader," "prince," &c., and applied to a king as the military and civil chief of his people (2 Sam. v. 2, vi. 21; 1 Chr. xxix. 22), to the general of an army (2 Chr. xxxii. 21), and to the head of a tribe (ix. 11). It denotes an officer of high rank in the palace, the lord high chamberlain (A. V. "chief governor," 2 Chr. xxviii. 7).—6. Heb. nâsi (2 Chr. i. 2), translated usually "prince," also "captain," "chief," &c. The prevailing idea in this word is that of elevation. It is applied to the chief of the tribe (Gen. xvii. 20; Num. ii. 3, &c.), to the heads of sections of a tribe (Num. iii. 32, vii. 2), and to a powerful sheikh (Gen. xxiii. 6).—7. Heb. pehâh or pehâh (1 K. x. 15, &c.), also translated "captain," "deputy," applied to the petty chieftains tributary to Solomon (2 Chr. ix. 14); to the military commander of the Syrians (1 K. xx. 24), the Assyrians (2 K. xviii. 24), the Chaldeans (Jer. li. 23), and the Medes (li. 28). Under the Persian viceroys, during the Babylonian captivity, the land of the Hebrews appears to have been portioned out among "governors," inferior in rank to the *satrap*s (Ezr. viii. 36), like the other provinces under the Persian king (Neh. ii. 7, 9). It is impossible to determine the precise limits of their authority, or the functions which they had to perform. It appears from Ezr. vi. 8 that these governors were intrusted with the collection of the king's taxes; and from Neh. v. 18, xii. 26, that they were supported by a contribution levied upon the people, which was technically termed "the bread of the governor" (compare Ezr. iv. 14). They were probably assisted in discharging their official duties by a council (Ezr. iv. 7, vi. 6). The "governor" beyond the river had a judgment-seat at Jerusalem, from which probably he administered justice when making a progress through his province (Neh. iii. 7).—8. Heb. pâkid (Jer. xx. 1), also translated "officer," "overseer," &c.; = simply a person appointed to any office. It is used of the officers proposed to be appointed by Joseph (Gen. xli. 34); of Zebul, Abimelech's lieutenant (Judg. ix. 28); of an officer of the high-priest (2 Chr. xxiv. 11); and of a priest or Levite of high rank (Neh. xi. 14, 22).—9. Heb. shallû (Gen. xlii. 6), also translated "ruler," &c.; = a man of authority; applied to Joseph as Pharaoh's prime minister (Gen. xlii. 6); to Arioch, "captain" of the guard to the king of Babylon (Dan. ii. 15); and to Daniel as third in rank under Belshazzar (v. 29).—10. Heb. sar (1 K. xxii. 26; 1 Chr. xxiv. 5, &c.), also translated "CAPTAIN," "prince," "ruler," "chief," "chief captain," &c.; = a chief, in any capacity. The term is used equally of the general of an army (Gen. xxi. 22), or the commander of a division (1 K. xvi. 9, xi. 24), as of the governor of Pharaoh's prison (Gen. xxxix. 21), and the chief of his butlers and bakers (xl. 2), or herdsman (xlvii. 6).—11. Chal. uğan, pl.

signin (Dan. ii. 48, iii. 2, 3, 27, vi. 7 [Heb. 8]), = a prefect, governor of a province, or of the magi.—12. Gr. ethnarchēs (literally ruler of a people, ethnarch), an officer of rank under Aretas, the Arabian king of Damascus (2 Cor. xi. 32). It has been conjectured that the ethnarch of Damascus was merely the governor of the resident Jews, but it does not seem probable that an officer of such limited jurisdiction would be styled "the ethnarch of Aretas the king;" and as the term is clearly capable of a wide range of meaning, it was most likely intended to denote one who held the city and district of Damascus as the king's vassal or representative.—13. Gr. hēgemōn (literally leader), the procurator of Judea under the Romans (Mat. xxvii. 2, &c.); also a leader, chief, or ruler (Mat. ii. 6, x. 18, &c.); once translated "prince" (Mat. ii. 6), twice "ruler" (Mk. xiii. 9; Lk. xxi. 12). The kindred Greek participle hēgoumenos (= leading, a leader) is twice translated "governor" (Mat. ii. 6; Acts vii. 10).—14. Gr. oikonomos, literally manager or ruler of a house (Gal. iv. 2), usually translated "steward" (Lk. xii. 42, &c.), once "chamberlain" (Rom. xvi. 23); = a steward, apparently intrusted (in Gal.) with the management of a minor's property.—15. Gr. architriklinos = master of a feast, Rbn. N. T. Lex. (Jn. ii. 9), "the governor of the feast." Lightfoot supposes him to have been a kind of chaplain, who pronounced the blessings upon the wine that was drunk during the seven days of the marriage feast. He appears to have been on intimate terms with the bridegroom, and to have presided at the banquet in his stead. The duties of the master of a feast are given at full length in Ecclus. xxxii. (xxxv. in LXX.).

Gozan (Heb. quarry? Ges.; pass, ford, Fū.) seems in the A. V. of 1 Chr. v. 26 to be the name of a river; but in 2 K. xvii. 6, and xviii. 11, it is evidently applied not to a river but a country. Gozan was the tract to which the Israelites were carried away captive by Pul, Tiglath-pileser, and Shalmaneser, or possibly Sargon. It has been variously placed; but probably = the Gauzanitis of Ptolemy, and the Mygdonia of other writers. It was the tract watered by the Habor, the modern Khabour, the great Mesopotamian affluent of the Euphrates (so Rawlinson, Gesenius, &c.).

Gra'ba = HAGABA (1 Esd. v. 29).

Grace (Heb. usually hēn or chēn; Gr. charis) usually in the Scriptures = favor, kindness in feeling or action, especially as exercised by God and the Lord Jesus Christ toward mankind, and as manifested in the blessings of the Gospel (Gen. vi. 8; Jn. i. 14, 16, 17, &c.). It may also = whatever yields pleasure or gratification, as gracefulness or beauty of form, manner, speech, character, &c. (Ps. xlv. 2; Prov. iii. 22; Eph. iv. 29; Col. iv. 6, &c.). ATONEMENT; JUSTIFY; LOVE; MERCY, &c.

* Graft'ing. GARDEN.

* Grape. VINE.

Grass. 1. This is the ordinary rendering of the Heb. hātsir or chātsir = grass, herbage, Ges. (1 K. xviii. 5; Job xl. 15; Ps. civ. 14, &c.), also translated "HAY," LXX., &c. As the herbage rapidly fades under the parching heat of the sun of Palestine, it has afforded to the sacred writers an image of the fleeting nature of human fortunes (Job viii. 12, A. V. "herb;" Ps. xxxvii. 2), and also of the brevity of human life (Is. xl. 6, 7; Ps. xc. 5).—

2. In the A. V. of Jer. i. 11, "as the heifer at grass" (Heb. dūshā) should be "as the heifer treading out corn" (so Gesenius; see AGRICULTURE). A different word (Heb. deshe = the first-shoots from the earth, tender grass, young herbage, Ges.) is translated "grass" in Gen. i. 11, 12; Is. xv. 6, &c.—3. In Num. xxii. 4, where mention is made of the ox licking up the "grass" of the field, the Heb. is yerek, elsewhere rendered green. (COLORS.)—4. Heb. 'ēneb = "herbs" for human food (Gen. i. 30; Ps. civ. 14), but also fodder for cattle (A. V. "grass;" Deut. xi. 15; Jer. xiv. 6, &c.). It is the grass (A. V. "herb") of the field (Gen. ii. 5; Ex. ix. 22) and of the mountain (Is. xlii. 15; Prov. xxvii. 25).—5. In the N. T. "grass" occurs only as the translation of the Gr. chorlos (Mat. vi. 30, &c.), which is also translated "blade" (xiii. 26; Mk. iv. 28), and "hay" (1 Cor. iii. 12). AGRICULTURE; BARN.

Graves. ARMS, II. 4.

* Gre'cia [-she-a or -sha] (L. Græcia; see GRECIAN) = GREECE (Dan. viii. 21, &c.).

* Gre'cian [-shan] (L. Græcius, fr. Gr. Graikos = the old, Pott, First), usually = GREEK, denoting one from GREECE, or one of the race inhabiting Greece; but in the N. T. the A. V. translation of Gr. Hellenistēs = a HELLENIST, or Jew speaking the Gr. language (Acts vi. 1, &c.).

Greece (fr. L.; see GRECIA). The histories of Greece and Palestine are as little connected as those of any two nations exercising the same influence on the destinies of mankind could well be. Homer's epic in its widest range does not include the Hebrews, while on the other hand the Mosaic idea of the Western world seems to have been sufficiently indefinite. (EARTH.) Moses may have derived some geographical outlines from the Egyptians; but he does not use them in Gen. x. 2-5, where he mentions the descendants of Javan as peopling the isles of the Gentiles. From the time of Moses to that of Joel we have no notice of the Greeks in the Hebrew writings. When, indeed, the Hebrews came into contact with the Ionians of Asia Minor, and recognized them as the long-lost islanders of the western migration, it was natural that they should mark the similarity of sound between the Heb. Yāvan (= Yōn), translated "JAVAN," and the Gr. Ionēs (= inhabitants of Ionía), and the application of that name to the Asiatic Greeks would tend to satisfy in some measure a longing to realize the Mosaic ethnography. Accordingly the O. T. word translated in A. V. "Grecia" (Dan. viii. 21, x. 20, xi. 2), and "Greece" (Zech. ix. 13), is in Heb. Yāvan, i. e. Javan, while the Heb. hēney hay-Yāvanīm is translated "Grecians" (Joel iii. 6 [iv. 6 in Heb.], margin "sons of the Grecians"); "Javan," however, is sometimes retained (Is. lxvi. 19; Ez. xxvii. 13). The Greeks and Hebrews met for the first time in the slave-market. The medium of communication seems to have been the Tyrian slave-merchants. About B. C. 800 Joel speaks of the Tyrians as selling the children of Judah to the Grecians (Joel iii. 6); and in Ez. xxvii. 13 the Greeks are mentioned as bartering their brazen vessels for slaves. Prophetic notice of Greece occurs in Dan. viii. 21, &c., where the history of ALEXANDER and his successors is rapidly sketched. Zechariah (ix. 13) foretells the triumphs of the Maccabees against the Greek empire of Syria, while

Isaiah (lxvi. 19) looks forward to the conversion of the Greeks, among other Gentiles, through the instrumentality of Jewish missionaries. In 1 Mc. xii. 5-23 we have an account of an embassy and letter sent by the Lacedæmonians to the Jews. The most remarkable feature in the transaction is the claim which the Lacedæmonians prefer to kindred with the Jews, and which Areus professes to establish by reference to a book. The notices of the Jewish people which occur in Greek writers have been collected by Josephus (Apion, i. 22). The chief are Pythagoras, Herodotus, Chærilus, Aristotle, Theophrastus, and Hecataeus. After the complete subjugation of the Greeks by the Romans, and the absorption into the Roman empire of the kingdoms formed out of the dominions of Alexander, the political connection between the Greeks and Jews as two independent nations no longer existed.—Ancient Greece, called by its inhabitants Hellas, was a country of S. E. Europe which extended from 36° to 40° N. latitude, separated on the N. from Illyricum and Macedonia by a range of mountains, and bounded on all other sides by the sea. That part of Greece on the N. of the Isthmus of Corinth contained the districts or provinces of Thessaly, Epirus, Acarnania, Ætolia, Locris, Doris, Phocis, Bœotia, Megaris, and Attica: the southern part or the Peloponnesus contained Laconia, Messenia, Arcadia, Elis, Argolis, Achaia, Sicynia, and Corinth. There were also numerous islands on the E. and W. coasts, all inhabited by the Greek race. Under the Romans the two provinces of MACEDONIA and ACHÆIA were often both included under the name of Greece. Greece occurs once in N. T. (Acts xx. 2, Gr. Hellas), as opposed to Macedonia. The Greeks were fond of tracing back their origin to Hellen, the son of Deucalion and Pyrrha, the survivors of the deluge; and of the four great divisions of the race, the Dorians and Æolians claimed to be descended from two sons of Hellen, and the Ionians and Achæans from two of his grandsons. The first inhabitants of Greece were called Pelasgians, and were regarded as a different race; but the history of Greece before the siege of Troy by the Greeks (B. C. 1184), and, indeed, till long afterward, is a matter of much doubt and dispute. The authentic history and chronology of Greece begins with the Olympiads (B. C. 776). Greece was divided into small independent states, some of the time at war among themselves, united into confederacies more or less extensive and lasting, but without any central controlling government; yet broadly distinguished from the rest of the world (BARBARIAN) by its language, blood, common religious rites and festivals, social institutions and laws. The two states of Greece which attained the greatest historical celebrity, were SPARTA in Laconia, and ATHENS in Attica. Some of the Greek colonies in W. Asia, N. Africa, Italy, and Sicily, attained high distinction. DARIUS HYSTASPIS, king of Persia, invaded Greece, and was defeated at Marathon (B. C. 492). His son Xerxes, following eleven years afterward with a land army of 1,800,000, was met by Leonidas, king of Sparta, with 7,000 at the pass of Thermopylae, and successfully resisted for two days, but on the third the Persians, by the help of a traitor, gained the rear of the gallant band, and the 1,000 which stood their ground with Leonidas were all slain. The Persians soon took Athens; but on the defeat at Salamis of his naval force (more than 4,000 vessels and 500,000 men), Xerxes fled to Asia. His army under Mardonius was finally defeated at Platæa, and his fleet at Mycale (B. C. 479). Thus the second Persian invasion of Greece ended; but it was followed by contests among the Greeks themselves, including the celebrated Peloponnesian war (B. C. 431-404), which lasted till Athens was captured by the Spartans and their allies. PHILIP, king of Macedon, established his supremacy in Greece by the battle of Chæronea (B. C. 338), but was succeeded two years afterward by his son ALEXANDER THE GREAT, who extended Greek influence over the greater part of Asia W. of the Indus, though Greece itself was from this time mostly in subjection, first to Macedon, afterward to Rome (ROMAN EMPIRE), and still later to Turkey. In 1821 the Greeks threw off the Turkish yoke, and a desolating war began, which lasted till 1829, when Greece took her place again as an independent country.—The language and literature of Greece have made her famous through the civilized world. The almost universal prevalence of this language in our Saviour's time and its admirable adaptedness to the expression of thought fitted it to be used in the preaching of the Gospel by the apostles and the writing of the New Testament. Greece was then, as it had long been, "the school of the human intellect," and, though the Greek religion was idolatrous, and Greek wisdom despised the Gospel and its salvation, exerted an important influence in preparing the way for the propagation and triumph of Christianity. (ALEXANDRIA, ATHENS; CORINTH; GRECIAN; GREEK; PHILOSOPHY; SEPTUAGINT, &c.). See also the article GREECE in the New American Cyclopædia.

* Greek (see GRECIAN), the A. V. translation of —1. Gr. Hellen = a native or inhabitant of GREECE, or one of the race inhabiting Greece, distinguished for civilization and refinement, and hence opposed to BARBARIAN (Rom. i. 14); but usually in the N. T. = one who uses the language and customs of this race, and thus equivalent to GENTILE, and opposed to JEW (Acts xvi. 1, 3, &c.).—2. Gr. adj. masc. Hellenikos, fem. Helleniké, neu. Hellenikon (Lk. xxiii. 38, A. V. "of Greek;" Rev. ix. 11, A. V. "Greek tongue"), and—3. Gr. adv. Hellenisti = in 'Greek, i. e. in the Greek language (Jn. xix. 20; Acts xxi. 37). The Greek language was undoubtedly understood and spoken in Palestine in our Saviour's time to a considerable extent. The Greek inscription placed over the cross and the question addressed in Greek by the Apostle Paul to the chief captain at the Temple are referred to above. Two of the apostles (ANDREW; PHILIP) had Greek names. The names DECAFOLIS, Scythopolis (BETH-SHEAN), Philadelphia (RABBAH 1), Ptolemais (ACCHO), are all from the Greek. While the Aramean or modified Hebrew (SHEMITIC LANGUAGES) was the language used by the Jews generally in Judæa, and by our Saviour in His exclamation on the cross (Mk. xv. 34, compare Mat. xxvii. 46), the Jews of all the larger cities and towns must have been more or less conversant with Greek. In Galilee the language of Hebrew origin had marked peculiarities (Mk. xiv. 70), and Greek was probably much more prevalent than in Judæa. The government of Alexander's successors (ANTIOCH'S ii.-viii., &c.) had much more authority and permanence there than in Judæa, and Greek was under them the language of the administrators of the government. Greyhound, the A. V. translation (Prov. xxx. 31, margin "horse," "Heb. girt in the loins") of the Heb. zarzir molnagim, i. e. one girt about the loins.

Various are the opinions as to what animal "comely in going" is here intended. Some think "a leopard," others "an eagle," or "a man girt with armor," or "a zebra," or "a war-horse girt with trappings" (Gesenius, Bochart, Rosenmüller, &c.), or "a wrestler," when girt about the loins for a contest (Talmud, Maurer, Mr. Houghton). Kimchi, Stuart, Gosse (in Fbn.), A. V., &c., translate "greyhound."

Grind'ing. MILL.

Grove, a word used in the A. V., with two exceptions, to translate the Heb. Āšêrâh, which is not a grove, but probably an idol or image of some kind. (ASHERAH.) It is believed also there was a connection between this symbol or image, whatever it was, and the sacred symbolic tree, often represented on Assyrian sculptures, and figured here in several different forms.—The two exceptions noticed above are Gen. xxi. 33, and 1 Sam. xxii. 6 (margin), where "grove" is the translation of the Heb. ēšêl, which in the text of 1 Sam. xxii. 6, xxxi. 13, is translated "tree," and by Stanley, Gesenius, Fürst, &c., a tamarisk; though Gesenius, Fürst, &c., suppose the meaning probably passed from the special to the general, thus = any large tree, and collectively trees, a wood, grove. (See also PLAIN 7).—In the religions of the ancient heathen world, groves play a prominent part. In the old times altars only were erected to the gods. It was thought wrong to shut up the gods within walls, and hence, as Pliny expressly tells us, trees were the first temples; and from the earliest times groves are mentioned in connection with religious worship (Gen. xii. 6, 7, xiii. 18; Deut. xi. 30; A. V. "plain"). The groves were generally found connected with temples, and often had the right of affording an asylum. Some have supposed that even the Jewish Temple had an enclosure planted with palm and cedar (Ps. xcii. 12, 13), and olive (lii. 8), as the mosque on its site now has. This is more than doubtful; but we know that a celebrated oak stood by the sanctuary at Shechem (Josh. xxiv. 26; Judg. ix. 6). There are in Scripture many memorable trees: e. g. Allon-bachuth (Gen. xxxv. 8), the tamarisk in Gibeah (1 Sam. xxii. 6; see above), the "OAK" in Shechem (Josh. xxiv. 26) under which the law was set up, the palm-tree of Deborah (Judg. iv. 5), &c. This observation of particular trees was among the heathen extended to a regular worship of them.

Guard, the A. V. translation of—1. Heb. and Chal. tabbâh or tabbâch, originally = a cook; and as butchering fell to the lot of the cook in Eastern countries, it gained the secondary sense of EXECUTIONER, and is applied to the body-guard of the kings of Egypt (Gen. xxxvii. 36) and Babylon (2 K. xxv. 8 ff.; Jer. xxxix. 9 ff., xl. 1 ff.; Dan. ii. 14).—2. Heb. râbâ, properly = a runner, the ordinary term employed for the attendants of the Jewish kings, whose office it was to run before the chariot (2 Sam. xv. 1; 1 K. i. 5; A. V. "to run" in both), and to form a military guard (1 Sam. xxii. 17, A. V. "footmen"; 2 K. x. 25, xi. 6; 2 Chr. xii. 10). (EPISTLE; FOOTMAN 2; POST II).—3. Heb. mishmereth and mishmar, properly = the act of watching, but occasionally transferred to the persons who kept watch (Neh. iv. 22, A. V. "watch" in iv. 9, vii. 3, xii. 9; Job vii. 12). ARMY; CAPTAIN.

Gad'go-dah (Heb. thunder? Ges.; incision, cleft, Fñ.) (Deut. x. 7). HOR-HAGIDGAD.

Guest. HOSPITALITY.

Gul'loth (Heb. pl. of gullâh = fountains, A. V. "springs"), a Heb. term used to denote the springs added by Caleb to the S. land in the neighborhood of DEBIR, which formed the dowry of his daughter Achsah (Josh. xv. 19; Judg. i. 15). The "springs" were "upper" and "lower"—possibly one at the top and the other at the bottom of a ravine or glen. An attempt has been lately made by Dr. Rosen to identify these springs with the 'Ain Nun-kur near Hebron, but the identification can hardly be received without fuller confirmation.

Gul (Heb. colored, dyed, Ges.). 1. A son of Naphtali (Gen. xvi. 24; 1 Chr. vii. 13), the founder of the family of the GUNITES (Num. xxvi. 48).—2. A descendant of Gad (1 Chr. v. 15).

Gul'nites, the = the descendants of GUNI, son of Naphtali (Num. xxvi. 48).

Gur (Heb. whelp of a lion, Ges.), the Go'ing up to, an ascent or rising ground, at which Ahaziah received his death-blow while flying from Jehu after the slaughter of Joram (2 K. ix. 27); probably some place more than usually steep on the difficult road which leads from the plain of Esdraelon to Jenin. AHAZIAH 2.

Gur-ba'al (Heb. sojourn of Baal, Ges.), a place or district in which dwelt Arabians, as recorded in 2 Chr. xxvi. 7. It appears from the context to have been in the country lying between Palestine and the Arabian peninsula; but this, although probable, cannot be proved. The Arab geographers mention a place called Baal, on the Syrian road, N. of Medina.

H

Ha-a-hash'ta-ri (Heb. the Ahashtarite; fr. Pers., prob. = the mule-driver, Ges.; the messenger, courier, Fñ.), a man, or a family, immediately descended from Ashur, the "father of Tekoa," by his second wife Naarah (1 Chr. iv. 6).

Ha-bal'ah [-ba'yah] (Heb. whom Jehovah hides or protects, Ges.), ancestor of certain sons of the priests who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel, but, their genealogy being imperfect, were not allowed to serve (Ezr. ii. 61; Neh. vii. 63).

Ha-bak kuk, or Hab'ak-kuk (Heb. embrace, Ges.), in Apocrypha ABACUC and HABACUC. I. Of the facts of the prophet's life we have no certain information, and with regard to the period of his prophecy there is great division of opinion. The Rabbinical tradition that Habakkuk was the son of the Shunammite woman whom Elisha restored to life is repeated by Abarbanel in his commentary, and has no other foundation than a fanciful etymology of the prophet's name, based on the expression in 2 K. iv. 16. In the title of Bel and the Dragon, as found in the LXX. version in Origen's Tetrapla, the author is called "Habakkuk the son of Joshua, of the tribe of Levi." Some have supposed this apocryphal writer = the prophet. Pseudo-Epiphanius and Dorotheus say that he was of the tribe of Simeon, and relate that when Jerusalem was sacked by Nebuchadnezzar, Habakkuk fled to Ostracine, and remained there till after the Chaldeans had left the city, when he returned to his own country, and died at his farm two years before the return from Babylon (b. c. 538). It was during his residence in Judea that he is said to have carried food to Daniel in the den of lions at Babylon (B. & D., Euseb., &c.). Habakkuk is said to have been buried at KER-LAH (Euseb.). Rabbinical tradition places his tomb at HUKKOK.—II. The Rabbinical traditions agree in placing Habakkuk with Joel and Nahum in the reign of Manasseh. Kimchi, Abarbanel, Witsius, Jahn, &c., adopt this date. Davidson, following Keil, decides in favor of the early part of the reign of Josiah. Calmet, Ewald, De Wette, Rosenmüller, Knobel, Maurer, Hitzig, Meier, &c., assign the commencement of Habakkuk's prophecy to the reign of Jehoikim. Delitzsch concludes that Habakkuk delivered his prophecy about the twelfth or thirteenth year of Josiah (b. c. 630 or 629). This view receives some confirmation from the position of his prophecy in the O. T. Canon (so Mr. Wright, original author of this article). The prophet commences by announcing his office and important mission (i. 1). He bewails the corruption and social disorganization by which he is surrounded, and cries to Jehovah for help (i. 2-4). Next follows the reply of the Deity, threatening swift vengeance (i. 5-11). The prophet, transferring himself to the near future foreshadowed in the divine threatenings, sees the rapacity and boastful impiety of the Chaldean hosts, but, confident that God has only employed them as the instruments of correction, assumes (ii. 1) an attitude of hopeful expectancy, and waits to see the issue. He receives the divine command to write in an enduring form the vision of God's retributive justice, as revealed to his prophetic eye (ii. 2, 3). The doom of the Chaldeans is first foretold in general terms (ii. 4-6), and the announcement is followed by a series of denunciations pronounced upon them by the nations who had suffered from their oppression (ii. 6-20). The strophical arrangement of these "woes" (three verses each) is a remarkable feature of the prophecy. The whole concludes with the magnificent Psalm in ch. iii., "Habakkuk's Lament" (Ewald), a composition unrivalled for boldness of conception, sublimity of thought, and majesty of diction. BIBLE; CANON; INSPIRATION; OLD TESTAMENT; PROPHET.

Hab-a-zi-ni'ah (fr. Heb. = light or lamp of Jehovah; Ges.; collection of Jah, Fñ.), ancestor of Jaazaniah, and apparently head of a family of the RECHABITES (Jer. xxxv. 3).

Ha-ber'ge-on [-je-]. ARMS, II. 1, 2.

Ha'bor (Heb. joining together, Ges.), the "river of Gozan" (2 K. xvii. 6, xviii. 11), beyond all reasonable doubt (so Rawlinson, Ritter, Gesenius, &c.) = the famous affluent of the Euphrates, which is called Aborrias by Strabo, Chaloras by Pliny and Ptolemy, and now Khabour. It is about 200 miles long; its course is tortuous, having a general direction about S. S. W., through rich, flowery meads. It flows from several sources in the mountain-chain, which about 37° N. lat. closes in the valley of the Tigris upon the S.—the Mons Masius of Strabo and Ptolemy, at present the Aharj Dagh.

Hach-a-li'ah [hak-] (fr. Heb. = whose eyes Jehovah enlightens, Ges.), father of NEHEMIAH 1 (Neh. i. 1, x. 1).

Hach'i-lah (Heb. darksome, Ges.), the Hill of, a hill apparently in a wood in the wilderness or waste land in the neighborhood of ZIPP 2; in the fastnesses, or passes, of which David and his six hundred followers were lurking when the Ziphites informed Saul of his whereabouts (1 Sam. xxiii. 19; compare 14, 15, 18). No trace of the name Hachilah has yet been discovered.

Hach'mo-ni (Heb. wise, Ges.), son of, and The Hach'mo-nite (1 Chr. xxvii. 32, xi. 11), both renderings—the former the correct one—of the same Hebrew words. Hachmon or Hachmoni was no doubt the founder of a family to which JEHIEL 5 and JASHOBEAM belonged: the actual father of Jashobeam was Zabdiel (xxvii. 2), and he is also said to have belonged to the Korhites (xii. 6), possibly the Levites descended from Korah.

Had'ad (Heb. powerful, mighty, Fñ.; see No. 1 below) was originally the indigenous appellation of the sun among the Syrians, and was thence transferred to the king, as the highest of earthly autocracies. The title appears to have been an official one, like Pharaoh. It is found occasionally in the altered form HADAR. 1. (Heb. = sharp, Ges.; powerful, mighty, Fñ.) Son of Ishmael (Gen. xxv. 15; 1 Chr. i. 30).—2. A king of Edom who gained an important victory over the Midianites on the field of Moab (Gen. xxxvi. 33, 36; 1 Chr. i. 46, 47).—3. A king of Edom, with Pau for his capital (1 Chr. i. 50); = HADAR 2.—4. A member of the royal house of Edom (1 K. xi. 14 ff.). In his childhood he escaped the massacre under Joab, in which his father appears to have perished, and fled with a band of followers into Egypt. Pharaoh, the predecessor of Solomon's father-in-law, treated him kindly, and gave him his sister-in-law in marriage. After David's death Hadad resolved to attempt the recovery of his dominion: Pharaoh in vain discouraged him, and upon this he left Egypt and returned to his own country. It does not appear from the Hebrew text how Hadad became subsequently to this an "adversary unto Solomon" (ver. 14), still less how he gained the sovereignty over Syria (ver. 25). The LXX. refers ver. 25 entirely to him, and substitutes for Aram (Syria), Edom.

Had-ad-e-zer (Heb. HADAD is his help, Ges.) = HADAREZER (2 Sam. viii. 3-12; 1 K. xi. 23).

Hadad-rimmon (Heb., see below), according to the ordinary interpretation of Zech. xii. 11 = a place in the valley of Megiddo, named after two Syrian idols (HADAD; RIMMON), where a national lamentation was held for the death of King Josiah. Van de Velde (i. 355) identifies Hadadrimmon with the modern village Rumîni, three-quarters of an hour S. of Lejjûn (Megiddo); but its position is unsuitable (so Porter, in Kitto).

Had'ar (Heb. = HADAD). 1. Son of Ishmael (Gen. xxv. 15); = HADAD 1. The mountain Hadad, belonging to Teymâ (TEMA) on the borders of the Syrian desert, N. of Medina, perhaps = the ancient dwellings of the tribe descended from him.—2. King of Edom, successor of Baal-hanan the son of Achbor (Gen. xxxvi. 39); = HADAD 3.

Had-ar-e-zer (Heb. = HADAREZER), son of Rehob (2 Sam. viii. 3), the king of ZOBAB, who, while on his way to "establish his dominion" at the Euphrates, was overtaken by David, and defeated with great loss of chariots, horses, and men (1 Chr. xviii. 3 ff.). (ARMS, II. 6.) After the first repulse of the Ammonites and their Syrian allies by Joab, Hadarezer sent his army to the assistance of his kindred the people of Maachah, Rehob, and Ish-tob (xix. 16 ff.; 2 Sam. x. 15 ff., compare 8). Under the command of Shophach, or Shobach, the captain of the host, they crossed the Euphrates, joined the other Syrians, and encamped at Helam. David himself came from Jerusalem to take the command of the Israelite army. As on the former occasion, the rout was complete.

Had'a-shah (Heb. fem. = new), a city of Judah, in the maritime low country (Josh. xv. 37 only); probably = ADASA. Hitherto it has eluded discovery in modern times.

Ha-das'sah (Heb. myrtle, Ges.), a name, probably the earlier name, of ESTHER (Esth. ii. 7).

Ha-dat'tah (Heb. new, unused, Fû.), according to the A. V. one of the towns of Judah in the extreme S. (Josh. xv. 25); but the Hebrew accents connect the word with that preceding it, as if it were Hazor-hadottah, i. e. New Hazor, in distinction from the Hazor in verse 23. Wilton and Rowlands (in Fairbairn, s. v. "South Country") identify Hazor-hadattah with an ancient ruin, Kasr Adadah, about twelve miles S. W. of Masada (Sebbeh) and W. of the Dead Sea.

* Ha'des [-deez] (Gr.). HELL.

Ha'did (Heb. sharp), a place named with Lod (Lydda) and Ono in Ezr. ii. 33; Neh. vii. 37, xi. 34; probably about three miles E. of Lydd (Lydda) at the modern village el-Had:theh. ADIDA.

Had'lal or Had'la-l (Heb. resting, Ges.), an Ephraimite, father of AMASA 2 (2 Chr. xxviii. 12).

Ha-do'ram (Heb. Hadar [= HADAD] is exulted, Fû.). 1. Fifth son of Joktan (Gen. x. 27; 1 Chr. i. 21). His descendants, according to Gesenius, Fürst, &c., = the Adramites, a tribe of S. Arabia.—2. Son of Tou or Toi, king of Hamath; his father's ambassador to congratulate David on his victory over Hadarezer, king of Zobah (1 Chr. xviii. 10); = JORAM 4.—3. The intendant of taxes under David, Solomon, and Rehoboam (2 Chr. x. 18); = ADONIRAM and ADORAM.

Ha'drach [-drak] (Aram. periodical return of the sun, Fû.; strong-weak, a symbolical name, Fbn.; perhaps from HADAR), a country of Syria (Zech. ix. 1, 2 only). The position of the district, with its borders, is here generally stated; but the name itself seems to have wholly disappeared. It still remains unknown.

Ha'gab (Heb. locust, Ges.; bent, Fû.), ancestor of certain Nethinim who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 46).

Hag'a-ba (Heb. = HAGAB, Ges., Fû.), ancestor of certain Nethinim who came back from captivity with Zerubbabel (Neh. vii. 48); = HAGABAH.

Hag'a-bah (Heb. = HAGAB, Ges., Fû.) = HAGABA (Ezr. ii. 45).

Hagar (Heb. flight), an Egyptian woman, the handmaid, or slave, of Sarah (Gen. xvi. 1), whom the latter gave as a CONCUBINE (MARRIAGE) to ABRAHAM, after he had dwelt ten years in the land of Canaan and had no children by Sarah (xvi. 2, 3). That she was a bondwoman is stated both in the O. T. and in the N. T., in the latter as part of her typical character. It is recorded that "when she saw that she had conceived, her mistress was despised in her eyes" (4), and Sarah, with the anger, we may suppose, of a free woman, rather than of a wife, reproached Abraham for the results of her own act. Hagar fled, turning her steps toward her native land through the great wilderness traversed by the Egyptian road. By the fountain in the way to Shur (BEER-LAHAI-ROI) the angel of the Lord found her, charged her to return and submit herself under the hands of her mistress, and delivered the remarkable prophecy respecting her unborn child, recorded in ver. 10-12. On her return, she gave birth to ISHMAEL, and Abraham was then eighty-six years old. Mention is not again made of Hagar in the history of Abraham until the feast at the weaning of Isaac, when "Sarah saw the son of Hagar the Egyptian, which she had borne unto Abraham, mocking;" and in exact sequence with the first flight of Hagar, we now read of her expulsion (xxi. 9 ff.). The verisimilitude, oriental exactness, and simple beauty of this story are internal evidences attesting its truth apart from all other evidence. The name of Hagar occurs elsewhere only when she takes a wife to Ishmael (xxi. 21); and in the genealogy (xxv. 12). St. Paul refers to her as the type of the old covenant, likening her to Mount Sinai, the Mount of the Law (Gal. iv. 22 ff.). In Mohammedan tradition Hagar is represented as the wife of Abraham.

Hag-ar-enes' [-eenz], Hag'ar-ites (both fr. Heb. pl. Hagrim, Hagriim = fugitives, Ges.; descendants of HAGAR?), a people dwelling to the E. of Palestine, with whom the tribe of Reuben made war in the time of Saul (1 Chr. v. 10, 18-20). The same people, as confederate against Israel, are mentioned in Ps. lxxxiii. Who these people were is a question that cannot readily be decided, though it is generally believed that they were named after Hagar. It is uncertain whether the important town and district of Hejer represent the ancient name and a dwelling of the Hagarenes; but it is reasonable to suppose that they do. Hejer, or Hejerd, is the capital town, and also a subdivision, of the province of Northeastern ARABIA called El-Bahreyn, on the borders of the Persian Gulf.

Hag'ger-lte [g as in get] (fr. Heb. Hagri = descendant of HAGAR), the. Jaziz the Hagerite had the charge of David's sheep (1 Chr. xxvii. 31).

Hag'ga-l or Hag'gal (Heb. festive, Ges.), the tenth in order of the minor prophets, and first of those who prophesied after the Captivity. With regard to his tribe and parentage, both history and tradition are alike silent. Probably he was one of the exiles who returned with Zerubbabel and Joshua. Ewald infers from chapter ii. 8 that he may have been one of the few survivors who had seen the first temple in its splendor. The rebuilding of the temple, commenced in the reign of Cyrus (B. C. 535), was suspended during the reigns of his successors, Cambyses and Pseudo-Smerdis, in consequence of the determined hostility of the Samaritans. On the accession of Darius Hystaspis (B. C. 521), the prophets Haggai and ZECHARIAH urged the renewal of the undertaking, and obtained the permission and assistance of the king (Ezr. v. 1, vi. 14). Animated by the high courage of these devoted men, the people prosecuted the work with vigor, and the temple was completed and dedicated in the sixth year of Darius (B. C. 516). According to tradition, Haggai was born in Babylon, was a young man when he came to Jerusalem, and was buried with honor near the sepulchres of the priests. It has hence been conjectured that he was a priest. Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, according to the Jewish writers, were with Daniel when he saw the vision of Dan. x. 7; and were after the Captivity members of the Great Synagogue. (SYNAGOGUE, THE GREAT; see also EZRA, BOOK OF.) One tradition places their death in the fifty-second year of the Medes and Persians; another makes Haggai survive till the entry of Alexander the Great into Jerusalem, and even till our Saviour's time. The names of Haggai and Zechariah are associated in the LXX. in the titles of Ps. 137, 145-148; in the Vulgate in those of Ps. 111, 145; and in the Peshito Syriac in those of Ps. 125, 126, 145-148. It may be that tradition assigned to these prophets the arrangement of the above-mentioned psalms for use in the temple service. According to Pseudo-Epiphanius, Haggai was the first who chanted the Hallelujah in the second temple. The style of his writing is generally tame and prosaic, though at times it rises to the dignity of severe invective, when the prophet rebukes his countrymen for their selfish indolence and neglect of God's house. But the brevity of the prophecies is so great, and the poverty of expression which characterizes them so striking, as to give rise to a conjecture, not without reason, that in their present form they are but the outline or summary of the original discourses (so Mr. Wright, after Eichhorn, Jahn, &c.). They were delivered in the second year of Darius Hystaspis (B. C. 520), at intervals from the 1st day of the 6th month to the 24th day of the 9th month in the same year.

Hag'ge-ri [g as in get] (Heb. Hagri = descendant of HAGAR; compare HAGERITE). "MIBHAR son of Haggeri" (margin "the Hagerite") was one of David's valiant men, according to 1 Chr. xi. 38.

The parallel passage—2 Sam. xxiii. 36—has "Bani the Gadite," which is probably the correct reading (so Kennicott).

Hag'gi (Heb. = HAGGAI, Ges.), second son of Gad (Gen. xli. 16; Num. xxvi. 15); founder of the HAGGITES.

Hag'gi'ah (fr. Heb. = festival of Jehovah, Ges.), a Merarite Levite (1 Chr. vi. 30).

Hag'gites, the = a Gadite family sprung from HAGGI (Num. xxvi. 15).

Hag'gith (Heb. festive, Ges.; a dancer, Mr. Grove), one of David's wives, the mother of Adonijah (2 Sam. iii. 4; 1 K. i. 5, 11, ii. 13; 1 Chr. iii. 2).

Hag'i-a (fr. Gr.) = HATTIL (1 Esd. v. 34).

* Ha-gi-eg'-ra-pha (Gr. = holy writings). BIBLE, III. 3; PSALMS.

Ha'i (Heb. = the A1) = A1 (Gen. xii. 8, xiii. 3).

* Hail (Heb. bārda; Gr. chalaza) was the seventh of the plagues of Egypt. (PLAGUES, THE TEN.) Hail is more common than snow in the hill-country of Palestine during the rainy season (Rhn. Phys. Geog. 2:0 f.). Destructive hail-storms sometimes occurred (Ps. cxlviii. 8; Hag. ii. 17, &c.). God smote the Amorites with "hailstones" (Josh. x. 11). "Hail" is mentioned among the Divine judgments (Ps. lxxviii. 47, 48, cv. 32; Is. xxviii. 2, 17; Ez. xiii. 11, 13; Rev. viii. 11, &c.). RAIN; THUNDER, &c.

Hair. The Hebrews were fully alive to the importance of the hair as an element of personal beauty, whether as seen in the "curled locks, black as a raven," of youth (Cant. v. 11), or in the "crown of glory" that encircled the head of old age (Prov. xvi. 31). The customs of ancient nations in regard to the hair varied considerably: the Egyptians allowed the women to wear it long, but kept the heads of men closely shaved from early childhood. The Greeks admired long hair, whether in men or women. The Assyrians also wore it long. (See cut under CROWNS.) The Hebrews on the other hand, while they encouraged the growth of hair, observed the natural distinction between the sexes by allowing the women to wear it long (Lk. vii. 38; Jn. xi. 2; 1 Cor. xi. 6 ff.), while the men restrained theirs by frequent clipping to a moderate length. This difference between the Hebrews and the surrounding nations, especially the Egyptians, arose no doubt partly from natural taste, but partly also from legal enactments: clipping the hair in a certain manner and offering the locks, was in early times connected with religious worship: and hence the Hebrews were forbidden to "round the corners of their heads" (Lev. xix. 27), meaning the locks along the forehead and temples, and behind the ears. The prohibition against cutting off the hair on the death of a relative (Deut. xiv. 1) was probably grounded on a similar reason. In addition to these regulations, the Hebrews dreaded baldness, as it was frequently the result of leprosy (Lev. xiii. 40 ff.), and hence formed one of the disqualifications for the priesthood (Lev. xxi. 20, LXX.). "Several of the Canaanitish nations shaved some part of the head." "The beard, mustaches, and eyebrows" of the Hittites "were all closely shaven. They had also a custom of shaving a square place just above the ear, leaving the hair on the side of the face and the whiskers, which hung down in a long plaited lock. The Zuzim shaved the back of the head. The Moabites of Rabbah shaved the forehead half-way to the crown, combing all the rest of the hair backward." (Osburn's Anc. Egypt, 125, 126.) Compare margin of

Jer. ix. 26, xxv. 23, &c., "cut off into corners, or, having the corners of their hair polled." Long hair was admired in the case of young men; it is especially noticed in the description of Absalom's person (2 Sam. xiv. 26). The care requisite to keep the hair in order in such cases must have been very great, and hence the practice of wearing long hair was unusual, and only resorted to as an act of religious observance. (NAZARITE.) In times of affliction the hair was altogether cut off (Is. iii. 17, 24, xv. 2; Jer. vii. 29). Tearing the hair (Ezr. ix. 3), and letting it go dishevelled, were similar tokens of grief. Wigs were commonly used by the Egyptians, but not by the Hebrews. The usual and favorite color of the hair was black (Cant. v. 11), as is indicated in the comparisons to a "flock of goats" and the "tents of Kedar" (iv. 1, i. 5): a similar hue is probably intended by the purple of Cant. vii. 5. A fictitious hue was occasionally obtained by sprinkling gold-dust on the hair. It does not appear that dyes were ordinarily used. Herod is said to have dyed his gray hair. The approach of age was marked by a sprinkling (Hos. vii. 9) of gray hairs, which soon overspread the whole head (Gen. xlii. 33, xlii. 29; 1 K. ii. 6, 9; Prov. xvi. 31, xx. 29). (ALMOND.) Pure white hair was deemed characteristic of the Divine Majesty (Dan. vii. 9; Rev. i. 14). The chief beauty of the hair consisted in curls, whether natural or artificial. With regard to the mode of dressing the hair, we have no very precise information; the terms used are of a general character, as of Jezebel (2 K. ix. 30), of Judith (Jd. x. 3). The terms used in the N. T. (1 Tim. ii. 9; 1 Pet. iii. 3) are also of a general character; Schleusner understands them of curling rather than plaiting. (BROIDED.) The arrangement of Samson's hair into seven locks, or more properly braids (Judg. xvi. 13, 19), involves the practice of plaiting, which was also familiar to the Egyptians and Greeks.

Grecian Manner of Wearing the Hair.—From Hope's Costumes.—(Fou.)

The locks were probably kept in their place by a fillet as in Egypt. Ornaments were worked into the hair, as practised by the modern Egyptians. Combs and hair-pins are mentioned in the Talmud (HEAD-DRESS.) The Hebrews, like other nations of antiquity, anointed the hair profusely with ointments, generally compounded of various aromatic ingredients (Ru. iii. 3; 2 Sam. xiv. 2; Ps. xxiii. 5, xlv. 7, xcii. 10; Eccl. ix. 8; Is. iii. 24); more especially on occasion of festivities or hospitality (Mat. vi. 17, xxvi. 7; Lk. vii. 46). (ANOINTING; OINTMENT.) It appears to have been the custom of the Jews in our Saviour's time to swear by the hair (Mat. v. 36), much as the Egyptian women still swear by the side-lock, and the men by their beards (Lane, i. 52, 71, notes). BEARD; HANDICRAFT; PUNISHMENTS; RAZOR.

Hak'ka-tan (Heb. the little). Johanan, son of Hakkatan, was the chief of the sons of Azgad who returned from Babylon with Ezra (Ezr. viii. 12).

Hak'koz (Heb. the thorn), a priest, the chief of the seventh course in the service of the sanctuary, as appointed by David (1 Chr. xxiv. 10). In Ezr. ii. 61, and Neh. iii. 4, 21, the name occurs again as Koz in the A. V.

Ha-ku'pha (Heb. bent, crooked, Ges.), ancestor of certain Nethinim who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 51; Neh. vii. 53).

Ha'lah (Heb.) (2 K. xvii. 16, xviii. 11; 1 Chr. v. 26) is probably (so Rawlinson) a different place from the CALAH of Gen. x. 11. Rawlinson supposes it = the Chalchitis of Ptolemy, a region adjoining Gauzanitis (Gozan); and that the name remains in the modern Gla, a large mound on the upper Khabour (Habor).

Ha'lak (Heb. the smooth), the Mount, a mountain twice named as the southern limit of Joshua's conquests (Josh. xi. 17, xii. 7); according to Wilton (in Fairbairn, article "Karkaa") the modern Jebel Yelek, a long and lofty ridge about 75 miles S. W. from Beer-sheba; according to Keil and Porter (in Kitto) the line of chalk cliffs which form the northern limit of the ARABAH (= the ascent of AKRAB-BIM, Robinson).

* Half Part (Neh. iii. 9 ff.). PART.

Hal'hul (Heb. full of hollows, Fül.), a town of Judah in the mountain district (Josh. xv. 58). The name still remains attached to a conspicuous hill, with ruins of walls, a mosque, &c., and a village on the eastern slope, one mile E. of the road from Jerusalem to Hebron, between three and four miles from the latter.

Ha'll (Heb. necklace, trinket, Ges.), a town on the boundary of Asher, named between Helkath and Beten (Josh. xix. 25).

Hal-car-nas'sus (L. fr. Gr.), in CARIA, a city of great renown, as the birthplace of Herodotus and of the later historian Dionysius, and as embellished by the Mausoleum erected by Artemisia, but of no Biblical interest except as the residence of a Jewish population in the periods between the O. and N. T. histories (1 Mc. xv. 23). The modern name of the place is Budrum.

Hall, used of the court of the high-priest's house (Lk. xxii. 53). In Matthew xxvii. 27, and Mark xv. 16, "hall" = "PRÆTORIUM," the "judgment-hall" in John xviii. 28. The hall or court of a house or palace would probably be an enclosed but uncovered space, on a lower level than the apartments of the lowest floor which looked into it.

Hal-le-lu-jah (Heb. halēlūyah = praise ye Jehovah [A. V. "praise ye the LORD"]), in margin of Psalms cv. 45, cvi. 1, 48, cxl. 1, cxlii. 1, cxliii. 1, &c., compare Psalms civ. 35, cxiii. 9, &c.; written "Alleluia" in Tobit xiii. 18, and Revelation xix. 1-6. Psalms cxliii.-cxviii. were called by the Jews the Hallel (Heb. praise), and were sung on the first of the month and at the feasts of Dedication, Tabernacles, Weeks, and the Passover. These Psalms bear marks of being intended for use in the temple service, the words "praise ye Jehovah" being taken up by the full chorus of Levites. In Revelation xix. 1-6, as in the offering of incense (viii.), there is evident allusion to the service of the Temple, as the apostle had often witnessed it in all its grandeur. HOSANNA; PASSOVER II. c.

Hal-lo-hesh (Heb. the chanter, Ges.), one of the "chief of the people" who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 24).

Ha-lo-hesh (Heb. HALLOHESH). Shallum, son of Halohesh, was "ruler of the half part of Jerusalem" (PART) at the repair of the wall by Nehemiah (Neh. iii. 12).

Ham (Heb. prob. = warm or hot, Ges.; dark-colored, black, Fū.). 1. The name of one of the three sons of Noah, apparently the second in age (so Mr. R. S. Poole, the original author of this article; but Gesenius, Fürst, Knobel, Delitzsch, &c., regard Ham as the youngest of Noah's sons) (Gen. ix. 24). Of the history of Ham nothing is related except his irreverence to his father, and the curse which that patriarch pronounced. The sons of Ham are stated to have been "CUSH and MIZRAIM and PHUT and CANAAN" (Gen. x. 6; comp. 1 Chr. i. 8). The name of Ham alone, of the three sons of Noah, if Mr. Poole's identification of it with the Egyptian Kem (= EGYPT) be correct, is known to have been given to a country (Ps. lxxviii. 51, cv. 23, cvi. 22). Mr. Poole concludes that settlements of Cush extended from Babylonia along the shores of the Indian Ocean to Ethiopia above Egypt, and that there was an eastern as well as a western Cush. The Mizraites (= descendants of Mizraim, or [so Mr. Poole] of Mazor [Heb. Mā-tsōr = Ham?; see EGYPT and MIZRAIM]) occupy a territory wider than that bearing the name of Mizraim. Mr. Poole supposes that Mizraim included all the first settlements, and that in remote times other tribes besides the Philistines migrated, or extended their territories. Phut has been always placed in Africa, where we find, in the Egyptian inscriptions, a great nomadic people corresponding to it. Respecting the geographical position of the Canaanites there is no dispute, although all the names are not identified. The Hamathites alone of those identified were settled in early times wholly beyond the land of Canaan. Perhaps there was a primeval extension of the Canaanite tribes after their establishment in the land called after their ancestor, for before the specification of its limits as those of their settlements it is stated "afterward were the families of the Canaanites spread abroad" (Gen. x. 18, 19). One of their most important extensions was to the N. E. Philologists are not agreed as to a Hamitic class of language. Recently Bunsen has applied the term "Hamitism," or as he writes it, Chamitism, to the Egyptian language, or rather family. Sir H. Rawlinson has applied the term Cushite to the primitive language of Babylonia, and the same term has been used for the ancient language of the southern coast of Arabia. The Biblical evidence seems, at first sight, in favor of Hebrew being classed as a Hamitic rather than a Shemitic form of speech. It is called in the Bible "the language of Canaan" (Is. xix. 18), although those speaking it are elsewhere said to speak "in the Jews' language" (2 K. xviii. 26, 28; Is. xxxvi. 11, 13; Neh. xiii. 24). But the one term, as Gesenius remarks, indicates the country where the language was spoken, the other as evidently indicates a people by whom it was spoken. Elsewhere we might find evidence of the use of a so-called Shemitic language by nations either partly or wholly of Hamite origin. This evidence would favor the theory that Hebrew was Hamitic; but on the other hand we should be unable to dissociate SEMITIC LANGUAGES from Shemitic peoples. The Egyptian languages would also offer great difficulties, unless it were held to be but partly of Hamitic origin, since it is mainly of an entirely different class from the Shemitic. It is mainly Nigritian, but it also contains Shemitic elements. Mr. Poole believes that the groundwork is Nigritian, and that the Shemitic part is a layer added to a complete Nigritian language. An inquiry into the history of the Hamite nations presents considerable difficulties, since it cannot be determined in the cases of the most important of these commonly held to be Hamite that they were purely of that stock. It is certain that the three most illustrious Hamite nations—the Cushites, the Phenicians, and the Egyptians—were greatly mixed with foreign peoples. There are some common characteristics, however, which appear to connect the different branches of the Hamite family, and to distinguish them from the children of Japheth and Shem. Their architecture has a solid grandeur that we look for in vain elsewhere. The early history of each of the chief Hamite nations shows great power of organizing an extensive kingdom, of acquiring material greatness, and checking the inroads of neighboring nomadic peoples. (ARABIA; BABEL; EGYPT.)—2. According to the Masoretic text (Gen. xiv. 5), Chedorlacmer and his allies smote the Zuzim in a place called Ham. If, as seems likely, the Zuzim = the Zamzummim, Ham must be placed in what was afterward the Ammonite territory. Hence it has been conjectured by Tuch, that Ham is but another form of the name of the chief stronghold of the children of Ammon, RABBAN 1, now Amman.—3. In the account of a migration of the Simeonites to the valley of Gedor, and their destroying the pastoral inhabitants, the latter, or possibly their predecessors, are said to have been "of Ham" (1 Chr. iv. 40). This may indicate that a Hamite tribe was settled here, or more precisely, that there was an Egyptian settlement.

Ha'man (Heb. perhaps fr. Pers. = magnificent, splendid, or fr. Sansc. = the planet Mercury, Ges.), the chief minister or vizier of King Ahasuerus (Esth. iii. 1, &c.). (ESTHER.) After the failure of his attempt to cut off all the Jews in the Persian empire, he was hanged on the gallows which he had erected for Mordecai. The Targum and Josephus interpret the description of him—"the AGAGITE"—as signifying that he was of Amalekitish descent; but he is called a Macedonian by the LXX. in Esth. ix. 24.

Ha'math (Heb. fortress, citadel, Ges.) appears to have been the principal city of Upper Syria from the time of the Exodus to that of the prophet Amos. It was situated in the valley of the Orontes, about half way between its source near Baalbek, and the bend which it makes at Jisr-hadid. It thus naturally commanded the whole of the Orontes valley, from the low screen of hills which forms the watershed between the Orontes and the Litány—the "entrance of Hamath," as it is called in Scripture (so Rawlinson, Stanley, &c., see below) (Num. xxxiv. 8; Josh. xiii. 5, &c.)—to the defile of Daphne below Antioch; and this tract appears to have formed the kingdom of Hamath, during the time of its independence. Robinson (iii. 568 f.) and Porter (ii. 336) regard "the entrance" or "entering in of Hamath" as the great interval or depression, opening toward the W. in lat. 34° 40', between the N. end of Mount Lebanon and the Nusatriyeh mountains. The Hamathites were a Hamitic race, and are included among the descendants of Canaan (Gen. x. 18). We must regard them as closely akin to the Hittites on whom they bordered, and with whom they were generally in alliance. Nothing appears of the power of Hamath, until the time of David (2 Sam. viii. 10). (Tor.) Hamath seems clearly to have been included in the dominions of Solomon (1 K. iv. 21-24). The "store-cities," which Solomon "built in Hamath" (2 Chr. viii. 4), were places for collecting stores of provisions (xxxii. 28); when situated on the great trade-roads they were no doubt intended to relieve the wants of travellers and their beasts of burden (Bertheau). In the Assyrian inscriptions of the time of Ahab (b. c. 900) Hamath appears as a separate power, in alliance with the Syrians of Damascus, the Hittites, and the Phenicians. About three-quarters of a century later, Jeroboam II. "recovered Hamath" (2 K. xiv. 28). Soon afterward the Assyrians took it (2 K. xviii. 34, xix. 13, &c.), and from this time it ceased to be a place of much importance. Antiochus Epiphanes changed its name to Epiphaneia. The natives, however, called it Hamath, even in Jerome's time, and its present name, Hamah, is but slightly altered from the ancient form. The population is 30,000 (Porter in Kitto). Huge water-wheels raise water from the Orontes, which is conveyed by rude aqueducts to the gardens and houses in the upper town.

Ha'math-zobah (Heb. HAMATH of ZOBAB, or fortress of Zobah) (2 Chr. viii. 3) has been conjectured to be = HAMATH (so Gesenius, Alexander in Kitto, &c.). But Rawlinson supposes Hamath-Zobah = another Hamath, distinguished from the "Great Hamath" by the suffix "Zobah."

Ha'math-ite (fr. Heb. = one from Hamath, Ges.), the, one of the families descended from Canaan, named last in the list (Gen. x. 18; 1 Chr. i. 16).

Ham'math (Heb. warm springs, Ges.; hot baths), one of the fortified cities in Naphtali (Josh. xix. 33). The notices of the Talmudists leave no doubt that it was near Tiberias, one mile distant—in fact that it had its name because it contained the hot baths of Tiberias. Josephus mentions it under the name of Emmus as a village not far from Tiberias. The Hamdām, at present three in number, still send up their hot and sulphureous waters, at a spot rather more than one mile S. of the modern town. In the list of Levitical cities in Naphtali (Josh. xxi. 32) the name of this place seems to be given as HAMMOTH-DOR, and in 1 Chr. vi. 76 it is HAMMON.

Ham-med'a-tha, or Ham-me-da'tha (Heb. fr. Pers. = the Medatha, Ges.; given by the god Hom, Fu.), father of HAMAN (Esth. iii. 1, 10, viii. 5, ix. 24).

Ham'me-lech [-lek] (Heb. the king), rendered in the A. V. as a proper name (Jer. xxxvi. 26, xxxviii. 6), probably = the king Jehoiakim in the first case, and in the latter Zedekiah. JERAHMEEL 3; MELCHIAH 8.

Ham'mer. The Hebrew language has several names for this indispensable tool. 1. Paltish, used by the gold-beater (Is. xli. 7, A. V. "carpenter") as well as by the quarry-man (Jer. xxiii. 29).—2. Makkāhāh, properly a tool for hollowing, hence a stonecutter's mallet (1 K. vi. 7).—3. Halmūth, used only in Judg. v. 26.—4. A kind of hammer, named nappāts (Jer. li. 20, A. V. "battle-axe," AXE), or mēphūs (Prov. xxv. 18, A. V. "mael"), was used as a weapon of war.—5. Cēlaphōth (plural) = sledge-hammers or axes, Ges. (Ps. lxxiv. 6).—"Hammer" figuratively = any overwhelming power, worldly (Jer. i. 23) or spiritual (xxxiii. 29).

Ham-mo'e-keth (Heb. the queen), daughter of Machir and sister of Gilead (1 Chr. vii. 17, 18).

Ham-mon (Heb. warm, sunny, Ges.). 1. A city in Asher (Josh. xix. 28), apparently not far from Zidon.—2. A city of Naphtali allotted to the Levites (1 Chr. vi. 76); = HAMMATH and HAMMOTH-DOR.

Ham'moth-dor (Heb. warm springs dwelling?), a city of Naphtali, allotted to the Gershonite Levites, and for a city of refuge (Josh. xxi. 32)* probably = HAMMATH.

Ha-mo'nah (Heb. multitude), a city, in or near which the multitudes of Gog were to be buried (Ez. xxxix. 16).

Ha-mon-gog (Heb. Gog's multitude), the Val'ley of, the name to be bestowed on a ravine or glen, previously known as "the ravine of the passengers on the E. of the sea," after the burial there of "Gog and all his multitude" (Ez. xxxix. 11, 16).

Ha'mor (Heb. an ass, Ges., Fii.), in N. T. ΕΜΜΟΡ, a Hivite (or according to the Alex. LXX. a Horite), who at the time of the entrance of Jacob on Palestine was prince of the land and city of Shechem, and father of SHECHM who defiled Jacob's daughter (Gen. xxxiii. 19, xxxiv. 2, 4, 6, 8, 13, 18, 20, 24, 26).

Ham'u-el (fr. Heb. = wrath of God, Ges.; God is a sun, Fii.), a man of Simeon; son of Mishma, of the family of Shaul (1 Chr. iv. 26).

Ha'mul (Heb. pitied, spared, Ges.), the younger son of Pharez, Judah's son by Tamar (Gen. xlv. 12; 1 Chr. ii. 5); ancestor of the HAMULITES (Num. xxvi. 21).

Ha'mul-ites, the = the descendants of HAMUL; a family of Judah (Num. xxvi. 21).

Ha-mu'tal (Heb. perhaps = kinsman of the dew), daughter of Jeremiah of Libnah; one of the wives of King Josiah, and mother of JEHOAHAZ and ZEDEKIAH (2 K. xxiii. 31, xxiv. 18; Jer. lii. 1).

Ha-mu-neel (Heb. = HANANEEL? Ges.; God is a rock, safety, Fii.), son of Shallum, and cousin of JEREMIAH 1, from whom the prophet bought a field (Jer. xxxii. 7-9, 12; and compare 44).

Ha'man (Heb. merciful, Ges., Fii.). 1. One of the chiefs of Benjamin (1 Chr. viii. 23).—2. The last of the six sons of Azel, a descendant of Saul (1 Chr. viii. 38, ix. 44).—3. "Son of Manah," i. e. possibly a Syrian of Aram-Maacah, one of David's "valiant men" (1 Chr. xi. 43).—4. Ancestor of certain Nethinim who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 46; Neh. vii. 49).—5. One of the Levites who assisted Ezra in his public exposition of the law (Neh. vii. 7). The same is probably mentioned in x. 10.—6. One of the "heads" of the "people," who also sealed the covenant (x. 22).—7. Another of the chief laymen on the same occasion (x. 26).—8. Son of Zaccur, son of Mattaniah, whom Nehemiah made one of the storekeepers of the provisions collected as tithes (xiii. 13).—9. Son of Ig'daliah (Jer. xxxv. 4). His sons had a chamber in the Temple.

Han'a-neel (Heb. God has graciously given, Ges.; God is gracious, Fii.), the Tow'er of, a tower which formed part of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 1, xii. 39). From these passages, particularly the former, it might almost be inferred that the Tower of Hananeel = the Tower of Meah: at any rate they were close together, and stood between the sheep-gate and the fish-gate. This tower is further mentioned in Jer. xxxi. 38, and Zech. xiv. 10, both connecting this tower with the "corner-gate," which lay on the other side of the sheep-gate.

Ha-na'ni (Heb. gracious, Ges., Fii.). 1. A son of Heman, and head of the 18th course of the service (1 Chr. xxv. 4, 25).—2. A seer who rebuked (b. c. 941) Asa, king of Judah (2 Chr. xvi. 7). For this he was imprisoned (10). He (or another Hanani) was the father of Jehu the seer, who testified against Baasha (1 K. xvi. 1, 7), and Jehoshaphat (2 Chr. xix. 2, xx. 34).—3. One of the priests who in the time of Ezra had taken strange wives (Ezr. x. 20).—4. A brother of Nehemiah (Neh. i. 2), made governor of Jerusalem under Nehemiah (vii. 2).—5. A priest (xii. 36), perhaps = No. 3.

Han-a-ni'ah (Heb. whom Jehovah has graciously given, Ges.; Jah is kind, Fii.). 1. One of the fourteen sons of Heman, and chief of the 16th course of singers (1 Chr. xxv. 4, 5, 23).—2. A captain in the army of King Uzziab (2 Chr. xxvi. 11).—3. Father of Zedekiah, a prince in the reign of Jehoakim (Jer. xxxvi. 12).—4. Son of Azur; a Benjamite of Gibeon, and a false prophet in the reign of Zedekiah, king of Judah. In the fourth year of his reign, b. c. 595, Hananiah withstood Jeremiah the prophet, and publicly prophesied in the Temple that within two years Jeconiah and all his fellow-captives, with the vessels of the Lord's house which Nebuchadnezzar had taken away to Babylon, should be brought back to Jerusalem (Jer. xxviii.): an indication that treacherous negotiations were already secretly opened with Pharaoh-hophra. Hananiah corroborated his prophecy by taking from off the neck of Jeremiah the yoke which he wore by Divine command (Jer. xxvii.) in token of the subjection of Judea and the neighboring countries to the Babylonian empire, and breaking it. But Jeremiah was bid to go and tell Hananiah that for the wooden yokes which he had broken he should make yokes of iron, so firm was the dominion of Babylon destined to be for seventy years. The prophet Jeremiah added a rebuke and prediction of Hananiah's death, the fulfilment of which closes the history of this false prophet. The history of Hananiah throws much light upon the Jewish politics of that eventful time, divided as parties were into the partisans of Babylon on one hand, and of Egypt on the other, and also illustrates the manner in which the false prophets hindered the mission, and obstructed the beneficial effects of the ministry, of the true prophets.—5. Grandfather of Irijah, the captain of the ward at the gate of Benjamin who arrested Jeremiah on the charge of deserting to the Chaldeans (Jer. xxxvii. 13).—6. Head of a Benjamite house (1 Chr. viii. 24).—7. The Hebrew name of SHADRACH. He was of the house of David, according to Jewish tradition (Dan. i. 3, 6, 7, 11, 19, ii. 17).—8. Son of Zerubbabel (1 Chr. iii. 19), from whom CHRIST derived His descent; according to Lord A. C. Hervey, = JOANNA in Luke. (GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST).—9. One of the sons of Bebai, husband of a foreign wife in Ezra's time (Ezr. x. 28).—10. A priest, one of the makers of the sacred ointments and incense, who built a portion of the wall of Jerusalem in the days of Nehemiah (Neh. iii. 8). He may be the Hananiah mentioned in verse 30 as having repaired another portion. If so, he was son of Shelemiah; perhaps the same as is named (xii. 41) among the priests with trumpets at the thanksgiving.—11. Head of the priestly course of Jeremiah in the days of Joiakim (xii. 12).—12. Ruler of the palace at Jerusalem under Nehemiah, a faithful, God-fearing man. The arrangements for guarding the gates of Jerusalem were intrusted to him with Hanani, the Tirshatha's brother (vii. 2, 3).—13. A chief of the people who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (x. 23); perhaps = 12.

* Hand (Heb. yad; Gr. cheir) is used in the Scriptures both literally as a member of the body, and figuratively = power, might, agency, protection, influence, &c. Thus a "hand" or "hands" are often ascribed to God, in describing the exercise of His power, or the bestowment of His favor, gifts, &c. The chief place of honor or dignity was at the right hand of a king, and hence the chief place of heavenly honor is spoken of as at the right hand of God (Ps. xlv. 9; Mk. xvi. 19, &c.). The laying on of hands is a symbolical act in conveying or pronouncing a blessing, offering a sacrifice, setting apart to an office or work, &c. (Gen. xlviii. 14; Lev. xvi. 21; Num. xxvii. 23; Mat. ix. 18; Acts xiii. 3; 1 Tim. iv. 14, &c.).

* Hand'-breadth. WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

Hand-i-craft. In the present article brief notices can only be given of such handicraft trades as are mentioned in Scripture. 1. The preparation of iron for use either in war, in agriculture, or for domestic purposes, was doubtless one of the earliest applications of labor; and, together with iron, working in brass, or rather copper alloyed with tin, bronze, is mentioned in the same passage as practised in antediluvian times (Gen. iv. 22). We know that iron was used for warlike purposes by the Assyrians, and on the other hand that stone-tipped arrows, as was the case also in Mexico, were used in the earlier times by the Egyptians as well as the Persians and Greeks. In the construction of the Tabernacle, copper, but no iron, appears to have been used, though the use of iron was at the same period well known to the Jews, both from their own use of it and from their Egyptian education, whilst the Canaanite inhabitants of Palestine and Syria were in full possession of its use both for warlike and domestic purposes (Ex. xx. 25, xxv. 3, xxvii. 19; Num. xxxv. 16; Deut. iii. 11, iv. 20, viii. 9; Josh. viii. 31, xvii. 16, 18). After the establishment of the Jews in Canaan, the occupation of a SMITH became recognized as a distinct employment (1 Sam. xiii. 19). The smith's work and its results are often mentioned in Scripture (2 Sam. xii. 31; 1 K. vi. 7; 2 Chr. xxvi. 14; Is. xlv. 12, liv. 16). The worker in gold and silver must have found employment both among the Hebrews and the neighboring nations in very early times, as appears from the ornaments sent by Abraham to Rebekah (Gen. xxiv. 22, 53, xxxv. 4, xxxviii. 18; Deut. vii. 25). ENGRAVER; ORNAMENTS, PERSONAL; STONES,

PRECIOUS. But, whatever skill the Hebrews possessed, it is quite clear that they must have learned much from Egypt and its "iron furnaces," both in metal-work and in the arts of setting and polishing precious stones. Various processes of the goldsmith's work are illustrated by Egyptian monuments. After the conquest frequent notices are found both of moulded and wrought metal, including soldering, which last had long been known in Egypt; but the Phenicians appear to have possessed greater skill than the Jews in these arts, at least in Solomon's time (Judg. viii. 24, 27, xvii. 4; 1 K. vii. 13, 45, 46; Is. xli. 7; Wis. xv. 4; Ecclus. xxxviii. 28; Bar. vi. 50, 55, 57). (AN-

(2 Sam. v. 11; 1 Chr. xiv. 1), as most probably were those, or at least the principal of those who were employed by Solomon in his works (1 K. v. 6). But in the repairs of the Temple, executed under Joash, king of Judah, and also in the rebuilding under Zerubbabel, no mention is made of foreign workmen, though in the latter case the timber is expressly said to have been brought by sea to Joppa by Zidonians (2 K. xii. 11; 2 Chr. xxiv. 12; Ezr. iii. 7). That the Jewish carpenters must have been able to carve with some skill is evident from Is. xli. 7, xlv. 13. In N. T. the occupation of a carpenter is mentioned in connection with Joseph the husband of the Virgin Mary, and ascribed to our Lord Himself by way of reproach (Mk. vi. 3; Mat. xiii. 55).

(AWL; AXE; HOUSE; SAW; TOOL.)—3. The masons employed by David and Solomon, at least the chief of them, were Phenicians (1 K. v. 18; Ez. xxvii. 9). Among their implements are mentioned the saw, plumb-line, and measuring-rod. Some of these, also the chisel and mallet, are represented on Egyptian monuments. (See cut on p. 361.) The large stones used in Solomon's Temple are said by Josephus to have been fitted together exactly without either mortar or cramps, but the foundation stones to have been fastened with lead. For ordinary building, MORTAR was used; sometimes, perhaps, bitumen (SLIME), as at Babylon (Gen. xi. 3). The lime, clay, and straw, of which mortar is generally composed in the East, require to be very carefully mixed and united so as to resist wet. The wall "daubed with untempered mortar" of Ez. xiii. 10 was perhaps a sort of cob-wall of mud or clay without lime, which would give way under heavy rain. The use of whitewash on tombs is remarked by our Lord (Mat. xxiii. 27). Houses infected with leprosy were required by the Law to be replastered (Lev. xiv. 40-45). (ARCH; ARCHITECTURE; BRICK; CLAY.)

4. Akin to the craft of the carpenter is that of ship and boat-building, which must have been exercised to some extent for the fishing-vessels on the lake of Gennesaret (Mat. viii. 23, ix. 1; Jn. xxi. 3, 8). Solomon built, at Ezion-geber, ships for his foreign trade, which were manned by Phenician crews, an experiment which Jehoshaphat endeavored in vain to renew (1 K. ix. 26, 27, xxii. 48; 2 Chr. xx. 36, 37). (EGYPT; SHIP.)—5. The perfumes used in the religious services, and in later times in the funeral rites of monarchs, imply knowledge and practice in the art of the "apothecaries," who appear to have formed a guild or association (Ex. xxx. 25, 35; Neh. iii. 8; 2 Chr. xvi. 14; Eccl. vii. 1, x. 1; Eccles. xxxviii. 8). (MEDICINE; OINTMENT.)—6. The arts of SPINNING and WEAVING both wool and linen were carried on in early times, as they are still usually among the Bedouins, by women. One of the excellences attributed to the good house-wife is her skill and industry in these arts (Ex. xxxv. 25, 26; Lev. xix. 19; Deut. xxii. 11; 2 K. xxiii. 7; Ez. xvi. 16; Prov. xxxi. 13, 24).

The loom, with its beam (1 Sam. xvii. 7), pin (Judg. xvi. 14), and shuttle (Job vii. 6), was perhaps introduced later, but as early as David's time (1 Sam. xvii. 7). (See cut on next page.) We read also of cm-broidery (EMBROIDERER), in which gold and silver threads were interwoven with the body of the stuff, sometimes in figure patterns, or with precious stones set in the needlework (Ex. xxvi. 1, xxviii. 4, xxxix. 6-13).—7. Besides these arts, those of dyeing and of glaziers, and glass vessels (GLASS), painters, and gold-workers are mentioned in the Mishna. Tent-makers are noticed in Acts xviii. 3, and frequent allusion is made to the trade of the potters.

(BOTTLE; PITCHER; POTTERY).—8. Bakers are noticed in Scripture (Jer. xxxvii. 21; Hos. vii. 4; BREAD; OVEN); and the valley Tyropœon at JERUSALEM probably derived its name from the occupation of the cheese-makers, its inhabitants. Butchers, not Jewish, are spoken of (1 Cor. x. 25). AGRICULTURE; ALABASTER; BASKET; CART; CHARIOT; CRAFTSMEN; MILL, &c.

Hand'ker-chief, Nap'kin, A'pron. The two former of these terms, as used in the A. V., = Gr. soudarion, the latter = Gr. simikinthion. Both words are of Latin origin: soudarion = sudarium from sudo, to sweat; simikinthion = semicinctum, i. e. a half girdle. The sudarium is noticed in the N. T. as a wrapper to fold up money (Lk. xix. 20)—as a cloth bound about the head of a corpse (Jn. xi. 44, xx. 7), being probably brought from the crown of the head under the chin—and lastly as an article of DRESS that could be easily removed (Acts xix. 12), probably a handkerchief worn on the head like the keffieh of the Bedouins. (HEAD-DRESS.) According to the scholiast quoted by Schleusner, the distinction between the two terms is that the sudarium was worn on the head, and the semicinctum used as a handkerchief.

APRON; DRESS.

* Hand'maid. SERVANT; SLAVE.

* Hand'-staves (Ez. xxxix. 9). ARMS I. 2, f. Ha'nes [-nec] (Heb. fr. Egyptian = name of a deity corresponding to Hercules, Fii.), a place in Egypt only mentioned in Is. xxx. 4: "For his princes were at Zoan, and his messengers came to Hanes." Hanes has been supposed by Vitringa, Michaelis, Rosenmüller, and Gesenius = Heracleopolis Magna, commonly regarded as an ancient royal city of Egypt, on the W. of the Nile, now Andsich. This identification depends wholly upon the similarity of the two names. Mr. R. S. Poole, Porter (in Kitto), &c., are disposed to think that the Targum is right in identifying it with TAHPANHES, a fortified town on the eastern frontier.

* Hang'ing. PUNISHMENTS.

Hang'ing; Hang'ings. These terms represent both different words in the original, and different articles in the Tabernacle furniture (1.) The "hanging" (Heb. māsāch) was a curtain or "covering" to close an entrance; one was placed before the door of the Tabernacle (Ex. xxvi. 36, 37, xxxix. 38); another was placed before the entrance of the court (Ex. xxvii. 16, xxxviii. 18; Num. iv. 26); the term is also applied to the veil that concealed the Holy of Holies (Ex. xxxv. 12, xxxix. 34, xl. 21; Num. iv. 6). (2.) The "hangings" (Heb. kōlā'im) were used for covering the walls of the court of the Tabernacle, just as tapestry was in modern times (Ex. xxvii. 9, xxxv. 17, xxxviii. 9; Num. iii. 26, iv. 26). (LEAF 2.) In 2 K. xxiii. 7, the Heb. bottin, strictly houses, A. V. "hangings," is probably intended to describe tents used as portable sanctuaries.

dress cloth (COLORS; DRESS; FULLER) were practised in Palestine, and those also of tanning and dressing LEATHER (Josh. ii. 15-18; 2 K. i. 8; Mat. iii. 4; Acts ix. 43). Shoemakers, barbers, and tailors are mentioned in the Mishna: the barber, or his occupation, in the Scriptures (RAZOR; Ez. v. 1; Lev. xiv. 8; Num. vi. 5), and the tailor, plasterers, glaziers, and glass vessels (GLASS), painters, and gold-workers are mentioned in the Mishna. Tent-makers are noticed in Acts xviii. 3, and frequent allusion is made to the trade of the potters.

nah, and mother of SAMUEL (1 Sam. i., ii.). A hymn of thanksgiving for the birth of her son is in the highest order of prophetic poetry; its resemblance to that of the Virgin Mary (comp. 1 Sam. ii. 1-10 with Lk. i. 46-55; see also Ps. cxlii.) has been noticed by the commentators.

Hanoch [-nok] (Heb. initiated or initiating, Ges.; = ENOCH and HENUCH). 1. The third in order of the children of Midian (Gen. xxv. 4); = HENUCH 2. —2. Eldest son of Reuben (Gen. xli. 9; Ex. vi. 14; Num. xxvi. 5; 1 Chr. v. 3), and founder of the family of HANOCHITES.

Hanoch-ites, the = the descendants of HANOCH 2 (Num. xxvi. 5).

Ha'nun (Heb. graciously regarded, favored, Ges.). 1. Son of Nahash (2 Sam. x. 1, 2; 1 Chr. xix. 1, 2), king of Ammon, who dishonored the ambassadors of David (2 Sam. x. 4), and involved the Ammonites in a disastrous war (xii. 31; 1 Chr. xix. 6). —2. A man who, with the people of Zanoah, repaired the valley-gate in the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 13). —3. Sixth son of Zalaph, who also assisted in the repair of the wall, apparently on the E. side (iii. 30).

Haph'ra-im (fr. Heb. = two pits, Ges.), a city of Issachar, mentioned next to Shunem (Josh. xix. 19). About six miles N. E. of Lejjün (Megiddo), and two miles W. of Solam (the ancient Shunem), stands the village of el-'Afuleh, possibly the representative of Haphraim.

Ha'ra (Heb. mountainous land, Ges.) (1 Chr. v. 26 only), is either a place utterly unknown, or = HARAN or CHARRAN (so Rawlinson). Porter (in Kitto) supposes Ha'ra may be the mountainous region N. of Gozan, ancient Mount Manius, now Karja Baghlar.

Har'a-dah (Heb. trembling, terror, Ges.), a desert station of the Israelites (Num. xxxiii. 24, 25); its position is uncertain. WILDERNESS OF THE WANDERING.

Ha'ran (Heb. mountaineer, Ges.). 1. Third son of Terah, and therefore youngest brother of Abram (Gen. xi. 26). Three children are ascribed to him —Lor (27, 31), and two daughters, viz. MILCAH, who married her uncle Nahor (29), and ISCAH (29). Haran was born in Ur of the Chaldees, and he died there while his father was still living (28). The ancient Jewish tradition is that Haran was burnt in the furnace of Nimrod for his wavering conduct during the fiery trial of ABRAHAM. —2. A Gershonite Levite in the time of David, one of the family of Shimei (1 Chr. xxiii. 9).

Ha'ran (Heb. parched, dry, Ges.), son of the great Caleb by his concubine Ephah (1 Chr. ii. 46).

Ha'ran (Heb. parched, dry, Ges.), the place whither Abraham migrated with his family from Ur of the Chaldees, and where the descendants of his brother Nahor established themselves (Gen. xi. 31, 32, xii. 4, 5, xxvii. 43, xxviii. 10, xxix. 4, compare xxiv. 10). It is said to be in Mesopotamia (xxiv. 10), or more definitely, in Padan-aram (xxv. 20), the cultivated district at the foot of the hills, a name well applying to the beautiful stretch of country which lies below Mount Masius between the Khabour and the Euphrates. Here, about midway in this district, is a town still called Harrán, which really seems never to have changed its appellation, and beyond any reasonable doubt (so Rawlinson, and most authorities) is the Haran or Charran of Scripture. Harrán lies upon the Belúk (ancient Bilichus), a small affluent of the Euphrates, which falls into it nearly in longitude 39°. It is now a small village inhabited by a few families of Arabs. Dr. Beke supposes that Haran, the "city of Nahor," was at Harrán el-Awamid (i. e. Harrán of the columns), a small village, four hours E. of Damascus, and that ARAM-NAHARAIM = the region between the Abana and Pharpar.

Ha'rar-ite (fr. Heb. = mountaineer, Ges.; one from some place called Harar or Haror [i. e. mountain, Fül.]), the, the designation of three men connected with David's "valiant men." 1. AGEH, a Hararite, father of SHAMMAH 3 (2 Sam. xxiii. 11). —2. SHAMMAH 5 the Hararite (xxiii. 33). —3. SHARAR (xxiii. 33), or SACAR (1 Chr. xi. 35), the Hararite, was the father of Ahiam, another of the "valiant men."

Har-bo'na (Heb. prob. fr. Pers. = ass-driver, Ges.), the third of the seven chamberlains, or eunuchs, who served King Ahasuerus (Esth. i. 10).

Har-bo'nah (Heb.) = HARBONA (Esth. vii. 9).

and Deut. xiv. 7, among the animals disallowed as food by the Mosaic law. There is no doubt that arnebeth denotes a "hare;" and probably the species Lepus Sinaiticus, occurring in the valleys of Arabia Petrea and Mount Sinai, and Lepus Syriacus, found in Lebanon, are those which were best known to the ancient Hebrews. The hare is at this day called orneb by the Arabs in Palestine and Syria. It is described as chewing the cud; but is not a true ruminant, though both it and the Hyrax (Coney) have the habit of moving the jaw about like the ruminants.

Hare of Mount Lebanon (Lepus Syriacus).

Har'el (Heb., see below). In the margin of Ez. xliii. 15 the word rendered "altar" in the text is given "Harel, i. e. the mountain of God." Junius (and so Gesenius) explains it of the hearth of the altar of burnt-offering, covered by the network on which the sacrifices were placed over the burning wood. ALTAR, B. I.

Har'em. HOUSE.

Har'eph (Heb. plucking off, Ges.; a powerful, strong one, or early-born, Fū.), a name occurring in the genealogies of Judah, as a son of Caleb, and "father of Beth-gader" (1 Chr. ii. 51 only).

Har'eth (Heb. prob. = thicket, Ges.), the For'est of, in which David took refuge, after, at the instigation of the prophet Gad, he had quitted the "hold" or fastness of the cave of Adullam—if indeed it was Adullam and not Mizpeh of Moab, which is not quite clear (1 Sam. xxii. 5). FOREST.

Har-hal'ah [-ha'yah], or Har-hi-fah (Heb. he was dry, Ges.; Jah is protecting, Fū.), father of UZZIEL 6 (Neh. iii. 8).

Har'has (Heb. want, poverty, Ges.; splendor, glitter, Fū.), an ancestor of Shallum, the husband of Huldah (2 K. xxii. 14).

Har'hur (Heb. inflammation, Ges.; nobility, distinction, Fū.). The sons of Harhur were among the Nethinim who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 51; Neh. vii. 53).

* Ha'rid (Heb.) = HADID (Ezr. ii. 33 margin).

Har'im (Heb. flat-nosed, Ges.). 1. A priest who had charge of the third division in the house of God (1 Chr. xxiv. 8).—2. 1,017 "children of Harim," probably descendants of the above, came up from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 39; Neh. vii. 42). The name, probably as representing the family, is mentioned on two other occasions (Neh. x. 5; Ezr. x. 21).—3. It further occurs in a list of the families of priests "who went up with Zerubbabel and Jeshua," and of those who were their descendants in the next generation—in the days of Joiakim the son of Jeshua (Neh. xii. 15). In the former list (xii. 4) the name is REHTM.—4. Another family of "children of Harim," 320 in number, came from the Captivity in the same caravan (Ezr. ii. 32; Neh. vii. 35). They also appear among those who had married foreign wives (Ezr. x. 31), as well as those who sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 27).

Har'iph (Heb. autumnal rain, Ges.; one early-born, Fū.). 112 "children of Hariph" returned from the Captivity with Zerubbabel (Neh. vii. 24). (JORAH.) The name occurs again among the "heads of the people" who sealed the covenant (x. 19).

Har'lot (Heb. zōn'ih, nochriy'ah, kedesh'hah; Gr. pornē). That this class of persons existed in the earlier states of society is clear from Gen. xxxviii. 15. Rahab (Josh. ii. 1) is said by the Targum to have been an innkeeper, but if there were such persons, considering what we know of Canaanitish morals (Lev. xviii. 27), we may conclude that they would, if women, have been of this class. The law forbids (xix. 29) the father's compelling his daughter to sin, but does not mention it as a voluntary mode of life on her part without his complicity. The Heb. kedesh'hah (= consecrated; see IDOLATRY; SOBOMITE) points to one description of persons, and nochriy'ah (= foreign woman; A. V. "strange woman," "stranger," &c.) to another, of whom this class mostly consisted. The first term refers to the impure worship of Astarte (ASHTORETH; Num. xxv. 1; compare Hdt. i. 199). The latter class would grow up with the growth of great cities and of foreign intercourse, and hardly could enter into the view of the Mosaic institutes. As regards the fashions involved in the practice, similar outward marks seem to have attended its earliest forms to those which we trace in the classical writers, e. g. a distinctive dress and a seat by the wayside (Gen. xxxviii. 14; compare Ez. xvi. 16, 25; Bar. vi. 43). Public singing in the streets occurs also (Is. xxiii. 16; Eccles. ix. 4). Those who thus published their infamy were of the worst repute, others had houses of resort, and both classes seem to have been known among the Jews (Prov. vii. 8–12, xxiii. 28; Eccles. ix. 7, 8); the two women in 1 K. iii. 16, lived, as Greek courtesans sometimes did, in a house together. In earlier times the price of a kid is mentioned (Gen. xxxviii.), and great wealth doubtless sometimes accrued to them (Ez. xvi. 33, 39, xxiii. 26). But lust, as distinct from gain, appears as the inducement in Prov. vii. 14, 15. The "harlots" are classed with "publicans," as those who lay under the ban of society in the N. T. (Mat. xxi. 32). The children of such persons were held in contempt, and could not exercise privileges nor inherit (Jn. viii. 41; Deut. xxiii. 2; Judg. xi. 1, 2). ADULTERY.

Har'ne-pher (Heb. snorting of panting? Sim.), son of Zophah, of the tribe of Asher (1 Chr. vii. 36).

* Har'ness in the A. V. = armor or weapons in general (1 K. xx. 11; 2 Chr. ix. 24), or specifically a breastplate or coat of mail (1 K. xxii. 34; 2 Chr. xviii. 33). (ARMS, II. 1.) In the sense of equipments or tackling of a draught horse it does not occur in the A. V., though the verb is found once (Jer. xlv. 4). CHARIOT; HORSE, &c.

* Har'nessed [-nest], the A. V. translation in Ex. xiii. 18 (margin "by five in a rank") of the Heb. pl. participle hāmushim or chāmushim, elsewhere translated "armed" (Josh. i. 14, iv. 12), "armed men" (Judg. vii. 11). Gesenius makes the Hebrew = fierce, active, eager, brave in battle. Fürst has equipped, ready for battle, armed.

Ha'rod (Heb. trembling, terror, Ges.), the Well of, a spring (Heb. 'ayin = the FOUNTAIN of JEZREEL?) by which Gideon and his great army encamped on the morning of the day which ended in the rout of the Midianites (Judg. vii. 1), and where the trial of the people by their mode of drinking apparently took place. The 'Ain Jalūd (Ar. = fountain of Goliath), with which Stanley would identify Harod, is very suitable to the circumstances, as the largest spring in the neighborhood, forming a pool of considerable size, at which great numbers might drink.

Ha'rod-lte (fr. Heb. = one from Harod [see below], or = HARORITE and HARARITE), the, designation of two of David's thirty-seven "valiant men," SHAMMAH and ELIKAH (2 Sam. xxiii. 25); doubtless derived from a place named Harod.

Ha-ro'eh (Heb. the seer), a name in the genealogical list of Judah as a son of "Shobal, father of Kirjath-jearim" (1 Chr. ii. 52); = REAIAH?

Ha'ror-lte (fr. Heb. = HARODITE and HARARITE, Fū.), the, the title given to SHAMMOTH, one of David's "valiant men" (1 Chr. xi. 27).

Ha-ro'sheth (Heb. a work, working, in wood, stone, &c., Ges.; city of crafts, place of artificial work, or [so others] forest, Fū.), or rather "Harosheth of the Gentiles," as it was called, from the mixed races that inhabited it, a city in the N. of Canaan, supposed by Mr. Ffoulkes, &c., to have stood on the W. coast of the lake Merom (el-Huléh), from which the Jordan issues forth in one unbroken stream, and in the portion of the tribe of Naphtali. It was the residence of SISERA, captain of Jabin, king of Canaan (Judg. iv. 2), and the point to which the victorious Israelites under Barak pursued the discomfited host and chariots of the second potentate of that name (Judg. iv. 16). Thomson (ii. 143) identifies Harosheth with an enormous double mound covered with ruins, called in Arabic Harothieh (= Harosheth in Hebrew), about eight miles N. N. W. from Megiddo, at the entrance of the pass from the plain of Acre by the Kishon into Esdraelon.

Harp, the A. V. translation of Heb. cinnôr and Gr. kithara, a stringed instrument of music. The cinnôr was the national instrument of the Hebrews, and was well known throughout Asia. The Penta-teuch assigns its invention to the antediluvian period (Gen. iv. 21). Touching its shape, a great difference of opinion prevails. The author of Shille Haggibborim describes it as resembling the modern harp; Pfeiffer gives it the form of a guitar; and Jerome declares it to have resembled in shape the Greek letter delta ( $\Delta$ ). Josephus records that the cinnôr had ten strings, and that it was played on with the plectrum; others assign to it twenty four, and in the Shille Haggibborim it is said to have had forty-seven. Josephus's statement, however, is in open contradiction to what is set forth in 1 Sam. xvi. 23, xviii. 10, that David played on the cinnôr with his hand. Probably (so Prof. Marks, after Munk) there was a smaller and a larger cinnôr, and these may have been played in different ways (1 Sam. x. 5). The Gr. kithara, sometimes in the LXX. = Heb. cinnôr (Gen. xxxi. 27; 2 Chr. ix. 11), occurs in the N. T. in 1 Cor. xiv. 7; Rev. v. 8, xiv. 2, xv. 2; and had (like the lyre, which was larger) a sounding base or bottom from which rose two horns as from a stag's head, these horns being connected near the top by a cross-bar, between which and the base the strings were stretched. It stood on the player's knees, was held with the left hand, and played with the right, sometimes with a plectrum or key (Rbn. N. T. Lex.).

Har'row. The word so rendered (Heb. hârîts or chârîts; 2 Sam. xii. 31; 1 Chr. xx. 3) is probably a threshing-machine or sledge (see AGRICULTURE); the Heb. verb sâdad, translated "to harrow" (Job xxxix. 10) and "break the clods" (Is. xxviii. 24; Hos. x. 11), expresses apparently the breaking of the clods (Gesenius translates harrov, i. e. level a field), but whether done by any such machine as we call a harrow is very doubtful.

Har'sha (Chal. enchanter, magician, Ges.; worker, Fû.), ancestor of certain Nethinim who came from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 52; Neh. vii. 54).

Hart (Heb. ayyâl). The hart is reckoned among the clean animals (Deut. xii. 15, xiv. 5, xv. 22), and seems, from the passages quoted as well as from 1 K. iv. 23, to have been commonly killed for food. The Heb. masc. noun ayyâl denotes, no doubt, some species of Cervide (deer-tribe), either the FALLOW-DEER (Dama vulgaris; Cervus Dama, Linn.), or the Barbary deer (Cervus Barbarus), the southern representative of the European stag (C. Elaphus), which occurs in Tunis and the coast of Barbary. (See cut on p. 365.) HIND.

Ha'ram (Heb. exalted, Ges.), father of Aharhel, in one of the most obscure genealogies of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 8).

Ha-ru'maph (Heb. snub-nosed, Ges., Fû.), father or ancestor of JEDATHAH 2 (Neh. iii. 10).

Ha'raph-lte, or Har'aph-lte (fr. Heb. = descendant of an unknown Haraph or Hariph = the early-born, i. e. strong, Fû.), the, the designation of Shephatiah, one of the Korhites who repaired to David at Ziklag (1 Chr. xii. 5).

Barbary Deer (Cervus Barbatus) — "HART" of A. V.

Har'uz (fr. Heb. = eager, active, Ges.), a man of Jobah; father of Meshullemeth, queen of Manasseh (2 K. xxi. 19).

Har'vest. AGRICULTURE.

Has-a-di'ah (fr. Heb. = whom Jehovah loves, Ges.), one of a group of five descendants of the royal line of Judah (1 Chr. iii. 20), apparently sons of Zerubbabel, perhaps born after the restoration.

Has-e-nu'ah (fr. Heb. = the bristling, Ges.), a Benjamite, of one of the chief families (1 Chr. ix. 7).

Has-a-bl'ah (fr. Heb. = whom Jehovah regards). 1. A Merarite Levite, son of Amaziah in Ethan's line (1 Chr. vi. 43, Heb. 30).—2. Another Merarite Levite (ix. 14).—3. The fourth of Jeduthun's six sons (xxv. 3), who had charge of the twelfth course in the temple choir (19).—4. A Hebronite Levite (xxvi. 30); possibly = No. 5.—5. Son of Kemuel, who was prince of Levi in the time of David (xxvii. 17).—6. A Levite chief, who officiated for King Josiah at his great passover-feast (2 Chr. xxxv. 9).—7. A Merarite Levite who accompanied Ezra from Babylon (Ezr. viii. 19).—8. One of the chiefs of the priests in the same caravan (24).—9. Ruler of half the circuit or environs (PART) of Keilah; he repaired a portion of the wall of Jerusalem under Nehemiah (Neh. iii. 17).—10. One of the Levites who sealed the covenant after the return from the Captivity (x. 11); probably = one of the chiefs of the Levites in the times immediately subsequent to the return from Babylon (xii. 24; compare 26).—11. A Levite, son of Bunni (xi. 15).—12. Another Levite, son of Mattaniah (22).—13. A priest of the family of Hilkiah in the days of Joiakim son of Jeshua (xii. 21).

Has-shab'nah (Heb. = HASHABIAH, Ges.), one of the chief of the people who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 25).

Has-ab-ni'ah (fr. Heb. = HASHABIAH, Ges.). 1. Father of HATTUSH 2 (Neh. iii. 10).—2. A Levite who officiated at the great fast under Ezra and Nehemiah when the covenant was sealed (ix. 5).

Hash-bad'a-na (fr. Heb. = thought in judging, perhaps thoughtful judge, Ges.), one (probably a priest or Levite) who stood on Ezra's left hand while he read the law to the people in Jerusalem (Neh. viii. 4).

Ha'shem (Heb. fat? Ges.). The sons of Hashem the Gizonite are named among David's "valiant men" in 1 Chr. xi. 34. JASHEN.

Hash-man'nim (Heb. pl., literally = the fat, i. e. the opulent, nobles, princes, Ges.; see below). This word occurs only in the Hebrew of Ps. lxxviii. 31: "Hashmannim (A. V. 'princes') shall come out of Egypt, Cush shall make her hands to hasten to God." The old derivation from the civil name of Hermopolis Magna seems reasonable (so Mr. R. S. Poole). This city was on the Nile, at the modern Ashmunein, nearly opposite Antinoë. The ancient Egyptian name is Ha-shmen, or Ha-shmoon, the abode of eight. If we suppose that Hashmannim is a proper name = Hermopolites, the mention might be explained by the circumstance that Hermopolis Magna was the great city of the Egyptian Hermes, Thoth, the god of wisdom. But Kimchi, Gesenius, Fürst, J. A. Alexander (on Ps.), &c., sustain the A. V. in rendering "princes."

Hash-mo'nah (Heb. fatness, fat soil, Ges.), a station of the Israelites, mentioned (Num. xxxiii. 29) next before Moseroth. Mr. Wilton would make Hashmonah = HESHMON. WILDERNESS OF THE WANDERING.

Ha'shub (fr. Heb. = HASSHUB). 1. A son of Patah-moab who assisted in the repair of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 11).—2. Another who assisted in the same work (iii. 23).—3. One of the heads of the people who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (x. 23); perhaps = No. 1 or 2.—4. A Merarite Levite (xi. 15) = HASSHUB.

Ha-shu'bah (Heb. esteemed, Ges.), the first of a group of five men, apparently the latter half of the family of Zerubbabel (1 Chr. iii. 20). HASADIAH.

Ha'sham (Heb. rich, opulent, Ges.). 1. Two hundred and twenty-three "children of Hashum" came back from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 19; Neh. vii. 22). Seven of them had married foreign wives from whom they had to separate (Ezr. x. 33). The chief man of the family was among those who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 18).—2. One (probably a priest or Levite) who stood on Ezra's left hand while he read the law to the congregation (viii. 4).

Ha-shu'pha (fr. Heb. = HASUPHA), ancestor of certain Nethinim who returned from the Captivity in the first caravan (Neh. vii. 46).

Has'rah (Heb.) = HARHAS (2 Chr. xxxiv. 22).

Has-sc-na'ah (Heb. the thorny, = SENAAH, Ges.). The "sons of Hassenaah" (= SENAAH) rebuilt the fish-gate in the repair of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 3).

Has'shub [hash'shub] (fr. Heb. = thinking, Ges.), a Merarite Levite (1 Chr. ix. 14) = HASHUB 4.

Hat. HEAD-DRESS.

Ha'tach [-tak] (fr. Heb. = verity, Bohlen), one of the eunuchs in the court of Ahasuerus (Esth. iv. 5, 6, 9, 10).

Ha'thath (Heb. terror, dismay, Ges.), one of the sons of Othniel the son of Kenaz (1 Chr. iv. 13).

Hat'l-pha (Heb. seized, captive, Ges.), ancestor of certain Nethinim who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 54; Neh. vii. 56).

Hat'l-ta (Heb. a digging, exploring, Ges.), ancestor of certain "porters" (i. e. gate-keepers), who returned from the Captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 42; Neh. vii. 45).

Ha'til (Heb. wavering, Ges.), ancestor of certain "children of Solomon's servants" who came back from the Captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 57; Neh. vii. 59).

* Ha'tsi-ham-me-nu'choth (Heb. midst of resting-places, Ges.), a proper name of a man or place (1 Chr. ii. 82, margin). MANAETHITES.

Ha'tush (Heb., probably = assembled, Ges.). 1. A descendant of the kings of Judah, apparently one of the sons of Shechaniah (1 Chr. iii. 22), in the fourth or fifth generation from Zerubbabel; possibly the one who accompanied Ezra from Babylon to Jerusalem (Ezr. viii. 2).—2. A priest who returned with Zerubbabel, and sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 4, xii. 2).—3. Son of Hashabiah; one of those who assisted Nehemiah in the repair of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 10).

Hau'ran (Ar.; Heb. Havrán or Chavrán = cave-district, Fii.), a province of Palestine (Ez. xlvii. 16, 18); probably = the well-known Greek province of Auranitis, and the modern Haurán. Josephus frequently mentions Auranitis in connection with Trachonitis, Batanaea, and Gaulanitis, which with it constituted the ancient kingdom of BASHAN. The surface is perfectly flat, and the soil among the richest in Syria. It contains upward of one hundred towns and villages, most of them now deserted, though not ruined.

Hav'l-lah (Heb. circle, district, Fii.). 1. A son of Cush (Gen. x. 7); and 2. a son of Joktan (x. 29). Various theories have been advanced respecting these obscure peoples. Probably (so Mr. E. S. Poole) both stocks settled in the same country, and there intermarried; thus receiving one name, and forming one race, with a common descent. The Cushite people of this name formed the westernmost colony of Cush along the S. of ARABIA, and the Joktanites were an earlier colonization. It is commonly thought that the district of Khāwlán, in the Yemen, preserves the trace of this ancient people. The district of Khāwlán lies between the city of San'a and the Hijāz, i. e. in the N. W. portion of the Yemen. It took its name, according to the Arabs, from Khāwlán, a descendant of Kahlán (JOKTAN), or, as some say, of Kahlán, brother of Himyer. This genealogy says little more than that the name was Joktanite. Khāwlán is a fertile territory, embracing a large part of myrriferous Arabia, mountainous, with plenty of water, and supporting a large population. Those who separate the Cushite and Joktanite Havilah either place them in Niebulr's two Khāwláns, or they place No. 2 on the N. of the peninsula, following the supposed argument derived from Gen. xxv. 18, and 1 Sam. xv. 7, and finding the name in that of the Chaulotaioi on the Persian Gulf. A Joktanite settlement so far N. is, however, very improbable. They discover No. 1 in the Avalite on the African coast, S. of the straits of Bab el-Mandeb.

Havoth-jair (fr. Heb. = villages of Jair, Ges.), certain villages on the E. of Jordan, in Gilead or Bashan, which were taken by JAIR the son of Manasseh, and called after his name (Num. xxxii. 41; Deut. iii. 14). In the records of Manasseh in Josh. xiii. 30, and 1 Chr. ii. 23, the Havoth-jair are reckoned with other districts as making up sixty "cities" (compare 1 K. iv. 13). Porter (ii. 270) concludes that the sixty cities called BASHAN-HA-

VOth-JAIR pertained to the land of Argob, which was in Bashan; and that the twenty-three cities called Havoth-jair were distinct from the former, and situated in Gilead. In Judg. x. 4, thirty cities are called Havoth-jair. Here the allusion is to a second JAIR, by whose thirty sons they were governed, and for whom the original number may have been increased.

Hawk, the A. V. translation of the Heb. nits (Lev. xi. 16; Deut. xiv. 15; Job xxxix. 26). The word is doubtless generic, as appears from the expression in Deuteronomy and Leviticus "after his kind," and includes various species of the Falconidae (the falcon or hawk family), with more special allusion perhaps to the small diurnal birds, such as the kestrel (Falco tinnunculus), the hobby (Hypotriorchis subbuteo), the gregarious lesser kestrel (Tinnunculus cenerchris), common about the ruins in the plain districts of Palestine, all of which were probably known to the ancient Hebrews. With respect to the passage in Job, which appears to allude to the migratory habits of hawks, it is curious to observe that, of the ten or twelve smaller birds of prey of Palestine, nearly all are summer migrants. The kestrel remains all the year, but T. cenerchris, Aceronixus gabar, Hyp. albonora, and F. melanopterus, are all migrants from the S. Besides the above-named smaller hawks, the two magnificent species of falcon, F. Saker and F. lanarius, are summer visitors to Palestine.

Hay, the A. V. translation in Prov. xxvii. 25, and Is. xv. 6, of the Heb. hatsir or chatsir, which occurs frequently in the O. T., and denotes "GRASS" of any kind. Harmer, quoting from a MS. paper of Sir J. Chardin, states that hay is not made anywhere in the East, and that the "hay" of the A. V. is therefore an error of translation. It is quite probable that the modern Orientals do not make hay in our sense of the term; but it is certain that the ancients did mow their grass, and probably made use of the dry material. See Ps. xxxvii. 2. There is an express Hebrew term for "dry grass" or "hay," viz. hashash or chinkash, which, in the only two places where the word occurs (Is. v. 24, xxxiii. 11), is rendered "CHAFF" in the A. V. Doubtless, however, the "dry grass" was not stacked, but only cut in small quantities, and then consumed. AGRICULTURE; BARN; MOWING.

Haza-el (Heb. whom God beholds, i. e. cares for, Ges.), a king of Damascus, who reigned from about B. C. 885 to B. C. 840. He appears to have been previously a person in a high position at the court of BEN-HADAD II., and was sent by his master to ELISHA, to inquire if he would recover from the malady under which he was suffering. Elisha's answer led to the murder of Ben-hadad by his ambitious servant, who forthwith mounted the throne (2 K. viii. 7-15). He was soon engaged in hostilities with Ahaziah, king of Judah, and Jehoram, king of Israel, for the possession of Ramoth-Gilead (viii. 28). The Assyrian inscriptions show that about this time a bloody and destructive war was being waged between the Assyrians on the one side, and the Syrians, Hittites, Hamathites, and Phenicians on the other. Toward the close of the reign of Jehu, Hazael led them against the Israelites (about B. C. 860), whom he "smote in all their coasts" (x. 32), thus accomplishing the prophecy of Elisha (viii. 12). At the close of his life, having taken Gath (xii. 17; compare Am. vi. 2), he proceeded to attack Jerusalem (2 Chr. xxiv. 24), and was about to assault the city, when Joash bribed him to retire (2 K. xii. 18). Hazael appears to have died about the year B. C. 840 (xiii. 24), having reigned forty-six years.

Hazai'ah [za'yah] (Heb. whom Jehovah beholds, Ges.), a descendant of SHELAH, son of Judah (Neh. xi. 5).

Haz'ar-ad'dar, &c. HAZER.

Haz'ar-ma'yeth (fr. Heb. court of death, Ges.), the third in order of the sons of JOKTAN (Gen. x. 26). The name is preserved, almost literally, in the Arabic Hadramūt and Hadrumāwet, and the appellation of a province and an ancient people of southern ARABIA. The province of Hadramāwt is situate E. of the modern Yemen. Its capital is Satham, a very ancient city, and its chief ports are Mirbāt, Zafārī, and Kisheem, from whence a great trade was carried on, in ancient times, with India and Africa.

* Haz'a-zon-ta'mar. HAZEZON-TAMAR.

Haz'el. The Hebrew term lūz occurs only in Gen. xxx. 37. Authorities are divided between the hazel and the ALMOND tree, as representing the lūz. The latter is most probably correct.

Haz'e-lel-po'ni (fr. Heb. = the shade looking upon me, Ges.), the sister of the sons of Etam in the genealogies of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 3).

Hazer (fr. Heb. hātsér = an enclosure, hence a court, village, Ges.), topographically, seems generally employed for the "villages" of people in a roving and unsettled life, the semi-permanent collections of dwellings which are described by travellers among the modern Arabs to consist of rough stone walls covered with the tent-cloths. As a proper name it appears in the A. V.:—1. In the plural HAZERIM, and HAZEROTH; see below. 2. In the slightly different form of HAZOR. 3. In composition with other words.—1. Haz'ar-ad'dar (from Heb. = village of Ad'ar, Ges.; Addar-court, Fū.; see ADAR), a place on the southern boundary of the land promised to Israel (Num. xxxiv. 4; "ADAR," Josh. xv. 3); supposed by some to be at 'Ain el-Kudeirāt, forty or fifty miles W. of 'Ain el-Weibeh (Kadesh-Barnea?).—2. Haz'ar-e'nan (fr. Heb. = village of fountains, Ges.; court of the holy fountain, Fū.), the place at which the northern boundary of the land promised to the children of Israel was to terminate (Num. xxiv. 9, 10; compare Ez. xlvii. 17, xlviii. 1). Porter would identify Hazar-enan with Kuryetein (Ar. = the two villages), a village more than sixty miles E. N. E. of Damascus.—3. Haz'ar-gad'dah (fr. Heb. = court of Gadda, an epithet of Venus as a fortune-bringing goddess, Fū.), one of the towns in the southern district of Judah (Josh. xv. 27), named between Moladah and Heshmon; at Jurrah, four or five miles W. S. W. from Moladah?—4. Haz'ar-hat'ti-con (fr. Heb. = middle village, Ges.), a place named in Ezekiel's prophecy of the ultimate boundaries of the land (Ez. xlvii. 16), on the boundary of Hauran. It is not yet known.—5. Haz'ar-shu'al (fr. Heb. = village of jackals, Ges.; court of jackals, Fū.), a town in the southern district of Judah, named between Hazar-guddah and Beer-sheba (Josh. xv. 28, xix. 3; 1 Chr. iv. 28); reoccupied after the Captivity (Neh. xi. 27); site at Sāweh, an ancient site about three miles E. N. E. of Beer-sheba.—6. Haz'ar-su'sah (fr. Heb. = HAZAR-SUSIM), one of the "cities" allotted to Simeon in the extreme south of Judah (Josh. xix. 5). (SANSANNAH.)—7. Haz'ar-su'sim (fr. Heb. = village of horses, Ges.; court of the horses of the sun, in the sun-worship, Fū.) = the preceding name (1 Chr. iv. 31).

Haz'e-rim (fr. Heb. plural; HAZER). THE AVIMS are said to have lived "in the villages (A. V. 'Hazerim') as far as Gaza" (Deut. ii. 23), before their expulsion by the Caphtorim.

Haz'e-roth (fr. Heb. plural; HAZER) (Num. xi. 35, xii. 16, xxxiii. 17; Deut. i. 1), a station of the Israelites in the desert, according to Burckhardt, Robinson, Stanley, &c., at 'Ain el-Hudherah, about eighteen hours N. E. from Sinai; according to Wilton, about twenty-five miles N. of Jebel Musa (Sinai?). WILDERNESS OF THE WANDERING.

Haz'e-zon-ta'mar, and Haz'a-zon-ta'mar (fr. Heb. = pruning of the palm, Ges.; palm-rows, palm-forest, Fū.), the ancient name of EN-GEDI (Gen. xiv. 7; 2 Chr. xx. 2).

Haz'i-el (Heb. vision of God, Ges.), a Gershonite Levite in the time of David, of the family of Shimeï or Shimi (1 Chr. xxiii. 9).

Haz'o (Heb. vision? Ges.), a son of Nahor, by Milcah his wife (Gen. xxii. 22).

Haz'or (Heb. enclosure, castle, Ges., Fū.; HAZER). 1. A fortified city allotted to Naphtali (Josh. xix. 36). Its position was apparently between Ramah and Kedesh (xii. 19), on the high ground overlooking the Lake of Merom. There is no reason for supposing it a different place from that of which Jabin was king (xi. 1; Judg. iv. 2, 17; 1 Sam. xii. 9). It was the principal city of N. Palestine (Josh. xi. 10). It was fortified by Solomon (1 K. iv. 15), and its inhabitants were carried captive by Tiglath-pileser (2 K. xv. 29). We encounter it once more in 1 Mc. xi. 67 (A. V. "Nasor"). Hazor was probably at Tell Khuraibeh (so Mr. Grove, after Robinson). (ÉDREI 2.) Porter (in Kitto) would place Hazor about four miles further S., on the S. bank of the Wady Hemdāj, where are the ruins of an ancient town on a commanding site. Thomson (ii. 439) would identify Hazor with Hazere, ten or fifteen miles W. of the above and of Lake Merom, where are also extensive ruins. Stanley (389) and Keith would place Hazor at Hazūr, on a commanding site above Cesarea Philippi, N. E. of Lake Merom.—2. One of the "cities" of Judah in the extreme south, named next to Kedesh (Josh. xv. 23). (ITHNAN.)—3. Hazor-Hadattah (= new Hazor), another of the southern towns of Judah (xv. 25). (HADATTAH.)—4. "Hezron which is Hazor" (xv. 25); = one of the preceding? or originally named Hazor, afterward Hezron? (KRIOTI 1.)—5. A place in which the Benjamites resided after the Captivity (Neh. xi. 33); at Tell 'Asûr, about six miles N. of Bethel? (Robinson); at Kharbet Arsar, a little W. of Ramah? (Tobler).—6. A place in Arabia (Jer. xlix. 28, 30, 33); = the region settled by descendants of HAZAR-MAVETH? (Porter in Kitto).

* He (Heb. hê = lattice or window? Ges.), the fifth letter of the Hebrew alphabet (Ps. cxix.). WRITING.

* Head [hed] (Heb. rôsh; Gr. kephale) is used in the Scriptures both literally = the topmost part of the human body or the foremost part of any other animal, and figuratively = that which is highest or chief. The head was covered in affliction (MOURNING), and anointed in festivity, &c. (ANOINTING). Sometimes men swore by their head (Mat. v. 36).

Head-dress. The Hebrews do not appear to have regarded a covering for the head as an essential article of dress. The earliest notice we have of such a thing is in connection with the sacerdotal vestments (Ex. xxviii. 40, A. V. "bonnets"). We may infer that it was not ordinarily worn in the Mosaic age. Even in after-times it seems to have been reserved especially for purposes of ornament: thus the Tsâniph (Heb.; A. V. "diadem") is noticed as being worn by nobles (Job xxix. 14), ladies (Is. iii. 23, A. V. "hoods"), and kings (Is. lxii. 3), while the Peér (Heb.) was an article of holiday dress (Is. lxi. 3, A. V. "beauty"; Ez. xxiv. 17, 23, A. V. "tire"), and was worn at weddings (Is. lxi. 10, A. V. "ornaments"). The former of these terms undoubtedly describes a kind of turban, and its form probably resembled that of the high-priest's Mitsnepheth (Heb.; A. V. "mitre"), as described by Josephus (iii. 7, § 3). The other term, Peér, primarily means an ornament, and is so rendered in the A. V. (Is. lxi. 10; see also verse 3, "beauty"), and is specifically applied to the head-dress from its ornamental character. It is uncertain what the term properly describes, but it may have applied to the jewels and other ornaments with which the turban is frequently decorated. The ordinary head-dress of the Bedouin consists of the keffich, a square handkerchief, generally of red and yellow cotton, or cotton and silk, folded so that three of the corners hang down over the back and shoulders, leaving the face exposed, and bound round the head by a cord. (DRESS, fig. 2.) Not improbably a similar covering was used by the Hebrews on certain occasions. The introduction of the Greek hat by Jason, as an article of dress adapted to the gymnasium, was regarded as a national dishonor (2 Mc. iv. 12). The Assyrian head-dress is described in Ez. xxiii. 15 under the terms

* Heal'ing. MEDICINE; MIRACLES.

* Heart (Heb. leb, lebâb; Gr. kardia), sometimes used in the Scriptures literally, but usually figuratively. The Hebrews regarded the heart as the seat not only of the feelings or affections, e. g. love, hatred, confidence, courage, &c., and of the will or determination, but also of the mind or intellectual faculties (Judg. xvi. 17; 1 K. x. 2, &c.). BOWELS.

Hearth [harth] (Heb. âh or âch, môkéd, môkédâh, cîyôr). One way of baking much practised in the East is to place the dough on an iron plate, either laid on, or supported on legs above the vessel sunk in the ground, which forms the oven. The cakes baked "on the hearth" (Gen. xviii. 6) were probably baked in the existing Bedouin manner, on hot stones, covered with ashes. The "hearth" of King Jehoiakim's winter palace (Jer. xxxvi. 23) was possibly a pan or brazier of charcoal. BREAD; FIRE.

Heath, the A. V. translation of Heb. 'ârô'er (Jer. xlviii. 6), and 'ar'âr (xvii. 6). The common heath (Erica vulgaris) is a shrub much used in Great Britain to thatch houses, make brooms, beds for the poor, &c.; but Mr. Houghton, Dr. Royle (in Kitto), Robinson, Henderson, &c., accept Celsus' conclusion that the Hebrew words translated "heath" = the 'arar of Arabic writers, which is some species of juniper, probably the Juniperus Sabina, or savin. Gesenius translates the Heb. ru'înâ.

Hea'then [th as in this] (Heb. gôy, plural gôyim; Gr. ethnos, plural ethnê). 1. While as yet the Hebrew nation had no political existence, gôyim denoted generally the "nations" of the world, including the descendants of Abraham (Gen. xviii. 18; compare Gal. iii. 16). (GENTILES.) The Hebrews, as they grew in number and importance, were distinguished in a most marked manner from the nations by whom they were surrounded, and were provided with a code of laws and a religious ritual which made the distinction still more peculiar. The nations from whom they were thus separated (A. V. "Gentiles," "heathen") are ever associated with the worship of false gods, and the foul practices of idolaters (Lev. xviii., xx.), and these constituted their chief distinctions, as gôyim, from the worshippers of the one God, the people of Jehovah (Num. xv. 41; Deut. xxxiii. 10). This distinction was maintained in its full force during the early times of the monarchy (2 Sam. vii. 23; 1 K. xi. 4-8, xiv. 24; Ps. cvi. 35).—2. But, even in early Jewish times, the term gôyim received by anticipation a significance of wider range than the national experience (Lev. xxvi. 33, 38; Deut. xxx. 1); and as the latter was gradually developed during the prosperous times of the monarchy, the gôyim were the surrounding nations generally, with whom the Israelites were brought into contact by the extension of their commerce. In the time of the Maccabees, following the customs of the gôyim denoted the neglect or concealment of circumcision (1 Mc. i. 15), disregard of sacrifices, profanation of the Sabbath, eating of swine's flesh and meat offered to idols (2 Mc. vi. 6-9, 18, xv. 1, 2), and adoption of the Greek national games (iv. 12, 14). In all points Judaism and heathenism are strongly contrasted. The "barbarous multitude" in 2 Mc. ii. 21 are opposed to those who played the men for Judaism, and the distinction now becomes an ecclesiastical one (compare Mat. xviii. 17). But, in addition to its significance as an ethnographical term, gôyim had a moral sense which must not be overlooked. In Ps. ix. 5, 15, 17 (compare Ez. vii. 21) the word stands in parallelism with "the wicked;" and in verse 17 the people thus designated are described as "forgetters of God," that know not Jehovah (Jer. x. 25). GREEK.

Heav'en [hev'n], pl. Heav'ens [hev'nz], the A. V. translation of—1. Heb. pl. shamayim (fr. an obsolete sing. = the high, Ges.), uniformly translated "heaven" (Gen. i. 1, 8, 9, 14, 15, 17, 20, &c.), or "heavens" (ii. 1, 4, &c.), except when connected with "fowl" or "bird," as in the phrase "fowl of the air" (i. 26, 28, 30, &c.). This Hebrew word occurs in the O. T. not far from 400 times. The kindred Chal. shamayim occurs nearly forty times in Ezra (v. 11, 12, &c.), Jeremiah (x. 11), and Daniel (ii. 18, 19, &c.), and is uniformly translated "heaven" or "heavens." "The heaven and the earth" (Gen. i. 1), or "the heavens and the earth" (ii. 1), = the universe. (CREATION; FIRMAMENT.)—2. Heb. shahak or shachak = the sky or heaven, so called from its expanse, Ges. (Ps. lxxviii. 34, marg. [Heb. 35], and lxxxix. 6, 37 [in Heb. 7, 38]), usually in pl. and translated "skies" (2 Sam. xxii. 12, &c.), or "clouds" (Job xxxv. 5, &c.).—3. Heb. gulgul once (Ps. lxxvii. 18 [Heb. 19]; Ges. and Fū. translate here whirlwind), elsewhere usually translated "wheel" (Eccl. xii. 6, &c.); literally that which rolls or revolves.—4. Heb. 'arabâh pl. once (Ps. lxxvii. 4, Heb. 5). Professor J. A. Alexander says this version is entirely unauthorized by usage, and thus translates—cast up a highway for the one riding through the deserts; in A. V. "extol him that rideth upon the heavens." (ARABAH; DESERT 1.)—5. Heb. pl. ariphim once only (Is. v. 30, marg. "destructions"). Gesenius makes the Hebrew literally = the distilling, poetically the clouds, and by metonymy the heavens.—6. Gr. ouranos, pl. ouranoi (Mat. iii. 2; Mk. i. 10, 11; Lk. iii. 21, 22, &c.), almost uniformly translated "heaven" or "heavens," but "air" in connection with "fowl" or "bird" (Mat. vi. 26, xiii. 32, &c.; comp. No. 1), and "sky" in a few cases (Mat. xvi. 2, 3, &c.). This Greek word occurs nearly 300 times in the N. T., and in the LXX. = No. 1. "Heaven" and "heavenly" are the A. V. translation in the N. T. of this word and of its derivatives only (see below).—Other Hebrew and Greek words may be considered = heaven, e. g. Heb. rakia, uniformly translated "FIRMAMENT;" Heb. marôm (= height), translated "from above" (2 Sam. xxii. 17, &c.), "on high" (Is. xxxiii. 5, &c.), &c.; Gr. hypsos (= height), sometimes translated "on high" (Lk. i. 78, xxiv. 49; Eph. iv. 8); Gr. anôthen = "from above" (Jn. iii. 31, &c.). St. Paul's expression "third heaven" (2 Cor. xii. 2) has led to much conjecture (see below). Grotius said that the Jews divided the heaven into three parts, viz. (1.) the air or atmosphere, where clouds gather; (2.) the firmament, in which the sun, moon, and stars are fixed; (3.) the upper heaven, the abode of God and His angels. (Compare Dan. iv. 12; Gen. xxii. 17; Ps. ii. 4, &c.) Robinson (N. T. Lex.) thus arranges the N. T. significations of Gr. ouranos (No. 6, above): (1.) properly and generically heaven, as including the visible heavens and their phenomena (1 Cor. viii. 5, &c.); (2.) specifically heaven, of the firmament itself, the starry heaven, in which the sun, moon, and stars are fixed (Mk. xiii. 25, &c.); (3.) specifically also of the lower heaven, or region below the firmament, = the air, atmosphere, where clouds and tempests are gathered, and lightning breaks forth, and where the birds fly (Mat. xxiv. 30, &c.); (4.) oftener heaven, the heavens, of the upper or superior heaven, beyond the visible firmament, the abode of God and His glory, of the glorified Messiah, the angels, the spirits of the just after death, and generally of every thing which is said to be with God (v. 16, &c.). Probably 2 Corinthians xii. 2 alludes to the three heavens above specified by Grotius and Robinson, and hence "the third heaven" = the highest heaven, the abode of God and angels and glorified spirits, the spiritual PARADISE (compare ver. 4; Eph. iv. 10; Heb. iv. 14, vii. 26). By metonymy, "heaven," as God's abode, often = God himself (Mat. xxi. 25, &c.). KING; KINGDOM.

* He'bel (Heb.) = ABEL (Gen. iv. 2, marg.).

He'ber (L. fr. Heb. heber or cheber = society, company, Ges.; sorcery, magic, Fū.; the Heb. of No. 3, 5, 7 is 'éber = EBER). 1. Grandson of the patriarch Asher (Gen. xli. 17; 1 Chr. vii. 31; Num. xxvi. 45).—2. "The father of Socho;" a man of the tribe of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 18).—3. A Gadite (v. 13).—4. A Benjamite, son of Elpaal (viii. 17).—5. A Benjamite, son of Shashak (viii. 22).—6. "Heber, the KENITE," the husband of Jael (Judg. iv. 11-17, v. 24).—7. The patriarch EBER 1 (Lk. iii. 35).

He'ber-ites, the = the descendants of HEBER 1, a branch of the tribe of Asher (Num. xxvi. 45).

He'brew, pl. He'brews (fr. Heb. 'Ibri, pl. 'Ibriim, 'Ibriyim; Gr. Hebraios, pl. Hebraioi; L. Hebraeus, pl. Hebraei; see below). This word first occurs as applied to ABRAHAM (Gen. xiv. 13). It was afterward given as a name to his descendants. Four derivations have been proposed: I. Patronymic from Abram (Augustine originally, Ambrose); an impossible derivation.—II. Appellative from Heb. verb 'abar (= to pass over, Ges.), applied by the Canaanites to Abraham upon his crossing the Euphrates (Gen. xiv. 13).—III. Appellative from the noun 'éber (= the region or country beyond, on the other side, Ges.), is essentially the same with II., since both rest upon the hypothesis that Abraham and his posterity were called Hebrews to express a distinction between the races E. and W. of the Euphrates. One of these opinions (II. or III.) is maintained by Jerome, Origen, Chrysostom, Grotius, Selden, Rosenmüller, Gesenius, Fürst, Rev. T. E. Brown, &c. The LXX. in Gen. xiv. 13 translates Habram ho perati (= Abram the one who carried over, L. and S.; Abram who crossed over, so many).

—IV. Patronymic from the patriarch EBER I (Josephus, Bochart, Buxtorf, Leusden, Bauer, Ewald, Hävernick, Baumgarten, Bush, Dr. W. L. Alexander in Kitto, &c.). 'Ibri is undoubtedly the proper Hebrew form of a patronymic from 'Eber (= EBER). But it is objected that no special prominence is in the genealogy (Gen. xi. 10-26) assigned to Eber such as might entitle him to the position of head or founder of the race, though in Gen. x. 21 Shem is called "the father of all the children of Eber," which Mr. Brown explains as = father of the nations to the E. of the Euphrates. The longevity of Eber, however, since, according to the Hebrew text of Gen. xi., he lived almost twice as long as any of his descendants, is a sufficient reason for applying a patronymic from Eber to his descendant Abraham, whose other ancestors, subsequent to Eber, were all dead before he went to Canaan. Besides, Eber may have had other marks of distinction, of which we are ignorant. According to the natural meaning of Gen. x. 21 and xiv. 13, for which a reason appears as above in the Hebrew chronology, Abram was called "the Hebrew" on account of his descent from Eber (or Heber); and when this appellation was once given to him by the Canaanites and other strangers among whom he dwelt, the transfer of it to his descendants, and especially to the Israelites, as a national designation, was easy and natural. The term "Israelite" was used by the descendants of JACOB of themselves among themselves: "Hebrew" was the name by which they were known to foreigners (so Mr. Brown, after Ges.). Ewald maintains that "Israelite" was a sacred or religious name appropriate to them as the chosen people of God, and "Hebrew" the common appellation. Mr. Brown and others suppose that "Hebrew" was originally applied to immigrants from beyond the Euphrates by the dwellers on the W. of that river; it was accepted by these immigrants in their external relations; and, after the general substitution of the word Jew, it still found a place in that marked and special feature of national contradistinction, the language. In the N. T. "the Hebrews" = the Jews, especially of Palestine, who used the "Hebrew" or Aramaic language, and inhabited the country of their fathers (HELLENIST); "Hebrew of the Hebrews" = a Hebrew in the strictest sense, i. e. by both parents.

Hebrews (see HEBREW), E-pl's'tle to the. I. Canonical authority. Was it received and transmitted as canonical by the immediate successors of the apostles? The most important witness among these, Clement (A. D. 70 or 95), refers to this Epistle in the same way as, and more frequently than, to any other canonical book. Little stress can be laid upon the few possible allusions to it in Barnabas, Hermas, Polycarp, and Ignatius. It is received as canonical by Justin Martyr, and by the compilers of the Peshito version of the N. T. Basilides and Marcion are recorded as distinctly rejecting the Epistle. But at the close of that period, in the N. African church, where first the Gospel found utterance in the Latin tongue, orthodox Christianity first doubted the canonical authority of the Epistle to the Hebrews. To the old Latin version of the Scriptures, which was completed probably about A. D. 170, this Epistle seems to have been added as a composition of Barnabas, and as destitute of canonical authority. During the next two centuries the extant fathers of the Roman and N. African churches regard the Epistle as a book of no canonical authority; but in the fourth century its authority began to revive. At the end of the fourth century, Jerome, the most learned and critical of the Latin fathers, reviewed the conflicting opinions as to the authority of this Epistle. He considered that the prevailing, though not universal, view of the Latin churches was of less weight than the view not only of ancient writers, but also of all the Greek and all the Eastern churches, where the Epistle was received as canonical and read daily; and he pronounced a decided opinion in favor of its authority. The great contemporary light of N. Africa, Augustine, held a similar opinion. The third Council of Carthage, A. D. 397, and a Decretal of Pope Innocent, A. D. 416, gave a final confirmation to their decision. But such doubts were confined to the Latin churches from the middle of the second to the close of the fourth century. All the rest of orthodox Christendom from the beginning was agreed upon the canonical authority of this Epistle. Cardinal Cajetan, the opponent of Luther, was the first to disturb the tradition of a thousand years, and to deny its authority. Erasmus, Calvin, and Beza questioned only its authorship. Luther, when he printed his version of the Bible, separated this book from St. Paul's Epistles, and placed it with the Epistles of St. James and St. Jude, next before the Revelation; indicating by this change of order his opinion that the four relegated books are of less importance and less authority than the rest of the N. T., but his opinion has not been adopted in any confession of the Lutheran church.—II. Who was the author of the Epistle? The superscription, the ordinary source of information, is wanting; but there is no reason to doubt that at first, everywhere, except in N. Africa, St. Paul was regarded as the author. The Alexandrian fathers received it in the same sense that the speech in Acts xxii. 1-21 is received as St. Paul's. Clement ascribed to St. Luke the translation of the Epistle into Greek from a Hebrew original of St. Paul. Origen believed that the thoughts were St. Paul's, the language and composition St. Luke's or Clement's of Rome. Tertullian names Barnabas as the reputed author according to the N. African tradition. The view of the Alexandrian fathers, a middle point between the Eastern and Western traditions, won its way in the Church. In the last three centuries every word and phrase in the Epistle has been scrutinized; Rev. C. Forster, Prof. Stuart (in Commentary), Prof. R. D. C. Robbins (in Bibliotheca Sacra, xviii. 469 ff.), Dr. W. L. Alexander (in Kitto), &c., advocate the opinion that St. Paul was the author of the language as well as of the thoughts of the Epistle. Dr. S. Davidson (Introduction to N. T.), Dr. Tregelles (in Horne's Introduction), and Mr. Bullock (the original author of this article), substantially agree with the Alexandrian tradition. Luther's conjecture that Apollos was the author has been widely adopted in Germany, and by Alford in England. Barnabas has been named by Wieseler, Thiersch, &c.; Luke by Grotius; Silas by others. Neander attributes it to some apostolic man of the

Pauline school, whose training and method of stating doctrinal truth differed from St. Paul's. Ewald has recently advocated the hypothesis that it was written by some Jewish teacher residing at Jerusalem to a church in some important Italian town, which is supposed to have sent a deputation to Palestine. Prof. Robbins (l. c.) thus sums up his argument:—"The amount and value of the external evidence is, to say the least, strongly in favor of Paul as the author. Internal evidence, though not perhaps in any one point, taken by itself, so clear as not to admit of question; yet, in almost every particular, is sufficient to render the composition by the Apostle Paul probable. Circumstances alluded to in the Epistle . . . do not certainly any more clearly suggest any other author. The sentiments and doctrines of the Epistle, when its object and aim are taken into view, seem to us strikingly Pauline. . . . The general characteristics of form are the same in the Hebrews and acknowledged Pauline Epistles, with, however, many differences, such as we should expect in any encyclical letter purposely anonymous. . . . The superiority of style so generally attributed to the Hebrews. . . indicates a higher and more studied effort of the same mind and pen. Similarity rather than diversity in the Hebrews and acknowledged Epistles of Paul, in the use of particular words and phrases, is now generally acknowledged. . . . By how much the spirit and doctrine of the Epistle is Pauline, by so much may it be believed that the diction is entirely the apostle's."—III. To whom was the Epistle sent? This question was agitated as early as the time of Chrysostom, who replies,—to the Jews in Jerusalem and Palestine. The argument of the Epistle is such as could be used with most effect to a church consisting exclusively of Jews by birth, personally familiar with and attached to the Temple-service. Ebrard limits the primary circle of readers even to a section of the church at Jerusalem. Some critics have maintained that this Epistle was addressed directly to Jewish believers everywhere: others have restricted it to those who dwelt in Asia and Greece.—IV. Where and when was it written? Eastern traditions of the fourth century, in connection with the opinion that St. Paul is the writer, name Italy and Rome, or Athens, as the place from whence the Epistle was written. Either place would agree with, perhaps was suggested by, the mention of Timothy in the last chapter. The Epistle was evidently written before the destruction of Jerusalem in A. D. 70. The whole argument, and especially the passages viii. 4 ff., ix. 6 ff., and xiii. 10 ff., imply that the Temple was standing, and that its usual course of Divine service was carried on without interruption. The date which best agrees with the traditionary account of the authorship and destination of the Epistle is A. D. 63, about the end of St. Paul's imprisonment at Rome, or a year after Albinus succeeded Festus as Procurator.—V. In what language was it written? Like Matthew, the Epistle has afforded ground for much unimportant controversy respecting the language in which it was originally written. The earliest statement is that of Clement of Alexandria to the effect that it was written by St. Paul in Hebrew, and translated by St. Luke into Greek. But nothing is said to lead us to regard it as a tradition, rather than a conjecture suggested by the style of the Epistle. Bleek argues in support of a Greek original, on the grounds of (1.) the purity and easy flow of the Greek; (2.) the use of Greek words which could not be adequately expressed in Hebrew without long periphrase; (3.) the use of paronomasia; and (4.) the use of the LXX. in quotations and references.—VI. Condition of the Hebrews, and scope of the Epistle. The numerous Christian churches scattered throughout Judea (Acts ix. 31; Gal. i. 22) were continually exposed to persecution from the Jews (1 Th. ii. 14); but in Jerusalem there was one additional weapon in the hands of the predominant oppressors of the Christians. The magnificent national Temple might be shut against the Hebrew Christian; and even if this affliction were not often laid upon him, yet there was a secret burden which he bore within him, the knowledge that the end of all the beauty and awfulness of Zion was rapidly approaching. What could take the place of the Temple, and that which was behind the veil, and the Levitical sacrifices, and the Holy City, when they should cease to exist? What compensation could Christianity offer him for the loss which was pressing the Hebrew Christian more and more? The writer of this Epistle meets the Hebrew Christians on their own ground. His answer is—"Your new faith gives you Christ, and, in Christ, all you seek, all your fathers sought. In Christ the Son of God you have an all-sufficient Mediator, nearer than angels to the Father, eminent above Moses as a benefactor, more sympathizing and more prevailing than the High-priest as an intercessor: His sabbath awaits you in heaven; to His covenant the old was intended to be subvenient; His atonement is the eternal reality of which sacrifices are but the passing shadow; His city heavenly, not made with hands. Having Him, believe in Him with all your heart, with a faith in the unseen future, strong as that of the saints of old, patient under present, and prepared for coming woe, full of energy, and hope, and holiness, and love." Such was the teaching of the Epistle to the Hebrews. BIBLE; CANON; INSPIRATION; NEW TESTAMENT; PAUL.

He'bron (Heb. conjunction, alliance, Ges.). 1. The third son of Kohath, and a grandson of Levi; a younger brother of Amram, father of Moses and Aaron (Ex. vi. 18; Num. iii. 19; 1 Chr. vi. 2, 18, xxiii. 12). The immediate children of Hebron are not mentioned by name (comp. Ex. vi. 21, 22), but he was the founder of a family of Hebronites (Num. iii. 27, xxvi. 58; 1 Chr. xxvi. 23, 30, 31), or "sons of Hebron" (xv. 9, xxiii. 19).—2. In the genealogical lists of Judah (ii. 42, 43), Maresah is said to have been the "father of Hebron." It is impossible at present to say whether these names are intended to be those of the places themselves or of persons who founded them.

He'bron (Heb. see above). 1. A city of Judah (Josh. xv. 54); situated among the mountains (xx. 7), twenty Roman miles S. of Jerusalem, and the same distance N. of Beer-sheba. Hebron is one of the most ancient cities in the world still existing; and in this respect it is the rival of Damascus. It was built, says a sacred writer, "seven years before Zoan in Egypt" (Num. xiii. 22); and was a well-known town when Abraham entered Canaan 3,780 years ago (Gen. xiii. 18). Its original name was KIRJATH-ARBA (Judg. i. 10), "the city of Arba;" so called from Arba, the father of Anak, and progenitor of the giant Anakim (Josh. xxi. 11, xv. 13, 14). It was sometimes called MAMRE. The chief interest of this city arises from its having been the scene of some of the most striking events in the lives of the patriarchs. Sarah died at Hebron; and Abraham then bought from Ephron the Hittite the field and cave of MACHPELAH, to serve as a family tomb (Gen. xxiii. 2-20). The cave is still there; and the massive walls of the Haram or mosque, within which it lies, form the most remarkable object in the whole city. Abraham is called by Mohammedans el-Khulil, "the Friend," i. e. of God, and this is the modern name of Hebron. Hebron was taken by Joshua from the descendants of Anak, and given to Caleb (Josh. x. 36, xiv. 6-13, xv. 13, 14). It was assigned to the Levites, and made a city of refuge (xxi. 11-13). Here David dwelt during the seven and a half years of his reign over Judah (2 Sam. v. 5). Hebron was rebuilt after the Captivity, but soon fell into the hands of the Edomites, from whom it was rescued by Judas Macabeus (Neh. xi. 25; 1 Mc. v. 65). A short time before the capture of Jerusalem, Hebron was burned by an officer of Vespasian. About the beginning of the twelfth century it was captured by the Crusaders. In 1187 it reverted to the Moslems, and has ever since remained in their hands. Hebron now contains about 5,000 inhabitants, of whom some fifty families are Jews. It is picturesquely situated in a narrow valley, surrounded by rocky hills. (ESHCOL.) The valley runs from N. to S.; and the main quarter of the town, surmounted by the lofty walls of the venerable Haram, lies partly on the eastern slope (Gen. xxxvii. 14; comp. xxiii. 19). The houses are all of stone. About a mile from the town, up the valley, is one of the largest oak-trees in Palestine. (OAK.) This, say some, is the very tree beneath which Abraham pitched his tent, and it still bears the name of the patriarch.—2. (fr. Heb. = ferry, ford, Fū.). One of the towns of Asher (Josh. xix. 28), on the boundary of the tribe. No one in modern times has discovered its site. Besides, it is not certain whether the name should not rather be Ebdon or ABDON 5, since that form is found in many MSS.

He'bron-ites (fr. Heb.), the = a family of Kohathite Levites, the descendants of Hebron the son of Kohath (Num. iii. 27, xxvi. 58; 1 Chr. xxvi. 23).

Hedge. Three of the Hebrew words thus rendered in the A. V., gûlêr, geder, gôdêrah, as well as their Gr. equivalent phragmos, denote simply that which surrounds or encloses, whether it be a stone "wall" (geder, Prov. xxiv. 31; Ez. xlii. 10), or a fence of other materials. Gûlêr and gôdêrah are used of the hedge of a vineyard (Num. xxii. 24, A. V. "wall"; Ps. lxxxix. 40; 1 Chr. iv. 23), and the latter is employed to describe the rude walls of stone, or fences of thorn, which served as a shelter for sheep in winter and summer (Num. xxxii. 16, A. V. "folds"). The stone walls which surround the sheepfolds of modern Palestine are frequently crowned with sharp thorns. In order to protect the vineyards from the ravages of wild beasts (Ps. lxxx. 12), it was customary to surround them with a wall of loose stones or mud (Mat. xxi. 33; Mk. xii. 1), which was a favorite haunt of serpents (Eccl. x. 8), and a retreat for locusts from the cold (Nah. iii. 17). A "wall" or fence of this kind is clearly distinguished in Is. v. 5 from the tangled "hedge," Heb. mesûcâh (A. V. "thorn hedge," Mic. vii. 4), which was planted as an additional safeguard to the vineyard (compare Ecclus. xxviii. 24), and was composed of the thorny shrubs with which Palestine abounds. The prickly pear, a species of cactus, so frequently employed for this purpose in the East at present, is believed to be of comparatively modern introduction. THORNS; WALL.

He'gal, or Heg'a-l (Heb. fr. Pers. = eunuch, Benfey), one of the eunuchs (A. V. "chamberlains") of the court of Ahasuerus (Esth. ii. 8, 15).

He'ge (Heb.) = HEGAI (Esth. ii. 3).

Heifer (hef-). The Hebrew language has no expression that exactly = our heifer; for both 'glâh and pârâh are applied to cows that have calved (1 Sam. vi. 7-12, plural A. V. "kine;" Job. xxi. 10; Is. vii. 21, A. V. "cow" in both). The heifer or young cow was not commonly used for ploughing, but only for treading out the corn (Hos. x. 11; but see Judg. xiv. 18), when it ran about without any headstall (Deut. xxv. 4); hence the expression an "unbroken heifer" (Hos. iv. 16, A. V. "back-sliding heifer"), to which Israel is compared. AGRICULTURE; BULL; HERD; OX; PURIFICATION.

Heir. The Hebrew institutions relative to inheritance were of a very simple character. Under the Patriarchal system the property was divided among the sons of the legitimate wives (Gen. xxi. 10, xxiv. 36, xxv. 5), a larger portion being assigned to one, generally the eldest (FIRST-BORN), on whom devolved the duty of maintaining the females of the family. The sons of concubines were portioned off with presents (xxv. 6); occasionally they were placed on a par with the legitimate sons (xlix. 1 ff.). At a later period the exclusion of the sons of concubines was rigidly enforced (Judg. xi. 1 ff.). Daughters had no share in the patrimony (Gen. xxxi. 14), but received a marriage portion. The Mosaic law regulated the succession to real property thus: it was to be divided among the sons, the eldest receiving a double portion (Deut. xxi. 17), the others equal shares; if there were no sons, it went to the daughters (Num. xxvii. 8), on the condition that they did not marry out of their own tribe (xxxvi. 6 ff.; Tob. vi. 12, vii. 13), otherwise the patrimony was forfeited. If there were no daughters, it went to the brother of the deceased; if no brother, to the paternal uncle; and, failing these, to the next of kin (Num. xxvii. 9-11). In the case of a widow left without children, the nearest of kin on her husband's side had the right of marrying her, and in the event of his refusal the next of kin (Ru. iii. 12, 13): with him rested the obligation of redeeming the property of the widow (iv. 1 ff.), if it had been either sold or mortgaged. If none stepped forward to marry the widow, the inheritance remained with her until her death, and then reverted to the next of kin. The land being thus so strictly tied up, the notion of heirship, as we understand it, was hardly known to the Jews. Testamentary dispositions were of course superfluous. The references to wills in St. Paul's writings are borrowed from the usages of Greece and Rome (Heb. ix. 17), whence the custom was introduced into Judea. AGRICULTURE; CHILD; MARRIAGE; WIDOW.

He'lah (Heb. rust, Ges.), one of the two wives of Ashur, father of Tekoa (1 Chr. iv. 8).

He'lam (fr. Heb. = fortress, Fū.), a place E. of the Jordan, but W. of the Euphrates, at which the Syrians were collected by Hadarezer, and at which David met and defeated them (2 Sam. x. 16, 17). The most probable conjecture perhaps is that it = Alamatha, a town named by Ptolemy, and placed by him on the W. of the Euphrates, near Nicephorium (so Mr. Grove, after Ewald).

He'lah (Heb. fatness, fertile region, Ges.), a town of Asher, probably on the plain of Phenicia, not far from Sidon (Judg. i. 31).

He'lon (Heb. fat, fertile, Ges.), a place only mentioned in Ezekiel xxvii. 18, as noted for wine. Geog- raphers have hitherto represented Helbon = the city of Aleppo, called Halab by the Arabs; but Aleppo produces no wine of any reputation. Porter (ii. 330 ff.) and Robinson (iii. 471 f.) identify it with a village and district about ten miles N. of Damascus, still bearing the ancient name Helbôn, and still celebrated as producing the finest grapes in the country.

Hel-chi'as (2 Esd. i. 1) = HILKIAH 2.

Hel-dai, or Hel-da-i (Heb. worldly, Ges.; enduring, long-lived, Fû.). 1. The twelfth captain of the monthly courses for the Temple-service (1 Chr. xxvii. 15); = HELEB, HELED?—2. An Israelite who seems to have returned from the Captivity (Zech. vi. 10); = HELEX 2? TOBIJAH 2.

He'leb (Heb. fat, fatness, Ges.), son of Baanah, the Netophathite; one of David's "valiant men" (2 Sam. xxiii. 29); = HELED.

He'led (Heb. continuance of life, strength, Fû.) = HELEB (1 Chr. xi. 30). HELDAI 1.

He'lek (Heb. possession, Fû.), a descendant of Manasseh, and second son of Gilead (Num. xxvi. 30); ancestor of the HELEKITES.

He'lek-ites (fr. Heb.), the = the family descended from HELEX (Num. xxvi. 30).

He'lem (Heb. stroke, Ges.; hammer of God, Fû.). 1. A descendant of Asher (1 Chr. vii. 35); = HOTHAM?—2. (Heb. strength, Fû.). A man mentioned only in Zech. vi. 14; apparently = HELDAI 2.

He'leph (Heb. exchange, Ges.; place of rushes, Fû.), the place from which the boundary of Naphthali started (Josh. xix. 33). Van de Velde proposes to identify it with Beitlif, W. of Kaden. KEDESH 3.

He'lez (fr. Heb. = loin? Ges.; strength, Fû.). 1. One of David's "thirty" valiant men (2 Sam. xxiii. 26; 1 Chr. xi. 27), an Ephraimite, and captain of the seventh monthly course (xxvii. 10).—2. A man of Judah, son of Azariah, a descendant of Jerahmeel (ii. 39).

He'li (Gr. = ELI). 1. The father of Joseph, the husband of the Virgin Mary (Lk. iii. 23); maintained by Lord A. C. Hervey to have been the real brother of Jacob the father of the Virgin herself. (GENEALOGY or JESUS CHRIST).—2. The third of three names inserted between ACHITOB and AMARIAS in the genealogy of Ezra, in 2 Esd. i. 2 (comp. Ezr. vii. 2, 3).

He'li-as (Gr.) = ELIAS or ELIJAH (2 Esd. vii. 39).

He'li-o-dorus (L. fr. Gr. = given by the sun), the treasurer of Seleucus Philopator, who was commissioned by the king, at the instigation of APOLLONIUS 1, to carry away the private treasures deposited in the Temple at Jerusalem. According to 2 Mc. iii. 9 ff., he was stayed from the execution of his design by a "great apparition," and fell down speechless. He was afterward restored at the intercession of the High-priest Onias (2 Mc. iii.). The full details of the narrative are not supported by any other evidence.

Hel'kal, or Hel'ka-l (Heb. Jehovah his portion, Ges.), a priest of the family of Meraioth, in the days of Joiakim (Neh. xii. 15).

Hel'kath (Heb. field, Fû.), the town named as the starting-point for the boundary of Asher (Josh. xix. 25), and allotted to the Gershonite Levites (xxi. 31); = ΗΕΚΟΚ.

Hel'kath-haz-zu-rim (Heb. field of strong men, A.V., Vulgate, Aquila; field of swords, Ges.; bareness of rocks, Fû.), a smooth piece of ground, apparently close to the pool of GIBKON, where the combat took place between the two parties of Joab's men and Abner's men, which ended in the death of the whole of the combatants, and brought on a general battle (2 Sam. ii. 16).

Hel-ki'as = HILKIAH 2 (1 Esd. i. 8).

Hell. This is the word generally used by our translators to render the Heb. Shêôl. It would perhaps have been better to retain the Hebrew word, or else render it always by "the grave" or "the pit." It is poetically represented (EARTH) as deep (Job xi. 8) and dark (xi. 21, 22), in the centre of the earth (Num. xvi. 30; Deut. xxxii. 22), having within it depths on depths (Prov. ix. 18), and fastened with gates (Is. xxxviii. 10) and bars (Job xvii. 16). In this cavernous realm are the souls of dead men, the Rephaim, and ill-spirits (Ps. lxxxvi. 13, lxxxix. 48; Prov. xxiii. 14; Ez. xxxi. 17, xxxii. 21). It is clear that in many passages of the O. T. Shêôl can only mean "the grave," and is so rendered in the A. V. (e. g. Gen. xxxvii. 35, xlii. 38; 1 Sam. ii. 6; Job xiv. 13). In other passages, however, it seems to involve a notion of punishment, and is therefore rendered in the A. V. by the word "Hell." But in many cases this translation misleads the reader. It is obvious, e. g., that Job. xi. 8; Ps. cxxxix. 8; Am. ix. 2 (where "hell" is used as the antithesis of "heaven"), merely illustrate the representation of Shêôl in the bowels of the earth. The LXX. used the Gr. Hades as = Heb. Shêôl. The ancient Greeks and Hebrews seem to have agreed in representing Hades or Shêôl as (1.) the common receptacle of departed spirits, good and bad; (2.) divided into two compartments, the one an Elysium or abode of bliss for the good, the other a Tartarus, or abode of sorrow and punishment for the wicked; (3.) situated under ground, in the mid-regions of the earth. But while the heathen had no prospect beyond its shadowy realms, the believing Hebrew regarded Shêôl as only his temporary and intermediate abode (Fhn., Bible Dictionary, art. Hades). In the N. T., Hades, like Shêôl, sometimes merely = the grave (Rev. xx. 13; Acts ii. 31; 1 Cor. xv. 55), or in general the unseen world. It is in this sense that the creeds say of our Lord "He went down into Hell," meaning the state of the dead in general, without any restriction of happiness or misery, a doctrine certainly, though only virtually, expressed in Scripture (Eph. iv. 9; Acts ii. 25-31). Elsewhere in the N. T. Hades is used of a place of torment (Lk. xvi. 23; 2 Pet. ii. 4; Mat. xi. 23, &c.). Consequently it has been the prevalent, almost the universal, notion that Hades is an intermediate state between death and resurrection, divided into two parts, one the abode of the blessed and the other of the lost. The expression most frequently used in the N. T. for the place of future punishment is Gehenna or Gehenna of fire. (GEHENNA and HINNOM.) See also DAMNATION; DEATH; ETERNAL; HEAVEN; LIFE; PARADISE.

Hel'len-ist (fr. Gr. Hellenistês, translated "Grecian" in A. V.). In one of the earliest notices of the first Christian Church at Jerusalem (Acts vi. 1), two distinct parties are recognized among its members, "Hebrews" and Hellenists (Grecians), who appear to stand toward one another in some degree in a relation of jealous rivalry (compare ix. 29). The name (so Mr. Westcott) marks a class distinguished by peculiar habits, and not by descent. Thus the Hellenists as a body included not only the proselytes of GREEK (or foreign) parentage, but also those Jews who, by settling in foreign countries, had adopted the prevalent form of the current Greek civilization, and with it the use of the common Greek dialect. The flexibility of the Greek language gained for it in ancient times a general currency similar to that which French enjoys in modern Europe; but with this important difference, that Greek was not only the language of educated men, but also the language of the masses in the great centres of commerce. Peculiar words and forms adopted at ALEXANDRIA were undoubtedly of Macedonian origin, but the later Attic may be justly regarded as the real basis of Oriental Greek. The vocabulary was enriched by the addition of foreign words, and the syntax was modified by new constructions. In this way a variety of local dialects must have arisen. One of these dialects has been preserved after the ruin of the people among whom it arose, by being consecrated to the noblest service which language has yet fulfilled. (NEW TESTAMENT; SEPTUAGINT.) The functions which this Jewish-Greek had to discharge were of the widest application, and the language itself combined the most opposite features. It was essentially a fusion of Eastern and Western thought. For, disregarding peculiarities of inflection and novel words, the characteristic of the Hellenistic dialect is the combination of a Hebrew spirit with a Greek body, of a Hebrew form with Greek words. The conception belongs to one race, and the expression to another. This view of the Hellenistic dialect will at once remove one of the commonest misconceptions relating to it. For it will follow that its deviations from the ordinary laws of classic Greek are themselves bound by some common law, and that irregularities of construction and altered usages of words are to be traced to their first source, and interpreted strictly according to the original conception out of which they sprang. The adoption of a strange language was essentially characteristic of the true nature of Hellenism. The purely outward elements of the national life were laid aside with a facility of which history offers few examples, while the inner character of the people remained unchanged. In every respect the thought, so to speak, was clothed in a new dress. Hellenism was, as it were, a fresh incorporation of Judaism according to altered laws of life and worship. It accomplished for the Palestinian Jews: it was the necessary step between a religion of form and a religion of spirit; it witnessed against Judaism as final and universal, and it witnessed for it, as the foundation of a spiritual religion which should be bound by no local restrictions. The Hellenists themselves were at once missionaries to the heathen, and prophets to their own countrymen. Yet this new development of Judaism was obtained without the sacrifice of national ties. In another aspect Hellenism served as the preparation for a Catholic creed. As it furnished the language of Christianity, it supplied also that literary instinct which counteracted the traditional reserve of the Palestinian Jews. Hel'met. ARMS, II. 3.

Hel'on (Heb. strong, Ges.), father of Eliab, prince of Zebulun (Num. i. 9, ii. 7, vii. 24, 25, x. 16).

Hem of Gar'ment (Heb. teitsith; Gr. kraspedon). The importance which the later Jews, especially the Pharisees (Mat. xxiii. 5), attached to the hem or fringe of their garments was founded upon the regulation in Num. xv. 38, 39, which gave a symbolical meaning to it. But the fringe was only in the first instance the ordinary mode of finishing the robe, the ends of the threads composing the woof being left in order to prevent the cloth from unravelling, just as in the Assyrian robes represented in the bas-reliefs of Nineveh: the blue ribbon being added to strengthen the border. The outer robe (DRESS, III. 4) was a simple quadrangular piece of cloth, and generally so worn that two of the corners hung down in front: these corners were ornamented with a "ribbon of blue," or rather dark violet.

He'mam (fr. Heb.) = HOMAM, son of Lotan, the eldest son of Seir (Gen. xxxvi. 22).

He'man (fr. Heb. = faithful, Ges.). 1. Son of Zerah (1 Chr. ii. 6; 1 K. iv. 31). (See No. 2.)—2. Son of Joel and grandson of Samuel the prophet, a Kohathite. He is called "the singer," rather, the musician (1 Chr. vi. 33), and was the first of the three Levites to whom was committed the vocal and instrumental music of the Temple-service in the reign of David (xv. 16-22), Asaph and Ethan, or rather (xxv. 1, 3) Jeduthun, being his colleagues. A further account of Heman is given 1 Chr. xxv., where he is called (ver. 6) "the king's seer in the matters of God." We there learn that Heman had fourteen sons, and three daughters. Whether or no this Heman is the person to whom the 88th Psalm is ascribed is doubtful. He is there called "the Ezrahite;" and the 89th Psalm is ascribed to "Ethan the Ezrahite." But since Heman and Ethan are described in 1 Chr. ii. 6 as "sons of Zerah," it is in the highest degree probable (so Lord A. C. Hervey) that Ezrahite means "of the family of Zerah," and consequently that Heman of the 88th Psalm is different from Heman the singer, the Kohathite. In 1 K. iv. 31 again (v. 11 Heb.), we have mention, as of the wisest of mankind, of Ethan the Ezrahite, Heman, Chalcol, and Darda, the sons of Mahol, a list corresponding with the names of the sons of Zerah, in 1 Chr. ii. 6. If Heman the Kohathite, or his father, had married an heiress of the house of Zerah, and was so reckoned in the genealogy of Zerah, then all the notices of Heman might point to the same person.

He'math, properly HAMATH (Am. vi. 14).

He'math (Heb. = HAMMATH), a person, or place, named in the genealogical lists of Judah, as the origin of the Kenites, and the "father" of the house of RECHAB (1 Chr. ii. 55).

Hem'dan (Heb. pleasant, Ges.), eldest son of Dishon, son of Anah the Horite (Gen. xxxvi. 26); = AMRAM 2. The name Hemdan is by Knobel compared with those of Humidy and Hanady, located to the E. and S. E. of 'Akaba. Also with the Ben-Hamdyde, found a short distance S. of Kerck.

Hemlock. The Heb. la'anah ("wormwood") and rosh ("oak") are rendered "hemlock" once each.

Hem (Heb. grace, favor, Ges.), according to the A. V. of Zech. vi. 14, a son of Zephaniah, and apparently the Josiah in verse 10. But, by the LXX. and others, the words are taken to mean "for the favor of the son of Zephaniah." TOLIJAH 2.

Hem (Gr. ornis = bird, fowl). The hen is nowhere noticed in the Bible except in Mat. xxiii. 37 and Lk. xiii. 34, where our Saviour compares His anxiety to save Jerusalem to the tender care of a hen "gathering her chickens under her wings." See also 2 Esd. i. 80, and Cock.

He'na (Heb. low ground, F.) seems to have been one of the chief cities of a monarchical state which the Assyrian kings had reduced shortly before the time of Sennacherib (2 K. xviii. 34, xix. 13; Is. xxxvii. 13). At no great distance from Sippara (SEPHARVAIM) an ancient town called Ana or Anah, which may be = Hena. A further conjecture identifies Ana with a town called Anat, mentioned in the Assyrian inscriptions as situated on an island in the Euphrates. The modern Anat is on the right bank of the stream, near a string of islands.

He'a-dad (Heb. favor of Hadad, Ges.), the head of a family of the Levites who took a prominent part in the rebuilding of the Temple (Ez. iii. 9; Neh. iii. 18, 24, x. 9).

He'noch (fr. Heb. = HANOCH, ENOCH). 1. ENOCH 2 (1 Chr. i. 3).—2. HANOCH 1 (i. 33).

He'pher (Heb. a pit, well, Ges.). 1. Youngest son of Gilead (Num. xxvi. 32), and head of the HEPHERITES.—2. Son of Ashur, the "father of Tekoa" (1 Chr. iv. 6).—3. The Mecherathite, one of David's "valiant men" (xi. 36); not in 2 Sam. xxiii. 34.

He'pher (see above), a place in ancient Canaan, which occurs in the list of conquered kings (Josh. xii. 17). It was on the W. of Jordan (compare ver. 7 and 1 K. iv. 10).

He'pher-lites, the = the family of HEPHER the son of Gilead (Num. xxvi. 32), a branch of Manasseh.

Heph'zi-bah (Heb. my delight is in her). 1. A name to be borne by the restored Jerusalem (Is. lxii. 4).—2. Queen of King Hezekiah, and mother of Manasseh (2 K. xxi. 1).

Her'ald (Chal. cdrôzd). The only notice of this officer in the O. T. occurs in Dan. iii. 4. The term "herald" might be substituted for "preacher" in 1 Tim. ii. 7; 2 Tim. i. 11; 2 Pet. ii. 5.

* Herbs. AGRICULTURE; BITTER HERBS; FOOD; GARDEN; PALESTINE.

Her'cu-les (L. fr. Gr. Heraklēs = having fame from the goddess Hera [L. Juno], Stephens's Thes.), the name commonly applied by the Western nations to the tutelary deity of Tyre (2 Mc. iv. 19, &c.), whose national title was Melkart = king of the city. The identification was based upon a similarity of the legends and attributes referred to the two deities, but Herodotus (ii. 44) recognized their distinctness, and dwells on the extreme antiquity of the Tyrian rite. The worship of Melkart was spread throughout the Tyrian colonies, and was especially established at Carthage. There can be little doubt but that Melkart is the proper name of the BAAL mentioned in the later history of the O. T. SAMSON.

Herd, Herdman, Herdsmen. The herd was greatly regarded both in the patriarchal and Mosaic period. The ox was the most precious stock next to HORSE and MULE. The herd yielded the most esteemed sacrifice (Num. vii. 3; Ps. lxxix. 31; Is. lxvi. 3); also flesh-meat and milk, chiefly converted, probably, into butter and cheese (Deut. xxxii. 14; 2 Sam. xvii. 29), which such milk yields more copiously than that of small cattle. The full-grown ox is hardly ever slaughtered in Syria; but, both for sacrificial and convivial purposes, the young animal was preferred (Ex. xxix. 1). The agricultural and general usefulness of the ox, in ploughing, threshing, and as a beast of burden (1 Chr. xii. 40; Is. xlvi. 1), made such a slaughtering seem wasteful. The animal was broken to service probably in his third year (Is. xv. 5; Jer. xlviii. 34). In the moist season, when grass abounded in the waste lands, especially in the "S." region, herds grazed there. Especially was the eastern table-land (Ez. xxxix. 18; Num. xxxii. 4) "a place for cattle." Herdsmen, &c., in Egypt were a low, perhaps the lowest caste; but of the abundance of cattle in Egypt, and of the care there bestowed on them, there is no doubt (Gen. xlvii. 6, 17; Ex. ix. 4, 20). So the plague of hail was sent to smite especially the cattle (Ps. lxxviii. 48), the first-born of which also were smitten (Ex. xii. 29). The Israelites departing stipulated for (x. 26) and took "much cattle" with them (xii. 38). Cattle formed thus one of the traditions of the Israelitish nation in its greatest period, and became almost a part of that greatness. When pasture failed, a mixture of various grains (Job vi. 5) was used, as also "chopped straw" (Gen. xxiv. 25; Is. xi. 7, lxxv. 25), which was torn in pieces by the threshing-machine and used probably for feeding in stalls. (AGRICULTURE; BARN; GRASS; HAY.) These last formed an important adjunct to cattle-keeping, being indispensable for shelter at certain seasons (Ex. ix. 6, 19). The occupation of herdsmen was honorable in early times (Gen. xlvii. 6; 1 Sam. xi. 5; 1 Chr. xxvii. 29, xxviii. 1). Saul himself resumed it in the interval of his cares as king; also Doeg was certainly high in his confidence (1 Sam. xxi. 7). Pharaoh made some of Joseph's brethren "rulers over his cattle." David's herd-masters were among his chief officers of state. The prophet Amos at first followed this occupation (Am. i. 1, vii. 14). ABRAHAM; SHEPHERD.

Her'es (Heb. the sun, Ges., Fū.) (Is. xix. 18). (IR-HA-HERES.) For Mount Heres (Judg. i. 35), see IR-SHEMESIL.

Her'esh (Heb. artificer), a Levite attached to the Tabernacle (1 Chr. ix. 15).

Her'mas (Gr. = HERMES [i. e. Mercury], or given by Hermes), a Christian resident at Rome to whom St. Paul sends greeting in Rom. xvi. 14. Ireneus, Tertullian, and Origen, agree in attributing to him the work called the Shepherd: which is supposed to have been written in the pontificate of Clement I.; while others affirm it to have been the work of a namesake in the following age. It existed for a long time only in a Latin version, but the first part in Greek is at the end of the Codex Sinaiticus. (NEW TESTAMENT; SEPTUAGINT.) It was never received into the canon; but yet was generally cited with respect only second to that paid to the authoritative books of the N. T., and was held to be in some sense inspired.

Her'mes (Gr. = the god known among the Romans as MERCURIUS or Mercury), a man mentioned in Rom. xvi. 14. According to tradition, he was one of the seventy disciples, and afterward Bishop of Dalmatia.

Her-mog'e-nes [-moj'e-neez] (Gr. begotten by Hermes, i. e. Mercury), a person mentioned by St. Paul in the latest of his Epistles (2 Tim. i. 15), when all in Asia had turned away from him, and among their number "Phygellus and Hermogenes."

Her'mon (Heb. prominent summit, peak, of a mountain, Ges.; prominent, rugged mountain, Fū.), a mountain on the N. E. border of Palestine (Deut. iii. 8; Josh. xii. 1), over against LEBANON (xi. 17), adjoining the plateau of Bashan (1 Chr. v. 23). Its situation being thus clearly defined in Scripture, there can be no doubt as to its identity. It stands at the southern end, and is the culminating point of the Anti-Libanus range; it towers high above the ancient border-city of Dan and the fountains of the Jordan, and is the most conspicuous and beautiful mountain in Palestine or Syria. The Sidonians called it SIRON, and the Amorites SHENIR. It was also named SION = the elevated (Deut. iv. 48). So now, at the present day, it is called Jebel esh-Sheikh, = the chief mountain; and Jebel eth-Thelj, = snowy mountain. When the whole country is parched with the summer sun, white lines of snow streak the head of Hermon. This mountain was the great landmark of the Israelites. It was associated with their northern border almost as intimately as the sea was with the western. Hermon has three summits, situated like the angles of a triangle, and about a quarter of a mile from each other. This may account for the expression in Ps. xlii. 7 (A. V. 6), "I will remember thee from the land of the Jordan and the Hermons" (A. V. "Hermonites"). This mountain is called Baal-hermon (Judg. iii. 3; 1 Chr. v. 23), possibly because Baal was there worshipped. The height of Hermon has never been measured, though it has often been estimated. It may safely be reckoned at 10,000 feet. Hermon was probably the "high mountain" (Mat. xvii. 1 ff.; Mk. ix. 2 ff.; Lk. ix. 28 ff.), or "holy mount" (2 Pet. i. 18), on which our Lord was transfigured (so Porter, Stanley, &c.), though a tradition of long standing makes this to have been Tabor (Robinson, ii. 358).—The name "Hermon" or "Little Hermon" is given to the range of Jebel ed-Duhy near Tabor, but only one "Hermon" is mentioned in the Scriptures.

Her'mon-ites (fr. Heb. pl. of HERMON), the. Properly "the Hermons," with reference to the three summits of Mount Hermon (Ps. xlii. 6 [Heb. 7]).

Her'od (Gr. Herôdês = heroic?). Various accounts are given of the ancestry of the Herods; but neglecting the exaggerated statements of friends and enemies, it seems certain that they were of Idumean descent. (Edomites.) But though aliens by race, the Herods were Jews in faith. The general policy of the whole Herodian family centred in the endeavor to found a great and independent kingdom, in which the power of Judaism should subserve to the consolidation of a state. The family relations of the Herods are singularly complicated from the frequent recurrence of the same names, and the several accounts of Josephus are not consistent in every detail. The table on p. 376, by Mr. Westcott, original author of this article, seems to offer a satisfactory summary of his statements.—I. Her'od the Great was the second son of Antipater, appointed procurator of Judea by Julius Cesar, B. C. 47, and Cypros, an Arabian of noble descent. At the time of his father's elevation, though only fifteen years old, he received the government of Galilee, and shortly afterward that of Celosyria. When Antony came to Syria (B. C. 41), he appointed Herod and his elder brother Phasael tetrarchs of Judea. Herod was forced to abandon Judea next year, by an invasion of the Parthians, who supported the claims of Antigonus, the representative of the Asmonean dynasty, and fled to Rome (B. C. 40). At Rome he was well received by Antony and Octavian (Augustus), and was appointed by the senate king of Judea, to the exclusion of the Asmonean line. In a few years, by the help of the Romans, he took Jerusalem (B. C. 37), and completely established his authority throughout his dominions. After the battle of Actium he visited Octavian at Rhodes, and his noble bearing won for him the favor of the conqueror, who confirmed him in the possession of the kingdom (B. C. 31), and in the next year increased it by the addition of several important cities, and afterward gave him the province of Trachonitis and the district of Paneas. The remainder of the reign of Herod was undisturbed by external troubles, but his domestic life was embittered by an almost uninterrupted series of injuries and cruel acts of vengeance. The terrible acts of bloodshed which Herod perpetrated in his own family were accompanied by others among his subjects equally terrible, from the number who fell victims to them. According to the well-known story, he ordered the nobles whom he had called to him in his last moments to be executed immediately after his decease, that so at least his death might be attended by universal mourning. It was at the time of his fatal illness that he must have caused the slaughter of the infants at Bethlehem (Mat. ii. 16-18), and from the comparative insignificance of the murder of a few young children in an unimportant village when contrasted with the deeds which he carried out or designed, it is not surprising that Josephus has passed it over in silence. (JESUS CHRIST.) In dealing with the religious feelings or prejudices of the Jews, Herod showed as great contempt for public opinion as in the execution of his personal vengeance. But while he alienated in this manner the affections of the Jews by his cruelty and disregard for the Law, he adorned Jerusalem with many splendid monuments of his taste and magnificence. The Temple, which he rebuilt with scrupulous care, was the greatest of these works. The restoration was begun B. C. 20, and the Temple itself was completed in a year and a half. But fresh additions were constantly made in succeeding years, so that it was said, "Forty and six years was this Temple in building" (Jn. ii. 20), a phrase which expresses the whole period from the commencement of Herod's work to the completion of the latest addition then made.—II. Her'od An'ti-pas was the son of Herod the Great by Malthace, a Samaritan. His father had originally destined him as his successor in the kingdom, but by the last change of his will appointed him "tetrarch of Galilee and Perea" (Mat. xiv. 1; Lk. iii. 19, ix. 7; Acts xiii. 1; compare Lk. iii. 1). He first married a daughter of Aretas, king of Arabia Petrea, but after some time he made overtures of marriage to HERODIAS, the wife of his half-brother Herod Philip I. (IV. below), which she received favorably. Aretas, indignant at the insult offered to his daughter, found a pretext for invading the territory of Herod, and defeated him with great loss. This defeat, according to the famous passage in Jos. xviii. 5, § 2, was attributed by many to the murder of John the Baptist, which had been committed by Antipas shortly before, under the influence of Herodias (Mat. xiv. 4 ff.; Mk. vi. 17 ff.; Lk. iii. 19). At a later time the ambition of Herodias proved the cause of her husband's ruin. She urged him to go to Rome to gain the title of king (compare Mk. vi. 14); but he was opposed at the court of Caligula by the emissaries of Agrippa, and condemned to perpetual banishment at Lugdunum (A. D. 39). Herodias voluntarily shared his punishment, and he died in exile. Pilate took occasion from our Lord's residence in Galilee to send him for examination (Lk. xxiii. 6 ff.) to Herod Antipas, who came up to Jerusalem to celebrate the Passover. The city of TIBERIAS, which Antipas founded and named in honor of the emperor, was the most conspicuous monument of his long reign.—III. Ar-che-la-us (ARCHELAUS).—IV. Her'od Phil'ip I. ("Philip," Mk. vi. 17) was the son of Herod the Great, and Mariamne, and must be carefully distinguished from the tetrarch Philip II. (V. below). He married HERODIAS, the sister of Agrippa I., by whom he had a daughter Salome. Herodias, however, left him, and made an infamous marriage with his half-brother Herod Antipas (II. above), (Mat. xiv. 3; Mk. vi. 17; Lk. iii. 19). He was excluded from all share in his father's possessions in consequence of his mother's treachery, and lived afterward in a private station.—V. Her'od Phil'ip II. was the son of Herod the Great and Cleopatra. Like his half-brothers Antipapas and Archelaus, he was brought up at home. He received as his own government Batanea, Trachonitis, Auranitis (Gaulonitis), and some parts about Jamnia, with the title of tetrarch (Lk. iii. 1). He built a new city on the site of Paneas, near the sources of the Jordan, which he called Cesarea (CESAREA PHILIPPI) (Mat. xvi. 13; Mk. viii. 27), and raised Bethsaida to the rank of a city under the title of Julius, and died there A. D. 34. He married Salome, the daughter of Herod Philip I. and Herodias, but, as he left no children at his death, his dominions were added to the Roman province of Syria.

—VI. Herod Agrippa I. was the son of Aristobulus and Berenice, and grandson of Herod the Great. He was brought up at Rome with Claudius and Drusus, and, after a life of various vicissitudes, was thrown into prison by Tiberius, where he remained till the accession of Caius (Caligula) A. D. 37. The new emperor gave him the governments formerly held by the tetrarchs Philip and Lysanias, and bestowed on him the ensigns of royalty and other marks of favor (Acts xii. 1). On the banishment of Antipas, his dominions were added to those already held by Agrippa. Afterward Agrippa rendered important services to Claudius, and received from him in return (A. D. 41) the government of Judea and Samaria. Unlike his predecessors, Agrippa was a strict observer of the Law, and he sought with success the favor of the Jews. Probably with this view he put to death James the son of Zebedee, and further imprisoned Peter (xii. 1 ff.). But his sudden death interrupted his ambitious projects. In the fourth year of his reign over the whole of Judea (A. D. 44) Agrippa attended some games at Cesarea, held in honor of the emperor. When he appeared in the theatre (xii. 21) his flatterers saluted him as a god; and suddenly he was seized with terrible pains, and, being carried from the theatre to the palace, died after five days' agony.

—VII. Herod Agrippa II. was the son of Herod Agrippa I. and Cypros, a grand-niece of Herod the Great. At the time of his father's death (A. D. 44) he was at Rome. Not long afterward, however, the emperor gave him (about A. D. 50) the kingdom of Chalcis, which had belonged to his uncle; and then transferred him (A. D. 52) to the tetrarchies formerly held by Philip and Lysanias with the title of king (xxv. 13). The relation in which he stood to his sister Berenice (xxv. 13) was the cause of grave suspicion. In the last Roman war Agrippa took part with the Romans, and after the fall of Jerusalem retired with Berenice to Rome, where he died in the third year of Trajan (A. D. 100). The appearance of St. Paul before Agrippa (A. D. 60) offers several characteristic traits. The "pomp" with which the king came into the audience-chamber (xxv. 23) was accordant with his general bearing; and the cold irony with which he met the impassioned words of the apostle (xxvi. 27, 28) suits the temper of one who was contented to take part in the destruction of his nation.

—VIII. Bere-nice or BER-NICE.—IX. DRU-SIL'LA.—X. HE-RO'DI-AS.

He-ro'di-ans (fr. Gr. = those for Herod). In the account (Mat. xxii. 15 ff.; Mk. xii. 13 ff.) of the last efforts made by different sections of the Jews to obtain from our Lord Himself the materials for His accusation, a party under the name of Herodians is represented as acting in concert with the Pharisees (Mat. xxii. 16; Mk. xii. 13; compare also iii. 6, viii. 15). There were probably many who saw in the power of the Herodian family the pledge of the preservation of their national existence in the face of Roman ambition. Two distinct classes might thus unite in supporting what was a domestic tyranny as contrasted with absolute dependence on Rome: those who saw in the Herods a protection against direct heathen rule, and those who were inclined to look with satisfaction upon such a compromise between the ancient faith and heathen civilization, as Herod the Great and his successors had endeavored to realize, as the true and highest consummation of Jewish hopes.

He-ro'di-as (Gr. a female Herod), daughter of Aristobulus, one of the sons of Mariamne and Herod the Great, and consequently sister of Agrippa I. She first married HEROD PHILIP I.; then she eloped from him to marry HEROD ANTIPAS, her step-uncle, who had been long married to, and was still living with, the daughter of Aeneas or Arcetas, king of Arabia. The consequences both of the crime, and of the reproof from JOHN THE BAPTIST which it incurred, are well known. Aretas made war upon Herod for the injury done to his daughter,* and routed him with the loss of his whole army. The head of John the Baptist was granted to the request of Herodias (Mat. xiv. 8-11; Mk. vi. 24-28). According to Josephus, the execution took place in a fortress called Machærus, looking down upon the Dead Sea from the S. She accompanied Antipas into exile to Lugdunum, probably (so Mr. Ffoulkes) Lugdunum Convenarum, a town of Gaul, on the right bank of the Garonne, at the foot of the Pyrenees, now St. Bertrand de Comminges, on the frontier of Spain.

He-ro'di-on (Gr.), a relative of St. Paul, to whom he sends his salutation among the Christians at Rome (Rom. xvi. 11).

Her-on, the A. V. translation of the Heb. anāphak, the name of an unclean bird in Lev. xi. 19, Deut. xiv. 18. It was probably (so Mr. Bevan) a generic name for a well-known class of birds. The only point on which any two commentators seem to agree is that it is not the heron. On etymological grounds, Gesenius considers the name applicable to some irritable bird, perhaps the goose. But Mr. P. H. Gosse (in Fbn.) supports the A. V., and says: The herons are wading-birds, peculiarly irritable, remarkable for their vivacity, frequenting marshes and oozy rivers, and spread over the East. One of the commonest species in Asia is Ardea russata, the little golden egret, or cow-heron.

He'sed (Heb. kindness, mercy, Ges.). The "son of Hese'd" ("Ben-hese'd," margin) was commissary for Solomon in "Aruboth, Sochoh, and all the land of Hopher" (1 K. iv. 10).

Hesh'bon (Heb. reason, intelligence, Ges.; stronghold, Fñ.), the capital city of Sihon, king of the Amorites (Num. xxi. 26). It stood on the western border of the high plain (PLAIN 4; Josh. xiii. 17), and on the boundary-line between the tribes of Reuben and Gad. The ruins of Heshbān, twenty miles E. of the Jordan, on the parallel of the N. end of the Dead Sea, mark the site, as they bear the name of the ancient Heshbon. Heshbon was rebuilt by the tribe of Reuben (Num. xxxii. 37), but was assigned to the Levites from Gad (Josh. xxi. 39). After the Captivity it fell into the hands of the Moabites, to whom it had originally belonged (Num. xxi. 26), and hence is mentioned in the denunciations against Moab (Is. xv. 4, Jer. xlviii. 2, 34, 45). It has been for many centuries wholly desolate. The ruins of Heshbon stand on a low hill rising out of the great undulating plateau.

They are more than a mile in circuit, but not a building remains entire. There are many cisterns among the ruins (compare Cant. vii. 4).

Hesh-men (Heb. fatness, fat soil, Ges.), a place named between Moladah and Beer-sheba in the extreme S. of Judah (Josh. xv. 27); = AZMON? (Mr. Grove); supposed by Wilton = HASHMONAH, and identified with 'Ain Hasb, about fifteen miles S. of the Dead Sea; supposed by Rowlands (in Fbn., under "S. country") at Hashum-Senneh, an ancient site about seven miles S. E. of Beer-sheba.

Hes-ron (L.) = HEZRON, son of Reuben (Num. xxvi. 6 in some copies).

Hes-ron-ltes, the = the descendants of HEZRON, the son of Reuben (Num. xxvi. 6 in some copies).

Heth (Heb. terror, dread, Ges.), the forefather of the nation of the HITTITES, called "sons" and "children of Heth" (Gen. xxiii. 3 ff., xxv. 10, xlix. 32). Once we hear of "daughters of Heth" (xxvii. 46). In the genealogical tables of Gen. x. and 1 Chr. i., Heth is a son of Canaan. The Hittites were therefore a Hamite race.

Hethlon (Heb. wrapped up, hiding-place, Ges.), a place on the northern border of Palestine (Ez. xlvii. 15, xlviii. 1). Probably the "way of Hethlon" is the pass at the N. end of Lebanon, and thus = "the entrance of Hamath" in Num. xxxiv. 8, &c.

Hez'e-ki (fr. Heb. = HEZEKIAH), a Benjamite, one of the sons of Elpaal, a descendant of Shaa-raim (1 Chr. viii. 17).

Hez'e-ki-ah (fr. Heb. Hizkiyâh = Jehovah strengthens, Ges.), twelfth king of Judah, son of the apostate AHAZ and Abi (or Abijah), ascended the throne at the age of twenty-five, B. C. 726. (ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF; JUDAH, KINGDOM OF.) Since, however, Ahaz died at the age of thirty-six, some prefer to make Hezekiah only twenty years old at his accession, as otherwise he must have been born when Ahaz was eleven years old; but, if any change be desirable, it is better (so Mr. Farrar) to suppose that Ahaz was twenty-five and not twenty years old at his accession. Hezekiah was one of the three best kings of Judah (2 K. xviii. 5; Eccles. xlix. 4). His first act was to purge, and repair, and reopen with splendid sacrifices and perfect ceremonial, the Temple which had been despoiled and neglected during his father's careless and idolatrous reign. This consecration was accompanied by a revival of the theocratic spirit, so strict as not even to spare "the high places," which, although tolerated by many well-intentioned kings, had naturally been profaned by the worship of images and Asherahs (A. V. "groves;" see ASHERAH; 2 K. xviii. 4). A still more decisive act was the destruction of a brazen serpent, said to have been the one used by Moses in the miraculous healing of the Israelites (Num. xxi. 9), which had become an object of adoration. When the kingdom of Israel had fallen (more probably before this, in the first year of his reign), Hezekiah extended his pious endeavors to Ephraim and Manasseh; and, by inviting the scattered inhabitants to a peculiar Passover, kindled their indignation also against the idolatrous practices which still continued among them. This Passover was, from the necessities of the case, celebrated at an unusual, though not illegal (Num. ix. 10, 11) time; and by an excess of Levitical zeal it was continued for the unprecedented period of fourteen days (2 Chr. xxix., xxx., xxxi.). At the head of a repentant and united people, Hezekiah ventured to assume the aggressive against the Philistines: and in a series of victories not only rewon the cities which his father had lost (xxviii. 18), but even dispossessed them of their own cities, except Gaza (2 K. xviii. 8) and Gath. It was perhaps to the purpose of this war that he applied the money which would otherwise have been used to pay the tribute exacted by Shalmanezzer, according to the agreement of Ahaz with his predecessor, Tiglath-pileser. When, after the capture of Samaria, the king of Assyria applied for this impost, Hezekiah refused it, and in open rebellion omitted to send even the usual presents (xviii. 7). Instant war was averted by the heroic and long-continued resistance of the Tyrians under their king Elulæus. This must have been a critical and intensely anxious period for Jerusalem; and Hezekiah used every available means to strengthen his position, and render his capital impregnable (2 K. xx. 20; 2 Chr. xxxii. 8-5, 30; Is. xxii. 8-11, xxxiii. 18). According to a scheme of chronology proposed by Dr. Hincks, Hezekiah's dangerous illness (2 K. xx.; Is. xxxviii.; 2 Chr. xxxii. 24) nearly synchronized with Sargon's futile invasion in the fourteenth year of Hezekiah's reign, eleven years before Sennacherib's invasion. That it must have preceded the attack of Sennacherib is nearly obvious from the promise in 2 K. xx. 6, as well as from modern discoveries. Hezekiah, whose kingdom was in a dangerous crisis, who perhaps had at that time no heir (for Manasseh was not born till long afterward, 2 K. xxi. 1), "turned his face to the wall and wept sore" at the threatened approach of dissolution. God had compassion on his anguish, and heard his prayer. Isaiah had hardly left the palace when he was ordered to promise the king's immediate recovery, and a fresh lease of life, ratifying the promise by a sign, and curing the boil by a plaster of figs, which were often used medicinally in similar cases (Is. xxxviii.). What was the exact nature of the disease we cannot say: according to Mead it was fever terminating in abscess. (MEDICINE.) Various ambassadors came with letters and gifts to congratulate Hezekiah on his recovery (2 Chr. xxxii. 23), and among them an embassy from Merodach-baladan (or Berodach, 2 K. xx. 12), the viceroy of Babylon, the Mardokempados of Ptolemy's canon. The ostensible object of this mission was to compliment Hezekiah on his convalescence (2 K. xx. 12; Is. xxxix. 1), and "to inquire of the wonder that was done in the land" (2 Chr. xxxii. 31), a rumor of which could not fail to interest a people devoted to astrology; but its real purpose was perhaps to discover how far an alliance between the two powers was possible or desirable, for Mardokempados, no less than Hezekiah, was in apprehension of the Assyrians. Community of interest made Hezekiah receive the overtures of Babylon with unconcealed gratification; and, perhaps, to enhance the opinion of his own importance as an ally, he displayed to the messengers the princely treasures which he and his predecessors had accumulated. If ostentation were his motive it received a terrible rebuke, and he was informed by Isaiah that from the then tottering and subordinate province of Babylon, and not from the mighty Assyria, would come the ruin and captivity of Judah (Is. xxxix. 5). Sargon was succeeded (B. C. 702) by his son SENNACHERIB, whose two invasions occupy the greater part of the Scripture records concerning the reign of Hezekiah. The first of these took place in the third year of Sennacherib (B. C. 702), and occupies only three verses (2 K. xviii. 13-16), though the route of the advancing Assyrians may be traced in Is. x. 5 xi. The rumor of the invasion redoubled Hezekiah's exertions, and he prepared for a siege by providing offensive and defensive armor, stopping up the wells, and diverting the watercourses, conducting the water of Gihon into the city by a subterranean canal (Ecclus. xlviii. 17). But the main hope of the political faction was the alliance with Egypt, and they seem to have sought it by presents and private entreaties (Is. xxx. 6). The account given of this first invasion in the Annals of Sennacherib is that he attacked Hezekiah because the Ekronites had sent their king Padiya (or Haddiya) as a prisoner to Jerusalem (compare 2 K. xviii. 8); that he took forty-six cities ("all the fenced cities" in 2 K. xviii. 13 is apparently a general expression, compare xix. 8) and 200,000 prisoners; that he besieged Jerusalem with mounds (compare xix. 32); and although Hezekiah promised to pay 800 talents of silver (of which perhaps 800 only were ever paid) and 30 of gold (xviii. 14), yet, not content with this, he mulcted him of a part of his dominions, and gave them to the kings of Ekron, Ashdod, and Gaza. In almost every particular this account agrees with the notice in Scripture. Hezekiah's bribe (or fine) brought a temporary release, for the Assyrians marched into Egypt, where, if Herodotus and Josephus are to be trusted, they advanced without resistance to Pelusium. In spite of this advantage, Sennacherib was forced to raise the siege of Pelusium, by the advance of Tirhakah. Returning from his futile expedition, Sennacherib "dealt treacherously" with Hezekiah (Is. xxxiii. 1) by attacking the stronghold of Lachish. This was the commencement of that second invasion, respecting which we have such full details in 2 K. xviii. 17 ff.; 2 Chr. xxxii. 9 ff.; Is. xxxvi. Although the annals of Sennacherib on the great cylinder in the British Museum reach to the end of his eighth year, and this second invasion belongs to his fifth year (B. C. 698, the twenty-eighth year of Hezekiah), yet no allusion to it has been found. So shameful a disaster was naturally concealed by national vanity. From Lachish he sent against Jerusalem an army under two officers and his cup-bearer the orator Rabshakeh, with a blasphemous and insulting summons to surrender. Hezekiah's ministers were thrown into anguish and dismay, but the undaunted Isaiah hurled back threatening for threatening with unrivalled eloquence and force. Meanwhile Sennacherib, having taken Lachish, was besieging Libnah, when, alarmed by a "rumor" of Tirhakah's advance, he was forced to relinquish once more his immediate designs, and content himself with a defiant letter to Hezekiah. The next event of the campaign, about which we are informed, is that the Jewish king with simple piety prayed to God with Sennacherib's letter outspread before him, and received a prophecy of immediate deliverance. Accordingly "that night the ANGEL of the Lord went out and smote in the camp of the Assyrians 185,000 men." It is very probable that some secondary cause was employed in the accomplishment of this event. Josephus, followed by an immense majority of ancient and modern commentators, attributes it to the pestilence. Hezekiah only lived to enjoy for about one year more his well-earned peace and glory. He slept with his fathers after a reign of twenty-nine years, in the fifty-fourth year of his age (B. C. 697).—2. Son of Neariah, descendant of the royal family of Judah (1 Chr. iii. 23).—3. The same name, though in the A. V. HIZKIAH, is found in Zeph. i. 1.—4. A'ter of Hez-e-ki'ah. ATER.

He'zi-on (L. fr. Heb. = vision, Ges.), a king of Aram ("Syria"), father of Tabrimon, and grandfather of Ben-hadad I. He and his father are mentioned only in 1 K. xv. 18. In the absence of all information, the natural suggestion is that he = REZON, the contemporary of Solomon, in xi. 23; the two names being very similar in Hebrew, and still more so in the versions.

He'zir (Heb. swine, Ges.). 1. A priest in David's time, leader of the seventeenth monthly course in the service (1 Chr. xxiv. 15).—2. One of the heads of the people (laymen) who sealed the solemn covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 20).

Hez'ral or Hez'ra-l (fr. Heb. = enclosed, walled in, Ges.), one of David's "thirty" valiant men (2 Sam. xxiii. 35); = HEZRO.

Hez'ro (fr. Heb.) = HEZRAI (1 Chr. xi. 37).

Hez'ron (fr. Heb. = HEZRAI, Ges.). 1. A son of Reuben, ancestor of the HEZRONITES 1 (Gen. xlv. 9; Ex. vi. 14).—2. A son of Pharez, ancestor of the HEZRONITES 2 (Gen. xlv. 12; Ru. iv. 18).—3. HAZOR 4 (Josh. xv. 25).

Hez'ron-ites (fr. Heb.), the. 1. Descendants of HEZRON the son of Reuben (Num. xxvi. 6).—2. A branch of the tribe of Judah, descendants of HEZRON, the son of Pharez (xxvi. 31).

Hid'dal or Hid'da-l (Heb. mighty, chief, Fū.), one of David's "thirty" valiant men (2 Sam. xxiii. 30); = HURAI.

Hid'de-kel (Heb. the rapid Tigris, Ges.; the rapid river, the river swift as an arrow, Fū.; see below), one of the rivers of EDEN 1, the river which "goeth eastward to Assyria" (Gen. ii. 14), and which Daniel calls "the Great river" (Dan. x. 4), seems to have been rightly identified by the LXX. with the TIGRIS. De'kel (so Rawlinson) clearly = Digla or Diglath, a name borne by the Tigris in all ages. The name now in use among the inhabitants of Mesopotamia is Dijleh. It has generally been supposed that Digla is a mere Semitic corruption of Tigra, and that this latter is the true name of the stream; but it must be observed that the two forms are found side by side in the Babylonian transcript of the Belistun inscription, and that the ordinary name of the stream in the inscriptions of Assyria is Tiggar.

Hil'el (Heb. = JEHIEL? Ges.; God is animation, Fū.), a native of Bethel, who rebuilt Jericho in the reign of Ahab (1 K. xvi. 34); and in whom was fulfilled the curse pronounced by Joshua (Josh. vi. 26).

Hil-e-rap'o-lis (Gr. sacred city, said to have been so called from the number of its temples), a city of PHRYGIA, celebrated for its hot calcareous springs, which have deposited vast and singular incrustations. It is mentioned (Ccl. iv. 13 only) with COLOSSE and LAODICEA, the three towns being all in the basin of the Meander, and within a few miles of one another. The situation of Hierapolis is extremely beautiful; and its ruins are considerable, the theatre and gymnasium being the most conspicuous. Its modern name is Pamouk-Kalassi.

Hil'er'e-el (Gr.) = JEHIEL (1 Esd. ix. 21).

Hil'er'e-moth (Gr.). 1. JEREMOTH (1 Esd. ix. 27).—2. RAMOTH (ix. 30).

Hil'er-i'e-lus (1 Esd. ix. 27) = JEHIEL in Ezr. x.

Hil'er-mas (Gr.) RAMIAH (1 Esd. ix. 26).

Hil-e-ron'y-mas (L. fr. Gr. = of hallowed name, L. & S.), a Syrian general in the time of Antiochus V. Eupator (2 Mc. xii. 2).

Hig-ga-ion [-ga'yon] (Heb., see below), a word which occurs in the Hebrew in Ps. ix. 17 (A. V. 16, "Higgaion," margin "meditation"), xix. 15 (A. V. 14, "meditation" [so Gesenius, Fürst]), xcii. 4 (A.

V. 3, "a solemn sound," margin "Higgaion"); Lam. iii. 62, "device," A. V., Ges., Ff.). In Ps. xcii. Gesenius and First translate with the murmur (or gentle sound) of the harp, A. V. "upon the harp with a solemn sound." In Ps. ix. First makes it an air, perhaps muffled music as a pause or a peculiar kind; Gesenius explains it as a musical sign (compare SELAH). It seems that Higgaion has two meanings, one of a general character implying thought, reflection, and another in Ps. ix. 17, xcii. 4, of a technical nature, the precise meaning of which cannot now be determined.

High Places (Heb. pl. šāmōth; see BAMOTh). From the earliest times it was the custom among all nations to erect altars and places of worship on lofty and conspicuous spots. To this general custom we find constant allusion in the Bible (Is. lxxv. 7; Jer. iii. 6; Ez. vi. 13, xviii. 6; Hos. iv. 13), and it is especially attributed to the Moabites (Is. xv. 2, xvi. 12; Jer. xlviii. 35). Even Abraham built an altar to the Lord on a mountain near Bethel (Gen. xii. 7, 8; compare xxii. 2-4, xxxi. 54), which shows that the practice was then as innocent as it was natural; and although it afterward became mingled with idolatrous observances (Num. xxiii. 3), it was in itself far less likely to be abused than the consecration of groves (Hos. iv. 13). (GROVE.) It is, however, quite obvious that if every grove and eminence had been suffered to become a place for legitimate worship, especially in a country where they had already been defiled with the sins of polytheism, the utmost danger would have resulted to the pure worship of the one true God. It was therefore forbidden by the law of Moses (Deut. xii. 11-14), which also gave the strictest injunction to destroy these monuments of Canaanitish idolatry (Lev. xxvi. 30; Num. xxxiii. 52; Deut. xxxiii. 29), without stating any general reason for this command, beyond the fact that they had been connected with such associations. The command was a prospective one, and was not to come into force until such time as the tribes were settled in the promised land. Both Gideon and Manoah built altars on high places by Divine command (Judg. vi. 25, 26, xiii. 16-23), and it is clear from the tone of the book of Judges that the law on the subject was forgotten or practically obsolete (so Mr. Farrar). This worship at other places than the Tabernacle seems to have been occasioned by the disturbed state of the country and the difficulty of uniting in journeys to Shiloh for the great feasts, and may have been permitted as a recurrence to the patriarchal system (R. S. Poole in Kitto). It is more surprising to find this law apparently ignored at a much later period—as by Samuel at Mizpeh (1 Sam. vii. 10) and at Bethlehem (xvi. 5); by Saul at Gilgal (xiii. 9) and at Ajalon (? xiv. 35); by David (1 Chr. xxi. 26); by Elijah on Mount Carmel (1 K. xviii. 30); and by other prophets (1 Sam. x. 5). In some of these cases the rule was evidently superseded by a Divine intimation; the Tabernacle and Zadok the priest were for a time at Gibeon, where Solomon sacrificed, while the ark was at Jerusalem (1 K. iii. 4; 2 Chr. i. 3 ff.; compare 1 Chr. xv. xvi. 37 ff., xxi. 29, 30); and reasons of which we are ignorant may have justified the irregularity in other cases; but it is certain that the worship in high places was common in Judea, not only during (1 K. iii. 2-4), but even after, the time of Solomon. The convenience of them was obvious, because, as local centres of religious worship, they obviated the unpleasant and dangerous necessity of visiting Jerusalem for the celebration of the yearly feasts (2 K. xiii. 9). In fact, the high places seem to have supplied the need of synagogues (Ps. lxxiv. 8). (SYNAGOGUE.) Many of the pious kings of Judah were either too weak or too ill-informed to repress the worship of Jehovah at these local sanctuaries, while they of course endeavored to prevent it from being contaminated with polytheism. Asa and Jehoshaphat seem to have removed the high places so far as they had been employed in the service of false gods; but allowed them to continue as convenient meeting-places where the people had been wont to assemble for the worship of Jehovah (1 K. xv. 14; 2 Chr. xiv. 3, xv. 17, xvii. 6, xx. 33) (Michaelis, Schulz, Bertheau, Fairbairn). At last HEZEKIAH set himself in good earnest to the suppression of this prevalent corruption (2 K. xviii. 4, 22), both in Judah and Israel (2 Chr. xxxi. 1), although, so rapid was the growth of the evil, that even his sweeping reformation required to be finally consummated by Josiah (2 K. xxiii.), and that too in Jerusalem and its immediate neighborhood (2 Chr. xxxiv. 3). After the time of Josiah we find no further mention of these Jehovistic high places. IDOLATRY.

High-priest. The office of high-priest among the Israelites may be considered—I. Legally. II. Theologically. III. Historically.—I. The legal view of the high-priest's office comprises all that the law of Moses ordained respecting it. The first distinct separation of AARON to the office of the priesthood, which previously belonged to the FIRST-BORN, was that recorded Ex. xxviii. We find from the very first the following characteristic attributes of Aaron and the high-priests his successors, as distinguished from the other priests:—(1.) Aaron alone was anointed (Lev. viii. 12), whence one of the distinctive epithets of the high-priest was "the anointed priest" (Lev. iv. 3, 5, 16, xxi. 10; see Num. xxxv. 25). This appears also from Ex. xxix. 29, 30. The Dress of Jewish High-priest.—(Kitto.)

ANointing of the sons of Aaron, i. e. the common priests, seems to have been confined to sprinkling their garments with the anointing oil (Ex. xxix. 21, xxviii. 41, &c.). The anointing of the high-priest is alluded to in Ps. cxxxiii. 2. The anointing oil is described in Ex. xxx. 22-25. The manufacture of it was intrusted to certain priests, called apothecaries (Neh. iii. 8). (OINTMENT.)—(2.) The high-priest had a peculiar DRESS, which passed to his successor at his death. This dress consisted of eight parts, as the Rabbins constantly note, the breast-plate, the ephod with its curious girdle, the robe of the ephod, the mitre, the broidered coat or diaper tunic, and the girdle, the materials being gold, blue, red, crimson, and fine (white) linen (Ex. xxviii.). (COLORS.) To the above are added, in verse 42, the breeches or drawers (Lev. xvi. 4) of linen; and to make up the number 8, some reckon the high-priest's mitre, or the plate separately from the bonnet; while others reckon the curious girdle of the ephod separately from the ephod. Of these eight articles of attire, four—viz. the coat or tunic, the girdle, the breeches, and the bonnet or turban (Heb. migbā'ah) instead of the mitre (Heb. mitsnepheth)—belonged to the common priests. Taking the articles of the high-priest's dress in order, we have (a.) the breast-plate (Heb. hōshen or chōshen), or, as it is further named (Ex. xxviii. 4, 15, 29, 30), the breastplate of judgment. It was, like the inner curtains of the Tabernacle, the veil, and the ephod, of "CUNNING work." (EMBROIDERER.) The breastplate was originally two spans long, and one span broad, but when doubled it was square, the shape in which it was worn. It was fastened at the top by rings and chains of wreathen gold to the two onyx-stones on the shoulders, and beneath with two other rings and a lace of blue to two corresponding rings in the ephod, to keep it fixed in its place, above the curious girdle. But the most remarkable and most important part of this breastplate were the twelve precious stones, set in four rows, three in a row, thus corresponding to the twelve tribes, and divided in the same manner as their camps were; each stone having the name of one of the children of Israel engraved upon it. According to the LXX. and Josephus, and in accordance with the language of Scripture, it was these stones which constituted the URIM AND THUMMIM. The addition of precious stones and costly ornaments expresses glory beyond simple justification (compare Is. lxii. 3; Rev. xxi. 11, 12-21). But, moreover, the high-priest being a representative personage, the fortunes of the whole people would most properly be indicated in his person. A striking instance of this, in connection too with symbolical dress, is to be found in Zech. iii. It seems to be sufficiently obvious that the breastplate of righteousness or judgment, resplendent with the same precious stones which symbolize the glory of the New Jerusalem, and on which were engraved the names of the twelve tribes, worn by the high-priest, who was then said to bear the judgment of the children of Israel upon his heart, was intended to express by symbols the acceptance of Israel grounded upon the sacrificial functions of the high-priest.—(b.) The Εφωδ. This consisted of two parts, of which one covered the back, and the other the front, i. e. the breast and upper part of the body. These were clasped together on the shoulder with two large onyx-stones, each having engraved on it six of the names of the tribes of Israel. It was further united by a "curious GIRDLE" of gold, blue, purple, scarlet, and fine twined linen round the waist.—(c.) The Robe of the ephod (Heb. me'ul; see DRESS III. 3). This was of inferior material to the ephod itself, being all of blue (Ex. xxviii. 31), which implied its being only of "woven work" (xxxix. 22). It was worn immediately under the ephod, and was longer than it. The blue robe had no sleeves, but only slits in the sides for the arms to come through. It had a hole for the head to pass through, with a border round it of woven work, to prevent its being rent. (ARMS, II. 2.) The skirt of this robe had a remarkable trimming of pomegranates in blue, red, and crimson, with a bell of gold between each pomegranate alternately. The bells were to give a sound when the high-priest went in and came out of the Holy Place.—(d.) The mitre or upper turban (HEAD-DRESS), with its gold plate, engraved with "HOLINESS TO THE LORD," fastened to it by a ribbon of blue (xxviii. 36 ff.). Josephus applies the Hebrew term mitsnepheth to the turbans of the common priests as well, but says that in addition to this, and sewn on to the top of it, the high-priest had another turban of blue; that besides this he had outside the turban a triple crown of gold, i. e. consisting of three rims one above the other, and terminating at top in a kind of conical calyx, like the inverted calyx of the herb hyoscyamus (henbane). Josephus doubtless gives a true account of the high-priest's turban as worn in his day. He also describes the lamina or gold plate, which he says covered the forehead of the high-priest.—(e.) The broidered coat (Heb. aitōneth tashbēts; DRESS, III. 1; EMBROIDERER) was a tunic or long skirt of linen with a tessellated or diaper pattern, like the setting of a stone. The GIRDLE, also of linen, was wound round the body several times from the breast downward, and the ends hung down to the ankles. The breeches or drawers, of linen, covered the loins and thighs; and the bonnet (Heb. migbā'ah; CROWN; HEAD-DRESS) was a turban of linen partially covering the head, but not in the form of a cone like that of the high-priest when the mitre was added to it. These four last were common to all priests. (PRIEST.)—(3.) Aaron had peculiar functions. To him alone it appertained, and he alone was permitted, to enter the Holy of Holies, which he did once a year, on the great day of atonement (ATONEMENT, DAY OF), when he sprinkled the blood of the sin-offering on the mercy-seat, and burnt incense within the veil (Lev. xvi.). He is said by the Talmudists not to have worn his full pontifical robes on this occasion, but to have been clad entirely in white linen (Lev. xvi. 4, 32). It is singular, however, that on the other hand, Josephus says that the great fast-day was the chief, if not the only day in the year, when the high-priest wore all his robes.—(4.) The high-priest had a peculiar place in the law of the manslayer, and his taking sanctuary in the cities of refuge. The manslayer might not leave the city of refuge during the lifetime of the existing high-priest who was anointed with the holy oil (Num. xxxv. 25, 28). It was also forbidden to the high-priest to follow a funeral, or lend his clothes for the dead, according to the precedent in Lev. x. 6. The other respects in which the high-priest exercised superior functions to the other priests arose rather from his position and opportunities, than were distinctly attached to his office, and they consequently varied with the personal character and abilities of the high-priest. Even that portion of power which most naturally and usually belonged to him, the rule of the Temple, and the government of the priests and Levites who ministered there, did not invariably fall to the share of the high-priest. The Rabbins speak very frequently of one second in dignity to the high-priest, whom they call the Sagan, and who often acted in the high-priest's room. He is the same who in the

O. T. is called "the second priest" (2 K. xxiii. 4, xv. 18). Thus too it is explained of ANNAS and CAIAPHAS (Lk. iii. 2), that ANNAS was Sagan. ANANIAS is also thought by some to have been Sagan, acting for the high-priest (Acts xxiii. 2). It does not appear by whose authority the high-priests were appointed to their office before there were kings of Israel. But as we find it invariably done by the civil power in later times, it is probable that, in the times preceding the monarchy, it was by the elders, or SANHEDRIM. The usual age for entering upon the functions of the priesthood, according to 2 Chr. xxxi. 17, is considered to have been twenty years, though a priest or high-priest was not actually incapacitated if he had attained to puberty. Again, according to Lev. xxi., no one that had a blemish could officiate at the altar.—II. The theological view of the high-priesthood does not fall within the scope of this Dictionary. Such a view would embrace the consideration of the office, dress, functions, and ministrations of the high-priest, considered as typical of the priesthood of our Lord JESUS CHRIST, and as setting forth under shadows the truths which are openly taught under the Gospel. (ATONEMENT; MESSIAH; SACRIFICE; SAVIOUR.) This has been done to a great extent in the Epistle to the Hebrews. It would also embrace all the moral and spiritual teaching supposed to be intended by such symbols.—III. Historical view of the subject. The history of the high-priests embraces a period of about 1,870 years, and a succession of about eighty high-priests, beginning with Aaron, and ending with Phinias. They naturally arrange themselves into three groups—(a.) those before David; (b.) those from David to the Captivity; (c.) those from the return of the Babylonish Captivity till the cessation of the office at the destruction of Jerusalem. (a.) The high-priests of the first group who are distinctly made known to us as such are—1. Aaron; 2. Eleazar; 3. Phinehas; 4. Eli; 5. Ahitub (1 Chr. ix. 11; Neh. xi. 11; 1 Sam. xiv. 3); 6. Ahiah; 7. Ahimelech. Phinehas, the son of Eli, and father of Ahitub, died before his father, and so was not high-priest. Of the above, the three first succeeded in regular order, Nadab and Abihu, Aaron's eldest sons having died in the wilderness (Lev. x.). But ELI, the fourth, was of the line of Ithamar. What was the exact interval between the death of Phinehas and the accession of Eli, what led to the transference of the chief priesthood from the line of Eleazar to that of Ithamar, we have no means of determining from Scripture. Josephus asserts that the father of Bukki—whom he calls Joseph, and Abiezer, i. e. Abishua—was the last high-priest of Phinehas's line, before Zadok. If Abishua died, leaving a son or grandson under age, Eli, as head of the line of Ithamar, might have become high-priest as a matter of course, or he might have been appointed by the elders. If Ahiah and Ahimelech are not variations of the name of the same person, they must have been brothers, since both were sons of Ahitub. The high-priests, then, before David's reign may be set down as eight in number, of whom seven are said in Scripture to have been high-priests, and one by Josephus alone.—(b.) Passing to the second group, we begin with the unexplained circumstance of there being two priests in the reign of David, apparently of nearly equal authority, viz. Zadok and ABIATHAR (1 Chr. xv. 11; 2 Sam. vii. 17). It is not unlikely (so Lord A. C. Hervey, the original author of this article), that after the death of Ahimelech and the secession of Abiathar to David, Saul may have made Zadok priest, and that David may have avoided the difficulty of deciding between the claims of his faithful friend Abiathar and his new and important ally Zadok by appointing them to a joint priesthood: the first place, with the Ephod, and Urim and Thummim, remaining with Abiathar, who was in actual possession of them. The first considerable difficulty that meets us in the historical survey of the high-priests of the second group is to ascertain who was high-priest at the dedication of Solomon's Temple. Josephus says that Zadok was, and the Seder Olam makes him the high-priest in the reign of Solomon; but 1 K. iv. 2 distinctly asserts that Azariah the son of Zadok was priest under Solomon, and 1 Chr. vi. 10 tells us of Azariah, "he it is that executeth the priest's office in the temple that Solomon built in Jerusalem," obviously meaning at its first completion. We can hardly therefore be wrong in saying that Azariah the son of Ahimaaz was the first high-priest of Solomon's Temple. In constructing the list of the succession of priests of this group, we must compare the genealogical list in 1 Chr. vi. 8–15 (A. V.) with the notices of high-priests in the Scriptures, and with the list given by Josephus. Now, as regards the genealogy, it is seen at once that there is something defective; for whereas from David to Jeconiah there are twenty kings, from Zadok to Jehozadak there are but thirteen priests. Then again, while the pedigree in its six first generations from Zadok, inclusive, exactly suits the history, yet is there a great gap in the middle; for between Amariah, the high-priest in Jehoshaphat's reign, and Shallum the father of Hilkiyah, the high-priest in Josiah's reign—an interval of about 240 years—there are but two names, Ahitub and Zadok, and those liable to the utmost suspicion from their reproducing the same sequence which occurs in the earlier part of the same genealogy—Amariah, Ahitub, Zadok. But the historical books supply us with four or five names for this interval, viz. Jehoiaha in the reigns of Athaliah and Joash, and probably still earlier; Zechariah his son; Azariah in the reign of Uzziah; Urijah in the reign of Ahaz; and Azariah in the reign of Hezekiah. If, however, in the genealogy of 1 Chr. vi., Azariah and Hilkiyah have been accidentally transposed, as is not unlikely, then the Azariah who was high-priest in Hezekiah's reign will be the Azariah of 1 Chr. vi. 13, 14. Putting the additional historical names at four, and deducting the two suspicious names from the genealogy, we have fifteen high-priests indicated in Scripture as contemporary with the twenty kings, with room, however, for one or two more in the history. In addition to these, the Sudeas of Josephus, who corresponds to Zedekiah in the reign of Amaziah in the Seder Olam, and Odeas, who corresponds to Hoshai in the reign of Manasseh, according to the same Jewish chronicle, may really represent high-priests whose names have not been preserved in Scripture. This would bring up the number to seventeen, or, if we retain Azariah as the father of Seraiah, to eighteen, which agrees nearly with the twenty kings. Reviewing the high-priests of this second group, the following are some of the most remarkable incidents:—(1.) The transfer of the seat of worship from Shiloh in the tribe of Ephraim to Jerusalem in the tribe of Judah, effected by David and consolidated by the building of the magnificent Temple of Solomon. (2.) The organization of the Temple-service under the high-priest. (3.) The revolt of the ten tribes. (4.) The overthrow of the usurpation of Athaliah by Jehoiaha the high-priest.

(5.) The boldness and success with which the high-priest Azariah withstood the encroachments of the king Uzziah upon the office and functions of the priesthood. (6.) The repair of the Temple by Jehoiada, the restoration of the Temple services by Azariah in the reign of Hezekiah, and the discovery of the book of the law and the religious reformation by Hilkiah in the reign of Josiah. (7.) In all these great religious movements, however, excepting the one headed by Jehoiada, it is remarkable how the civil power took the lead. The preponderance of the civil over the ecclesiastical power, as an historical fact, in the kingdom of Judah, although kept within bounds by the hereditary succession of the high-priests, seems to be proved from these circumstances. The priests of this series ended with Seraiah, who was taken prisoner by Nebuzar-adan, and slain at Riblah by Nebuchadnezzar, together with Zephaniah the second priest or Sagan, after the burning of the Temple and the plunder of all the sacred vessels (2 K. xx. 18). His son Jehozadak or Josedech was at the same time carried away captive (1 Chr. vi. 15). The time occupied by these high-priests was about 454 years, which gives an average of something more than twenty-five years to each high-priest. It is remarkable that not a single instance is recorded after the time of David of an inquiry by Urim and Thummim. The ministry of the prophets seems to have superseded that of the high-priests (see e. g. 2 Chr. xv., xviii., xx. 14, 15; 2 K. xix. 1, 2, xxii. 12-14; Jer. xxi. 1, 2).—(c.) An interval of about fifty-two years elapsed between the high-priests of the second and third group, during which there was neither Temple, nor altar, nor ark, nor priest. Jehozadak, or Josedech, as it is written in Hag. i. 1, 14, &c., who should have succeeded Seraiah, lived and died a captive at Babylon. The pontifical office revived in his son Jeshua, of whom such frequent mention is made in Ezra and Nehemiah, Haggai and Zechariah, 1 Esdras and Ecclesiasticus; and he therefore stands at the head of the third and last series, honorably distinguished for his zealous coöperation with Zerubbabel in rebuilding the Temple, and restoring the dilapidated commonwealth of Israel. His successors, as far as the O. T. guides us, were Joiakim, Eliashib, Joiada, Johanan (or Jonathan), and Jaddua. Jaddua was high-priest in the time of Alexander the Great. Jaddua was succeeded by Onias I., his son, and he again by Simon the Just, the last of the men of the great synagogue. (JERUSALEM; SYNAGOGUE, THE GREAT.) Upon Simon's death, his son Onias being under age, Eleazar, Simon's brother, succeeded him. The high-priesthood of Eleazar is memorable as being that under which the LXX. version of the Scriptures (SEPTUAGINT) was made at Alexandria for Ptolemy Philadelphus, according to the account of Josephus taken from Aristæas. Viewed in its relation to Judaism and the high-priesthood, this translation was a sign, and perhaps a helping cause, of their decay. It marked a growing tendency to Hellenize, utterly inconsistent with the spirit of the Mosaic economy. What, however, for a time saved the Jewish institutions, was the cruel and impolitic persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes. The result was that after the high-priesthood had been brought to the lowest degradation by the apostasy and crimes of the last Onias or Menelaus, the son of Eleazar, and after a vacancy of seven years had followed the brief pontificate of Alcimus, his no less infamous successor, a new and glorious succession of high-priests arose in the Asmonean family (MACCABEES), who united the dignity of civil rulers, and for a time of independent sovereigns, to that of the high-priesthood. The Asmonean family were priests of the course of Jojarib, the first of the twenty-four courses (1 Chr. xxiv. 7), whose return from captivity is recorded 1 Chr. ix. 10; Neh. xi. 10. They were probably of the house of Eleazar, though this cannot be affirmed with certainty. This Asmonean dynasty lasted from B. C. 153, till the family was damaged by intestine divisions, and then destroyed by Herod the Great. Aristobulus, the last high-priest of his line, brother of Mariamne, was murdered by order of Herod, his brother-in-law, B. C. 35. There were no fewer than twenty-eight high-priests from the reign of Herod to the destruction of the Temple by Titus, a period of 107 years. The N. T. introduces us to some of these later and oft-changing high-priests, viz. Annas, Caiaphas, and Ananias. Theophilus, the son of Ananias, was the high-priest from whom Saul received letters to the synagogue at Damascus (Acts ix. 1, 14). Phannias, the last high-priest, was appointed by lot by the Zealots from the course of priests called by Josephus Eniachim (probably a corrupt reading for Jachim). The subjoined table shows the succession of high-priests, as far as it can be ascertained, and of the contemporary civil rulers:

* Highway (Lev. xxvi. 22; Judg. v. 6; 2 K. xviii. 17; Mat. xxii. 9, &c.). Roads of some kind apparently existed in Palestine at a very early period; but probably most of them were, as now, only narrow tracks, by which beasts of burden or travellers on foot pass from city to city. The law in regard to cities of refuge (CITY OF REFUGE) required ways to be kept open by which the manslayer might flee thither (Deut. xix. 3; see Talmud). The "king's highway" is mentioned (Num. xxi. 22); language derived from road-making is used (Is. xl. 3, 4, xlix. 11, lxii. 10, &c.); in some parts of the land, at least, carriages and chariots were used (CARRIAGE; CART; CHARIOT; WAGON); but for its best roads Palestine was indebted to the Romans. Traces of the Roman roads still remain; but for centuries little or no attention has been paid to road-making in Palestine. Instead of wheeled vehicles, we find horses, camels, and asses principally used for transportation. JERUSALEM.

Hil'en (Heb. fortress? Fū), a city of Judah allotted to the priests (1 Chr. vi. 58); = HOLON 1.

Hil-k'lah (fr. Heb. = portion of Jehovah, Ges.).

1. Father of ELIAKIM 1 (2 K. xviii. 18, 26, 37, xix. 2; Is. xxii. 20, xxxvi. 3, 11, 22, xxxvii. 2).—2. High-priest in the reign of Josiah (2 K. xxii. 4 ff.; 2 Chr. xxxiv. 9 ff.; 1 Esd. i. 8). According to the genealogy in 1 Chr. vi. 13 (A. V.) he was son of Shallum, and from Ezr. vii. 1, apparently the ancestor of Ezra the scribe. His high-priesthood was rendered particularly illustrious by the great reformation effected under it by King Josiah, by the solemn Passover kept at Jerusalem in the eighteenth year of that king's reign, and above all by the discovery which he made of the book of the law of Moses in the Temple. With regard to the latter, Kennicott is of opinion that it was the original autograph copy of the Pentateuch written by Moses which Hilkiyah found, but his argument is far from conclusive. A difficult and interesting question arises, What was the book found by Hilkiyah? Our means of answering this question seem to be limited, (1.) to an examination of the terms in which the depositing the book of the law by the ark was originally enjoined; (2.) to an examination of the contents of the book discovered by Hilkiyah, as far as they transpire; (3.) to any indications which may be gathered from the contemporary writings of Jeremiah, or from any other portions of Scripture. A consideration of all these points raises a strong probability that the book in question was the book of Deuteronomy (so Lord A. C. Hervey, De Wette, Gesenius, Rosenmüller, &c. Josephus, Le Clerc, Keil, Ewald, Lengerke, Haver-nick, &c., suppose it was the whole PENTATEUCH).—3. A Merarite Levite, son of Amzi (1 Chr. vi. 45, Heb. 30).—4. Another Merarite Levite, second son of Hosah (xxvi. 11).—5. One of those who stood on the right hand of Ezra when he read the law to the people; probably a priest (Neh. viii. 4). He may = the Hilkiyah who came up in the expedition with Jeshua and Zerubbabel (xii. 7).—6. A priest of Anathoth, father of the prophet Jeremiah (Jer. i. 1).—7. Father of Gemariah, who was one of Zedekiah's envoys to Babylon (Jer. xxix. 3).

Hill. The structure and characteristics of the hills of PALESTINE will be most conveniently noticed in the general description of the features of the country. The word "hill" has been employed in the A. V. as the translation of—1. Heb. gibē' dh, from a root which seems to have the force of curvature or humpishness. A word involving this idea is peculiarly applicable to the rounded hills of Palestine.—2. Heb. har, which has a much more extended sense than gibē' dh, meaning a whole district rather than an individual eminence, and to which our word "mountain" answers with tolerable accuracy. This translation of har by "hill" sometimes obscures the meaning of a passage where it is desirable that the topography should be unmistakable. For instance, in Ex. xxiv. 4, the "hill" is the same which is elsewhere, in the same chapter (12, 13, 18, &c.) and book, consistently and accurately rendered "mount" and "mountain." (MIZAR.) The country of the "hills" in Deut. i. 7; Josh. ix. 1, x. 40, xi. 16, is the elevated district of Judah, Benjamin, and Ephraim, which is correctly called "the mountain" in Num. xiii. 29, &c. In 2 K. i. 9 and iv. 27, the use of the word "hill" obscures the allusion to Carmel, which in other passages (e. g. 1 K. xviii. 19; 2 K. iv. 25) has the term "mount" correctly attached to it.—3. Heb. ma'leh, better "ascent," once (1 Sam. ix. 11). (MALEH-ACRABBIM).—4. Gr. bounos (Lk. iii. 5, xxiii. 30).—5. Gr. oros (Mat. v. 14; Lk. iv. 29), elsewhere "mountain" (Mat. iv. 8, v. 1, &c.) or "mount" (xxi. 1, &c.). The "hill" (Lk. ix. 37) = the "mountain" (ver. 28). In Lk. i. 39, 65, the "hill country" (Gr. hē oreinē) is the "mountain of Judah" frequently referred to in the O. T. JUDAH 1 (IV.).

Hil'el (Heb. praise, Ges.), a native of Pirathon in Mount Ephraim; father of ABDON, judge of Israel (Judg. xii. 13, 15).

Hin (Heb.). WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

Hind (Heb. ayyūlāh, ayyēlēth), the female of the common stag or Cervus Elaphus. (HART.) It is frequently noticed in the poetical parts of Scripture as emblematic of activity (Gen. xlix. 21; 2 Sam. xxii. 34; Ps. xviii. 33; Hab. iii. 19), gentleness (Prov. v. 19), feminine modesty (Cant. ii. 7, iii. 5), earnest longing (Ps. xlii. 1, "hart"), and maternal affection (Jer. xiv. 5). Its shyness and remoteness from the haunts of men are also alluded to (Job xxxix. 1), and its timidity, causing it to cast its young at the sound of thunder (Ps. xxix. 9). AIJE-LETH SHAHAR.

Hinge (Heb. pôth, tsir). Both ancient Egyptian and modern Oriental doors were and are hung by means of pivots turning in sockets both on the upper and lower sides (1 K. vii. 50). In Syria, and especially the Haurân, there are many ancient doors consisting of stone slabs with pivots carved out of the same piece, inserted in sockets above and below, and fixed during the building of the house. (GATE.) The allusion in Prov. xxvi. 14 is thus clearly explained.

Hinnom (Heb. lamentation? Ayre; full of goodness or favor, or endowed with goods, rich, Fû), Valley of, otherwise called "the valley of the son" or "children of Hinnom;" a deep and narrow ravine, with steep, rocky sides to the S. and W. of Jerusalem, about one mile and a half in length, separating Mount Zion to the N. from the "Hill of Evil Counsel," and the sloping rocky plateau of the "plain of Rephaim" to the S. (ACELDAMA; GIBBON.) The earliest mention of the Valley of Hinnom in the sacred writings is in Josh. xv. 8, xviii. 16, where the boundary-line between Judah and Benjamin is described as passing along the bed of the ravine. On the southern brow, overlooking the valley at its eastern extremity, Solomon erected high places for Molech (1 K. xi. 7), whose horrid rites were revived from time to time in the same vicinity by the later idolatrous kings. Ahaz and Manasseh made their children "pass through the fire" in this valley (2 K. xvi. 3; 2 Chr. xxviii. 3, xxxiii. 6), and the fiendish custom of infant sacrifice to the fire-gods seems to have been kept up in TOPHET, at its S. E. extremity, for a considerable period (Jer. vii. 31; 2 K. xxx. 10). To put an end to these abominations, the place was polluted by Josiah, who rendered it ceremonially unclean by spreading over it human bones, and other corruptions (2 K. xxiii. 10, 13, 14; 2 Chr. xxxiv. 4, 5), from which time it appears to have become the common cesspool of the city, into which its sewage was conducted, to be carried off by the waters of the Kidron, as well as a laystall, where all its solid filth was collected. From its ceremonial defilement, and from the detested and abominable fire of Molech, if not from the supposed ever-burning funeral-piles, the later Jews applied the name of this valley (Heb. Gêy Hinnôm), GEHENNA, to denote the place of eternal torment. (HELL.) The name by which it is now known is Wâdy Jehennam, or Wâdy er-Rubeh.

Hirah (Heb. noble birth, Ges.), an Adullamite, the friend of Judah (Gen. xxxviii. 1, 12; and see 20).

Hiram, or Hu'ram (both Heb. = noble, high-born, Ges.). 1. The king of Tyre who sent workmen and materials to Jerusalem, first (2 Sam. v. 11; 1 Chr. xiv. 1) to build a palace for David, whom he ever loved (1 K. v. 1), and again (v. 10; 2 Chr. ii. 14, 16) to build the Temple for Solomon, with whom he had a treaty of peace and commerce (1 K. v. 11, 12). The contempt with which he received Solomon's present of Cabul (ix. 12) does not appear to have caused any breach between the two kings. He admitted Solomon's ships, issuing from Joppa, to a share in the profitable trade of the Mediterranean (x. 22); and Jewish sailors, under the guidance of Tyrians, were taught to bring the gold of Ophir (ix. 26) to Solomon's two harbors on the Red Sea. Diodorus, the Phenician historian, and Menander of Ephesus assign to Hiram a prosperous reign of thirty-four years; and relate that his father was Abibal, his son and successor Balazar. Others relate that Hiram, besides supplying timber for the Temple, gave his daughter in marriage to Solomon.—2. A man of mixed race (vii. 13, 40, 45), the principal artificer sent by King Hiram to Solomon. HANDICRAFT; HURAM; TEMPLE.

Hircahus (L. fr. Gr.), "a son of Tobias," who had a large treasure placed for security in the treasury of the Temple at the time of the visit of HELIODORUS (about 187 B. C.; 2 Mc. iii. 11).

* Hire'ling = one who serves for hire. SERVANT.

* Hir'om (1 K. vii. 40 margin) = HIRAM 2.

* Hittite (fr. Heb.) = descendant of HETH. HITTITE.

Hittites (fr. Heb.) Hitt or Chitti, pl. Hittim or Chittim, the = the nation descended from HETH, the second son of Canaan. Our first introduction to the Hittites is in the time of Abraham, when he bought, from the "sons" or "children of Heth," the field and the cave of Machpelah, belonging to Ephron the Hittite. They were then settled at the town which was afterward, under its new name of HELKON, to become one of the most famous cities of Palestine, then bearing the name of Kirjath-arba, and perhaps also of Mamre (Gen. xxiii. 19, xxv. 9). The propensities of the tribe appear at that time to have been rather commercial than military. As Ewald well says, Abraham chose his allies in warfare from the Amorites, but he goes to the Hittites for his grave. But the tribe was evidently as yet but small, not important enough to be noticed beside "the Canaanite and the Perizzite" who shared the bulk of the land between them (Gen. xii. 6, xiii. 7). Throughout the book of Exodus, the name of the Hittites occurs only in the usual formula for the occupants of the Promised Land. From this time their quiet habits vanish, and they take their part against the invader, in equal alliance with the other Canaanite tribes (Josh. ix. 1, xi. 3, &c.). Henceforward the notices of the Hittites are very few and faint. The individual Hittites mentioned in the Bible are—ADAH (Gen. xxxvi. 2), AHIMELECH (1 Sam. xxvi. 6), BASHEMATH (Gen. xxvi. 34), BEERI, ELON, EPHRON (xxiii. 10, &c.), JUDITH (xxvi. 34), URIAH (2 Sam. xi. 3 ff., xxiii. 39, &c.), ZOHAR (Gen. xxiii. 8). The Egyptian annals tell us of a very powerful confederacy of Hittites in the valley of the Orontes, with whom Sether I., or Sethos, waged war about B. C. 1340, and whose capital, Ketesh, situate near Emesa, he conquered. In the Assyrian inscriptions, as lately deciphered, there are frequent references to a nation of Khatti, whose territory also lay in the valley of the Orontes, and who were sometimes assisted by the people of the sea-coast, probably the Phenicians. If the identification of these people with the Hittites should prove to be correct, it affords a clew to the meaning of some passages which are otherwise puzzling (Josh. i. 4; Judg. i. 26; 1 K. x. 29; 2 K. vii. 6; 2 Chr. i. 17). HIAI.

Hi'vite, pl. Hi'vites (fr. Heb. Hivvi or Chivvi = dweller in an encampment or nomadic village, Fñ., Ges. doubtfully; inhabitant of the interior or midland, Ewald), the. The name is, in the original, uniformly found in the singular number. In the genealogical tables of Genesis, "the Hivite" is named as one of the descendants—the sixth in order—of Canaan, the son of Ham (Gen. x. 17; 1 Chr. i. 15). In the first enumeration of the nations who, at the time of the call of Abraham, occupied the Promised Land (Gen. xv. 19–21), the Hivites are omitted from the Hebrew text. The name is also absent in the report of the spies (Num. xiii. 29). Perhaps this is owing to the then insignificance of the Hivites. The name constantly occurs in the formula by which the country is designated in the earlier books (Ex. iii. 8, 17, &c.), and also in the later ones (1 K. ix. 20; 2 Chr. viii. 7). We first encounter the actual people of the Hivites at Jacob's return to Canaan. Shechem was then in their possession, Hamor the Hivite being the "prince of the land" (Gen. xxxiv. 2). They were at this time, to judge of them by their rulers, a warm and impetuous people, credulous and easily deceived by the crafty and cruel sons of Jacob. The narrative further exhibits them as peaceful and commercial, given to "trade" (10, 21), and to the acquiring of "possessions" of cattle and other "wealth" (10, 23, 28, 29). We next meet with the Hivites during the conquest of Canaan (Josh. ix. 7, xi. 19). (GIBEX.) Their character is now in some respects materially altered. They are still evidently averse to fighting, but they have acquired—possibly by long experience in traffic—an amount of craft which they did not before possess, and which enables them to turn the tables on the Israelites in a highly successful manner (Josh. ix. 3–27). The main body of the Hivites, however, were at this time living on the northern confines of Western Palestine—"under Hermon, in the land of Mizpeh" (Josh. xi. 3)—"in Mount Lebanon, from Mount Baal-Hermon to the entering in of Hamath" (Judg. iii. 3, comp. 2 Sam. xxiv. 7). AVIM.

Hiz-ki'ah (fr. Heb. = HEZEKIAH), an ancestor of Zephaniah the prophet (Zeph. i. 1).

Hiz-ki'jah (Heb. = HEZEKIAH), according to the A. V. a man who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 17). But there is no doubt that the name should be taken with that preceding it, as "Ater-Hizkijah" = "Ater of Hezekiah." ATER 2.

Hobab (Heb. beloved, Ges.). This name is found in two places only (Num. x. 29; Judg. iv. 11), and it seems doubtful whether it denotes the father-in-law of Moses, or his son, i. e. Moses' brother-in-law. (1.) In favor of the latter are (a.) the express statement that Hobab was "the son of Raguel" (Num. x. 29); Raguel or Reuel being identified with JETHRO, not only in Ex. ii. 18 (comp. iii. 1, &c.), but also by Josephus. (b.) The fact that Jethro had some time previously left the Israelite camp to return to his own country (Ex. xviii. 27). (2.) In favor of Hobab's identity with Jethro are (a.) the words of Judg. iv. 11; but this is of later date than the other, and altogether a more casual statement. (b.) Josephus, in speaking of Raguel, remarks that he "had Iothor (i. e. Jethro) for a surname." The Mohammedan traditions favor the identity of Hobab with Jethro. But whether Hobab was the father-in-law of Moses or not, the notice of him in Num. x. 29–32, though brief, is full of point and interest. While Jethro is preserved to us as the wise and practised administrator, Hobab appears as the experienced Bedouin sheikh, to whom Moses looked for the material safety of his cumbersome caravan in the new and difficult ground before them.

Hobab (Heb. hidden, hiding-place, Ges.), the place to which Abraham pursued the kings who had pillaged Sodom (Gen. xiv. 15). It was situated "to the N. of Damascus." Arab tradition makes the village of Burzeh, three miles N. of Damascus, the place where Abraham offered thanks to God after the discomfiture of the kings. The Jews of Damascus affirm that the village of Jöbar, about three miles N. E. of Damascus = Hobab.

Hod (Heb. splendor, majesty, Ges.), a son of Zophah, and chieftain of Asher (1 Chr. vii. 37).

Hod-dal'ah, or Hod-a-l'ah (fr. Heb. = praise ye Jehovah? Ges.), son of Elioenai, of the royal line of Judah (1 Chr. iii. 24). GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST.

Hod-a-vi'ah (fr. Heb. = HODAVIAH, Ges.). 1. A man of Manasseh, one of the heads of the half-tribe E. of Jordan (1 Chr. v. 24).—2. A man of Benjamin, son of Has-senuah (1 Chr. ix. 7).—3. A Levite, who seems to have given his name to an important family in the tribe (Ezr. ii. 40); = HODEVAH and JUDAH 3?

Hodesh (Heb. the new moon, a month, Ges.), a woman named in the genealogies of Benjamin (1 Chr. viii. 9) as the wife of Shaharaim.

Hod-e'vah (Heb. = HODIJAH, Ges.) = HODAVIAH 3 (Neh. vii. 43).

Hod-i'ah (fr. Heb. = HODIJAH), one of the two wives of Ezra, a man of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 19); doubtless = JEHUDIJAH in verse 18.

Hod-i'jah (Heb. splendor of Jehovah, Ges.). 1. A Levite in the time of Ezra and Nehemiah (Neh. viii. 7; probably also ix. 5, x. 10).—2. Another Levite at the same time (x. 13).—3. A layman, one of the "heads" of the people at the same time (x. 18).

Hog'lah (Heb. partridge, Ges.), the third of the five daughters of ZELOPHEHAD (Num. xxvi. 33, xxvii. 1, xxxvi. 11; Josh. xvii. 3). HEIR.

Ho'ham (Heb. probably = whom Jehovah impels, Ges.), king of Hebron at the conquest of Canaan (Josh. x. 3).

* Hold = a fortress or place held by a GARRISON (Judg. ix. 46, 49, &c.; 1 Sam. xxii. 4, 5, &c.). TOWER; WAR.

* Hete. CAVE.

Holm'-tree [home-] (Gr. pinos; L. ilex), a species of oak, named only in Sus. 58. (DANIEL, APOCRYPHAL ADDITIONS to.) The Gr. pinos of Theophrastus and Dioscorides no doubt = the Quercus coccifera. The L. ilex was applied both to the holmoak (Q. ilex) and to the Kermes-oak (Q. coccifera).

Hol-o-fer'nes [-neez] (Gr. Olophurnes, probably fr. Pers., but the meaning uncertain), according to Jd. ii. 4, &c., a general of Nebuchadnezzar, king of the Assyrians, who was slain by JUDITH during the siege of Bethulia.

Holon (Heb. sandy, Ges.). 1. A town in the mountains of Judah, allotted to the priests; named between Goshen and Giloh, in the group with Debir (Josh. xv. 51, xxi. 15); = HILEN.—2. A city of Moab (Jer. xlviii. 21 only). No identification of it has yet taken place.

* Ho'ly Chil'dren, The Song of the Three. DANIEL, APOCRYPHAL ADDITIONS to.

* Ho'ly Spir'it. SPIRIT, THE HOLY.

Ho'mam (Heb. destruction, Ges.), an Edomite (1 Chr. i. 39), = HEMAM.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

Honey [hun'ny] usually = Heb. dēbash, or Gr. meli. The Heb. nópheth tsúphim is translated in Ps. xix. 10 (Heb. 11) "the honey-comb," margin (and so Gesenius) "the dropping of honey-combs," i. e. honey dropping from the combs: tsúph dēbash is also translated "honey-comb" (Prov. xvi. 24); nópheth (= a sprinkling, dropping, sc. of honey, Ges.) is translated "honey-comb" (v. 3, xxiv. 13, xxvii. 7; Cant. iv. 11); ya'ar (Cant. v. 1) or ya'arath had-dēbash (1 Sam. xiv. 27) (= the redundance, or overflowing, or dropping of honey, Ges.; see above) is translated "honey-comb." The Gr. melission kérion = "honey-comb" in Lk. xxiv. 42.—The Heb. dēbash, in the first place, = the product of the BEE, to which we exclusively give the name of honey. All travellers agree in describing Palestine as a land "flowing with milk and honey" (Ex. iii. 8); bees being abundant even in the remote parts of the wilderness, where they deposit their honey in the crevices of the rocks or in hollow trees. In some parts of Northern Arabia the hills are so well stocked with bees, that no sooner are hives placed than they are occupied. In the second place dēbash = a decoction of the juice of the grape, which is still called dibs, and which forms an article of commerce in the East; it was this, and not ordinary bee-honey, which Jacob sent to Joseph (Gen. xliii. 11), and which the Tyrians purchased from Palestine (Ez. xxvii. 17) (so Mr. Bevan, Gesenius, &c.). A third kind has been described by some writers as "vegetable" honey, by which is meant the exudations of certain trees and shrubs, such as the Tamarix mannifera, found in the peninsula of Sinai, or the stunted oaks of Luristan and Mesopotamia. The honey, which Jonathan ate in the wood (1 Sam. xiv. 25), and the "wild honey" (Gr. meli agrion), which supported John the Baptist (Mat. iii. 4), have been referred to this species. But it was probably the honey of the wild bees. A fourth kind is described by Josephus, as being manufactured from the juice of the date. Food.

* Hood. DRESS; HEAD-DRESS.

Hook, Hooks. Various kinds of hooks are noticed in the Bible, of which the following are the most important.—1. Fishing-hooks (FISH) (Heb. tsinnáh, sir, haccáh or chaardh) (Am. iv. 2; Job xli. 1; Is. xix. 8; Hab. i. 15 [A. V. "angle" in the two last]); Gr. angkiatron (Mat. xvii. 27).—2. Heb. hóah or chóach, properly = a ring (A. V. "thorn") placed through the mouth of a large fish and attached by a cord to a stake for the purpose of keeping it alive in the water (Job xli. 2); the Heb. ag-món meaning the cord is rendered "hook" in the A. V.—3. Heb. hah or chach and hóah or chóach, A. V. "hook" (2 K. xix. 28; Is. xxxvii. 29; Ez. xxix. 4, xxxviii. 4), properly = a ring, such as in our country is placed through the nose of a bull, and similarly used in the East for leading about lions (Ez. xix. 4, 9, where the A. V. has "with or 'in' chains"), camels and other animals. A similar method was adopted for leading prisoners, as in the case of Manasseh, who was led with rings (2 Chr. xxxiii. 11; A. V. "in the thorns"). Illustrations of this practice are found in Assyrian sculptures, which represent the king holding a bridle or cords attached to rings in the lips of captives. (WAR, cut).—4. The hooks of the pillars of the Tabernacle (Heb. pl. vávim; Ex. xxvi. 32, 37, xxvii.

10 ff., xxxvi. 36, 38, xxxviii. 10 ff.).—5. Heb. mazmárdh = a vinedresser's "pruning-hook" (Is. ii. 4, xviii. 5; Mic. iv. 3; Joel iii. 10).—6. Heb. maz'ég, miz'ágdh = a "flesh-hook" for getting up the joints of meat out of the boiling-pot (Ex. xxvii. 3; 1 Sam. ii. 13, 14, &c.; see ALTAR).—7. Heb. shiphattayim, probably = "hooks" used for hanging up animals to flay them (Ez. xl. 43).

Hophni (Heb. a fighter) and Phineas, the two sons of ELI, who fulfilled their hereditary sacerdotal duties at Shiloh. Their brutal rapacity and lust, which seemed to acquire fresh violence with their father's increasing years (1 Sam. ii. 22, 12–17), filled the people with disgust and indignation, and provoked the curse pronounced against their father's house first by an unknown prophet (27–36), and then by Samuel (iii. 11–14). They were both cut off in one day in the flower of their age, and the ark which they had accompanied to battle against the Philistines was lost on the same occasion (iv. 10, 11).

Hor (Heb., an archaic form of har = mountain, Ges., Fū., &c.), Mount. 1. The mountain on which Aaron died (Num. xx. 25, 27; Deut. xxxii. 50). The few facts given in the Bible regarding Mount Hor are soon told. It was "on the boundary-line" (Num. xx. 23) or "at the edge" (xxxiii. 37) of the land of Edom. It was the halting-place of the people next after Kadesh (xx. 22, xxxiii. 37), and they quitted it for Zalmonah (xxxiii. 41) in the road to the Red Sea (xxi. 4). During the encampment at Kadesh, Aaron, at Jehovah's command, ascended the mount with his brother and his son; the garments and office of high-priest were taken from Aaron and put upon Eleazar; and Aaron died there in the top of the mount. Mount Hor is situated on the E. side of the great valley of the ARABAH, the highest and most conspicuous of the whole range of the sandstone mountains of EDOM, having close beneath it on its E. side the mysterious city of Petra. The tradition has existed from the earliest date. It is now the Jebel Nebi Harun, "the mountain of the Prophet Aaron." Mr. Wilton (The Negeb, 126 ff.) rejects this tradition, and makes Mount Hor = Jebel Modera, on the other side of the Arabah; but most travellers and scholars accept the traditional site. Of the geological formation of the traditional Mount Hor we have no very trustworthy accounts. The general structure of the range of Edom, of which it forms the most prominent feature, is now red sandstone, displaying itself to an enormous thickness. Mount Hor itself is said to be entirely sandstone, in very horizontal strata. Its height, according to the latest measurements, is 4,800 feet (Eng.) above the Mediterranean, i. e. about 1,700 feet above the town of Petra, 4,000 above the level of the Arabah, and more than 6,000 above the Dead Sea. The mountain is marked far and near by its double top, which rises like a huge castellated building from a lower base, and is surmounted by a circular dome of the tomb of Aaron, a distinct white spot on the dark-red surface of the mountain. The impression received on the spot is that Aaron's death took place in the small basin between the two peaks, and that the people were stationed either on the plain at the base of the peaks, or at that part of the Wady Abu-Kusheibeh from which the top is commanded. The chief interest of Mount Hor will always consist in the widely-extended prospect from its summit—the last view of Aaron—that view which was to him what Pisgah was to his brother.—2. A mountain, entirely distinct from the preceding, named in Num. xxxiv. 7, 8 only, as one of the marks of the northern boundary of the land which the children of Israel were about to conquer. The identification of this mountain has always been one of the puzzles of

Ho'rite, pl. Ho'rites, Ho'rim, Ho'rims (Heb. Hôri or Chôri, pl. Hôrim or Chôrim = dwellers in caverns, troglodytes, Ges., Fû.), terms applied to the aboriginal inhabitants of Mount Seir (Gen. xiv. 6), and probably allied to the Emims and Rephaims.

They were smitten by the kings of the East. Their genealogy is given in Gen. xxxvi. 20-30 and 1 Chr. i. 38-42. They were exterminated by the Edomites (Deut. ii. 12, 22). Their excavated dwellings are still found in hundreds in the sandstone cliffs and mountains of Edom, and especially in Petra.

Hormah (Heb. place desolated, Ges.), or Ze'phath (Judg. i. 17), was the chief town of a king of a Canaanitish tribe on the S. of Palestine, which was reduced by Joshua (Josh. xii. 14), and became a city of the territory of Judah (xv. 30; 1 Sam. xxx. 30), but apparently belonged to Simeon (Josh. xix. 4; 1 Chr. iv. 30). The seeming inconsistency between Num. xxi. 3 and Judg. i. 17 may be relieved by supposing that the vow made at the former period was fulfilled at the latter, and the name given by anticipation. The Amalekites, &c., pursued the defeated Israelites to Hormah (Num. xiv. 45; Deut. i. 44).

Horn (Heb. keren; Gr. keras), primarily, the hard, projecting, pointed organ growing, commonly in pairs, on the heads of certain animals, as oxen, goats, rams, deer, &c., and often used as a weapon of defence or offence. I. Literal (Gen. xxii. 13; Ex. xxi. 29; Deut. xxxiii. 17; Dan. vii. 7 ff., viii. 3 ff.; Josh. vi. 4, 5; compare Ex. xix. 13; 1 Sam. xvi. 1, 13; 1 K. i. 39; Job xlii. 14, &c.). Two purposes are mentioned in the Scriptures to which the horn seems to have been applied. Trumpets were probably at first merely horns perforated at the tip, such as are still used in many places for calling home farm-laborers, &c., at meal-time. (CORNET.) The word horn also = a flask, or vessel made of horn, containing oil (1 Sam. xvi. 1, 13; 1 K. i. 39), or used as a kind of toilet-bottle, filled with the preparation of antimony with which women tinged their eyelashes. (PAINT.)—II. Metaphorical. 1. From similarity of form. To this use belongs the application of the word horn to a trumpet of metal. "Horns of ivory" (Ez. xxvii. 15) = elephants' teeth. The horns of the altar (ALTAR; Ex. xxvii. 2) are not supposed to have been made of horn, but to have been metallic projections from the four corners. The peak or summit of a hill was called a horn (Is. v. 1, margin). In Hab. iii. 4 "horns coming out of his hand" = rays of light. 2. From similarity of position and use. Two principal applications of this metaphor will be found—strength and honor. Of strength the horn of the unicorn was the most frequent representative (Deut. xxxiii. 17, &c.), but not always; compare 1 K. xxii. 11, where probably horns of iron, worn defiantly and symbolically on the head, are intended. Among the Druses upon Mount Lebanon the married women wear silver horns on their heads. In the sense of honor, the word horn stands for the abstract (my horn, Job xvi. 15; all the horns [A. V.

Sacred Geography. The Mediterranean was the western boundary. The northern boundary started from the sea; the first point in it was Mount Hor, and the second the entrance of Hamath. The entrance of HAMATH seems to have been determined by Mr. Porter as the pass at Kalat el-Husn, close to Huma, the ancient Hamath—at the other end of the range of Lebanon. Surely "Mount Hor" then = the great chain of Lebanon itself, the natural northern boundary of the country (so Mr. Grove).

Ho'ram (Heb. height, Ges.), king of GEZER at the conquest of the southwestern part of Palestine (Josh. x. 33).

Ho'reb (Heb. dry, desert, Ges.) (Ex. iii. 1, xvii. 6, xxxiii. 6; Deut. i. 2, 6, 19, iv. 10, 15, v. 2, ix. 8, xviii. 16, xxix. 1; 1 K. viii. 9, xix. 8; 2 Chr. v. 10; Ps. cvi. 19; Mal. iv. 4; Eccles. xlviii. 7). SINAI.

Ho'rem (Heb. devoted, Ges.), one of the fortified places in Naphtali; named with Iron and Migdal-el (Josh. xix. 38). Van de Velde suggests Hûrah, near Yârôn (Iron?), as the site of Horem.

Hor-ha-gid'gad (Heb. Mount Gidgad, LXX., Vulg.; hole of thunder? Ges.), a desert station where the Israelites encamped (Num. xxxiii. 32), probably = GUDGODAH (Deut. x. 7). (DEUTERONOMY, B. I. 5.) On the W. side of the Arabah, about forty-five miles N. W. of 'Akabah, Robinson (i. 181) has a broad sandy Wady Ghudhâghidh (Ar. = diminutions), the junction of which with the Arabah would not be unsuitable. Mr. Wilton suggests that Hor-hagidgad may be a conspicuous conical mountain, Jebel 'Arâif en-Nâkah, about twenty miles further N., and Gudgodah a valley near it.

Ho'ri (Heb. a dweller in caverns, troglodyte, Ges.; noble, free, Fû.). 1. A Horite, son of Lotan, the son of Seir (Gen. xxxvi. 22; 1 Chr. i. 39).—2. In Gen. xxxvi. 30, "Hori" has in the original the article prefixed = the Horite; and is the same word with that which in verses 21, 29, is rendered in the A. V. "the Horites".—3. A man of Simeon; father of Shaphat (Num. xiii. 5).

horn] of Israel, Lam. ii. 3), and so for the supreme authority. It also stands for the concrete, whence it = king, kingdom (Dan. viii. 2, &c.; Zech. i. 18). Out of either or both of these last two metaphors sprang the idea of representing gods with horns.

Heads of modern Asiatics ornamented with horns.

Hor'net. That the Hebrew tsir'dh = the hornet, may be taken for granted on the almost unanimous authority of the ancient versions. Not only were bees exceedingly numerous in Palestine, but from the name ZOREAH (Josh. xv. 33) we may infer that hornets in particular infested some parts of the country. In Scripture the hornet is referred to only as the means which Jehovah employed for the extirpation of the Canaanites (Ex. xxiii. 28; Deut. vii. 20; Josh. xxiv. 12; Wis. xii. 8). Some commentators (Bochart, Rosenmüller, Bush, &c.) regard the word as used in its literal sense, but it more probably (so Mr. Bevan, Michaelis, Gesenius, &c.) expresses under a vivid image the consternation with which Jehovah would inspire the enemies of the Israelites, as declared in Deut. ii. 25 and Josh. ii. 11.

Hor-o-na'im (Heb. two caverns), a town of Moab, possibly a sanctuary, named with Zor and Luhith (Is. xv. 5; Jer. xlviii. 3, 5, 34). No clue is afforded to its position, either by the notices of the Bible or by mention in other works. It seems to have been on an eminence, and approached by a road which is styled the "way" (Is. xv. 5), or the "descent" (Jer. xlviii. 5).

Hor'o-nite, or Ho'ron-ite (fr. Heb. = one from HORONAIM, Ges.; one from BETH-HORON, Fii.), the designation of Sanballat (Neh. ii. 10, 19, xiii. 28).

Horse (see below). The most striking feature in the Biblical notices of the horse (Equus caballus of naturalists) is the exclusive application of it to warlike operations; in no instance is that useful animal employed for ordinary locomotion or agriculture, if we except Is. xxviii. 28, where we learn that horses (A. V. "horsemen") were employed in threshing, not, however, in that case put in the gears, but simply driven about wildly over the strewed grain. This remark will be found to be borne out by the historical passages hereafter quoted; but it is equally striking in the poetical parts of Scripture. The animated description of the horse in Job xxxix. 19-25 applies solely to the war-horse. The terms under which the horse is described in Hebrew are usually sus and pardah. There is a marked distinction between the sus and the pardah; the former were horses for driving in the war-chariot, of a heavy build, the latter were for riding, and particularly for cavalry. This distinction is not observed in the A. V., from the circumstance that pardah also signifies horseman; the correct sense is essential in the following passages—1 K. iv. 26, "forty thousand chariot-horses and twelve thousand cavalry-horses;" Ez. xxvii. 14, "driving-horses and riding-horses;" Joel ii. 4, "as riding-horses, so shall they run;" and Is. xxi. 7, "a train of horses in couples." In addition to these terms, the Heb. recessh = a swift horse, used for the royal post (Esth. viii. 10, 14) and similar purposes (1 K. iv. 28; A. V. "dromedary" as also in Esth.), or for a rapid journey (Mic. i. 13); ramm-âc once = a mare (Esth. viii. 10); susâh, in Cant. i. 9, is regarded in the A. V. as a collective term, "company of horses;" it rather means, according to the received punctuation, my mare, but still better, by a slight alteration in the punctuation, mares. In the N. T., the Gr. hippos = "horse" and the derivatives hippus and hippikon are applied to "horsemen." The Hebrews in the patriarchal age, as a pastoral race, did not stand in need of the services of the horse, and for a long period after their settlement in Canaan they dispensed with it, partly in consequence of the hilly nature of the country, which only admitted of the use of chariots in certain localities (Judg. i. 19), and partly in consequence of the prohibition in Deut. xvii. 16. (ARMY; CHARIOT; MARGOG.) David first established a force of cavalry and chariots after the defeat of Hadadezer (2 Sam. viii. 4). But the great supply of horses was subsequently effected by Solomon through his connection with Egypt (1 K. iv. 26). Solomon also established a very active trade in horses, which were brought by dealers out of Egypt and resold at a profit to the Hittites, who lived between Palestine and the Euphrates (1 K. x. 28, 29). In the countries adjacent to Palestine, the use of the horse was much more frequent. It was introduced into Egypt probably by the Hyksos (Shepherd kings), as it is not represented on the monuments before the eighteenth dynasty. The Jewish kings sought the assistance of the Egyptians against the Assyrians in this respect (Is. xxxi. 1, xxxvi. 8; Ez. xvii. 15). But the cavalry of the Assyrians and other Eastern nations was regarded as most formidable; the horses themselves were highly bred, as the Assyrian sculptures still testify, and fully merited the praise bestowed on them in Hab. i. 8. With regard to the trappings and management of the horse we have little information; the bridle (Heb. reman) was placed over the horse's nose (Is. xxx. 28), and a bit

(Heb. metheg; Gr. chalinos) or curb is also mentioned (2 K. xix. 28; Ps. xxxii. 9; Prov. xxvi. 3; Is. xxxvii. 29; in the A. V. incorrectly given "bridle," except in Ps. xxxii. and Jas. iii. 3). The harness of the Assyrian horses was profusely decorated, the bits being gilt (1 Esd. iii. 6), and the bridles adorned with tassels; on the neck was a collar terminating in a bell, as described in Zech. xiv. 20. Saddles were not used until a late period. The horses were not shod, and therefore hoofs as hard "as flint" (Is. v. 28) were regarded as a great merit. The chariot-horses were covered with embroidered trappings (Ez. xxvii. 20). Horses and chariots were used also in idolatrous processions, as noticed in regard to the sun (2 K. xxiii. 11).

* Horse-gate, a gate of JERUSALEM (2 Chr. xxiii. 15; Neh. iii. 28; Jer. xxxi. 40); probably belonging to the wall which enclosed the Temple (Ges.).

* Horse-leech (Heb. 'alūkāh) occurs once only, viz. Prov. xxx. 15. There is little, if any, doubt that 'alūkāh denotes some species of leech, or rather is the generic term for any bloodsucking annelid, such as Hirudo (the medicinal leech), Hæmopsis (the horseleech), Limnatis, Trocheta, and Aulastoma, if all these genera are found in the marshes and pools of the Bible-lands. The bloodsucking leeches, such as Hirudo and Hæmopsis, were without a doubt known to the ancient Hebrews, and as the leech has been for ages the emblem of rapacity and cruelty, there is no reason to question that this annelid is denoted by 'alūkāh. The Arabs to this day denominate the Limnatis Nilotica, 'alak. The expression "two daughters" figuratively denotes its bloodthirsty propensity.

* Horse-man. ARMY; HORSE.

* Hō'sah (Heb. taking refuge, or a refuge, Ges.), a city of Asher (Josh. xix. 29), the next landmark on the boundary to Tyre.

* Hō'sah (Heb., see above), a Merarite Levite, one of the first door-keepers to the ark after its arrival in Jerusalem (1 Chr. xxvi. 10, 33).

* Hō'sai (Heb. Hōzai or Chōzai = seer, Ges.), in the margin of 2 Chr. xxxiii. 19, "the seers" in the text. Gesenius, Fürst, &c., make it the proper name of a person.

* Hō'sin'na [-zan-] (Gr. fr. Heb. = save now; save, we pray), the cry of the multitude as they thronged in our Lord's triumphal procession into Jerusalem (Mat. xxi. 9, 15; Mk. xi. 9, 10; Jn. xii. 13). The Psalm from which it was taken, the 118th, was one with which they were familiar, from being accustomed to recite the 25th and 26th verses at the Feast of Tabernacles. On that occasion the Hallel, consisting of Psalms cxiii.-cxviii., was chanted by one of the priests, and at certain intervals the multitudes joined in the responses, waving their branches of willow and palm, and shouting, as they waved them, HALLELUJAH, or Hosanna, or "O Lord, I beseech thee, send now prosperity" (Ps. cxviii. 25). On each of the seven days of the feast the people thronged in the court of the Temple, and went in procession about the altar, setting their boughs bending toward it; the trumpets sounding as they shouted Hosanna. It was not uncommon for the Jews in later times to employ the observances of this feast, to express their feelings on other occasions of rejoicing (1 Mc. xiii. 51; 2 Mc. x. 6, 7).

* Hō-se'a [-zee'ah] (Heb. = HOSEEA), son of Beeri, and first of the Minor Prophets, as they appear in the A. V. (BIBLE; CANON.)—Time. This question must be settled, as far as it can be settled, partly by reference to the title, partly by an inquiry into the contents of the book. For the beginning of Hosea's ministry the title gives us the reign of Uzziah, king of Judah, but limits this vague definition by reference to Jeroboam II., king of Israel; it therefore yields a date not later than B. C. 783. The pictures of social and political life which Hosea draws so forcibly are rather applicable to the interregnum after the death of Jeroboam (B. C. 782-772), and to the reign of the succeeding kings. (ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF.) It seems almost certain that very few of his prophecies were written until after Jeroboam's death (B. C. 783), and probably the life, or rather the prophetic career, of Hosea extended from B. C. 784 to B. C. 725, a period of fifty-nine years.—Place. There seems to be a general consent among commentators that the prophecies of Hosea were delivered in the kingdom of Israel.—Tribe and Parentage. Tribe quite unknown. The Pseudo-Epiphanius, it is uncertain upon what ground, assigns Hosea to the tribe of Issachar. Of his father Beeri we know absolutely nothing.—Order in the Prophetic series. Most ancient and mediæval interpreters make Hosea the first of the prophets. But by moderns he is generally assigned the third place. It is perhaps more important to know that Hosea must have been more or less contemporary with Isaiah, Amos, Jonah, Joel, and Nahum.—Division of the Book. It is easy to recognize two great divisions, which, accordingly, have been generally adopted: (1.) chap. i. to iii.; (2.) iv. to vi. The subdivision of these several parts is a work of greater difficulty: that of Eichhorn will be found to be based upon a highly subtle, though by no means precarious, criticism. (1.) According to him, the first division should be subdivided into three separate poems, each originating in a distinct aim, and each after its own fashion attempting to express the idolatry of Israel by imagery borrowed from the matrimonial relation. The first, and therefore the least elaborate of these, is contained in chap. iii., the second in i. 2-11, the third in i. 2-9, and ii. 1-23. These three are progressively elaborate developments of the same reiterated idea. Chap. i. 2-9 is common to the second and third poems, but not repeated with each severally. (2.) Attempts have been made by Wells, Eichhorn, &c., to subdivide the second part of the book. These divisions are made either according to reigns of contemporary kings, or according to the subject-matter of the poem. The former course has been adopted by Wells, who gets five, the latter by Eichhorn, who gets sixteen poems out of this part of the book. These prophecies were probably collected by Hosea himself toward the end of his career.—Hosea's marriage with Gomer has its literal and its allegorical interpreters. For the literal view we have the majority of the Fathers, and of the ancient and mediæval interpreters, Horsley, Lowth, Henderson, Pusey, Kurtz, &c. For the allegorical are the Chaldee Paraphrase, some Rabbins, Origen's school, Junius, and the bulk of modern commentators. Eichhorn shows that marrying a harlot is not necessarily implied by "a wife of whoredoms," which may very well = a wife who, after marriage, becomes an adulteress, though chaste before. He also observes the unfitness of a wife unchaste before marriage to be a type of Israel.—References in N. T. Mat. ix. 13, xii. 7 to Hos. vi. 6; Lk. xxiii. 30, Rev. vi. 16, Hos. x. 8; Mat. ii. 15, Hos. xi. 1; Rom. ix. 25, 26, 1 Pet. ii. 10, Hos. i. 10, ii. 23; 1 Cor. xv. 4, Hos. vi. 2; Heb. xiii. 15 Hos.

xiv. 2.—Style. Commentators agree that, of all the prophets, he is, in point of language, the most obscure and hard to be understood. His heart seems to have been so full and fiery, that it might well burst through all restraints of diction.

Ho-shal'ah, or Hosh-a-l'ah (fr. Heb. = whom Jehovah helps, Ges.). 1. A man who led the princes of Judah in the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem, rebuilt by Nehemiah (Neh. xii. 32).—2. Father of Jezaniah, or Azariah, who was a man of note after the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar (Jer. xlii. 1, xliii. 2).

Hosh'a-ma (Heb. whom Jehovah hears, Ges.), a son of king Jeconiah, or Jehoiachin (1 Chr. iii. 18).

Ho-she'a (Heb. deliverance, safety, Ges.; = Hosea). 1. The son of Nun, i. e. JOSHUA 1 (Deut. xxxii. 44). (OSHEA).—2. The nineteenth, last, and best king of Israel. (ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF) He succeeded Pekah, whom he slew in a successful conspiracy, thereby fulfilling Is. vii. 16. Although Josephus calls Hoshea a friend of Pekah, we have no ground for calling this a treacherous murder. It took place B. C. 737, in the twentieth year of Jotham (2 K. xv. 30), i. e. "in the twentieth year after Jotham became sole king," for he only reigned sixteen years (xv. 33). But there must have been an interregnum of at least eight years before Hoshea came to the throne, B. C. 729, in the twelfth year of Ahaz (xvii. 1). It is expressly stated (xvii. 2) that Hoshea was not so sinful as his predecessors. In the third year of his reign (B. C. 726) Shalmaneser cruelly stormed the strong caves of Beth-arbel (Hos. viii. 14), and made Israel tributary (2 K. xvii. 3) for three years. At the end of this period, encouraged perhaps by the revolt of Hezekiah, Hoshea entered into a secret alliance with So, king of Egypt, to throw off the Assyrian yoke. The alliance did him no good; it was revealed to the court of Nineveh by the Assyrian party in Ephraim, and Hoshea was immediately seized as a rebellious vassal, shut up in prison, and apparently treated with the utmost indignity (Mic. v. 1). Of the subsequent fortunes of Hoshea we know nothing.—3. Son of Azariah (1 Chr. xxvii. 20); ruler of Ephraim in the time of King David.—4. One of the heads of the people, who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 23).

Hos-pli-tal'i-ty was regarded by most nations of the ancient world as one of the chief virtues, and especially by peoples of the Shemitic stock; but that it was not characteristic of these alone is amply shown by the usages of the Greeks and even the Romans. Among the Arabs we find the best illustrations of the old Bible narratives, and among them see traits that might besem their ancestor Abraham. The laws respecting strangers (Lev. xix. 33, 34) and the poor (xxv. 14 ff.; Deut. xv. 7), and concerning redemption (Lev. xxv. 23 ff.), &c., are framed in accordance with the spirit of hospitality; and the strength of the national feeling regarding it is shown in the incidental mentions of its practice. In the Law, compassion to strangers is constantly enforced by the words, "for ye were strangers in the land of Egypt" (xix. 34). And, before the Law, Abraham's entertainment of the angels (Gen. xviii. 1 ff.) and Lot's (xix. 1) are in exact agreement with its precepts, and with modern usage (compare Ex. ii. 20; Judg. xiii. 15, xix. 17, 20, 21). In the N. T. hospitality is yet more markedly enjoined; and in the more civilized state of society which then prevailed, its exercise became more a social virtue than a necessity of patriarchal life. The good Samaritan stands for all ages as an example of hospitality, embodying the command to love one's neighbor as himself (Lk. x. 30 ff.). The neglect of Christ is symbolized by inhospitality to our neighbors (Mat. xxv. 43). The apostles urged the church to "follow after hospitality" (Rom. xii. 13; compare 1 Tim. v. 10); to remember Abraham's example (Heb. xiii. 2); to "use hospitality one to another without grudging" (1 Pet. iv. 9); while a bishop must be a "lover of hospitality" (Tit. i. 8; compare 1 Tim. iii. 2). The practice of the early Christians was in accord with these precepts. Their hospitality was a characteristic of their belief. Such having been the usage of Biblical times, it is important to remark how hospitality was shown. In the patriarchal ages we may take Abraham's example as the most fitting, as we have of it the fullest account (Gen. xviii.). "Hospitality," says Mr. Lane, "is a virtue for which the natives of the East in general are highly and deservedly admired; and the people of Egypt are well entitled to commendation on this account. . . . Very few persons here would think of sitting down to a meal, if there was a stranger in the house, without inviting him to partake of it, unless the latter were a menial, in which case he would be invited to eat with the servants. . . . By a Sunneh law a traveller may claim entertainment of any person able to afford it to him for three days. The account of Abraham's entertaining the three angels, related in the Bible, presents a perfect picture of the manner in which a modern Bedawee sheikh receives travellers arriving at his encampment. He immediately orders his wife or women to make bread, slaughters a sheep or some other animal, and dresses it in haste, and bringing milk or any other provisions that he may have ready at hand, with the bread and the meat which he has dressed, sets them before his guests. If these be persons of high rank, he stands by them while they eat, as Abraham did in the case above alluded to. Most Bedawees will suffer almost any injury to themselves or their families rather than allow their guests to be ill-treated while under their protection. There are Arabs who even regard the chastity of their wives as not too precious to be sacrificed for the gratification of their guests." The Oriental respect for the COVENANT of bread and salt, or salt alone, certainly sprang from the high regard in which hospitality was held. * Hes'ta-ges (i. e. persons taken as security for the faithful performance of a treaty, &c.) are mentioned (2 K. xiv. 14; 2 Chr. xxv. 24) as taken by Joash, king of Israel, after his victory over Amaziah of Judah. Hostages are often mentioned in the Apocrypha (1 Mc. i. 10, viii. 7, ix. 53, x. 6, 9, xi. 62, xiii. 16). LOAN; WAR.

Ho'tham (Heb. a seal, signet-ring, Ges.), a man of Asher; son of Heber, of the family of Beriah (1 Chr. vii. 32), = HIFLEM 1?

Ho'than (fr. Heb., properly HO'THAM), a man of Aroer, father of Shama and Jehiel, among David's "valiant men" (1 Chr. xi. 44).

Ho'thir (Heb. to make higher or superior, Fül.), thirteenth son of HEMAN, "the king's seer" (1 Chr. xxv. 4, 28), a Kohathite Levite. He had charge of the twenty-first course of musicians.

Hour (Chal. sh'ah, sha'athâ; Gr. hōra). The ancient Hebrews were probably unacquainted with the division of the natural day into twenty-four parts. (CHRONOLOGY 1; DIAL.) The general dis-functions of "morning, evening, and noonday" (Ps. lv. 17) were sufficient for them at first, as they were for the early Greeks; afterward the Hebrews parcelled out the period between sunrise and sunset into a series of minute divisions distinguished by the sun's course. The early Jews appear to have divided the day into four parts (Neh. ix. 3), and the night into three watches (Judg. vii. 19), and even in the N. T. we find a trace of this division in Mat. xx. 1-5. The Greeks adopted the division of the day into twelve hours from the Babylonians. At what period the Jews became first acquainted with this way of reckoning time is unknown, but it is generally supposed that they too learned it from the Babylonians during the Captivity. In whatever way originated, it was known to the Egyptians at a very early period. They had twelve hours of the day and of the night. There are two kinds of hours, viz. (1.) the astronomical or equinoctial hour, i. e. the twenty-fourth part of a civil day, and (2.) the natural hour, i. e. the twelfth part of the natural day, or of the time between sunrise and sunset. These are the hours meant in the N. T., Josephus, and the Rabbis (Jn. xi. 9, &c.), and it must be remembered that they perpetually vary in length, so as to be very different at different times of the year. What horologic contrivances the Jews possessed in the time of our Lord is uncertain; but we may safely suppose that they had gnomons, dials, and clepsydræ, all of which had long been known to the Persians and other nations with whom they had come in contact. For the purposes of prayer the old division of the day into four portions was continued in the Temple-service, as we see from Acts ii. 15, iii. 1, x. 9.

House (Heb. bayith; Gr. oikos) = a dwelling in general, whether literally, as house, tent, palace, cottage, cave, citadel, tomb; derivatively, as tabernacle, temple, heaven; or metaphorically, as family. Although, in Oriental language, every tent may be regarded as a house, yet the distinction between the permanent dwelling-house and the tent must have taken rise from the moment of the division of mankind into dwellers in tents and builders of cities, i. e. of permanent habitations (Gen. iv. 17, 20; Is. xxxviii. 12). The Hebrews did not become dwellers in the cities till the sojourn in Egypt, and after the conquest of Canaan (Gen. xlvii. 3; Ex. xii. 7; Heb. xi. 9), while the Canaanites as well as the Assyrians were from an earlier period builders and inhabitants of cities, and it was into the houses and cities built by the former that the Hebrews entered to take possession after the conquest (Gen. x. 11, 19, xix. 1, xxiii. 10, xxxiv. 20; Num. xi. 27; Deut. vi. 10, 11). The houses of the rural poor in Egypt, as well as in most parts of Syria, Arabia, and Persia, are for the most part mere huts of mud, or sunburnt bricks. In some parts of Palestine and Arabia stone is used, and in certain districts caves in the rock are used as dwellings (Am. v. 11). The houses are usually of one story only, viz. the ground floor, and sometimes contain only one apartment. Sometimes a small court for the cattle is attached; and in some cases the cattle are housed in the same building, or the people live on a raised platform, and the cattle round them on the ground (1 Sam. xxviii. 24). (BARN.) The windows are small apertures high up in the walls, sometimes grated with wood. (LATTICE; WINDOW.) The roofs are commonly, but not always, flat, and are usually formed of a plaster of mud and straw laid upon boughs or rafters; and, upon the flat roofs, tents, or "booths" of boughs and rushes, are often raised to be used as sleeping-places in summer. The difference between the poorest houses and those of the class next above them is greater than between these and the houses of the first rank. The prevailing plan of Eastern houses of this class presents, as was the case in ancient Egypt, a front of wall, whose blank and mean appearance is usually relieved only by the door and a few latticed and projecting windows. Within this is a court or courts with apartments opening into them. In some houses at Damascus are seven such courts. When there are only two, the innermost is the harem, in which the women and children live. Over the door is a projecting window with a lattice more or less elaborately wrought, which, except in times of public celebrations, is usually closed (2 K. ix. 30). An awning is sometimes drawn over the court, and the floor strewn with carpets on festive occasions. On the ground floor is generally an apartment for male visitors, called mandarah, having a portion of the floor sunk below the rest, called durk'ah. The rest of the floor is a raised platform, called leewán, with a mattress and cushions at the back on each of the three sides. This seat or sofa is called deewán or divan. The stairs to the upper apartments are in Syria usually in a corner of the court. Around part, if not the whole, of the court is a veranda, often nine or ten feet deep, over which, when there is more than one floor, runs a second gallery of like depth with a balustrade. Bearing in mind that the reception-room is raised above the level of the court, we may, in explaining the circumstances of the miracle of the paralytic (Mk. ii. 3; Lk. v. 18), suppose 1. either that our Lord was standing under the veranda, and the people in front in the court. The bearers of the sick man ascended the stairs to the roof of the house, and taking off a portion of the boarded covering of the veranda, or removing the awning, in the former case let down the bed through the veranda roof, or in the latter, down by way of the roof, and deposited it before the Saviour. 2. Another explanation presents itself in considering the room where the company were assembled as the

"upper chamber," and the roof opened for the bed to be the true roof of the house. 3. And one still more simple is found in regarding the house as one of the rude dwellings now to be seen near the Sea of Galilee, a mere room ten or twelve feet high and as many or more square, with no opening except the door. The roof, used as a sleeping-place, is reached by a ladder from the outside, and the bearers of the paralytic, unable to approach the door, would thus have ascended the roof, and, having uncovered it, let him down into the room where our Lord was. When there is no second floor, but more than one court, the women's apartments, harem, harm, or haram, are usually in the second court; otherwise they form a separate building within the general enclosure, or are above on the first floor. When there is an upper story, the Ki'ah (a second room fitted with deewáns) forms the most important apartment, and thus probably answers to the "upper chamber," which was often the "guest-chamber" (Lk. xxii. 12; Acts i. 13, ix. 37, xx. 8). The windows of the upper rooms often project one or two feet, and form a kiosk or latticed chamber. Such may have been the "chamber in the wall" (2 K. iv. 10, 11). The "lattice" through which Ahaziah fell, perhaps belonged to an upper chamber of this kind (i. 2), as also the "third loft," from which Eutychus fell (Acts xx. 9; compare Jer. xxii. 13). There are usually no special bedrooms in Eastern houses. (Ben.) The outer doors are closed with a wooden lock, but in some cases the apartments are divided from each other by curtains only. There are no chimneys, but fire is made when required with charcoal in a chafing-dish; or a fire of wood might be kindled in the open court of the house (Lk. xxii. 55). Some houses in Cairo have an apartment called mak'ad, open in front to the court, with two or more arches, and a railing; and a pillar to support the wall above. It was in a chamber of this kind, probably one of the largest size to be found in a palace, that our Lord was being arraigned before the high-priest, when the denial of Him by St. Peter took place. He "turned and looked" on Peter as he stood by the fire in the court (Lk. xxii. 56, 61; Jn. xviii. 24), whilst He Himself was in the "Hall of Judgment." The roofs of Eastern houses are mostly flat, though there are sometimes domes over some of the rooms. The flat portions are plastered with a composition of mortar, tar, ashes, and sand. In many cases the terrace roof is little better than earth rolled hard. Sometimes the roof is of boards, stone slabs, palm-leaf, or even cornstalks or brushwood spread over with gravel, &c. In no point do Oriental domestic habits differ more from European than in the use of the roof. Its flat surface is made useful for various household purposes, as drying corn, hanging up linen, and preparing figs and raisins. The roofs are used as places of recreation in the evening, and often as sleeping-places at night (2 Sam. xi. 2, xvi. 22; Dan. iv. 29; 1 Sam. ix. 25, 26; Job xxvii. 18; Prov. xxi. 9). They were also used as places for devotion, and even idolatrous worship (Jer. xxxii. 29, xix. 13; 2 K. xxiii. 12; Zeph. i. 5; Acts x. 9). At the time of the Feast of Tabernacles, booths were erected by the Jews on the tops of their houses. Protection of the roof by parapets (A. V. "a battlement") was enjoined by the law (Deut. xxii. 8). In ancient Assyrian and also in Egyptian houses, a sort of raised story was sometimes built above the roof, and in the former an open chamber, roofed or covered with awning, was sometimes erected on the house-top. Special apartments were devoted in larger houses to winter and summer uses (Jer. xxxvi. 22; Am. iii. 15). The "ivory house" of Ahab was probably a palace largely ornamented with inlaid ivory. The circumstance of Samson's pulling down the house by means of the pillars may be explained by the fact of the company being assembled on tiers of balconies above each other, supported by central pillars on the basement; when these were pulled down, the whole of the upper floors would fall also (Judg. xvi. 26). Hukkok (Heb. what is cut in = a ditch, Fñ.; or decree, law, Ges.?), a place on the boundary of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 34) named next to Aznoth-tabor; probably at Yūkāk, a village in the mountains of Naphtali, W. of the upper end of the Sea of Galilee, about seven miles S. S. W. of Safed.

Hukok (Heb. = HUKKOK) = HELKATH in Josh. xxi. 1 (1 Chr. vi. 75).

Hul (Heb. circle, Ges.), second son of Aram, and grandson of Shem (Gen. x. 23). The geographical position of the people whom he represents is not well decided. The strongest evidence is in favor of the district about the roots of Lebanon, where Arul-el-Hul'eh now = a district N. of Lake Merom.

Hul'dah (Heb. weasel, Ges., Fñ.), a prophetess, whose husband Shallum was keeper of the wardrobe in King Josiah's time. To her Josiah had recourse when Hilkiah found a book of the Law, to procure an authoritative opinion on it (2 K. xxii. 14; 2 Chr. xxxiv. 22). COLLEGE.

Hamtah (Heb. place of lizard, or bulwark, Ges.), a city of Judah in the mountain-district, the next to Hebron (Josh. xv. 54).

Hunt'ing. The objects for which hunting is practiced indicate the various conditions of society and the progress of civilization. Hunting, as a matter of necessity, whether for the extermination of dangerous beasts, or for procuring sustenance, betokens a rude and semi-civilized state; as an amusement, it betokens an advanced state. The Hebrews, as a pastoral and agricultural people, were not given to the sports of the field; the density of the population, the earnestness of their character, and the tendency of their ritual regulations, particularly those affecting food, all combined to discourage the practice of hunting. There was no lack of game in Palestine; on their entrance into the land, the wild beasts were so numerous as to be dangerous (Ex. xxiii. 29). Some of the fiercer animals survived to a late period, as lions. The manner of catching these animals was either by digging a pitfall, which was the usual manner with the larger animals, as the lion (2 Sam. xxiii. 20; Ez. xix. 4, 8); or by a trap, which was set under ground (Job xviii. 10), in the run of the animal (Prov. xxii. 5), and caught it by the leg (Job xviii. 9); or lastly by the use of the NET, of which there were various kinds, as for the gazelle (Is. li. 20, A. V. "wild BULL") and other animals of that class. Birds formed an article of food among the Hebrews (Lev. xvii. 13), and much skill was exercised in catching them. The following were the most approved methods:—(1.) The trap, which consisted of two parts, a net, strained over a frame, and a stick to support it, but so placed that it should give way at the slightest touch (Am. iii. 5, "gin;" Ps. lxxix. 22, "trap"). (2.) The snare (Job xviii. 9, A. V. "robber"), consisting of a cord (xviii. 10; compare Ps. xviii. 5, cxvi. 3, cxi. 5), so set as to catch the bird by the leg. (3.) The net. (4.) The decoy, to which reference is made in Jer. v. 26, 27. ARMS; CAGE; FISH; FOOD; SPARROW.

Hupham (Heb. coast-man? Ges.; protected, Fñ.), a son of Benjamin; founder of the family of the HUPHAMITES (Num. xxvi. 39); = HUPPIM.

Hupham-ites (fr. Heb.), the = the descendants of HUPHAM (Num. xxvi. 39).

Huppah (Heb. covering, protection, Ges., Fñ.), a priest in David's time, having charge of the thirteenth course (1 Chr. xxiv. 13).

Hup'pim (Heb. pl. = coverings, Ges.; protection, Fñ.), head of a Benjamite family. According to the text of the LXX. in Gen. xlii. 21, a son of Bela; but 1 Chr. vii. 12 tells us that he was son of Ir, or Iri. HUPHAM.

Hur (Heb. a hole, Ges.; immaculateness, nobility, Fñ.). 1. A man mentioned with Moses and Aaron on the occasion of the battle with Amalek at Rephidim (Ex. xvii. 10), when with Aaron he stayed up the hands of Moses (12). He is mentioned again in xxiv. 14, as being, with Aaron, left in charge of the people by Moses during his ascent of Sinai. The Jewish tradition is that he was the husband of Miriam, and that he was identical with—2. The grandfather of Bezaleel, the chief artificer of the Tabernacle—"son of Uri, son of Hur" of the tribe of Judah" (Ex. xxxi. 2, xxxv. 30, xxxviii. 22; 2 Chr. i. 5). In the lists of the descendants of Judah in 1 Chronicles the pedigree is more fully preserved. Hur there appears as one of the great family of Pharez. He was son of Caleb the son of Hezron, by a second wife, Ephrath (1 Chr. ii. 19, 20; compare 5, also iv. 1), the first fruit of the marriage (ii. 50, iv. 4), and the father, besides Uri (ver. 20), of three sons, who founded the towns of Kirjath-jearim, Bethlehem, and Beth-gader (51). Hur's connection with Bethlehem would seem to have been of a closer nature than with the others (iv. 4).—3. The fourth of the five kings of Midian slain with Balaam after the "matter of Peor" (Num. xxxi. 8). In a later mention of them (Josh. xiii. 21) they are called "princes" of Midian and "dukes."—4. Father of Rephaiah, who was ruler of half of the environs of Jerusalem, and assisted Nehemiah in the repair of the wall (Neh. iii. 9).—5. The "son of Hur"—margin "Ben-hur"—was commissariat officer for Solomon in Mount Ephraim (1 K. iv. 8).

Hu'rai (Chal. worker in linen? Ges.; free, noble, Fñ.), one of David's "valiant men"—"Hurai of the brooks of Gaash" (1 Chr. xi. 32). HIRPAI.

Hur'am (Heb. noble, high-born, Ges.). 1. A Benjamite; son of Bela, the first-born of the patriarch (1 Chr. viii. 5).—2. The king of Tyre in alliance with David and Solomon—elsewhere HIRAM (1 Chr. xiv. 1; 2 Chr. ii. 3, 11, 12, viii. 2, 18, ix. 10, 21).—3. HIRAM the artificer (ii. 13, ix. 11, 16).

Hu'ri (Heb. worker in linen, Ges.), a Gadite; father of Abihail (1 Chr. v. 14).

Hu'sband. MAN; MARRIAGE.

Hu'shah (Heb. haste, Ges., Fū.), a name in the genealogies of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 4)—“Ezer, father of Hushah;” perhaps the name of a place.

Hu'shah (Heb. hasting, Ges.), an ARCHITE (2 Sam. xv. 32 ff., xvi. 16 ff.). He is called the “friend” of David (xv. 37); in 1 Chr. xxvii. 33, the word is rendered “companion.” To him David confided the delicate and dangerous part of a pretended adherence to the cause of ABSAOM. His advice was preferred to AMITHOPHEL's, and speedily brought to pass the ruin which it meditated. He was probably the father of BAANAH 3 (1 K. iv. 16).

Hu'sham (Heb. haste, Ges.), early king of Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 34, 35; 1 Chr. i. 45, 46).

Hu'shath-lite (fr. Heb. = one from HUSHAH, Ges., Fū.), the, the designation of two of David's “valiant men.” 1. SIBBECHAI or SIBBECAI (2 Sam. xxi. 18; 1 Chr. xi. 29, xx. 4, xxvii. 11). Josephus calls him a Hittite.—2. MEBUNAI (2 Sam. xxiii. 27), probably a corruption of SIBBECHAI.

Hu'shim (Heb. pl. = the hasting, Ges., Fū.). 1. In Gen. xlv. 23, “the children of Dan” are said to have been Hushim. The name is plural, as if of a tribe rather than an individual. In Num. xxvi. the name is changed to SHUHAM.—2. A Benjamite (1 Chr. vii. 12); and here again apparently the plural nature of the name is recognized, and Hushim is stated to be “the sons of Aher.”—3. One of the two wives of Shaharaim (viii. 8).

Husks. The Gr. pl. keratia, rendered in the A. V. “husks” (Lk. xv. 16), describes really the fruit of mon in Syria and Egypt; it is evergreen, and grows to the height of twenty or thirty feet; it produces pods, shaped like a horn, varying in length from six to ten inches, and about a finger's breadth, or rather more. These pods, containing a thick pithy substance, very sweet to the taste, were eaten by cattle, and particularly by pigs, and by the poorer classes of the population.

Huz (fr. Heb. = Uz), eldest son of Nahor and Milcah (Gen. xxii. 21).

Huz'zab (fr. Heb. = it is fixed, or determined, Ges.; fr. Pers. = beautifully beaming, Fū.), according to the general opinion of the Jews, was the queen of Nineveh when Nahum delivered his prophecy (Nah. ii. 7). The moderns follow the rendering in the margin of our English Bible—“that which was established.” Still (so Rawlinson) Huzzab may really be a proper name = “the Zab country,” or the fertile tract E. of the Tigris, watered by the upper and lower Zab rivers (Zab Ala and Zab Asfal), the A-diab-éné of the geographers. This province—the most valuable part of Assyria—might well stand for Assyria itself.

Hy-das'pes (L. fr. Gr.), a river noticed in Jd. i. 6, in connection with the Euphrates and Tigris. It is uncertain what river is referred to; the well-known Hydaspes of India (the Jelum of the Panji) is too remote. We may perhaps identify it with the Choaspes of Susiana.

Hy-e'na (L. hyana, fr. Gr.). Authorities are at variance as to whether the Heb. trāhūa in Jer. xii. 9 means a “hyena” as the LXX. has it, or a “speckled bird,” as in the A. V. The etymological force of the word is equally adapted to either, the hyena being streaked. The only other instance in which it occurs is as a proper name, ZELOIM (1 Sam. xiii. 18, “the valley of hyenas,” Aquila; Neh. xi. 34). The hyena was a fierce, strong beast, common in ancient as in modern Egypt, and is constantly depicted on monuments: it must therefore have been well known to the Jews, if indeed not equally common in Palestine (Ecclus. xiii. 18).

Hym-e-næ'us (L. Hymeneus, fr. Gr. = a wedding-song, marriage, L. & S.), a person named twice in St. Paul's Epistles to Timothy; the first time classed with Alexander (1 Tim. i. 20); and the second time classed with Philetus (2 Tim. ii. 17, 18). In the error with which he was charged—“saying, that the resurrection is past already”—he stands as one of the earliest of the Gnostics. As regards the sentence passed upon him—it has been asserted by some writers of eminence, that the “delivering to Satan” is a mere synonym for ecclesiastical excommunication. Such can hardly be the case (so Mr. Ffoulkes). As the apostles healed all manner of bodily infirmities, so they seem to have possessed and exercised the same power in inflicting them—a power far too perilous to be continued when the manifold exigencies of the apostolical age had passed away (Acts v. 5, 10, ix. 17, 40, xiii. 11). Even apart from actual intervention by the apostles, bodily visitations are spoken of in the case of those who approached the Lord's Supper unworthily (1 Cor. xi. 30). On the other hand, SATAN was held to be the instrument or executer of all these visitations. Thus, while the “delivering to Satan” may resemble ecclesiastical excommunication in some respects, it has its own characteristics likewise, which show plainly that one is not to be confounded or placed on the same level with the other. DEMONIACS; MIRACLES.

Hymn (fr. Gr. = a song) (Eph. v. 19; Col. iii. 16). Among the later Jews the word psalm had a definite meaning (PSALMS), while hymn was more or less vague in its application, and capable of being used as occasion should arise. To Christians the Hymn has always been something different from the Psalm; a different conception in thought, a different type in composition. There is some dispute about the hymn sung by our Lord and His apostles on the occasion of the Last Supper; but even supposing it to have been the Hallel, or Paschal Hymn, consisting of Ps. cxiii.-cxviii. (HALLELUJAH; PASSOVER), it is obvious that the word hymn is in this case applied not to an individual Psalm, but to a number of psalms chanted successively, and altogether forming a kind of devotional exercise not unaptly called a hymn. In the jail at Philippi, Paul and Silas "sang hymns" (A. V. "praises") unto God, and so loud was their song that their fellow-prisoners heard them. This must have been what we mean by singing, and not merely recitation. It was in fact a veritable singing of hymns. And it is remarkable that the noun hymn is only used in reference to the services of the Greeks, and in the same passages is clearly distinguished from the Psalm (Eph. v. 19; Col. iii. 16)—"psalms, and hymns, and spiritual songs." It is worth while inquiring what profane models the Greek hymnographers chose to work after. In the old religion of Greece the word hymn had already acquired a sacred and liturgical meaning. The special forms of the Greek hymn were various. The Homeric and Orphic hymns were written in the epic style, and in hexameter verse. Their metre was not adapted for singing. In the Pindaric hymns we find a sufficient variety of metre, and a definite relation to music. These were sung to the accompaniment of the lyre; and it is very likely that they engaged the attention of the early hymn-writers. The first impulse of Christian devotion was to run into the moulds ordinarily used by the worshippers of the old religion. In 1 Cor. xiv. 26, allusion is made to improvised hymns, which, being the outburst of a passionate emotion, would probably assume the dithyrambic form. It was in the Latin church that the trochaic and iambic metres became most deeply rooted, and acquired the greatest depth of tone and grace of finish. The introduction of hymns into the Latin church is commonly referred to Ambrose. But it is impossible to conceive that the West should have been so far behind the East: and it is more likely (so Mr. Brown) that the tradition is due to the very marked prominence of Ambrose as the greatest of all the Latin hymnographers. The trochaic and iambic metres, thus impressed into the service of the church, have continued to hold their ground, and are in fact the 7's, Short Metre, Common Metre, and Long Metre of our modern hymns; many of which are translations or imitations of Latin originals. MUSIC.

Hyssop (Heb. ézob; Gr. hussopos; L. hyssopus), a plant much used in the Hebrew purifications and sprinklings. Perhaps no plant mentioned in the Scriptures has given rise to greater differences of opinion than this. The difficulty arises from the fact that in the LXX. the Greek hussopos is the uniform rendering of the Hebrew ézob, and that this rendering is indorsed by the apostle in Hebrews ix. 19, 21, when speaking of the ceremonial observances of the Levitical law. Whether, therefore, the LXX. made use of the Greek hussopos as the word most nearly resembling the Hebrew in sound, as Stanley suggests, or as the true representative of the plant indicated by the latter, is a point which probably will never be decided. Botanists differ widely even with regard to the identification of the hussopos of Dioscorides. Kühn gives it as his opinion that the Hebrews used the Origanum Egyptiacum in Egypt, the O. Syriacum in Palestine, and that the hyssop of Dioscorides was the O. Smyrnum. The ézob, A. V. "hyssop," was used to sprinkle the doorposts of the Israelites in Egypt with the blood of the paschal lamb (Ex. xii. 22); it was employed in the purification of lepers and leprous houses (Lev. xiv. 4, 51), and in the sacrifice of the red heifer (Num. xix. 6). In consequence of its detergent qualities, or from its being associated with the purificatory services, the Psalmist makes use of the expression, "purge me with hyssop" (Ps. li. 7). It is described in 1 K. iv. 33 as growing on or near walls. In Jn. xix. 29, "put it upon hyssop" corresponds to "put it on a reed" in Mat. xxvii. 48 and Mk. xv. 36. Bochart decides in favor of marjoram, or some plant like it, and to this conclusion, it must be admitted, all ancient tradition points. The monks on Jebel Musa (Mt. Sinai?) give the name of hyssop to a fragrant plant called ja'deh, which grows in great quantities on that mountain. Celsius, after enumerating eighteen different plants (thyme, rosemary, French lavender, &c.), which have been severally identified with the hyssop of Scripture, concludes that we have no alternative but to accept the common hyssop, the Hyssopus officinalis, a perennial aromatic plant, about two feet high, growing in tufts. The late Dr. J. F. Royle, after a careful investigation of the subject, arrived at the conclusion that the "hyssop" is the caper-plant, or Capparis spinosa of Linnæus, sometimes called in Arabic asuf, which grows in dry and rocky places and on walls in Lower Egypt, Sinai, and Palestine. Robinson (N. T. Lex.), Gesenius, &c., make the "hyssop" of the Scriptures = the common hyssop, and other similar aromatic plants, as lavender, and especially organum or wild marjoram, &c. PALESTINE, Botany.

I

* I am, and I am that I am. JEHOVAH.

Ib'har (fr. Heb. = whom God chooses, Ges.), a son of David (2 Sam. v. 15; 1 Chr. iii. 6, xiv. 5), born in Jerusalem.

Ib'le-am (fr. Heb. = he consumes the people, Ges.), a city of Manasseh, with villages or towns dependent on it (Judg. i. 27), in the territory of Issachar or Asher (Josh. xvii. 11). The ascent of Gur was "at Ib'leam" (2 K. ix. 27), somewhere near the present Jenin, probably to the N. of it. BILEAM.

Ib-nei'ah [nee'yah] (fr. Heb. Jehonah will build, Ges.), son of Jehoram, a Benjamite (1 Chr. ix. 8).

Ib-ni'jah (Heb. = IBNEIAH, Ges.), a Benjamite (1 Chr. ix. 8).

Ib'ri (Heb. = HEBREW), a Merarite Levite of the family of Jaaziah in David's time (1 Chr. xxiv. 27).

Ib'zan (fr. Heb. = of tin? Ges.; splendid, beautiful, Fñ.), a native of Bethlehem (in Zebulun?), who judged Israel for seven years after Jephthah (Judg. xii. 8, 10). He had thirty sons and thirty daughters, and took home thirty wives for his sons, and sent out his daughters to as many husbands abroad. He was buried at Bethlehem. BOAZ.

Ieh'a-bod (Heb. inglorious, Ges.), son of Phinehas, and grandson of Eli (1 Sam. iv. 21, xiv. 3).

I-co-ni-um (L. fr. Gr., popularly derived from a little image [Gr. eikonion] of Medusa placed here by Perseus), the modern Konieh, is situated in the western part of an extensive plain, on the central table-land of Asia Minor, and not far to the N. of the chain of Taurus. This level district was anciently called LYCAONIA. Xenophon reckons Iconium as the most easterly town of PHRYGIA; but all other writers speak of it as being in Lycaonia, of which it was practically the capital. It was on the great line of communication between Ephesus and the western coast of the peninsula on one side, and Tarsus, Antioch, and the Euphrates on the other. Iconium was a well-chosen place for missionary operations (Acts xiv. 1, 3, 21, 22, xvi. 1, 2; 2 Tim. iii. 11). The Apostle Paul's first visit was on his first circuit, in company with Barnabas; and on this occasion he approached it from Antioch in Pisidia, which lay to the W. (Acts xiii. 50, 51). (TIMOTHY.) From its position it could not fail to be an important centre of Christian influence in the early ages of the Church. In the declining period of the Roman empire, Iconium was made a colony. In the middle ages it became a place of great consequence, as the capital of the Seljukian sultans. Konieh is still a town of considerable size, the residence of a pasha, and head of a province.

Id'a-lah (fr. Heb. = what God exalts, Sim.; fr a Heb. verb = to go softly and secretly? Ges.; memorial-stone of God, Fii.), a city of Zebulun, named between Shimron and Bethlehem (Josh. xix. 15).

Id'hash (fr. Heb. = honeyed? Ges.; a stout, fat one, Fii.), one of the three sons of "the father of Etam," among the families of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 3).

Id'do (Heb. [except Nos. 3 and 6] = timely, Ges.; one born on a feast-day, Fii.). 1. Father of Ahinadab (1 K. iv. 14).—2. A descendant of Gershom, son of Levi (1 Chr. vi. 21); = ADAIAH.—3. (fr. Heb. = loving, Ges.; favorite, Fii.). Son of Zechariah, ruler of Manasseh, E. of Jordan in David's time (xxvii. 21).—4. A seer whose "visions" against Jeroboam incidentally contained some of the acts of Solomon (2 Chr. ix. 29). He appears to have written a chronicle or story relating to the life and reign of Abijah (xiii. 22), and also a book "concerning genealogies," in which the acts of Rehoboam were recorded (xii. 15). These books are lost, but they may have formed part of the foundation of the existing books of Chronicles. Ancient Jewish traditions identified Iddo with the "man of God" out of Judah who denounced Jeroboam's altar (1 K. xii. 1).—5. Grandfather of the prophet Zechariah (Zech. i. 1, 7), although in other places Zechariah is called "the son of Iddo" (Ezr. v. 1, vi. 14). Iddo returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel and Jeshua (Neh. xii. 4, 16).—6. (Heb. misfortune, Ges.; powerful, Fii.). The chief of those who assembled at Casiphia, at the time of the second caravan from Babylon. He was one of the Nethinim (Ezr. viii. 17; compare 20).

I'dol (fr. Gr.), Im'age (fr. L.). As no less than twenty-one different Hebrew words have been rendered in the A. V. either by "idol" or "image," and that by no means uniformly, it will be of some advantage to attempt to discriminate between them, and assign, as nearly as the two languages will allow, the English equivalents for each. But, before proceeding to the discussion of those words which in themselves indicate the objects of false worship, it will be necessary to notice a class of abstract terms, which, with a deep moral significance, express the degradation associated with it, and stand out as a protest of the language against the enormities of idolatry. Such are—1. Heb. aven (AVEN), rendered elsewhere "nought," "vanity," "iniquity," "wickedness," "sorrow," &c., and once only "idol" (Is. lxvi. 3). The primary idea of the root seems to be emptiness, nothingness, as of breath or vapor; and, by a natural transition, in a moral sense, wickedness in its active form of mischief, and then, as the result, sorrow and trouble. Hence aven = a rain, false, wicked thing, and expresses at once the essential nature of idols, and the consequences of their worship.—2. Heb. lil is thought by some to have a sense akin to that of falsehood, and would therefore much resemble aven, as applied to an idol (Lev. xix. 4, xxvi. 1, &c.). It is used of the "images" of Noph or Memphis (Ez. xxx. 13). In strong contrast with Jehovah it appears in Ps. xvi. 5, xlvii. 7.—3. Heb. éymáh, "horror" or "terror," and hence an object of horror or terror (Jer. l. 38), in reference either to the hideousness of the idols or to the gross character of their worship. In this respect it is closely connected with—4. Heb. mitsdath (= a right, horror), applied to the idol of Maachah, probably of wood, which Asa cut down and burned (1 K. xv. 13; 2 Chr. xv. 16), and which was unquestionably the phallus, the symbol of the productive power of nature and the nature-goddess. (ASHERAH.) With this must be noticed, though not actually rendered "image" or "idol,"—5. Heb. boasheth, "shame," or "shameful thing" (A. V. Jer. xi. 13; Hos. ix. 10), applied to Baal or Baal-peor, as characterizing the obscenity of his worship. With elil is found in close connection—6. Heb. gillûlîm, also a term of contempt, but of uncertain origin (A. V. uniformly "idols," Ez. xxx. 13, &c.). The Rabbinical authorities favor the interpretation of the A. V. margin in Deut. xxix. 17, "dunzy gods." The expression is applied, principally in Ezekiel, to false gods and their symbols (Deut. xxix. 17; Ez. viii. 10, &c.). It stands side by side with other contemptuous terms, e. g. with Heb. shekets, "abomination" (Ez. viii. 10, A. V. "abominable"), and (xx. 8) with—7. The cognate Heb. shikkûts, "ABOMINATION," "abominable filth," &c., especially applied, like shekets, to that which produced ceremonial uncleanness (Ez. xxxvii. 23, A. V. "detestable things;" Nah. iii. 6, A. V. "abominable filth;" Zech. ix. 7, A. V. "abominations," i. e. food offered in sacrifice to idols). As referring to the idols themselves, it primarily denotes the obscene rites with which their worship was associated, and hence, by metonymy, is applied both to the objects of worship and also to their worshippers (1 K. xi. 5, 7, &c., A. V. "abominations").—We now come to the consideration of those words which more directly apply to the images or idols, as the outward symbols of the deity who was worshipped through them.—8. Heb. seuel or séuel = a likeness, semblance (L. simulacrum). It occurs in 2 Chr. xxxiii. 7, 15 (A. V. "idol"); Deut. iv. 16 ("figure"), and Ez. viii. 3, 5 ("image").—9. Heb. and Chal. tsélem (Chal. also tsélém) is by all lexicographers, ancient and modern, connected with Heb. tsé, "a shadow." It is the "image" of God in which man was created (Gen. i. 26, 27, v. 3, ix. 6, &c.). (ADAM.) It is unquestionably used to denote the visible forms of external objects, and is applied to figures of gold and silver (1 Sam. vi. 5; Num. xxxiii. 52; Dan. iii. 1 ff., &c.), such as the golden "image" of Nebuchadnezzar, as well as to those painted upon walls (Ez. xxiii. 14). "Image" perhaps most nearly represents it in all passages. Applied to the human countenance (Dan. iii. 19, A. V. "form"), it signifies the expression.—10. Heb. tsémûnâh, rendered "image" in Job iv. 16; elsewhere "similitude" (Deut. iv. 12, 15, 16, &c.), "likeness" (23, 25, v. 8, &c.): form or shape would be better (so Mr. Wright).—11. Heb. 'atsûb (1 Sam. xxxi. 9, &c.), 12. 'etséb (Jer. xxii. 28), or 13. 'ôtséb (Is. xlviii. 5), "a figure," all derived from a root 'atsab (= to work or fashion), are terms applied to idols as expressing that their origin was due to the labor of man.—14. Heb. tsîr, once only applied to an idol (Is. xlv. 16), = a form or mould, and hence an "idol."—15. Heb. natsetebâh, any thing set up, a statue, a memorial stone (Gen. xxviii. 18, xxi. 45, xxxv. 14, 15, &c., A. V. "pillar"). (ANOINTING.) The word is applied to denote the obelisks which stood at the entrance to the temple of the Sun at Heliopolis (Jer. xliii. 13). It is also used of the statues of Baal (2 K. iii. 2), whether of stone (x. 27) or of wood (x. 26), which stood in the innermost recess of the temple at Samaria. The Phenicians consecrated and anointed stones like that at Bethel, which were called, as some think, from this circumstance Beitylia. Many such are said to have been seen on the Lebanon, near Heliopolis, dedicated to various gods. The Palladium of Troy, the black stone in the Kaaba at Mecca, said to have been brought from heaven by the angel Gabriel, and the stone at Ephesus "which fell down from Jupiter" (Acts xix. 35), are examples of the belief, anciently so common, that the gods sent down their images (meteoric stones) upon earth. Closely connected with these "statues" of Baal, whether in the form of obelisks or otherwise, were—16. Heb. pl. hammânîm or chammânîm, rendered in the margin of most passages and by Gesenius, Fürst, &c., "sun-images." The word has given rise to much discussion. Gesenius mentions the occurrence of hammân or chammân with Baal in the Phenician and Palmyrene inscriptions on consecrated statues or columns, and translates Baal the solar, Baal the sun. The Palmyrene inscription at Oxford has been thus rendered: "This column (Chammânâ), and this altar, the sons of Malchu, &c., have erected and dedicated to the Sun." From the expressions in Ez. vi. 4, 6, and Lev. xxvi. 30, it may be inferred that these columns, which perhaps represented a rising flame of fire, and stood upon the altar of Baal (2 Chr. xxxiv. 4), were of wood or stone.—17. Heb. mascûth occurs in Lev. xxvi. 1 (A. V. "image," margin "picture," "figured"); Num. xxiii. 52 (A. V. "pictures"); Ez. viii. 12 (A. V. "imagery"): device most nearly suits all passages (so Mr. Wright; compare Ps. lxxiii. 7 [A. V. "could wish"]; Prov. xviii. 11 [A. V. "conceit"]; xxv. 11 [A. V. "pictures"]). The general opinion appears to be that Heb. eben mascûth, A. V. "image of stone" (Lev. xxvi. 1), = a stone with figures graven upon it. Gesenius explains it as a stone with the image of an idol, Baal or Astarte; Fürst says, a stone formed into an idol.—18. Heb. terâphîm. (TERAPHIM.)—The terms which follow have regard to the material and workmanship of the idol rather than to its character as an object of worship.—19. Heb. pesel, and 20. Heb. pl. pésîlîm, usually translated in the A. V. "graven" or "carved images." In two passages the latter is ambiguously rendered "quarries" (Judg. iii. 19 [margin "graven images"], 26), following the Targum. Prof. Cassel understands here landmarks, i. e. pillars or heaps of stone on the boundary between the territory held by the Moabites as conquerors W. of Jordan and that of the Hebrews; but there seems no reason for departing from the ordinary signification. These sculptured images were apparently of wood, iron, or stone, covered with gold or silver (Deut. vii. 25; Is. xxx. 22; Hab. ii. 18), the more costly being of solid metal (Is. xl. 19). They could be burnt (Deut. vii. 5; 2 Chr. xxxiv. 4; Is. xlv. 20), or cut down (Deut. xii. 3) and pounded (2 Chr. xxxiv. 7), or broken in pieces (Is. xxi. 9). In making them, the skill of the wise iron-smith (Deut. xxvii. 15; Is. xl. 20) or carpenter, and of the goldsmith, was employed (Judg. xvii. 3, 4; Is. xli. 7), the former supplying the rough mass beaten into shape on his anvil (Is. xlv. 12), while the latter overlaid it with plates of gold and silver, probably from Tarshish (Jer. x. 9), and decorated it with silver chains. The image thus formed was adorned with embroidered robes (Ez. xvi. 18). Brass and clay were among the materials employed for the same purpose (Dan. ii. 33, v. 23). The several stages of the process by which the metal or wood became the "graven image" are so vividly described in Is. xlv. 10–20, that it is only necessary to refer to that passage, and we are at once introduced to the mysteries of idol manufacture, which, as at Ephesus, "brought no small gain unto the craftsmen."—21. Heb. na'ech, or nésech (Is. xli. 29, xlviii. 5; Jer. x. 14), &c., and 22. mas-séchéh (Ex. xxxii. 4, 8; Deut. ix. 12, &c.) are evidently synonymous, = a "molten" image. Mas-séchéh is frequently used in distinction from pesel or pesilim above (Deut. xxvii. 15; Judg. xvii. 3, &c.). The golden calf which Aaron made was "fashioned with a graving tool" (Ex. xxxii. 4).—23. Gr. eikón (= likeness), uniformly "image" in A. V., is the "image" or head of the emperor on the coinage (Mat. xxii. 20, &c.), an idol—"image" or statue (Rev. xiii. 14, 15, &c.), &c.; in LXX. = No. 8, 9, 19.—24. Gr. eidōlon, uniformly translated "idol" in A. V., denotes either the "image" (Acts vii. 41, &c.) or by metonymy the idol-god or deity himself (Acts xv. 20; 1 Cor. viii. 4, &c.); in LXX. = No. 6, 20.—Among the earliest objects of worship, regarded as symbols of deity, were, as has been said above, the meteoric stones which the ancients believed to have been the images of the gods sent down from heaven. From these they transferred their regard to rough unhewn blocks, to stone columns or pillars of wood, in which the divinity worshipped was supposed to dwell, and which were consecrated, like the sacred stone at Delphi, by being anointed with oil, and crowned with wool on solemn days. Such customs are remarkable illustrations of the solemn consecration by Jacob of the stone at Bethel, as showing the religious reverence with which these memorials were regarded. Of the forms assumed by the idolatrous images we have not many traces in the Bible. DAGON, the fish-god of the Philistines, was a human figure terminating in a fish; and that the Syrian deities were represented in later times in a symbolical human shape we know for certainty. The Hebrews imitated their neighbors in this respect as in others (Is. xlv. 13; Wis. xiii. 13). When the process of adorning the image was completed, it was placed in a temple or shrine appointed for it (Bar. 12, 19; Wis. xiii. 15; 1 Cor. viii. 10). From these temples the idols were sometimes carried in procession (Bar. 4, 26) on festival days. Their priests were maintained from the idol treasury, and feasted upon the meats which were appointed for the idols' use (B. & D. 3, 13). GENTILES; GOD; HEATHEN; IDOLATRY; TEMPLE.

Idol-a-try (fr. Gr. eidōlatreia; Heb. tiraphim once only, 1 Sam. xv. 23; TERAPHIM), strictly speaking, denotes the worship of deity in a visible form, whether the images to which homage is paid are symbolical representations of the true God, or of the false divinities which have been made the objects of worship in His stead. (ADORATION; PRAYER; SACRIFICE).—I. The first undoubted allusion to idolatry or idolatrous customs in the Bible is in the account of Rachel's stealing her father's TERAPHIM (Gen. xxxi. 19), a relic of the worship of other gods, whom the ancestors of the Israelites served "on the other side of the river, in old time" (Josh. xxiv. 2). These Laban consulted as oracles (Gen. xxx. 27, A. V. "learned by experience;" DIVINATION 8), though without entirely losing sight of the God of Abraham and the God of Nahor, to whom he appealed when occasion offered (xxxi. 53), while he was ready, in the presence of Jacob, to acknowledge the benefits conferred upon him by Jehovah (xxx. 27). Such, indeed, was the character of most of the idolatrous worship of the Israelites. Like the Cuthean colonists in Samaria, who "feared Jehovah, and served their own gods" (2 K. xvii. 33), they blended in a strange manner a theoretical belief in the true God with the external reverence which, in different stages of their history, they were led to pay to the idols of the nations by whom they were surrounded. And this marked feature of the Hebrew character is traceable through the entire history of the people. During their long residence in Egypt, the country of symbolism, they defiled themselves with the idols of the land, and it was long before the taint was removed (Josh. xxiv. 14; Ez. xx. 7). To these gods, Moses, as the herald of Jehovah, flung down the gauntlet of defiance, and the plagues of Egypt smote their symbols (Num. xxxiii. 4). Yet, with the memory of their deliverance fresh in their minds, their leader absent, the Israelites clamored for some visible shape in which they might worship the God who had brought them up out of Egypt (Ex. xxxii.). Aaron lent himself to the popular cry, and chose as the symbol of deity one with which they had long been familiar—the CALF—embodiment of Apis, and emblem of the productive power of nature. For a while the erection of the Tabernacle, and the establishment of the worship which accompanied it, satisfied that craving for an outward sign which the Israelites constantly exhibited; and for the remainder of their march through the desert, with the dwelling-place of Jehovah in their midst, they did not again degenerate into open apostasy. But it was only so long as their contact with the nations was of a hostile character that this seeming orthodoxy was maintained. During the lives of Joshua and the elders who outlived him, they kept true to their allegiance, but the generation following, who knew not Jehovah, nor the works He had done for Israel, swerved from the plain path of their fathers, and were caught in the toils of the foreigner (Judg. ii.). From this time forth their history becomes little more than a chronicle of the inevitable sequence of offence and punishment (ii. 12, 14). By turns each conquering nation strove to establish the worship of its national god. Thus far idolatry is a national sin. The episode of Micah, in Judg. xvii., xviii., sheds a lurid light on the secret practices of individuals, who, without formally renouncing Jehovah, though ceasing to recognize Him as the theocratic King (xvii. 6), linked with His worship the symbols of ancient idolatry. The house of God, or sanctuary, which Micah made in imitation of that at Shiloh, was decorated with an EPHOD and TERAPHIM dedicated to God, and with a graven and molten image (Ivot.) consecrated to some inferior deities. It is a significant fact, showing how deeply rooted in the people was the tendency to idolatry, that a Levite, who should have been most sedulous to maintain Jehovah's worship in its purity, was found to assume the office of priest to the images of Micah; and that this Levite, priest afterward to the idols of Dan, was no other than Jonathan, the son of Gershom, the son of Moses. In later times the practice of secret idolatry was carried to greater lengths. Images were set up on the corn-floors, in the wine-vats, and behind the doors of private houses (Is. lvii. 8; Hos. ix. 1, 2); and to check this tendency, the statute in Deut. xxvii. 15 was originally promulgated. Under Samuel's administration a fast was held, and purificatory rites performed, to mark the public renunciation of idolatry (1 Sam. vii. 3-6). But in the reign of Solomon all this was forgotten. Each of his many foreign wives brought with her the gods of her own nation; and the gods of Ammon, Moab, and Zidon, were openly worshipped. Rehoboam, the son of an Ammonite mother, perpetuated the worst features of Solomon's idolatry (1 K. xiv. 22-24), and in his reign was made the great schism in the national religion: when JEROBOAM, fresh from his recollections of the Apis worship of Egypt, erected golden calves at Bethel and at Dan, and by this crafty state-policy severed forever the kingdoms of Judah and Israel (xii. 26-33). The successors of Jeroboam followed in his steps, till Ahab, who married a Zidonian princess, at her instigation (xxi. 25) built a temple and altar to Baal, and revived all the abominations of the Amorites (xxi. 26). Compared with the worship of Baal, the worship of the calves was a venial offence, probably because it was morally less detestable and also less anti-national (xii. 28; 2 K. x. 28-31). Henceforth Baal-worship became so completely identified with the northern kingdom, that it is described as walking in the way or statutes of the kings of Israel (xvi. 3, xvii. 8), as distinguished from the sin of Jeroboam. The conquest of the ten tribes by Shalmaneser was for them the last scene of the drama of abominations which had been enacted uninterruptedly for upward of 250 years. In the northern kingdom no reformation arose to vary the long line of royal apostates: whatever was effected in the way of reformation, was done by the hands of the people (2 Chr. xxxi. 1). The first act of Hezekiah on ascending the throne was the restoration and purification of the Temple, which had been dismantled and closed during the latter part of his father's life (xxviii. 24, xxix. 3). The iconoclastic spirit was not confined to Judah and Benjamin, but spread throughout Ephraim and Manasseh (xxxi. 1), and to all external appearance idolatry was extirpated. But the reform extended little below the surface (Is. xxix. 13). With the death of Josiah ended the last effort to revive among the people a purer ritual, if not a purer faith. The lamp of David, which had long shed but a struggling ray, flickered for a while, and then went out in the darkness of Babylonian captivity. But foreign exile was powerless to eradicate the deep inbred tendency to idolatry. One of the first difficulties with which Ezra had to contend, and which brought him well-nigh to despair, was the haste with which his countrymen took them foreign wives of the people of the land, and followed them in all their abominations (Ezr. ix.). The conquests of ALEXANDER III. THE GREAT in Asia caused Greek influence to be extensively felt and Greek idolatry to be first tolerated, and then practised by the Jews (1 Mc. i. 43-50, 54). The attempt of ANTIOCHUS IV. EPIPHANES to establish this form of worship was vigorously resisted by Mattathias (ii. 23-26). (MACCABEES.) The erection of synagogues has been assigned as a reason for the comparative purity of the Jewish worship after the Captivity, while another cause has been discovered in the hatred for images acquired by the Jews in their intercourse with the Persians. It has been a question much debated whether the Israelites were ever so far given up to idolatry as to lose all knowledge of the true God. It would be hard to assert this of any nation, and still more difficult to prove. But there is still room for grave suspicion that among the masses of the people, though the idea of a Supreme Being—of whom the images they worshipped were but the distorted representatives—was not entirely lost, it was so obscured as to be but dimly apprehended (2 Chr. xv. 3).—II. The old religion of the Shemitic races consisted, in the opinion of Movers, in the deification of the powers and laws of nature; these powers being considered either as distinct and independent, or as manifestations of one supreme and all-ruling being. In most instances the two ideas were coexistent. The deity, following human analogy, was conceived of as male and female: the one representing the active, the other the passive principle of nature; the former the source of spiritual, the latter of physical life. The sun and moon were early selected as outward symbols of this all-pervading power, and the worship of the heavenly bodies was not only the most ancient but the most prevalent system of idolatry. Taking its rise probably in the plains of Chaldea, it spread through Egypt, Greece, Scythia, and even Mexico and Ceylon (compare Deut. iv. 19, xvii. 3; Job xxxi. 26-28). Probably the Israelites learned their first lessons in sun-worship (SUN) from the Egyptians, in whose religious system that luminary, as Osiris, held a prominent place. The Phenicians worshipped him under the title of "Lord of Heaven." (BAAL; TAMMUZ.) AS MOLECH or MILCOM, the sun was worshipped by the Ammonites, and as CHEMOSH by the Moabites. The Hadad of the Syrians is the same deity. The Assyrian Bel or Belus is another form of Baal. (MERODACH; RIMMON; SUCCOTH-BENOTH.) By the later kings of Judah, sacred horses and chariots were dedicated to the sun-god, as by the Persians (2 K. xxiii. 11). The MOON, worshipped by the Phenicians under the name of Astarte or Baaltis, the passive power of nature, as Baal was the active, and known to the Hebrews as ASHTAROTH or ASHTORETH, the tutelary goddess of the Zidonians, appears early among the objects of Israelitish idolatry. (DIANA; MEXI.) But, though we have no positive historical account of star-worship before the Assyrian period, we may infer that it was early practised in a concrete form among the Israelites from the allusions in Am. v. 26, and Acts vii. 42, 43. However this may be, Movers contends that the later star-worship, introduced by Ahaz and followed by Manasseh, was purer and more spiritual in its nature than the Israelitish-Phenician worship of the heavenly bodies under symbolical forms as Baal and ASHERAH; and that it was not idolatry in the same sense that the latter was, but of a simply contemplative character. But there is no reason to believe that the divine honors paid to the "Queen of Heaven" (or, as others render, "the frame" or "structure of the heavens") were equally dissociated from image worship. The allusions in Job xxxviii. 31, 32, are too obscure to allow any inference to be drawn as to the mysterious influences held by the old astrologers to be exercised by the stars over human destiny, nor is there sufficient evidence to connect them with any thing more recondite than the astronomical knowledge of the period. The same may be said of the poetical figure in Deborah's chant of triumph, "the stars from their highways (A. V. 'in their courses') warred with Sisera" (Judg. v. 20). In the later times of the monarchy, Mazzaloth, the planets, or the zodiacal signs (MAZZAROTH) received, next to the sun and moon, their share of popular adoration (2 K. xxiii. 5). (ADRAMMELECH: ANANMELECH; FIRE; JUPITER; MERCURY; NEBO; REMPHAN; TARTAK.) Beast-worship was exemplified in the calves of Jeroboam (CALF), and the hints which seem to point to the goat. (DEVIL 3.) There is no actual proof that the Israelites ever joined in the service of DAGOS, the fish-god of the Philistines, though Ahaziah sent stealthily to Baal-zebub, the fly-god of Ekron (2 K. i.) (BAAL 2), and in later times the brazen serpent (SERPENT, BRAZEN) became the object of idolatrous homage (xviii. 4). (ASHIMA; NERGAL; NIBHAZ.) Of pure hero-worship among the Shemitic races we find no trace. The reference in Wis. xiv. 15 (worship of a deceased child) is to a later practice introduced by the Greeks. The singular reverence with which trees have been honored is not without example in the history of the Hebrews. The terebinth (OAK) at Mamre, beneath which Abraham built an altar (Gen. xii. 7, xiii. 18), and the memorial grove planted by him at Beer-sheba (xxi. 33), were intimately connected with patriarchal worship. Mountains and HIGH PLACES were chosen spots for offering sacrifice and incense to idols (1 K. xi. 7, xiv. 23); and the retirement of gardens and the thick shade of woods offered great attractions to their worshippers (2 K. xvi. 4; Is. i. 29; Hos. iv. 13). The host of heaven was worshipped on the house-top (2 K. xxiii. 12; Jer. xix. 3, xxxii. 29; Zeph. i. 5). The priests of the false worship are sometimes designated CHEMARIM, a word of Syriac origin applied to the non-Levitical priests who burnt incense on the high places (2 K. xxiii. 5) as well as to the priests of the calves (Hos. x. 5). In addition to the priests there were other persons intimately connected with idolatrous rites, and the impurities from which they were inseparable. Both men and women consecrated themselves to the service of idols: the former as kēdēshim (Heb. plural masculine, A. V. "Sodomites," Deut. xxiii. 17, &c.; Sodomites); the latter as kēdēshōth (Heb. plural feminine), who wove shrines for Astarte (2 K. xxiii. 7). The same class of women existed among the Phenicians, Armenians, Lydians, and Babylonians (Bar. vi. 43). They are distinguished from the public prostitutes (Hos. iv. 14) and associated with the performances of sacred rites. (HARLOT.) Besides these accessories, there were the ordinary rites of worship which idolatrous systems had in common with the religion of the Hebrews. Offering burnt sacrifices to the idol gods (2 K. v. 17), burning incense in their honor (1 K. xi. 8), and bowing down in worship before their images (xix. 18), were the chief parts of their ritual; and from their very analogy with the ceremonies of true worship were more seductive than the grosser forms. Nothing can be stronger or more positive than the language in which these ceremonies were denounced by Hebrew law. Every detail of idol-worship was made the subject of a separate enactment, and many of the laws, which in themselves seem trivial and almost absurd, receive from this point of view their true significance. We are told by Maimonides that the prohibitions against sowing a field with mingled seed, and wearing garments of mixed material, were directed against the practices of idolaters, who attributed a kind of magical influence to the mixture (Lev. xix. 19). Such too were the precepts which forbade that the garments of the sexes should be interchanged (Deut. xxiii. 5). There are supposed to be allusions to the practice of necromancy in Is. lxv. 4, or at any rate to superstitious rites in connection with the dead. (DIVINATION; MAGIC.) Cutting the flesh for the dead (Lev. xix. 28; 1 K. xviii. 28), and making a baldness between the eyes (Deut. xiv. 1), were associated with idolatrous rites: the latter being a custom among the Syrians. (HAIR; MOURNING.) The law which regulated CLEAN and UNCLEAN meats (Lev. xx. 23-26) may be considered both as a sanitary regulation and also as tending to separate the Israelites from the surrounding idolatrous nations. The mouse, one of the unclean animals of Leviticus (xi. 29), was sacrificed by the ancient MAGI (Is. lxvi. 17). Eating of the things offered was a necessary appendage to the sacrifice (compare Ex. xviii. 12, xxxii. 6, xxxiv. 15; Num. xxv. 2, &c.). The Israelites were forbidden "to print any mark upon them" (Lev. xix. 28), because it was a custom of idolaters to brand upon their flesh some symbol of the deity they worshipped, as the ivy-leaf of Bacchus (3 Mc. ii. 29). Many other practices of false worship are alluded to, and made the subjects of rigorous prohibition, but none are more frequently or more severely denounced than those which peculiarly distinguished the worship of Molech. It has been attempted to deny that the worship of this idol was polluted by the foul stain of human sacrifice, but the allusions are too plain and too pointed to admit of reasonable doubt (Deut. xii. 31; 2 K. iii. 27; Jer. vii. 31; Ps. cvi. 37; Ez. xxiii. 29). Nor was this practice confined to the rites of Molech; it extended to those of Baal (Jer. xix. 5), and the king of Moab (2 K. iii. 27) offered his son as a burnt-offering to his god Chemosh. Kissing the images of the gods (1 K. xix. 18; Hos. xiii. 2), hanging votive offerings in their temples (1 Sam. xxi. 10), and carrying them to battle (2 Sam. v. 21), as the Jews of Maccabeus' army did with the things consecrated to the idols of the Jamnites (2 Mc. xii. 40), are usages connected with idolatry which are casually mentioned, though not made the objects of express legislation. But soothsaying, interpretation of dreams, necromancy, witchcraft, magic, and other forms of divination, are alike forbidden (Deut. xviii. 9; 2 K. i. 2; Is. lxv. 4; Ez. xxi. 21).—III. It remains now briefly to consider the light in which idolatry was regarded in the Mosaic code, and the penalties with which it was visited. If one main object of the Hebrew polity was to teach the unity of God, the extermination of idolatry was but a subordinate end. JEHOVAH, the God of the Israelites, was the civil head of the State. He was the theocratic king of the people, who had delivered them from bondage, and to whom they had taken a willing oath of allegiance. Idolatry, therefore, to an Israelite was a state offence (1 Sam. xv. 23), a political crime of the gravest character, high-treason against the majesty of his king. But it was much more than all this. While the idolatry of foreign nations is stigmatized merely as an abomination in the sight of God, which called for His vengeance, the sin of the Israelites is regarded as of more glaring enormity and greater moral guilt. In the figurative language of the prophets, the relation between Jehovah and His people is represented as a marriage bond (Is. liv. 5; Jer. iii. 14), and the worship of false gods with all its accompaniments (Lev. xx. 56) becomes then the greatest of social wrongs (Hos. ii.; Jer. iii., &c.). (ADULTERY.) Regarded in a moral aspect, false gods are called "stumbling-blocks" (Ez. xiv. 3), "lies" (Am. ii. 4; Rom. i. 25), "horrors" or frights (Jer. i. 38; Idol 3, 4), "abominations" (Deut. xix. 17, xxxii. 18; 1 K. xi. 5; 2 K. xxiii. 13), "sin" (Am. viii. 14), and with a profound sense of the degradation consequent upon their worship, they are characterized by the prophets, whose mission it was to warn the people against them (Jer. xlv. 4), as "shameful thing," "shame" (xi. 13; Hos. ix. 10). As considered with reference to Jehovah, they are "other gods" (Josh. xxiv. 2, 16), "strange gods" (Deut. xxxii. 16), "new gods"

(Judg. v. 8), "devils—not God" (Deut. xxxii. 17; 1 Cor. x. 20, 21). Idolatry, therefore, being from one point of view a political offence, could be punished without infringement of civil rights. No civil penalties were attached to mere opinions, but overt acts of idolatry were made the subjects of legislation. The first and second commandments are directed against idolatry of every form. Individuals and communities were equally amenable to the rigorous code. The individual offender was devoted to destruction (Ex. xxii. 20); his nearest relatives were not only bound to denounce him and deliver him up to punishment (Deut. xiii. 2–10), but their hands were to strike the first blow when, on the evidence of two witnesses at least, he was stoned (xvii. 2–5). To attempt to seduce others to false worship was a crime of equal enormity (xiii. 6–10). An idolatrous nation shared a similar fate.—IV. Much indirect evidence on this subject might be supplied by an investigation of proper names. Traces of the sun-worship of the ancient Canaanites remain in the nomenclature of their country, e. g. BETH-SHEMESH, house of the sun, EN-SHEMESH, spring of the sun, and IR-SHEMESH, city of the sun. SAMSON, the Hebrew national hero, took his name from the same luminary, and was born in a mountain-village above the modern 'Ain Shems (En-shemesh). The name of Baal, the sun-god, is one of the most common occurrence in compound words, and is often associated with places consecrated to his worship. The Moon, Astarte or ASHTAROTH, gave her name to a city of Bashan (Josh. xiii. 12, 31). Nebo enters into many compounds: NEBUZARADAN, SANGAR-NEBO, &c. Bel is found in BELSHAZZAR, BELT-SHAZZAR, &c. Chemosh, the fire-god of Moab, appears in CARCHEMISH, and Peor in BETH-PEOR. MALCOM, a name which occurs but once, and then of a Moabite by birth, may have been connected with Molech and Milcom. A glimpse of star-worship may be seen in the name of the city CHESIL. It is impossible to pursue this investigation to any length: the hints that have been thrown out may prove suggestive.

Id-u-el (fr. Gr.) = ARIEL 1 (1 Esd. viii. 43).

Id-u-me'a (L. Idumæa, fr. EDOM) = the land of EDOM (Is. xxxiv. 5, 6; Ez. xxxv. 13, xxxvi. 5; 1 Mc. iv. 15, 29, 61, v. 3, vi. 31; 2 Mc. xii. 32; Mk. iii. 8).

Id-u-me'aus = EDOMITES, inhabitants of Idumea, or descendants of EDOM (2 Mc. x. 15, 16).

Igal (fr. Heb. = God will avenge, Ges.). 1. One of the spies, son of Joseph, of the tribe of Issachar (Num. xiii. 13).—2. One of David's "valiant men," son of Nathan of Zobah (2 Sam. xxiii. 36); = JOEL 8.

Ig-da-Wah (fr. Heb. = Jehovah will make great, Ges.), a prophet or holy man—"the man of God"—named once only (Jer. xxxv. 4), as the father of Hanan.

Ige-al (fr. Heb. = IGAL), son of Shemaiah; a descendant of the royal house of Judah (1 Chr. iii. 22).

Iim (fr. Heb. = ruins, Ges.). 1. The partial or contracted form of IJE-ABARIM (Num. xxxiii. 45).—2. A town in the extreme S. of Judah (Josh. xv. 29). AZEM.

* I'im (fr. Heb.) (Is. xiii. 22 margin). BEAST 6.

Ije-ab-ri-m (fr. Heb. = the heaps, or ruins, of the further regions, Mr. Grove; ruins at or on Abarim, Ges.), one of the later halting-places of the children of Israel (Num. xxi. 11, xxxiii. 44), on the S. E. boundary of Moab; not on the pasture-downs of the modern Belka, but in the waste uncultivated

"wilderness" on its skirts (xxi. 11); = IIM 1; not identified. ABARIM; DESERT 2.

* I'Im (fr. Heb.) (Is. xxxiv. 14, margin). BEAST 6.

Ijon (fr. Heb. = a ruin, Ges.), a town in the N. of Palestine, belonging to Naphtali. It was taken and plundered by the captains of Ben-hadad (1 K. xv. 20; 2 Chr. xvi. 4), and a second time by Tiglath-pileser (2 K. xv. 29). At the base of the mountains of Naphtali, a few miles N. W. of the site of Dan, is a fertile and beautiful little plain called Merj 'Ayn, and near its N. end is a large mound, Tell Dibbin, on which are traces of a strong and ancient city, probably the site of Ijon (so Robinson, Porter, Van de Velde, Thomson, &c.).

Ik'kesh (Heb. perverse, Ges.), father of IRA the Tekoite (2 Sam. xxiii. 26; 1 Chr. xi. 28, xxvii. 9).

I'lal (Heb. supreme, Ges.), an Ahohite, one of David's "valiant men" (1 Chr. xi. 29). ZALMON.

Il-tyr'i-um (L. fr. Gr.; according to Appian named from Illyria, son of the Cyclops Polyphemus, and progenitor of the people), an extensive district lying along the eastern coast of the Adriatic from the boundary of Italy on the N. to Epirus on the S., and contiguous to Mæsia and Macedonia on the E. (Rom. xv. 19). Within these limits was DALMATIA.

Im'age. IDOL.

Im'la (fr. Heb. = whom God makes full, Ges.), father or progenitor of Micaiah the prophet (2 Chr. xviii. 7, 8); = IMLAH.

Im'lah (fr. Heb.) = IMLA (1 K. xxii. 8, 9).

Im-man'u-el (Heb. God with us; L. form EMMANUEL), the symbolical name given by the prophet Isaiah to the child who was announced to Ahaz and the people of Judah, as the sign which God would give of their deliverance from their enemies (Is. vii. 14). It is applied by the Apostle Matthew to the Messiah, born of the Virgin (A. V. "Emmanuel," Mat. i. 23). In the early part of the reign of Ahaz the kingdom of Judah was threatened with annihilation by the combined armies of Syria and Israel. Jerusalem was menaced with a siege. The king had gone to "the conduit of the upper pool," when the prophet met him with the message of consolation. Not only were the designs of the hostile armies to fail, but within sixty-five years the kingdom of Israel would be overthrown. In confirmation of his words, the prophet bids Ahaz ask a sign of Jehovah, which the king, with pretended humility, refused to do. After administering a severe rebuke to Ahaz for his obstinacy, Isaiah announces the sign which Jehovah Himself would give unasked: "Behold! the virgin is with child and beareth a son, and she shall call his name Immanuel." The interpreters of this passage are naturally divided into three classes. The first class consists of those who refer the fulfilment of the prophecy to an historical event, which followed immediately upon its delivery. The majority of Christian writers, till within the last fifty years, form a second class, and apply the prophecy exclusively to the Messiah; while a third class, almost equally numerous, consider both these explanations true, and hold that the prophecy had an immediate and literal fulfilment, but was completely accomplished in the miraculous conception and birth of JESUS CHRIST. Among the first are the Jewish writers of all ages, without exception. Some, as Rashi and Aben Ezra, refer the prophecy to a son of Isaiah himself, others to Hezekiah, and others, as Kimchi and Abarbanel, to a son of Ahaz by another wife. Interpreters of the second class, who refer the prophecy solely to the Messiah, of course understand by the "virgin" the Virgin Mary. Against this hypothesis of a solely Messianic reference, it is objected that the birth of the Messiah could not be a sign of deliverance to the people of Judah in the time of Ahaz. Vitringa explains it thus: as surely as Messiah would be born of the virgin, so surely would God deliver the Jews from the threatened evil. But this explanation involves another difficulty. Before the child shall arrive at years of discretion, the prophet announces the desolation of the land whose kings threatened Ahaz. In view of the difficulties which attend these explanations of the prophecy, the third class of interpreters above alluded to have recourse to a theory which combines the two preceding, viz. the hypothesis of the double sense. They suppose that the immediate reference of the prophet was to some contemporary occurrence, but that his words received their true and full accomplishment in the birth of the Messiah. From the manner in which the quotation occurs in Mat. i. 23, there can be no doubt that the Evangelist did not use it by way of accommodation, but as having in view its actual accomplishment. Whatever may have been his opinion as to any contemporary or immediate reference it might contain, this was completely obscured by the full conviction that burst upon him when he realized its completion in the Messiah. The hypothesis of the double sense satisfies most of the requirements of the problem, and as it is at the same time supported by the analogy of the apostle's quotations from the O. T. (Mat. ii. 15, 18, 23, iv. 15), we accept it as approximating most nearly to the true solution (so Mr. Wright, author of this article). OLD TESTAMENT, B, 2.

Immer (Heb. talkative, Ges.). 1. The founder of an important family of priests (1 Chr. ix. 12; Ezr. ii. 37, x. 20; Neh. iii. 29, vii. 40, xi. 13; Jer. xx. 1). This family had charge of, and gave its name to, the sixteenth course of the service (1 Chr. xxiv. 14).—2. Apparently a place in Babylonia, from which some returned to Jerusalem who could not prove their genealogy (Ezr. ii. 59; Neh. vii. 61).

* Im-mor-tal'-ty (fr. L.), the A. V. translation of—1. Gr. athanasia = deathlessness, exemption from death (1 Cor. xv. 53, 54; 1 Tim. vi. 16).—2. Gr. aphtharsia = incorruption, exemption from decay, Robinson, N. T. Lex. (Rom. ii. 7; 2 Tim. i. 10), elsewhere translated "incorruption" (1 Cor. xv. 42, 50, 53, 54) and "sincerity," i. e. moral incorruptness (Eph. vi. 24; Tit. ii. 7). DEATH; ETERNAL; LIFE; RESURRECTION.

Im'na (fr. Heb. = whom God keeps back, Ges.), a prince of Asher; son of Helem (1 Chr. vii. 35; compare 40).

Im'nah (fr. Heb. = good fortune, Ges.; = JIMNA, JIMNAH). 1. The first-born of Asher (1 Chr. vii. 30) = JIMNAH.—2. A Levite, father of Kore, who assisted in the reforms of Hezekiah (2 Chr. xxxi. 14).

* Im-pate' (fr. L. imputo = to bring into the reckoning, to reckon, charge or ascribe, Andrews' Friend's L. Lex.), to, the A. V. translation of—1. Heb. hāshab or chāshab (Lev. vii. 18, xvii. 4; Ps. xxxii. 2), elsewhere translated "to think" (Gen. i. 20; Job xxxv. 2, &c.), "to count" (Lev. xxv. 27, 31, 52, &c.), "to reckon" (Num. xxiii. 9, &c.), "to esteem" (Is. liii. 3, 4; Lam. iv. 2, &c.), "to devise" (2 Sam. xiv. 14; Esth. viii. 3, &c.), "to imagine" (Ps. x. 2, &c.), "to purpose" (Lam. ii. 8, &c.), &c.—2. Heb. sim or sim (1 Sam. xxii. 15; 2 Sam. xix. 19, Heb. 20), usually translated "to put" (Gen. ii.

8, xxiv. 2, 9, 47, &c.), "to set" (iv. 15, vi. 16, &c.), or "to make" (xxi. 13, 18, &c.). In Hab. i. 11, there is no Hebrew equivalent.—3. Gr. ellogé (Rom. v. 13 only), elsewhere translated "put on account" (Phn. 18 only).—4. Gr. logizomai (Rom. iv. 6, 8, 11, 22–24; Gal. iii. 6, margin; 2 Cor. v. 19; Jas. ii. 23), elsewhere translated "to reason" (Mk. xi. 31), "to reckon" (Lk. xxii. 37; Rom. iv. 4, 9, 10, &c.), "to number" (Mk. xv. 28), "to count" (Rom. ii. 26, iv. 3, 5, &c.), "to account" (viii. 36; 1 Cor. iv. 1, &c.), "to think" (Rom. ii. 3; 1 Cor. xiii. 5, 11, &c.), "to suppose" (2 Cor. xi. 5; 1 Pet. v. 12), "to conclude" (Rom. iii. 28), &c.; in LXX. = No. 1).

Im'rah (fr. Heb. = refractory, Ges.), a chief of Asher, of the family of זִפְרָה (1 Chr. vii. 36).

Im'ri (Heb. eloquent, Ges.). 1. A man of Judah of the family of Pharez (1 Chr. ix. 4).—2. Father or progenitor of ZACCUR 4 (Neh. iii. 2).

Incense (Heb. kitórâh, kitórêh, lībônâh [FRANKINCENSE]; Gr. thumíama). The incense employed in the service of the tabernacle was compounded of the perfumes stacte, onycha, galbanum, and pure frankincense. All incense not made of these ingredients was forbidden to be offered (Ex. xxx. 9). According to Rashi on Ex. xxx. 34, the above-mentioned perfumes were mixed in equal proportions, seventy manehs being taken of each. In addition to the four ingredients already mentioned, Rashi enumerates seven others. Josephus mentions thirteen. The proportions of the additional spices are given by Maimonides as follows: Of myrrh, cassia, spikenard, and saffron, sixteen manehs each. Of costus twelve manehs, cinnamon nine manehs, sweet bark three manehs. The weight of the whole confectio was 368 manehs. To these was added the fourth part of a cab of salt of Sodom, with amber of Jordan, and an herb called "the smoke-raiser," known only to the cunning in such matters, to whom the secret descended by tradition. In the ordinary daily service, one maneh was used, half in the morning and half in the evening. Allowing then one maneh of incense for each day of the solar year, the three manehs which remained were again pounded, and used by the high-priest on the day of atonement (Lev. xvi. 12). A store of it was constantly kept in the Temple. The incense possessed the threefold characteristic of being salted (not "tempered," as in A. V.), pure and holy. Salt was the symbol of incorruptness, and nothing, says Maimonides, was offered without it, except the wine of the drink-offerings, the blood, and the wood (compare Lev. ii. 13). Aaron, as high-priest, was originally appointed to offer incense, but in the daily service of the second Temple the office devolved upon the inferior priests, from among whom one was chosen by lot (Lk. i. 9), each morning and evening. The officiating priest appointed another, whose office it was to take the fire from the brazen altar. The times of offering incense were specified in the instructions first given to Moses (Ex. xxx. 7, 8). The morning incense was offered when the lamps were trimmed in the Holy place, and before the sacrifice, when the watchman set for the purpose announced the break of day. When the lamps were lighted "between the evenings," after the evening sacrifice and before the drink-offerings were offered, incense was again burnt on the golden altar, which belonged to the oracle (A. V. "that was by the oracle," 1 K. vi. 22), and stood before the veil which separated the Holy place from the Holy of Holies, the throne of God (Rev. viii. 4). When the priest entered the Holy place with the incense, all the people were removed from the Temple, and from between the porch and the altar (compare Lk. i. 10). Profound silence was observed among the congregation who were praying without (compare Rev. viii. 1), and at a signal from the prefect the priest cast the incense on the fire, and, bowing reverently toward the Holy of Holies, retired slowly backward, not prolonging his prayer, that he might not alarm the congregation, or cause them to fear that he had been struck dead for offering unworthily (Lev. xvi. 13; Lk. i. 21). On the day of atonement (ATONEMENT, DAY OF) the service was different. The offering of incense has formed a part of the religious ceremonies of most ancient nations. It was an element in the idolatrous worship of the Israelites (Jer. xi. 12, 17, xlviii. 35; 2 Chr. xxxiv. 25). With regard to the symbolical meaning of incense, opinions have been many and widely differing. Fairbairn, with many others, looks upon prayer as the reality of which incense is the symbol (Ps. cxli. 2; Rev. v. 8, viii. 3, 4). Looking upon incense in connection with the other ceremonial observances of the Mosaic ritual, it would rather seem to be symbolical, not of prayer itself, but of that which makes prayer acceptable, the intercession of Christ (so Mr. Wright). In Rev. viii. 3, 4, the incense is spoken of as something distinct from, though offered with, the prayers of all the saints (compare Lk. i. 10); and in Rev. v. 8 it is the golden vials, and not the odors or incense, which are said to be the prayers of saints.

India [ind'yā, or in'de-ā] (L. fr. the river Indus; Heb. Hōdū). The name of India does not occur in the Bible before Esther, where it is noticed as the limit of the territories of Ahasuerus in the E., as Ethiopia was in the W. (Esth. i. 1, viii. 9). The India of Esther is not the peninsula of Hindostan, but the country surrounding the Indus, the Punjab and perhaps Scinde. In 1 Mc. viii. 8, India is reckoned among the countries which Eumenes, king of Pergamus, received out of the former possessions of Antiochus the Great. (IONIA.) A more authentic notice of the country occurs in 1 Mc. xi. 37. But though the name of India occurs so seldom, the people and productions of that country must have been tolerably well known to the Jews. There is undoubted evidence that an active trade was carried on between India and Western Asia. (ARABIA.) The trade opened by Solomon with Ophir through the Red Sea chiefly consisted of Indian articles. The connection thus established with India led to the opinion that the Indians were included under the ethnological title of Cush (Gen. x. 6).

* In-gath-er-ing, Feast of (Ex. xxiii. 16). TABERNACLES, FEAST OF.

Ink, Ink'horn. WRITING.

Inn. The Heb. nālōn thus rendered literally = a lodging-place for the night. Inns, in our sense of the term, were, as they still are, unknown in the East, where hospitality is religiously practised.

The khans, or caravanserais, are the representatives of European inns, and these were established but gradually. It is doubtful whether there is any allusion to them in the O. T. The halting-place of a caravan was selected originally on account of its proximity to water or pasture, by which the travellers pitched their tents and passed the night. Such was undoubtedly the "inn" at which occurred the incident in the life of Moses, narrated in Ex. iv. 24 (compare Gen. xlii. 27, xliii. 21). On the more frequented routes, remote from towns (Jer. ix. 2, A. V. "lodging-place"), caravanserais were in course of time erected, often at the expense of the wealthy. The following description of one of those on the road from Bagdad to Babylon will suffice for all:—"It is a large and substantial square building, in the distance resembling a fortress, being surrounded with a lofty wall, and flanked by round towers to defend the inmates in case of attack. Passing through a strong gateway, the guest enters a large court, the sides of which are divided into numerous arched compartments, open in front, for the accommodation of separate parties and for the reception of goods. In the centre is a spacious raised platform, used for sleeping upon at night, or for the devotions of the faithful during the day. Between the outer wall and the compartments are wide vaulted arcades, extending round the entire building, where the beasts of burden are placed. Upon the roof of the arcades is an excellent terrace, and over the gateway an elevated tower containing two rooms—one of which is open at the sides, permitting the occupants to enjoy every breath of air that passes across the heated plain. The terrace is tolerably clean; but the court and stabling below are ankle-deep in chopped straw and filth" (Loftus, Chaldea, p. 13). The "inn" (Gr. pandocheion, lit. a place where all are received, Rbn. N. T. Lex.) of

Luke x. 34 probably differed from the "inn" (Gr. kataluma = lodging-place, translated "guest-chamber" in Mk. xiv. 14 and Lk. xxii. 11) of Luke ii. 7, in having a "host" or "innkeeper" (x. 35), who supplied some few of the necessary provisions, and attended to the wants of travellers left to his charge. BARN; HOSPITALITY; HOUSE; MANGER.

* In-spi-ra-tion (fr. L., lit. an in-breathing).—I. This word occurs twice in the A. V.—1. In Job xxxii. 8, as the translation of the Heb. nishāmāh, usually and literally translated "breath" (Gen. ii. 7, vii. 22; Job xxxiii. 4, &c.), sometimes "spirit" (xxvi. 4; Prov. xx. 27), or "soul" (Is. lvii. 16), &c. In the A. V. Job xxxii. 8 reads thus: "But there is a spirit in man; and the inspiration of the Almighty giveth them understanding." Gesenius here and in xxxiii. 4 makes the Hebrew = the Spirit of God, imparting wisdom and life; Fürst makes it = the spiritual inspiration of God in man, giving spiritual power and physical life. Wis. xv. 11 speaks of God as having "inspired into (Gr. empneusanta, lit. having breathed in) him (man) an active soul, and breathed in a living spirit."—2. In 2 Tim. iii. 16 in the translation of the Gr. theopneustos, lit. God-breathed or God-inspired, in A. V. "given by inspiration of God." Ver. 16, 17 read: "All Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness, that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works."

•The "is" in both clauses is supplied by the translators; but many would supply "is" only once, thus: "All Scripture given by inspiration of God, is also profitable," &c. This construction is allowable, but less natural than that of the A. V. Some of those who adopt the latter construction understand it, "All" (or every) "Scripture" that is "given by inspiration," &c., implying that some Scripture may not be given by inspiration, and hence that both profitableness for doctrine, &c., and inspiration are strictly affirmed here of only a part of what is known as Scripture. But both the being "given by inspiration" and the being "profitable for doctrine," &c., properly belong, according to the apostle's argument, to "all Scripture." In ver. 15 he gives a characteristic of "the holy Scriptures"—not of some of them merely, but of the whole collection of the O. T. writings thus designated among the Jews (BIBLE; CANON)—"which are able to make thee wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus;" and then he uses like comprehensive language in ver. 16, 17. It makes little difference in the general sense whether the phrase "given by inspiration" is considered with the A. V. as a part of the predicate, or simply as an epithet of the subject "all Scripture." Thus Origen, Bishop Ellicott, Dean Alford, &c., who adopt the latter view, regard the epithet as applying to the entire O. T. Certainly no distinction between inspired and uninspired Scripture is either made or hinted at by the apostle; and the attempts (by Semler, &c.) to introduce such a distinction into the passage are inconsistent with the apostle's argument, with the proper construction of language, and with the known reverence of the Jews and primitive Christians for the whole O. T.—II. Theories and Definitions of the Inspiration of the Scriptures. Setting aside for the present the views of those who deny the divine origin and authority of the Scriptures, there are three theories more or less prevalent among those who claim to be evangelical Christians, which may be styled—1. The mechanical theory, or the theory of verbal inspiration, which holds that not only the thoughts, but also the very words of Scripture, are the direct product of the divine mind, the human writers of the various books being thus only the amanuenses who wrote down the language which the Spirit of God dictated. So (according to Knapp) Justin and other fathers, Schubert, Ernesti, &c.; so (apparently) Gausson.—2. The common Evangelical theory, sometimes called the dynamical theory, which holds that inspiration, without impairing the free use of each writer's own natural powers, so moulded his views in regard to the subject-matter to be communicated to men, and, when necessary, in regard to the very language to be used by him, as to secure the communication in the Scriptures of that, and of that only, which, properly interpreted, is truth—the truth which in its substance and form is in perfect accordance with the divine mind and will. So Henderson, Lee, Torrey, Fitch (see below), Fairbairn, Ayre, the editor of this volume, &c., &c. This theory holds that the inspiration of the Scriptures is perfectly consistent with their recording falsehoods uttered (e. g. by the serpent to Eve), unsound arguments and perverted truths set forth (e. g. by Job's friends), mistakes, faults, and unholy contentions even of apostles and others whom God inspired to communicate truth, uninspired opinions or judgments (e. g. of Paul in 1 Cor. vii.), &c. In such cases the inspiration has nothing to do with originally uttering the language or exhibiting the conduct recorded, but is concerned in making an infallible record of the fact that such language was uttered, such conduct took place in the given circumstances, &c. This theory admits the occurrence in copies of the Scriptures of mistakes in transcribing, translating, and printing, which it is the business of Biblical criticism to investigate and determine. Those who thus agree in maintaining the inspiration of the Scriptures may differ among themselves as to the authorship and dates of composition of particular books, the scope of particular prophecies, the explanation of particular precepts or doctrines, the meaning of particular passages, and even the general principles of interpretation.—3. The broad church or liberal theory, which holds that inspiration secures the infallible correctness of the Scriptures in regard only to moral and religious truth. This theory admits the occurrence in the Scriptures of positive errors or untruths in natural science, chronology, archaeology, geography, &c. So Dr. Samuel Davidson, the late Dr. Thomas Arnold, some of the prominent contributors to Smith's Dictionary of the Bible, Coleridge, Tholuck, Olshausen, &c.—Various and somewhat discrepant definitions have been given of inspiration and revelation. Knapp (Christian Theology) defines inspiration "an extraordinary divine influence by which the teachers of religion were instructed what and how they should write or speak, while discharging the duties of their office." Rev. William Lee (The Inspiration of Holy Scripture, Dublin, 1857) makes inspiration = the assistance afforded in the utterance of God's truth, or in the recording of what God meant to have written in the Scriptures; and revelation = the direct impartation, to the mind of the prophet or seer, of truth which must otherwise be unknown to him (see B. S. xv. 33, 34). Professor Torrey (B. S. xv. 323 ff.) makes revelation = "all God's direct manifestations of Himself, with their necessary connections and dependencies," embracing "the whole circle of truths and of facts, whether knowable or not knowable by unaided human reason, which are necessary to make what God communicates clearly intelligible to, and practically operative on, beings constituted as we are, and with all our passions and infirmities;" and constituting "one simple and connected system of supernatural divine teaching, by word and fact, of which the Scriptures of the O. and N. T. are the faithful record." He defines inspiration "as that guidance from above, whereby the sacred penmen, in committing this divine revelation to writing, were preserved from all such error as would interfere with the end which God, in giving this revelation to man, proposed." Mr. Westcott (Introduction to the Gospels) conceives that "by inspiration "man's "natural powers are quickened, so that he contemplates with a divine intuition the truth as it exists still among the ruins of the moral and physical worlds;" while "by revelation we see, as it were, the dark veil removed from the face of things, so that the true springs and issues of life stand disclosed in their eternal nature." "If you inquire," says Professor E. T. Fitch (B. S. xii. 253), "in what sense the Bible is breathed forth from God, the true answer is, the whole book was prepared by His direction, in subservience to a scheme of redemption through Christ, which had been planned in His eternal wisdom; by men, to whom He gave direct revelations or imparted necessary wisdom and knowledge to guide them in their writings; and that, consequently, the whole book has indorsed upon it His name and authority. While all other books are the books of men, this is the book of God. While others are liable to err respecting truth and duty, this is infallible."—III. Proofs of the Inspiration of all the Scriptures. In opposition to those who admit the truth of the Biblical narrative as a whole and the general credibility of the Scriptures, but deny their inspiration; to those, also, who admit the divine authority of the revelation or system of truth contained in the Scriptures, but deny that the Scriptures, as a whole, constitute this revelation, and would modify or explain away a large portion of their contents as marred by human imperfection, and inconsistent with the real or absolute truth which alone, in their view, the Holy Spirit did or could dictate; we may allege—1. The claim of the Scriptures themselves. A large part of the O. and N. T. consists of what are positively declared to be messages or instructions from God; e. g. the TEN COMMANDMENTS, and many other parts of the Pentateuch (MOSES), and the communications of the prophets generally (PROPHET) (Ex. xx. 1; Lev. i. 1; Num. i. 1; Is. viii. 1, lxvi. 1, &c.). The Apostle Paul gives to the whole O. T. the significant title, "the oracles of God" (Rom. iii. 2). In 2 Tim. iii. 15–17 (see I. above), he claims inspiration for the whole O. T., then familiarly known as "the Holy Scriptures," "the Scriptures" (Mat. xxi. 42, &c.), "the SCRIPTURE" (Jn. vii. 38, 42, &c.), &c. A similar claim for the writings of the O. T. prophets is set up in 2 Pet. i. 20, 21: "No prophecy of the Scripture is of any private interpretation" (i. e. the prophecy is not from the prophet himself as interpreting or unfolding by his own unassisted powers the will or purposes of God, as is further explained in the next verse). "For the prophecy came not in old time" (margin, "at any time," Gr. pote) "by the will of man; but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost." In the N. T. the words of Jesus Himself come with the claim of full divine authority: "For He whom God hath sent, speaketh the words of God: for God giveth not the Spirit by measure unto Him" (Jn. iii. 34). Not merely as He uttered them at first, but as afterward repeated by the apostles, guided according to His promise, into all truth by the Spirit of truth (xvi. 13), and having all things brought to their remembrance (xiv. 26), do these words claim for themselves the credit of being inspired of God. Paul claimed inspiration (1 Cor. ii. 13): "Which things also we speak, not in the words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Holy Ghost teacheth; comparing spiritual things with spiritual" (i. e. comparing the teachings of the Gospel with those of the O. T.; but Robinson [N. T. Lec.] translates combining spiritual things with spirit- ual, i. e. expressing thoughts taught by the Spirit in words taught by the Spirit; Conybeare and Howson translate explaining spiritual things to spiritual men). Both Paul and Peter wrote as "apostles" (Rom. i. 1, &c.; 1 Pet. i. 1, &c.), i. e. as divinely commissioned to communicate the word of God. Peter ranks the epistles of Paul with "the other Scriptures," cites them as agreeing in doctrine with what he taught, and ascribes them to "the wisdom given" unto Paul (2 Pet. iii. 15, 16). The Apostle John, in Revelation, repeatedly exhibits his divine commission, and, in closing the words of his prophecy, solemnly threatens with the wrath of God any man who should add to or take away from them (Rev. i. 1, 19, ii. 1, xiv. 13, xxii. 18, 19, &c.). (See also MARK; LUKE; JUDE, &c.) Thus scattered up and down, from the beginning to the end of the Scriptures of truth, are express claims that they are the inspired word of God.—2. The need of it in order to make the Scriptures truly authoritative as the word of God. If the writers were not divinely inspired, we know neither what nor where the word of God is. If man by his unaided reason must pick out the fragments of absolute or spiritual truth here and there, as he may be able to discover them in the mass of rubbish and valuables, to which those would reduce the Scriptures who regard them as but partially or not at all divinely inspired, he is little better off now than the heathen who for 4,000 years B. C. searched for divine truth by the light of nature, without finding God or arriving at a saving knowledge of His truth even then (Rom. i. 20 ff.). The need of the word of God is not met by any such "inspiration" as is common to mankind generally, or possessed by eminent poets, artists, men of genius, &c.; for this does not exempt their productions from dangerous mistakes and imperfections. The inspiration of the Scriptures is no more impossible than any other miracle (MIRACLES); and the character of God makes it certain that He will give this inspiration, or work any other miracle, whenever it is necessary to promote the ends of wisdom and love for which His government exists.—3. The impossibility of otherwise satisfactorily accounting for the marvellous perfection of the Scriptures as the word of God. They give a rational view of God and of His relations to the universe, and especially to man. They have been—they are—the power of God unto salvation. Where the Scriptures have been known—read—loved, the Christian religion and church have flourished, though multitudes of enemies have risen up and threatened to overwhelm them. Nothing else has been found to fill the place for living power which the Scriptures occupy and have occupied from age to age. They are perfect in their adaptation to the moral and spiritual wants of mankind. It is also a fact that after centuries of investigation by acute and subtle foes, as well as by able and candid friends, the Scriptures can still claim to be consistent with themselves from the beginning of Genesis to the end of Revelation. Countless discrepancies have been discovered, but they are discrepancies in appearance only, not in reality; or if real, their existence may be readily accounted for: e. g. all alleged discrepancies between different parts of Scripture in regard to chronology may be satisfactorily explained, or so far explained, by the supposition of mistakes in copying numbers (ABRAHAM 1; AHAZIAH 2; ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF, &c.), by reference to the Hebrew custom of reckoning incomplete days or years at the beginning or end of a period as if they were complete (compare 1 K. xv. 33, xvi. 6, 8, 10; also Mat. xii. 40, xxvii., xxviii.; and see 1 Sam. xxx. 12, 13; 2 Chr. x. 5, 12, &c.; the ancient Romans, Hebrews, &c., counted that the third day which we should call the second, so that Sunday is the third day after Friday, the fourth after Thursday, &c.), or by the help of some other known or properly supposable fact, as to remove all necessity of regarding them as absolutely irconcilable. Thus Keil and others suppose an interregnum of eleven and a half years between King Jeroboam II. and his son Zachariah, who succeeded him (compare 2 K. xiv. 17, 23, xv. 8), and one of eight and a half years between Pekah and Hoshea his successor (compare xv. 30, xvii. 1). Verbal contradictions and other apparent discrepancies, as in the narratives of events (ACELDAMA; AHAZIAH 2; GOSPELS; JESUS CHRIST, &c.), in the relations of persons to one another (Gen. xii. 5, xiii. 8; see BROTHER, &c.), in commands and precepts (compare Prov. xxvi. 4 with 5; also Gen. ix. 6 with xxii. 2, &c.), in the representations of God (compare Is. vi. 1 with Jn. i. 18; also Gen. vi. 6 with 1 Sam. xv. 29, &c.), in the quotations of the N. T. from the O. T. (OLD TESTAMENT), in the application of prophecies (e. g. IMMANUEL), &c.; these are not real contradictions or discrepancies when properly explained. Still further, the Scriptures harmonize with all discovered truth. The Bible has no geographical, zoological, geological, or astronomical untruths (ANT; CONEY; CREATION; EARTH; HARE; HEAVEN, &c.), though it makes abundant use of popular language, or the language of appearances in distinction from that which is scientifically accurate. As to the discrepancies in CHRONOLOGY and history alleged to exist between the Scriptures, particularly the books of Moses, as we have them, and the records and monuments of EGYPT, ASSYRIA, and other ancient nations, or the discoveries of modern science, we may safely say, that, while many remarkable confirmations of Biblical history, chronology, &c., have been obtained from these, no conclusions derived from any of them which are irreconcilable with the Hebrew Scriptures can be properly said to be so firmly established as to be beyond the possibility of being overthrown by future discoveries in the same direction. The consistency of the Scriptures with themselves and with other known truth is wonderful when we remember that nearly 1,600 years intervened between the beginning and the end of committing them to writing—that they were written in countries hundreds of miles apart, by men of different attainments and habits, occupying different stations in life, and using different languages. Moses in the wilderness of Sinai, David on the throne of Israel, Daniel in the palaces of Babylon and Shushan, Ezekiel among the exiles by the river Chebar, Amos among the herdmen of Tekoa, and Paul in prison at Rome, all inculcate the same great truths. The ideas of many of them in respect to subjects incidentally treated of in the Scriptures were doubtless very inaccurate, yet they uniformly contributed their share to make the Bible the book of truth and perfect excellence. All this can be rationally accounted for only because "all Scripture is given by inspiration of God."—4. The general consent of both Jews and Christians in all ages that the O. T. was given by inspiration, and the general reception by Christians for 1,800 years of the canonical books of the N. T. as inspired. The claims of all the books of the Scriptures were scrutinized by those who were ready to sacrifice their lives for the truth, and were exceedingly scrupulous about receiving as canonical or inspired (and these were, in their minds, closely connected) any book which did not bring with it the proper credentials. The known differences of opinion in regard to some books of the N. T. (CANON), show that evidence of worthiness to be accredited came before any general or even partial reception among Christians of a book as divinely inspired. Both the divine Author of the Gospel and His followers belong to the kingdom of truth (Jn. xviii. 37); and no rational account can be given of the origin of the Scriptures and their general reception among Christians as the word of God, except that they were, as they claim to be, "given by inspiration of God."

In'stant (fr. L.), In'stant-ly, the A. V. translation of five distinct Greek words = pressing, urgent, urgently, or fervently, as will be seen from the following passages (Lk. vii. 4, xxiii. 23; Acts xxvi. 7; Rom. xii. 12). In 2 Tim. iv. 2 we find "be instant in season and out of season," literally, stand ready—be alert for whatever may happen. In Luke ii. 38, "that instant" literally = in that hour.

* In-ter-ces'sion (fr. L.) = PRAYER for another or for others (Jer. vii. 16, &c.); rarely, prayer against others (Rom. xi. 2).

* In-ter-pre-ta'tion (fr. L. = a making known the meaning, explanation). INSPIRATION; OLD TESTAMENT.

I-on-i-a (Gr., said to be named fr. Ion, an early king of the country). The substitution of this word for "INDIA" in 1 Mc. viii. 8 is a conjecture of Grotius without any authority of MSS. The name was given in early times to that part of the western coast of Asia Minor which lay between Æolis on the N. and Doris on the S. In Roman times Ionia ceased to have any political significance, being absorbed in the province of Asia.

Iph-e-de'ah [if-fe-dee'yah] (fr. Heb. = whom Jehovah sets free, Ges.), a Benjamite chief, son of Shashak (1 Chr. viii. 25).

Ir (Heb. city, Ges.) = IRI 1 (1 Chr. vii. 12).

I'ra (Heb. wakeful, Ges.) 1. "The JAIRITE," named in the catalogue of David's great officers (2 Sam. xx. 26).—2. "The ITHRITE," one of David's "valiant men" (xxiii. 38; 1 Chr. xi. 40).—3. Another of David's "valiant men," a Tekoite, son of Ikkes, and captain of the sixth monthly course (2 Sam. xxiii. 26; 1 Chr. xi. 28, xxvii. 9).

I'rad (Heb. = ARAD?; = JARED, Fū.), son of Enoch; grandson of Cain, and father of Mehujael (Gen. iv. 18).

I'ram (Heb. belonging to a city, Ges.), a "duke" of the Edomites (Gen. xxxvi. 43; 1 Chr. i. 54), i. e. the chief of a family or tribe. No identification of him or of his posterity has been found.

Ir-ha-he're's (Heb., see below), in A. V. "the city of destruction" (margin "Heres," or "the sun"), the name or an appellation of a city in Egypt, mentioned only in Is. xix. 18. There are various explanations. 1. The city of the sun, a translation of the Egyptian sacred name of Heliopolis. (Os.) 2. The city Heres, a transcription in the second word of the Egyptian sacred name of Heliopolis, Ha-ra, the abode (literally house) of the sun. 3. A city destroyed, literally a city of destruction, meaning that one of the five cities mentioned should be destroyed, according to Isaiah's idiom. 4. A city preserved, meaning that one of the five cities mentioned should be preserved. The first of these explanations is highly improbable, for we find elsewhere both the sacred and civil names of Heliopolis, so that a third name merely a variety of the Hebrew rendering of the sacred name is very unlikely. The second explanation, which we believe has not been hitherto put forth, is liable to the same objection as the preceding one, besides that it necessitates the exclusion of the article. The fourth explanation would not have been noticed, had it not been supported by the name of Gesenius. The common reading and old rendering remain, which certainly present no critical difficulties. A very careful examination of the nineteenth chapter of Isaiah, and of the eighteenth and twentieth, which are connected with it, has inclined us to prefer it (so Mr. R. S. Poole, original author of this article). Calvin supposes the passage to mean that five cities of Egypt would profess the true religion = "speak the language of Canaan," while one rejecting it would be called "city of destruction," not as its proper name, but as descriptive of its doom.

Iri (Heb. = IRAM). 1. A Benjamite, son of Bela (1 Chr. vii. 7); = IR.—2. URIAH 3 (1 Esd. viii. 62).

I-ri'jah (Heb. fountain [i. e. constituted] of Jehovah, Ges.), son of Shelemiah; a "captain of the ward," who met Jeremiah in the gate of Jerusalem called the "gate of Benjamin," accused him of being about to desert to the Chaldeans, and led him back to the princes (Jer. xxxvii. 13, 14).

Ir-na-hash, or Ir-na'hash (Heb. serpent-city), a name which, like many other names of places, occurs in the genealogical lists of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 12, margin "the city of Nahash"). No trace of it attached to any site has been discovered. Ir-nahash = BETHLEHEM 1 (so Jerome). NAHASH 2.

Iron (fr. Heb. = piety? Ges.), a city of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 38); identified by Van de Velde (i. 173), &c., with Yarân, a village about ten miles W. of Lake Merom.

Iron [i'urn] (Heb. barzel; Chal. parz'la; Gr. sideros), mentioned with brass as the earliest of known metals (Gen. iv. 22). As it is rarely found in its native state, but generally in combination with oxygen, the knowledge of the art of forging iron, which is attributed to Tubal Cain, argues an acquaintance with the difficulties which attend the smelting of this metal. Iron melts at about 3,000° Fahrenheit, and to produce this heat large furnaces supplied by a strong blast of air are necessary. A method is employed by the natives of India, extremely simple and of great antiquity, which though rude is very effective, and suggests the possibility of similar knowledge in an early stage of civilization. Malleable iron was in common use, but it is doubtful whether the ancients were acquainted with cast-iron. The natural wealth of the soil of Canaan is indicated by describing it as "a land whose stones are iron" (Deut. viii. 9). The book of Job contains passages which indicate that iron was well known. It declares that "iron is taken out of the earth" (Job xxviii. 2, margin "dust"). The "furnace of iron" (Deut. iv. 28; 1 K. viii. 51) is a figure which vividly expresses hard bondage, as represented by the severe labor which attended the operation of smelting. Sheet-iron was used for cooking-utensils (Ez. iv. 3; compare Lev. vii. 9). That it was plentiful in the time of David appears from 1 Chr. xxii. 3. The market of Tyre was supplied with bright or polished iron by the merchants of Dan and Javan (Ez. xxvii. 19). The Chalybes of the Pontus were celebrated as workers in iron in very ancient times. The produce of their labor is supposed to be alluded to in Jer. xv. 12, as being of superior quality. It was long supposed that the Egyptians were ignorant of the use of iron, and that the allusions in the Pentateuch were anachronisms, as no traces of it have been found in their monuments; but in the sepulchres at Thebes butchers are represented as sharpening their knives on a round bar of metal attached to their aprons, which from its blue color is presumed to be STEEL. One iron mine only has been discovered in Egypt, which was worked by the ancients. It is at Hammami, between the Nile and the Red Sea; the iron found by Mr. Burton was in the form of specular and red ore. That no articles of iron should have been found is easily accounted for by the fact that it is easily destroyed by moisture and exposure to the air. The Egyptians obtained their iron almost exclusively from Assyria Proper in the form of bricks or pigs. Specimens of Assyrian iron-work overlaid with bronze were discovered by Mr. Layard, and are now in the British Museum. Iron weapons of various kinds were found at Nimroud, but fell to pieces on exposure to the air. The rendering given by the LXX. of Job xl. 18—verse 13, in the LXX. "his backbone (is) iron poured," i. e. made liquid, melted, cast; A. V. "his bones (are) like bars of iron"—seems to imply that some method nearly like that of casting was known, and is supported by a passage in Diodorus (v. 13). In Eccles. xxxviii. 28, we have a picture of the interior of an iron-smith's (Is. xlv. 12) workshop. ARMS; AXE; CHARIOT; FURNACE; HANDICRAFT; KNIFE; METALS; MINES; TOOL, &c.

Ir-pe-el (fr. Heb. = restored by God), one of the cities of Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 27); site unknown.

Ir-she'mesh (Heb. city of the sun), a city of the Danites (Josh. xix. 41), probably = BETH-SHEMESH, and, if not identical, at least connected with Mount HERES (Judg. i. 35).

Iru (Heb. = IRAM?), eldest son of the great CALEB son of Jephunneh (1 Chr. iv. 15).

Isaac [-zak] (fr. Heb. = laughter), the son whom Sarah, in accordance with the Divine promise, bore to ABRAHAM, probably at Gerar, when Abraham was one hundred and Sarah ninety years old (Gen. xvii. 17). In his infancy he became the object of Ishmael's jealousy; and in his youth (when twenty-five years old, according to Jos. i. 13, § 2) the victim, in intention, of Abraham's great sacrificial act of faith. When forty years old he married REBEKAH his cousin, by whom, when he was sixty, he had two sons, ESAC and JACOB. In his seventy-fifth year he and his brother Ishmael buried their father Abraham in the cave of Machpelah. From his abode by the well Lahai-roi, in the South Country—a barren tract, comprising a few pastures and wells, between the hills of Judea and the Arabian desert, touching at its W. end Philistia, and on the N. Hebron—Isaac was driven by a famine to Gerar. Here Jehovah appeared to him and bade him dwell there and not go over into Egypt, and renewed to him the promises made to Abraham. Here he subjected himself, like Abraham in the same place and under like circumstances (Gen. xx. 2), to a rebuke from Abimelech, the Philistine king, for an equivocation. Here he acquired great wealth by his flocks; but was repeatedly dispossessed by the Philistines of the wells which he sunk at convenient stations. At Beer-sheba Jehovah appeared to him by night and blessed him, and he built an altar there: there, too, like Abraham, he received a visit from the Philistine king Abimelech, with whom he made a covenant of peace. After the deceit by which

Jacob acquired his father's blessing, Isaac sent his son to seek a wife in Pudan-aram; and all that we know of him during the last forty-three years of his life is that he saw that son, with a large and prosperous family, return to him at Hebron (xxxv. 27) before he died there at the age of 180 years. He was buried by his two sons in the cave of Machpelah. In the N. T. reference is made to the offering of Isaac (Heb. xi. 17; Jas. ii. 21), and to his blessing his sons (Heb. xi. 20). As the child of the promise, and as the progenitor of the children of the promise, he is contrasted with Ishmael (Rom. ix. 7, 10; Gal. iv. 28; Heb. xi. 18). In our Lord's remarkable argument with the Sadducees, his history is carried beyond the point at which it is left in the O. T., and beyond the grave. Isaac, of whom it was said (Gen. xxxv. 29) that he was gathered to his people, is represented as still living to God (Lk. xx. 38, &c.); and by the same Divine authority he is proclaimed as an acknowledged heir of future glory (Mat. viii. 11, &c.). It has been asked, What are the persecutions sustained by Isaac from Ishmael to which St. Paul refers (Gal. iv. 29)? Rashi relates a Jewish tradition of Isaac suffering personal violence from Ishmael, a tradition which, as Mr. Ellicott thinks, was adopted by St. Paul. But Origen and Augustine seem to doubt whether the passage in Gen. xxi. 9 bears the construction apparently put upon it. The offering up of Isaac by Abraham has been viewed in various lights. By Bishop Warburton (Div. Leg. vi. § 5) the whole transaction was regarded as "merely an information by action, instead of words, of the great sacrifice of Christ for the redemption of mankind, given at the earnest request of Abraham, who longed impatiently to see Christ's day." Mr. Maurice (Patristics and Laugivers, iv.) draws attention to the offering of Isaac as the last and culminating point in the divine education of Abraham, that which taught him the meaning and ground of self-sacrifice. Isaac, the gentle and dutiful son, the faithful and constant husband, became the father of a house in which order did not reign. His life, judged by a worldly standard, might seem inactive, ignoble, and unfruitful; but the guileless years, prayers, gracious acts, and daily thank-offerings of pastoral life are not to be so esteemed, though they make no show in history. The typical view of Isaac is barely referred to in the N. T.; but it is drawn out with minute particularity by Philo and those interpreters of Scripture who were influenced by Alexandrian philosophy. Jewish legends represent Isaac as an angel made before the world, and descending to earth in human form; as one of the three men in whom human sinfulness has no place, as one of the six over whom the angel of death has no power; as instructed in Divine knowledge by Shem; as the originator of evening prayer.

* Isai (L. fr. Heb.) = JESSE (1 Chr. x. 14, margin).

I-sai'ah [-za'yah] (fr. Heb. = salvation of Jehovah; Jah is helper, Fii.; = JESAJAH, JESAJAH), the prophet, son of AMOZ. (BIBLE; CANON; INSPIRATION; OLD TESTAMENT; PROPHET.) Kimchi (A. D. 1230) says in his commentary on Is. i. 1, "We know not his race, nor of what tribe he was." I. The first verse of his book runs thus: "The vision of Isaiah the son of Amoz, which he saw concerning Judah and Jerusalem in the days of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah." A few remarks on this verse (so Mr. Huxtable, original author of this article) will open the way to the solution of several inquiries relative to the prophet and his writings. 1. This verse plainly prefaces at least the first part of the book (chs. i.-xxxix.), which leaves off in Hezekiah's reign; and the obvious construction would take it as applying to the whole book. 2. We are authorized to infer, that no part of the vision, the fruits of which are recorded in this book, belongs to the reign of Manasseh. A rabbinical tradition, indeed, apparently confirmed by Heb. xi. 37, reports that Isaiah was sawn asunder in the trunk of a tree by order of Manasseh; and a very old mulberry-tree, near the pool of Siloam, on the slopes of Ophel, is now pointed out as the spot of the martyrdom. 3. Isaiah must have been an old man at the close of Hezekiah's reign. The ordinary chronology gives 758 B. C. for the date of Jotham's accession, and 698 for that of Hezekiah's death. This gives us a period of 60 years. And since his ministry commenced before Uzziah's death (how long we know not), supposing him to have been no more than 20 years old when he began to prophesy, he would have been 80 or 90 at Manasseh's accession. 4. The circle of hearers upon whom his ministry was immediately designed to operate is determined to be "Judah and Jerusalem." 5. It is the most natural and obvious supposition that the "visions" are in the main placed in the collection according to their chronological order. 6. If we compare the contents of the book with the description here given of it, we recognize prophesies which are certainly to be assigned to the reigns of Uzziah, Ahaz, and Hezekiah; but we cannot so certainly find any belonging to the reign of Jotham. 7. We naturally ask, Who was the compiler of the book? The obvious answer is, that it was Isaiah himself aided by a scribe (compare Jer. xxxvi. 1-5). Isaiah we know was otherwise an author (2 Chr. xxvi. 22, xxxii. 32). (PROPHET.)—II. In order to realize the relation of Isaiah's prophetic ministry to his own contemporaries, we need to take account both of the foreign relations of Judah at the time, and internally of its social and religious aspects. Our materials are scanty, and are to be collected partly out of 2 Kings and 2 Chronicles, and partly out of the remaining writings of contemporary prophets, Joel (probably), Obadiah, and Micah, in Judah; and Hosea, Amos, and Jonah, in Israel. Of these the most assistance is obtained from Micah. 1. Under UZZIAH the political position of Judah had greatly recovered from the blows suffered under Amaziah; the fortifications of Jerusalem itself were restored; castles were built in the country; new arrangements in the army and equipments of defensive artillery were established; and considerable successes in war gained against the Philistines, the Arabians, and the Ammonites. This prosperity continued during the reign of JOTHAM, except that toward the close of this latter reign, troubles threatened from the alliance of Israel and Syria. The consequence of this prosperity was an influx of wealth, and this with the increased means of military strength withdrew men's confidence from Jehovah, and led them to trust in worldly resources. Moreover, great disorders existed in the internal administration, all of which, whether moral or religious, were, by the very nature of the commonwealth, as theocratic, alike amenable to prophetic rebuke.—2. Now, what is the tenor of Isaiah's message in the time of Uzziah and Jotham? This we read in chapters i.-v. Chapter i. is very general in its contents. The seer stands (perhaps) in the Court of the Israelites denouncing to nobles and people, then assembling for divine worship, the whole estimate of their character formed by Jehovah, and His approaching chastisements. This discourse suitably heads the book; it sounds the keynote of the whole; fires of judgment destroying, but purifying a remnant—such was the burden all along of Isaiah's prophesying. Of the other public utterances belonging to this period, chapters ii.-iv. are by almost all critics considered to be one prophesying—the leading thought of which is that the present prosperity of Judah should be destroyed for her sins, to make room for the real glory of piety and virtue; while chapter v. forms a distinct discourse, whose main purport is that Israel, God's vineyard, shall be brought to desolation. At first he invites attention by reciting a parable (of the vineyard) in calm and composed accents (ch. v.). But as he interprets the parable his note changes, and a sixfold "woe" is poured forth with terrible invective. It is levelled against the covetous amassers of land; against luxurious revellers; against bold sinners, who defied God's works of judgment; against those who confounded moral distinctions; against self-conceited septs; and against profligate perverters of judicial justice. In fury of wrath Jehovah stretches forth His hand. Here there is an awful vagueness in the images of terror which the prophet accumulates, till at length out of the cloud and mist of wrath we hear Jehovah hiss for the stern and irresistible warriors (the Assyrians), who from the end of the earth should crowd forward to spoil—after which all distinctness of description again fades away in vague images of sorrow and despair.—3. In the year of Uzziah's death an ecstatic vision fell upon the prophet. In this vision he saw Jehovah, in the Second Person of the Godhead (Jn. xii. 41: compare Mal. iii. 1), enthroned aloft in His own earthly tabernacle, attended by seraphim, whose praise filled the sanctuary as it were with the smoke of incense. As John at Patmos, so Isaiah was overwhelmed with awe; he felt his own sinfulness and that of all with whom he was connected, and cried "woe" upon himself as if brought before Jehovah to receive the reward of his deeds. But, as at Patmos the Son of Man laid His hand upon John, saying, "Fear not!" so, in obedience evidently to the will of Jehovah, a seraph with a hot stone (Coal 3) taken from the altar touched his lips, the principal organ of good and evil in man, and, thereby removing his sinfulness, qualified him to join the seraphim in whatever service he might be called to. This vision in the main was another mode of representing what, both in previous and in subsequent prophesying, is so continually denounced—the almost utter destruction of the Hebrew people, with yet a purified remnant. It is a touching trait, illustrating the prophet's own feelings, that when he next appears before us, some years later, he has a son named Shear-jashub = "Remnant shall return." The name was evidently given with significance; and the fact discovers alike the sorrow which ate his heart, and the hope in which he found solace.—4. Some years elapse between chapters vi. and vii., and the political scenery has greatly altered. The Assyrian power of Nineveh now threatens the Hebrew nation; Tiglath-pileser has already spoiled Pekah of some of the fairest parts of his dominions. After the Assyrian army was withdrawn, the Syrian kingdom of Damascus rises into notice; its monarch, Rezin, combines with the now weakened king of Israel, and probably with other small states around, to consolidate (it has been conjectured) a power which shall confront Asshur. Ahaz keeps aloof, and becomes the object of attack to the allies; he has been already twice defeated (2 Chr. xxviii. 5, 6); and now the allies are threatening him with a combined invasion (A. C. 741). The news that "Aram is encamped in Ephraim" (Is. vii. 2, A. V. "Syria is confederate with" [margin "resteth on"] "Ephraim") fills both king and people with consternation, and the king is gone forth from the city to take measures, as it would seem, to prevent the upper reservoir of water from falling into the hands of the enemy. Under Jehovah's direction Isaiah goes forth to meet the king, surrounded no doubt by a considerable company of his officers and of spectators. The prophet is directed to take with him the child whose name, Shear-jashub, was so full of mystical promise, to add greater emphasis to his message. As a sign that Judah was not yet to perish, he announces the birth of the child IMMANUEL, who should not "know to refuse the evil and choose the good," before the land of the two hostile kings should be left desolate. But here the threat which mingles with the promise in Shear-jashub appears, and again Isaiah predicts the Assyrian invasion.—5. As the Assyrian empire began more and more to threaten the Hebrew commonwealth with utter overthrow, the prediction of the Messiah, the Restorer of Israel, becomes more positive and clear. The king was bent upon an alliance with Assyria. This Isaiah steadfastly opposes (compare x. 20). "Neither fear Aram and Israel, for they will soon perish; nor trust in Asshur, for she will be thy direst oppressor." Such is Isaiah's strain. And by divine direction he employs various expedients to make his testimony the more impressive. He procured a large tablet (viii. 1), and with witnesses he wrote thereon, in large characters suited for a public notice, the words "MAHER-SHALAL-HASH-BAZ" = Hasten-booty Speed-spoil; which tablet was no doubt to be hung up for public view, in the entrance (we may suppose) to the Temple. And further his wife—who appears to have been herself possessed of prophetic gifts ("the prophetess")—just at this time gave birth to a son. Jehovah bids the prophet give him the name Hasten-booty Speed-spoil as above, adding, that, before the child should be able to talk, the wealth of Damascus and the booty of Samaria should be carried away before the king of Assyria. The people of Judah were split into political factions. The court was for Assyria, and indeed formed an alliance with Tiglath-pileser; but a popular party was for the Syro-Ephraimitic connection formed to resist Assyria. "Fear none but Jehovah only! fear Him, trust Him; He will be your safety." Such is the purport of the discourse viii. 5-ix. 7.—6. A prophecy was delivered at this time against the kingdom of Israel (ix. 8-x. 4). As Isaiah's message was only to Judah, we may infer that the object of this utterance was to check the disposition shown by many to connect Judah with the policy of the sister kingdom.—7. The utterances recorded in x. 5-xii. 6, one of the most highly-wrought passages in the whole book, was probably one single outpouring of inspiration. It stands wholly disconnected with the preceding in the circumstances which it presupposes; and to what period to assign it, is not easy to determine.—8. The next eleven chapters, xiii.-xxiii., contain chiefly a collection of utterances, each of which is styled a "burden." (a.) The first (xiii. 1-xiv. 27) is against Babylon; placed first, either because it was first in point of utterance, or because Babylon in prophetic vision, particularly when Isaiah compiled his book, headed in importance all the earthly powers opposed to God's people, and therefore was to be first struck down by the shaft of prophecy. The ode of triumph (xiv. 3-23) in this burden is among the most poetical passages in all literature. (b.) The short and pregnant "burden" against Philistia (xiv. 29-32), in the year that Ahaz died, was occasioned by the revolt of the Philistines from Judah, and their successful inroad recorded 2 Chr. xxviii. 18. (c.) The "burden of Moab" (xv., xvi.) is remarkable for the elegiac strain in which the prophet bewails the disasters of Moab, and for the dramatic character of xvi. 1-6. (d.) Chapters xvii., xviii. This prophecy is headed "the burden of Damascus;" and yet after verse 3 the attention is withdrawn from Damascus and turned to Israel, and then to Ethiopia. Israel appears as closely associated with Damascus. This brings us to the time of the Syro-Ephraimitic alliance; at all events Ephraim has not yet ceased to exist. Chapter xvii. 12-14, as well as xviii. 1-7, points again to the event of xxxvii. But why this here? The solution seems to be that, though Assyria would be the ruin both of Aram and Israel, and though it would even threaten Judah ("us," verse 14), it should not then conquer Judah (compare turn of xiv. 31, 32). (e.) In the "burden of Egypt" (xix.) the prophet seems to be pursuing the same object. Both Israel (2 K. xvii. 4) and Judah (Is. xxxi.) were naturally disposed to look toward Egypt for succor against Assyria. Probably to counteract this tendency the prophet is here directed to prophesy the utter helplessness of Egypt under God's judgments. But the result should be that numerous cities of Egypt should own Jehovah for their God. (IR-HA-HERES.) (f.) In the midst of these "burdens," chapter xx. presents Isaiah in a new aspect, an aspect in which he appears in this instance only. The more emphatically to enforce the warning already conveyed in the "burden of Egypt," Isaiah was commanded to appear for three years (from time to time, we may suppose) in the streets and Temple of Jerusalem stripped of his sackcloth mantle, and wearing his vest only, with his feet also bare. (DRESS, III. 1.) (g.) In "the burden of the desert of the sea," a poetical designation of Babylonia (xxi. 1-10), the images in which the fall of Babylon is indicated are sketched with the rapidity of Æschylus and certainly not less than the awfulness and grandeur of that great tragic poet of Greece. (h.) "The burden of Dumah" and "of Arabia" (xxi. 11-17) relate apparently to some Assyrian invasion. (i.) In "the burden of the valley of vision" (xxii. 1-14) it is doubtless Jerusalem that is thus designated. The scene presented is that of Jerusalem during an invasion; in the hostile army are named Elam and Kir, nations which no doubt contributed troops both to the Ninevite and to the Babylonian armies. The latter is probably here contemplated. (k.) The passage xxii. 15-25 is singular in Isaiah as a prophesying against an individual. SHEBNA was one of the king's highest functionaries, and seems to have been leader of a party opposed to Jehovah (verse 25). Perhaps he was disgraced and exiled by Hezekiah after the event of xxxvii. If his fall was the consequence of the Assyrian overthrow, we can better understand both the denunciation against the individual and the position it occupies in the record. (l.) The last "burden" is against Tyre (xxiii.). Her utter destruction is not predicted by Isaiah as it afterward was by Ezekiel.

—9. The next four chapters, xxiv.-xxvii., form one prophecy essentially connected with the preceding ten "burdens" (xiii.-xxiii.), of which it is in effect a general summary. The elegy of xxiv. is interrupted at verse 13 by a glimpse at the happy remnant, but is resumed at verse 16 till at verse 21 the dark night passes away altogether to usher in an inexpressibly glorious day. In xxv., after commemorating the destruction of all oppressors, the prophet gives us in verses 6-9 a most glowing description of Messianic blessings, which connects itself with the N. T. by numberless links, indicating the oneness of the prophetic Spirit ("the Spirit of Christ," 1 Pet. i. 11) with that which dwells in the later revelation. In xxvi., verses 12-18 describe the new, happy state of God's people as God's work wholly. In xxvii. 1, "Leviathan the fleeing (A. V. 'piercing,' margin 'crossing like a bar') serpent, and Leviathan, the twisting (A. V. 'crooked') serpent and the dragon in the sea," are perhaps Nineveh and Babylon—two phases of the same Asshur—and Egypt (compare verse 13); all, however, symbolizing adverse powers of evil.—10. Chapters xxviii.-xxxv. The former part of this section seems to be of a fragmentary character, being probably the substance of discourses not fully communicated, and spoken at different times. xxviii. 1-6 is clearly predictive; it therefore preceded Shalmaneser's invasion, when Samaria ("the crown of pride") was destroyed. And her ewe have a picture given us of the way in which Jehovah's word was received by Isaiah's contemporaries. Priest and prophet were drunk with a spirit of infatuation—"they erred in vision, they stumbled in judgment," and therefore only scoffed at his ministrations.—Chapter xxix. Jerusalem was to be visited with extreme danger and terror, and then sudden deliverance (verses 1-8). But the threatening and promise seemed very enigmatical; prophets, and rulers, and scholars, could make nothing of the riddle (9-12). Alas! the people themselves will only hearken to the prophets and priests speaking out of their own heart; even their so-called piety to Jehovah is regulated, not by His true organs, but by pretended ones (verse 13); but all their vaunted policy shall be confounded; the wild wood shall become a fruitful field, and the fruitful field a wild wood—the humble pupils of Jehovah and these self-wise leaders shall interchange their places of dishonor and prosperity (verses 18-24). One instance of the false leading of these prophets and priests (xxx. 1) in opposition to the true prophets (verses 10, 11) was the policy of courting the help of Egypt against Assyria. Against this, Isaiah is commanded to protest, which he does both in xxx. 1-17, and in xxxi. 1-3, pointing out at the same time the fruitlessness of all measures of human policy and the necessity of trusting in Jehovah alone for deliverance. In xxx. 18-33, and xxxi. 4-9, there is added to each address the prediction of the Assyrian's overthrow and its consequences, xxx. 19-24. As the time approaches, the spirit of prophecy becomes more and more glowing; that marvellous deliverance from Asshur, wherein God's "Name" (xxx. 27) so gloriously came near, opens even clearer glimpses into the time when God should indeed come and reign, in the Anointed One, and when virtue and righteousness should everywhere prevail (xxxii. 1-8, 15-20); then the mighty Jehovah should be a king dwelling amongst His people (xxxiii. 17, 22). The sinners in Zion should be filled with dismay, dreading lest His terrible judgment should alight upon themselves also (xxxiii. 14). With these glorious predictions are blended also descriptions of the grief and despair which should precede that hour, xxxii. 9-14 and xxxiii. 7-9, and the earnest prayer then to be offered by the pious (xxxiii. 2). In chapter xxxiv. the prediction must certainly be taken with a particular reference to Idumea; we are, however, led, both by the placing of the prophecy and by lxiii. 2, to take it in a general as well as typical sense. As xxxiv. has a general sense, so xxxv. indicates in general terms the deliverance of Israel as if out of captivity, rejoicing in their secure and happy march through the wilderness.—11. xxxvii.—xxxix. At length the season so often, though no doubt obscurely foretold, arrived. The Assyrian was near with forces apparently irresistible. In the universal consternation which ensued, all the hope of the state centred upon Isaiah; the highest functionaries of the state—Shebna, too—wait upon him in the name of their sovereign. The short answer which Jehovah gave through him was, that the Assyrian king should hear intelligence which should send him back to his own land, there to perish. How the deliverance was to be effected, Isaiah was not commissioned to tell; but the very next night (2 K. xix. 35) brought the appalling fulfilment. A divine interposition so marvellous, so evidently miraculous, was in its magnificence worthy of being the kernel of Isaiah's whole book.—Chapters xxxviii., xxxix. chronologically precede the two previous ones.—12. The last twenty-seven chapters form a prophecy, whose coherence of structure and unity of authorship are generally admitted even by those who deny that it was written by Isaiah. The point of time and situation from which the prophet here speaks, is for the most part that of the Captivity in Babylon (compare e. g. lxiv. 10, 11). But this is adopted on a principle which appears to characterize "vision," viz., that the prophet sees the future as if present. This second part falls into three sections, each, as it happens, consisting of nine chapters; the two first end with the refrain, "There is no peace, saith Jehovah (or 'my God'), to the wicked;" and the third with the same thought amplified. (1.) The first section (xl.—xlviii.) has for its main topic the comforting assurance of the deliverance from Babylon by CYRUS, who is even named twice (xli. 2, 3, 25, xlv. 28, xlv. 1-4, 13, xli. 11, xlviii. 14, 15). It is characteristic of sacred prophecy in general that the "vision" of a great deliverance leads the seer to glance at the great deliverance to come through Jesus Christ. This principle of association prevails in the second part taken as a whole; but in the first section, taken apart, it appears as yet imperfectly. (2.) The second section (xlix.—lvii.) is distinguished from the first by several features. The person of Cyrus as well as his name, and the specification of Babylon, disappear altogether. Return from exile is indeed repeatedly spoken of and at length (xlix. 9-26, li. 9-11, lv. 12, 13, lvii. 14); but in such general terms as admit of being applied to the spiritual and Messianic, as well as to the literal restoration. (3.) In the third section (lviii.—lxvi.) as Cyrus nowhere appears, so neither does "Jehovah's servant" occur so frequently to view as in the second. The only delineation of the latter is in lxi. 1-3 and in lxiii. 1-6, 9. He no longer appears as suffering, but only as saving and avenging Zion. The section is mainly occupied with various practical exhortations founded upon the views of the future already set forth.—III. Numberless attacks have been made by German critics (Koppe, Eichhorn, Justi, De Wette, Gesenius, Hitzig, Knobel, Ewald, &c.) upon the integrity of the whole book, different critics pronouncing different portions of the first part spurious, and many concurring to reject the second part altogether (the last twenty-seven chapters). Defenders of the integrity of the book have not, however, been wanting, e. g.: Jahn, Hengstenberg, Müller, Kleinert, Havernick, Stier, Keil, Delitzsch (in Fbu.), &c. The circumstance mainly urged by those who gainsay Isaiah's authorship of this second part is the unquestionable fact that the author takes his stand-point at the close of the Babylonish Captivity, as if that were his present, and from thence looks forward into his subsequent future. Other grounds which are alleged are confessedly secondary and external, and are really of no great weight. The most important of these is founded upon the difference of style. On the other hand, for the authenticity of the second part the following reasons may be advanced. (a.) Externally. The unanimous testimony of Jewish and Christian tradition (compare Ecclesi. xlviii. 24); the use apparently made of the second part in Jer. x. 1-16, v. 25, xxv. 31, l., li., in Ez. xlii. 40, 41, and Zeph. ii. 15, iii. 10; the decree of Cyrus in Ezr. i. 2-4, which plainly is founded on Is. xlv. 28, xlv. 1, 13; and the evidence of the N. T. quotations (Mat. iii. 3; Lk. iv. 17; Acts viii. 28; Rom. x. 16, 20). (b.) Internally. The unity of design which connects these last twenty-seven chapters with the preceding; the oneness of diction which pervades the whole book; the peculiar elevation and grandeur of style which characterize the second part as well as the first; the absence of any other name than Isaiah's claiming the authorship; the claims which the writer makes to the foreknowledge of the deliverance by CYRUS, which claims, on the opposing view, must be fraudulent; lastly, the Messianic predictions which mark its inspiration, and remove the chief ground of objection against its having been written by Isaiah. Ewald thus characterizes Isaiah: "Just as the subject requires, he has readily at command every several kind of style and every several change of delineation; and it is precisely this that, in point of language, establishes his greatness, as well as in general forms one of his most towering points of excellence. His only fundamental peculiarity is the lofty, majestic calmness of his style. His discourse varies into every complexion; it is tender and stern, dictating and threatening, mourning and again exulting in divine joy, mocking and earnest; but ever at the right time it returns to its original elevation and repose, and never loses the clear ground-color of its divine seriousness." In point of style we can find no difficulty in recognizing in the second part the presence of the same plastic genius as we discover in the first. And, altogether, the aesthetic criticism of all the different parts of the book brings us to the conclusion that the whole of the book originated in one mind, and that mind one of the most sublime and variously-gifted instruments which the Spirit of God has ever employed to pour forth Its Voice upon the world.

Is'cah (fr. Heb. = she looks abroad, Ges.; Jah is a looking one, Fù.), daughter of Haran, the brother of Abram, and sister of Milcah and of Lot (Gen. xi. 29). In the Jewish traditions she is identified with SARAI.

Is-da-el (Gr.) = GIDDEL 2 (1 Esd. v. 33).

Ish'bah (fr. Heb. = praising, Ges.), a man in the line of Judah, the "father of Eshtemoa" (1 Chr. iv. 17).

Ish'bak (fr. Heb. = leaving, Ges.), a son of Abraham and Keturah (Gen. xxv. 2; 1 Chr. i. 32), and the progenitor of a tribe of northern Arabia, possibly (so Mr. E. S. Poole) in the valley called Sabák, or, it is said, Sibák, in the Dahná, a fertile and extensive track, belonging to the Bence-Temeem, in Nejd, or the highland of Arabia, on the N. E. of it. There is, however, another Dahná, nearer to the Euphrates, and some confusion may exist regarding the true position of Sabák; but either Dahná is suitable for the settlements of Ishbak. The first-mentioned Dahná lies in a favorable portion of the widely-stretching country known to have been peopled by the Keturahites. Porter (in Kitto) supposes the name and first possession of Ishbak preserved in the great castle of Shobek, about twelve miles N. of Petra. This castle was a chief stronghold of the Crusaders, who called it Mons Regalis.

Ish'bi-be'nob (fr. Heb. = my seat is at Nob, Ges.), son of Rapha; one of the race of Philistine giants, who attacked David in battle, but was slain by Abishai (2 Sam. xxi. 16, 17).

Ish'-bo-sheth, or Ish'-bo'sheth (Heb. man of shame), the youngest of Saul's four sons, and his legitimate successor. His name appears (1 Chr. viii. 33, ix. 39) to have been originally ESH-BAAL, the man of Baal. He was thirty-five years of age at the time of the battle of Gilboa, but for five years ABNER was engaged in restoring the dominion of the house of Saul over all Israel. Ish-bosheth was then "forty years old when he began to reign over Israel, and reigned two years" (2 Sam. ii. 10). During these two years he reigned at Mahanaim, though only in name. The wars and negotiations with David were entirely carried on by Abner (ii. 12, iii. 6, 12). When Ish-bosheth heard of Abner's death, "his hands were feeble, and all the Israelites were troubled" (iv. 1). In this extremity of weakness he fell a victim, probably, to revenge for a crime of his father. Two Beerothites (BAANAH 1 and RECHAB 2), in remembrance, it has been conjectured, of Saul's slaughter of their kinsmen the Gibeonites, determined to take advantage of the helplessness of the royal house to destroy the only prominent representative that was left, excepting the child Mephibosheth (iv. 4). After assassinating Ish-bosheth, they took his head to David as a welcome present. They met with a stern reception. David rebuked them for the cold-blooded murder of an innocent man, and ordered them to be executed. The head of Ish-bosheth was carefully buried in the sepulchre of his great kinsman Abner, at the same place (iv. 9-12).

Ish'l (fr. Heb. = saving, salutory, Ges.). 1. A descendant of Judah; son of Appaim (1 Chr. ii. 31); one of the great house of Hezron.—2. Another descendant of Judah, with a son Zoheth (iv. 20).—3. Head of a family of Simeon (iv. 42).—4. A chief of Manasseh E. of Jordan (v. 24).

Ish'l (Heb. my man, my husband), in Hos. ii. 16, is the Israelite term, in opposition to BAALI the Canaanite term with the same meaning, though the latter, customarily applied to heathen gods, conveys the idea of possession and rule rather than of affection.

Ish'l'ah (fr. Heb. = whom Jehovah lends, Ges.; = ISHIAH, ISSIAH, JESIAH), the fifth of Izrahiah's five sons; a chief of Issachar in David's time (1 Chr. vii. 3).

I-shi'jah (fr. Heb. = ISHIAN), a lay Israelite of the sons of Harim, who had married a foreign wife (Ezr. x. 31).

Ish'ma (fr. Heb. = waste, desolation, Ges.), a son "of the father of Etam" in the genealogy of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 8).

Ish'ma-el (fr. Heb. = whom God hears). 1. The son of ABRAHAM by HAGAR the Egyptian, his concubine; born when Abraham was eighty-six years old (Gen. xvi. 15, 16). Ishmael was the first-born of his father, born in Abraham's house, when he dwelt in the plain of Mamre; and on the institution of the covenant of circumcision, was circumcised, he being then thirteen years old (xvii. 25). With the institution of the covenant, God renewed his promise respecting Ishmael. He does not again appear in the narrative until the weaning of Isaac. The latter was born when Abraham was one hundred years old (xxi. 5), and as the weaning, according to Eastern usage, probably took place when the child was between two and three years old, Ishmael himself must have been then between fifteen and sixteen years old. At the great feast made in celebration of the weaning, "Sarah saw the son of Hagar the Egyptian, which she had borne unto Abraham, mocking," and urged Abraham to cast out him and his mother. The patriarch, comforted by God's renewed promise that of Ishmael He would make a nation, sent them both away, and they departed and wandered in the wilderness of Beer-sheba. Here the water being spent in the bottle, Hagar cast her son under one of the desert shrubs, and went away a little distance, "for she said, Let me not see the death of the child," and wept. "And God heard the voice of the lad, and the angel of the Lord called to Hagar out of heaven," renewed the promise already thrice given, "I will make him a great nation," and "opened her eyes, and she saw a well of water." Thus miraculously saved from perishing by thirst, "God was with the lad; and he grew, and dwelt in the wilderness; and became an archer." It is doubtful whether the wanderers halted by the well, or at once continued their way to the "wilderness of Paran," where we are told he dwelt, and where "his mother took him a wife out of the land of Egypt" (9-21). This wife of Ishmael is not elsewhere mentioned; she was, we must infer, an Egyptian. No record is made of any other wife of Ishmael, though the repeated mention of his daughter as "sister of Nebajoth" seems to point to a different mother for Ishmael's other sons. According to Rabbinical tradition, Ishmael put away his wife and took a second. The Arabs assert that he married (1.) an Amalekite, by whom he had no issue; and (2.) a Joktanite of the tribe of Jurhum. He had twelve sons and one daughter. Of the later life of Ishmael we know little. He was present with Isaac at the burial of Abraham (xxv. 9). Esau contracted an alliance with him when he "took unto the wives which he had Mahalath (or BASHZ MATN, xxxvi. 3) the daughter of Ishmael Abraham's son, the sister of Nebajoth, to be his wife" (xxviii. 9). The death of Ishmael is recorded in a previous chapter, after the enumeration of his sons, as having taken place at the age of one hundred and thirty-seven years (xxv. 17, 18). It remains for us to consider—1, the place of Ishmael's dwelling; and 2, the names of his children, with their settlements, and the nation sprung from them.—1. From the narrative of his expulsion, we learn that Ishmael first went into the wilderness of Beer-sheba, and thence, but at what interval of time is uncertain, removed to that of Paran. His continuance in these or the neighboring places seems to be proved by his having been present at the burial of Abraham; for in the East sepulture follows death after a few hours; and by Esau's marrying his daughter at a time when he (Esau) dwelt at Beer-sheba. There are, however, other passages which must be taken into account. He was the first Abrahamic settler in the E. country (xxv. 6). The "East country" perhaps was restricted in early times to the wildernesses of Beer-sheba and Paran; or Ishmael removed to that E. country, northward, without being distant from his father and his brethren; each case being agreeable with Gen. xxv. 6.—2. The sons of Ishmael were, Nebajoth (expressly stated to be his first-born), Kedar, Adbeel, Mibsam, Mishma, Dumah, Massa, Hadar, Tema, Jetur, Naphish, Kedemah (xxv. 13-15): and he had a daughter named Mahalath (xxviii. 9), elsewhere written Bashemath (xxxvi. 3). They peopled the N. and W. of the Arabian peninsula (ARABIA), and eventually formed the chief element of the Arab nation. Their language, generally acknowledged to have been the Arabic commonly so called, has been adopted with insignificant exceptions throughout Arabia. The term ISHMAELITE occurs on three occasions (Gen. xxxvii. 25, 27, 28, xxxix. 1; Judg. viii. 24; Ps. lxxxiii. 6). From the context of the first two instances, it seems to have been a general name for the Abrahamic peoples of the East country, the "men" or "children of the East;" but the second admits also of a closer meaning. In the third instance the name is applied in its strict sense to the Ishmaelites. (ITHRA.) The notions of the Arabs respecting Ishmael are partly derived from the Bible, partly from the Jewish Rabbins, and partly from native traditions. They believe that Ishmael was the first-born of Abraham, and the majority of their doctors assert that this son, and not Isaac, was offered by Abraham in sacrifice. Ishmael, say the Arabs, dwelt with his mother at Mecca, and both are buried in the place called the "Hejr," on the N. W. (termed by the Arabs the N.) side of the Kaabeh, and enclosed by a curved wall called the "Hateem." Ishmael was visited at Mecca by Abraham, and they together rebuilt the temple which had been destroyed by a flood. At Mecca Ishmael married a daughter of Mudad or El-mudad (ALMUDAD), chief of the Joktanite tribe Jurhum, and had thirteen children. (ISMAEL 1.)—2. Son of Azel, a descendant of Saul through Merib-baal or Mephibosheth (1 Chr. viii. 38, ix. 44).—3. A man of Judah, father of ZEBADIAH (2 Chr. xix. 11).—4. Another man of Judah; son of Jehohanan; one of the captains of hundreds who assisted Jehoiada in restoring Joash to the throne (xxiii. 1).—5. A priest, of the sons of Pashur, forced by Ezra to relinquish his foreign wife (Ezr. x. 22).—6. The son of Nethaniah; a perfect marvel of craft and villany, whose treachery forms one of the chief episodes of the history of the period immediately succeeding the first fall of Jerusalem. His exploits are related in Jer. xl. 7-xli. 15, with a short summary in 2 K. xxv. 23-25. His full description is "Ishmael, the son of Nethaniah, the son of Elishama, of the seed royal" of Judah (Jer. xli. 1; 2 K. xxv. 25). During the siege of the city he had, like many others of his countrymen (Jer. xl. 11), fled across the Jordan, where he found a refuge at the court of Baalis, then king of the Ammonites. After the departure of the Chaldeans, Ishmael made no secret of his intention to kill the superintendent left by the king of Babylon, and usurp his position. Of this GEDALIAH was warned in express terms by Johanan and his companions. Thirty days after, in the seventh month (xli. 1), on the third day of the month, Ishmael again appeared at Mizpah, this time accompanied by ten men. Gedaliah entertained them at a feast (xli. 1). Before its close Ishmael and his followers had murdered Gedaliah and all his attendants with such secrecy that no alarm was given outside the room. The same night he killed all Gedaliah's establishment, including some Chaldean soldiers who were there. For two days the massacre remained perfectly unknown to the people of the town. On the second day Ishmael perceived from his elevated position a large party coming southward along the main road from Shechem and Samaria. He went out to meet them. They proved to be eighty devotees, who, with rent clothes, and with shaven beards, mutilated bodies, and with other marks of heathen devotion, and weeping as they went, were bringing incense and offerings to the ruins of the Temple. At his invitation they turned aside to the residence of the superintendent. As the unsuspecting pilgrims passed into the court-yard he closed the entrances behind them, and there he and his band butchered the whole number: ten only escaped by the offer of heavy ransom for their lives. The seventy corpses were then thrown into the well which was within the precincts of the house, and was completely filled with the bodies. This done, he descended to the town, surprised and carried off the daughters of King Zedekiah, who had been sent there by Nebuchadnezzar for safety, with their eunuchs and their Chaldean guard (xli. 10, 16), and all the people of the town, and made off with his prisoners to the country of the Ammonites. The news of the massacre had by this time got abroad, and Ishmael was quickly pursued by Johanan and his companions. He was attacked, two of his bravoes slain, the whole of the prey recovered; and Ishmael himself, with the remaining eight of his people, escaped to the Ammonites, and thenceforward passes into obscurity.

Ish'ma-el-ite (fr. Heb.) = descendant of ISHMAEL.

Ish-ma'ah [-ma'yah], or Ish-ma-l'ah, fr. Heb. = whom Jehovah hears, Ges.), son of Obadiah; ruler of Zebulun in David's time (1 Chr. xxvii. 19).

Ish'me-el-ite (fr. Heb.) (1 Chr. ii. 17) and Ish'me-el-ites (Gen. xxxvii. 25, 27, 28, xxxix. 1) = descendant or descendants of ISHMAEL.

Ish'me-ral (fr. Heb. = whom Jehovah keeps, Ges.), a Benjamite, of the family of Elpaal (1 Chr. viii. 18).

I'shod (fr. Heb. = man of glory, Ges.), one of the tribe of Manasseh E. of Jordan; son of Hammoleketh (1 Chr. vii. 18).

Ish'pan (fr. Heb. = bald? Ges.; a firm, strong one, Fñ.), a Benjamite, of the family of Shashak (1 Chr. viii. 22).

Ish'-tob (Heb., probably = men of Tob), apparently one of the small kingdoms or states which formed part of the general country of Aram (SYRIA), named with Zobah, Rehob, and Maacah (2 Sam. x. 6, 8). (TOB.)

Ish'u-ah (fr. Heb. = even, level, Ges.; self-satisfying, Fñ.), second son of Asher (Gen. xlii. 17).

Ish'u-al (fr. Heb. = ISHUAH, Ges.; Jah is self-satisfying, Fñ.), third son of Asher (1 Chr. vii. 30); founder of a family bearing his name (Num. xxvi. 44, A. V. "Jesuites").

Ish'u-l (fr. Heb. = ISHUAL), second son of Saul by his wife Ahinoam (1 Sam. xiv. 49, comp. 50).

*Is'land [i] (Heb. î; Gr. nésion, néos) = ISLE. For "wild beasts of the island," see BEAST 6.

Isle (Heb. î; Gr. néos). The radical sense of the Hebrew word seems to be habitable place, dry land as opposed to water, and in this sense it occurs in Is. xlii. 15, A. V. "islands." Hence it means secondarily any maritime district, whether belonging to a continent or to an island: thus it is used of the shore of the Mediterranean (Is. xx. 6, xxiii. 2, 6), and of the coasts of Elishah (Ez. xxvii. 7), i. e. of Greece and Asia Minor. In this sense it is more particularly restricted to the shores of the Mediterranean, sometimes in the fuller expression "islands of the sea" (Is. xi. 11). Occasionally the word is specifically used of an island, as of Caphtor or Crete (Jer. xlvii. 4, A. V. "country," margin "isle"). But more generally it is applied to any region separated from Palestine by water, as fully described in Jer. xxv. 22. The Gr. néos (in LXX. = Heb. î) properly in N. T. = "island" (Acts xxvii. 26, xxviii. 1, 7, 9, &c.) or "isle" (xiii. 6, xxviii. 11; Rev. i. 9). The Gr. nésion, translated "island" (Acts xxvii. 16 only), = small island, islet.

Is-ma-el'ah [-ki-] (fr. Heb. = whom Jehovah upholds, Ges.), a Levite, an overseer of offerings during the revival under King Hezekiah (2 Chr. xxxi. 13).

Is'ma-el (Gr. and L.). 1. ISHMAEL, son of Abraham (Jd. ii. 23).—2. ISHMAEL 5 (1 Esd. ix. 29).

Is-mal'ah [-ma'yah], or Is-ma-l'ah (fr. Heb. = ISHMAIAH, Ges.), a Gibeonite chief who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chr. xii. 4).

Is'pah (fr. Heb. = ISHPAN, Ges., Fû.), a Benjamite chief, of the family of Beriah (1 Chr. viii. 16).

Is-ra-el [iz- or is-] (fr. Heb. = warrior or soldier of God, Ges.; God is ruler, Fû.). 1. The name given (Gen. xxxii. 28) to Jacob after his wrestling with the Angel (Hos. xii. 4) at Peniel. The A. V. translates the Hebrew sârûhâ in Gen. xxxii. 29 (A. V. 28) "as a prince hast thou power;" but Rosenmüller and Gesenius give it the meaning, "thou hast contended."—2. It became the national name of the twelve tribes collectively. They are so called in Ex. iii. 16 and afterward.—3. It is used in a narrower sense, excluding Judah, in 1 Sam. xi. 8; 2 Sam. xx. 1; 1 K. xii. 16. Thenceforth it was assumed and accepted as the name of the Northern kingdom. (ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF).—4. After the Babylonian CAPTIVITY, the returned exiles resumed the name Israel as the designation of their nation. The name Israel is also used to denote laymen, as distinguished from Priests, Levites, and other ministers (Ezr. vi. 16, ix. 1, x. 25, Neh. xi. 3, &c.). "Israel" figuratively = God's faithful people (Ps. lxxiii. 1; Rom. ix. 6, xi. 26; Gal. vi. 16, compare iii. 29, &c.). ABRAHAM; DAVID; DISPERSION; HEBREW; ISAAC; JERUSALEM; JEW; JOSHUA; JUDAH, KINGDOM OF; JUDGE; MOSES; SAMUEL; SAUL; SOLOMON, &c.

Is-ra-el (see ISRAEL). King'dom of. 1. The prophet Abijah of Shiloh, who was commissioned in the latter days of SOLOMON to announce the division of the kingdom, left one tribe (Judah) to the house of DAVID, and assigned ten to Jeroboam (1 K. xi. 35, 31). These were probably Joseph (= Ephraim and Manasse), Issachar, Zebulun, Asher, Naphtali, Benjamin, Dan, Simeon, Gad, and Reuben; Levi being intentionally omitted. Eventually the greater part of Benjamin, and probably the whole of Simeon and that part of Dan in the neighborhood of Judah, were included, as if by common consent, in the kingdom of Judah. With respect to the conquests of David, Moab appears to have been attached to the kingdom of Israel (2 K. iii. 4); so much of Syria as remained subject to Solomon (see 1 K. xi. 24) would probably be claimed by his successor in the Northern kingdom; and Ammon, though connected with Rehoboam as his mother's native land (2 Chr. xii. 13), and afterward tributary to Judah (xxvii. 5), was at one time allied (xx. 1), we know not how closely or how early, with Moab. The sea-coast between Accho and Japho remained in the possession of Israel. (PALESTINE.)—2. The population of the kingdom is not expressly stated. (ARMY; CENSUS.) Jeroboam brought into the field an army of 800,000 men (2 Chr. xiii. 3). If in B. C. 957 there were actually under arms 800,000 men of that age in Israel, the whole population may perhaps have amounted to at least three and a half millions.—3. SHECHEM was the first capital of the new kingdom (1 K. xii. 25), venerable for its traditions, and beautiful in its situation. Subsequently TIRZAH became the royal residence, if not the capital, of Jeroboam (xiv. 17) and of his successors (xv. 33, xvi. 8, 17, 23). SAMARIA, uniting in itself the qualities of beauty and fertility, and a commanding position, was chosen by Omri (xvi. 24), and remained the capital of the kingdom, until it had given the last proof of its strength by sustaining for three years the onset of the hosts of Assyria. JEZREEL was probably only a royal residence of some of the Israelitish kings.—4. The disaffection of EPHRAIM and the Northern tribes having grown in secret under the prosperous but burdensome reign of SOLOMON, broke out at the critical moment of that monarch's death. Then Ephraim, the centre of the movement, found in JEROBOAM I an instrument prepared to give expression to the rivalry of centuries.—5. The kingdom of Israel developed no new power. It was but a portion of David's kingdom, deprived of many elements of strength. Its frontier was as open and as widely extended as before; but it wanted a capital for the seat of organized power. Its territory was as fertile and as tempting to the spoiler, but its people were less united and patriotic. A corrupt religion poisoned the source of national life. These causes tended to increase the misfortunes and to accelerate the early end of the kingdom of Israel. It lasted 254 years, from B. C. 975 to B. C. 721, about two-thirds of the duration of its more compact neighbor, Judah. (JUDAH, KINGDOM OF.) But it may be doubted whether the division into two kingdoms greatly shortened the independent existence of the Hebrew race, or interfered with the purposes which, it is thought, may be traced in the establishment of David's monarchy.—6. The detailed history of the kingdom of Israel will be found under the names of its nineteen kings. A summary view may be taken in four periods:—(a.) B. C. 975-929. Jeroboam had not sufficient force of character in himself to make a lasting impression on his people. A king, but not a founder of a dynasty, he aimed at nothing beyond securing his present elevation. (CALF; IDOLATRY.) The army soon learned its power to dictate to the isolated monarch and disunited people. Baasha, in the midst of the army at Gibbethon, slew the son and successor of Jeroboam; Zimri, a captain of chariots, slew the son and successor of Baasha; Omri, the captain of the host, was chosen to punish Zimri; and after a civil war of four years he prevailed over Tibni, the choice of half the people.—(b.) B. C. 929-884. For forty-five years Israel was governed by the house of Omri. That sagacious king pitched on the strong hill of Samaria as the site of his capital. The princes of his house cultivated an alliance with the kings of Judah, which was cemented by the marriage of Jehoram and Athaliah. The adoption of Baal-worship led to a reaction in the nation, to the moral triumph of the prophets in the person of ELIJAH, and to the extinction of the house of Ahab in obedience to the bidding of ELISHA.—(c.) B. C. 854–772. Unparalleled triumphs, but deeper humiliation, awaited the kingdom of Israel under the dynasty of Jehu. Hazael, the ablest king of Damascus, reduced Jehoahaz to the condition of a vassal, and triumphed for a time over both the disunited Hebrew kingdoms. Almost the first sign of the restoration of their strength was a war between them; and Jehoash, the grandson of Jehu, entered Jerusalem as the conqueror of Amaziah. Jehoash also turned the tide of war against the Syrians; and Jeroboam II., the most powerful of all the kings of Israel, captured Damascus, and recovered the whole ancient frontier from Hamath to the Dead Sea. This short-lived greatness expired with the last king of Jehu's line.—(d.) B. C. 772–721. Military violence, it would seem, broke off the hereditary succession after the obscure and probably convulsed reign of Zachariah. An unsuccessful usurper, Shallum, is followed by the cruel Menahem, who, being unable to make head against the first attack of Assyria under Pul, became the agent of that monarch for the oppressive taxation of his subjects. Yet his power at home was sufficient to insure for himself a ten years' reign, his son and successor, Pekahiah, being cut off after two years by a bold usurper, Pekah. Abandoning the northern and transjordanic regions to the encroaching power of Assyria under Tiglath-pileser, he was very near subjugating Judah, with the help of Damascus, now the coequal ally of Israel. But Assyria interposing summarily put an end to the independence of Damascus, and perhaps was the indirect cause of the assassination of the baffled Pekah. The irresolute Hoshea, the next and last usurper, became tributary to his invader, Shalmaneser, betrayed the Assyrian to the rival monarchy of Egypt, and was punished by the loss of his liberty, and by the capture, after a three years' siege, of his strong capital, Samaria. Some gleanings of the ten tribes yet remained in the land after so many years of religious decline, moral debasement, national degradation, anarchy, bloodshed, and deportation. Even these were gathered up by the conqueror and carried to Assyria, never again, as a distinct people, to occupy their portion of that goodly and pleasant land which their forefathers won under Joshua from the heathen.

7. The following Table, by Mr. Bullock, original author of this article, shows at one view the chronology of the Kings of Israel and Judah. Columns 1, 2, 3, 7, 8, 9, 10, are taken from the Bible. Column 4 is the scheme of CHRONOLOGY adopted in the margin of the A. V., which is founded on the calculations of Archbishop Usher; column 5 the computation of Clinton (Faeti Hellenici); column 6 the computation of Winer.

The numerous dates given in the Bible as the limits of the duration of the kings' reigns act as a continued check on each other. The apparent discrepancies between them have been unduly exaggerated by some writers. To meet such difficulties various hypotheses have been put forward;—that an interregnum occurred; that two kings (father and son) reigned conjointly; that certain reigns were dated not from their real commencement, but from some arbitrary period in that Jewish year in which they commenced; that the Hebrew copyists have transcribed the numbers incorrectly, either by accident or design; that the original writers have made mistakes in their reckoning. All these are mere suppositions, and even the most probable of them must not be insisted on as if it were an historical fact. But in truth most of the discrepancies may be accounted for by the simple fact that the Hebrew annalists reckon in round numbers, never specifying the months in addition to the years of the duration of a king's reign. Consequently some of these writers seem to set down a fragment of a year as an entire year, and others omit such fragments altogether. Hence, in computing the date of the commencement of each reign, without attributing any error to the writer or transcribers, it is necessary to allow for a possible mistake amounting to something less than two years in our interpretation of the indefinite phraseology of the Hebrew writers. But there are a few statements in the Hebrew text which cannot thus be reconciled. (a.) There are in the Second Book of Kings three statements as to the beginning of the reign of Jehoram, king of Israel, which in the view of some writers involve a great error, and not a mere numerical one. His accession is dated (1.) in the second year of Jehoram, king of Judah (2 K. i. 17); (2.) in the fifth year before Jehoram, king of Judah (viii. 16); (3.) in the eighteenth year of Jehoshaphat (iii. 1). But these statements may be reconciled by the fact that Jehoram, king of Judah, had two accessions which are recorded in Scripture, and by the probable supposition of Archbishop Usher that he had a third and earlier accession which is not recorded. These three accessions are, (1.) when Jehoshaphat left his kingdom to go to the battle of Ramoth-gilead, in his seventeenth year; (2.) when Jehoshaphat (viii. 16) either retired from the administration of affairs, or made his son joint-king, in his twenty-third year; (3.) when Jehoshaphat died, in his twenty-fifth year. So that, if the supposition of Usher be allowed, the accession of Jehoram, king of Israel, in Jehoshaphat's eighteenth year synchronized with (1.) the second year of the first accession, and (2.) the fifth year before the second accession of Jehoram, king of Judah. (b.) The date of the beginning of Uziah's reign (2 K. xv. 1) in the twenty-seventh year of Jeroboam II. cannot be reconciled with the statement that Uziah's father, Amaziah, whose whole reign was twenty-nine years only, came to the throne in the second year of Joash (xiv. 1), and so reigned fourteen years contemporaneously with Joash and twenty-seven with Jeroboam. Usher and others suggest a reconciliation of these statements by the supposition that Jeroboam's reign had two commencements, the first not mentioned in Scripture, on his association with his father Joash, B. C. 837. But Keil, after Capellus and Grotius, supposes that, by an error of the Hebrew, instead of twenty-seventh of Jeroboam we ought to read fifteenth. (c.) The statements that Jeroboam II. reigned forty-one years (2 K. xiv. 23) after the fifteenth year of Amaziah, who reigned twenty-nine years, and that Jeroboam's son Zachariah came to the throne in the thirty-eighth year of Uziah (xv. 8), cannot be reconciled without supposing that there was an interregnum of eleven years between Jeroboam and his son Zachariah. And almost all chronologists accept this as a fact, although it is not mentioned in the Bible. Some chronologists, who regard an interregnum as intrinsically improbable after the prosperous reign of Jeroboam, prefer the supposition that the number forty-one in xiv. 23 ought to be changed to fifty-one, and that the number twenty-seven in xv. 1 should be changed to fourteen, and that a few other corresponding alterations should be made. (CHRONOLOGY.) (d.) In order to bring down the date of Pekah's murder to the date of Hoshea's accession, some chronologists propose to read twenty-nine years for twenty, in 2 K. xv. 27. Others prefer to let the dates stand as at present in the text, and suppose that an interregnum, not expressly mentioned in the Bible, occurred between those two usurpers. The words of Isaiah (ix. 20, 21) seem to indicate a time of anarchy in Israel.

Is'ra-el-ite = descendant of ISRAEL. (HEBREW; JEW.) In 2 Sam. xvii. 25, Ithra, the father of Amasa, is called "an Israelite," or more correctly "the Israelite," while in 1 Chr. ii. 17 he appears as "Jether the Ishmaelite" (A. V. "Ishmeelite"). The latter is undoubtedly the true reading.

Issa-char [-kar] (fr. Heb. = there is reward, or he brings reward, Ges.). 1. The ninth son of JACOB and fifth of Leah; born to Leah after the interval which occurred in the births of her children (Gen. xxx. 17; comp. xxix. 35). Of Issachar the individual we know nothing. At the descent into Egypt four sons are ascribed to him, who founded the four chief families of the tribe (xlvi. 13; Num. xxvi. 23-25; 1 Chr. vii. 1). Issachar's place during the journey to Canaan was on the E. of the Tabernacle, with his brothers Judah and Zebulun (Num. ii. 5), the group moving foremost in the march (x. 15). Issachar was one of the six tribes who were to stand on Mount Gerizim during the ceremony of blessing and cursing (Deut. xxvii. 12). He was still in company with Judah, Zebulun being opposite on Ebal. The number of the fighting men of Issachar, when taken in the census at Sinai, was 54,400; in the next census by Jordan, 64,300; in one taken afterward, probably by Joab, 145,600 (Num. i. 28, 29, xxvi. 23-25; 1 Chr. vii. 1-5). The allotment of Issachar lay above that of Manasseh (Josh. xix. 17-23). In the words of Josephus, "it extended in length from Carmel to the Jordan, in breadth to Mount Tabor." This territory was, as it still is, among the richest land in Palestine. Westward was the famous plain (ESDRELON; JEXREEL) which derived its name from its fertility. On the N. is Tabor, which even under the burning sun of that climate is said to retain the glades and dells of an English wood. On the E., behind Jexreel, is the opening which conducts to the plain of the Jordan—to that Beth-shean which was proverbially among the Rabbis the gate of Paradise for its fruitfulness. It is this aspect of the territory of Issachar which appears to be alluded to in the Blessing of Jacob (Gen. xlix. 15). The image of the strong-boned he-ass chewing the cud of stolid ease and quiet is very applicable to a rural agrarian people. (Ass.) The Blessing of Moses completes the picture. He is not only in "tents"—a nomad or seminomad life—but "rejoicing" in them (Deut. xxxiii.

18, 19).—One among the Judges of Israel was from Issachar—TOLA (Judg. x. 1)—but beyond the length of his sway we have only the fact recorded that he resided out of the limits of his own tribe, at Shamir in Mount Ephraim. The 200 head men of the tribe who went to Hebron to assist in making David king over the entire realm “had understanding of the times to know what Israel ought to do . . . and all their brethren were at their commandment” (1 Chr. xii. 32). The census of the tribe in the reign of David is contained in 1 Chr. vii. 1–6, and an expression occurs in it which testifies (so Mr. Grove) to the nomadic tendencies above noticed. Out of the whole number of the tribe, no less than 36,000 were marauding mercenary troops—“bands,”—a term applied to no other tribe in this enumeration, though elsewhere to Gad, and uniformly to the irregular bodies of the nomadic nations around Israel—BAASHA, the son of Abijah, of the house of Issachar, a member of the army with which Nadab and all Israel were besieging Gibbethon, apparently not of any standing in the tribe (compare 1 K. xvi. 2), slew the king, and himself mounted the throne (xv. 27, &c.). (ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF.) He was evidently a fierce and warlike man (xvi. 29; 2 Chr. xvi. 1), and an idolater like Jeroboam. The Issacharite dynasty lasted during the twenty-four years of his reign and the two of his son Elah.—Distant as Jezreel was from Jerusalem, many from Issachar took part in the passover with which Hezekiah sanctified the opening of his reign (2 Chr. xxxi. 1). A few years afterward the king of Assyria carried Issachar away with the rest of Israel to his distant dominions.—2. A Korhite Levite, one of the doorkeepers of the house of Jehovah, seventh son of OBED-EDOM (1 Chr. xxvi. 5).

Is-shi'ah (fr. Heb. = whom Jehovah lends, Ges.; = ISHIAH, JESIAH). 1. A descendant of Moses by his younger son Eliezer (1 Chr. xxiv. 21; compare xxiii. 17, xxvi. 25); = JESHAIAH 2.—2. A Levite of the house of Kohath and family of Uzziel (xxiv. 23); = JESIAH 2.

Issue, Run'ning. Lev. xv. 2, 3, xxii. 4, with Num. v. 2, and 2 Sam. iii. 29, are probably to be interpreted of gonorrhœa. In Lev. xv. 3 a distinction is introduced, which merely means that the cessation of the actual flux does not constitute ceremonial cleanness, but that the patient must bide the legal time, seven days (ver. 13), and perform the prescribed purifications and sacrifice (ver. 14). BLOOD, ISSUE OF; MEDICINE; UNCLEANNESS.

Is-tal-cu'rus (fr. Gr.). In 1 Esd. viii. 40, the “son of Istalcurus” is substituted for “and Zabbud” of the corresponding list in Ezr. viii. 14.

Is'u-ah (fr. Heb.) = ISHUAH, second son of Asher (1 Chr. vii. 30).

Is'u-i (fr. Heb.) = ISHUAH, third son of Asher (Gen. xvi. 17); founder of a family called in the A. V. JESUITES (Num. xxvi. 44).

* I-tal'ian (= of [or from] ITALY) Band (Acts x. 1). ARMY 2.

It'a-ly (L. and Gr. Italia; according to some, from Italus, an early chief in the country; according to others, from Gr. italos, a bull, on account of its many excellent horned cattle) is used in the N. T. in the usual sense of the period, i. e. in its true geographical sense, as = the whole natural peninsula between the Alps and the Straits of Messina (Acts xviii. 2, xxvii. 1; Heb. xiii. 24). The word first denoted the extreme S. of the peninsula, then the whole of the peninsula S. of the Rubicon (about 44° N. lat.), but from the close of the Roman Republic (AUGUSTUS CESAR) was employed as now. PAUL; ROMAN EMPIRE; ROME.

I'thal, or Ith'a-i (Heb. = ITTAI, FÜ.), a Benjamite, son of Ribai of Gibeah, one of David's “valiant men” (1 Chr. xi. 31); = ITTAI 2.

Ith'a-mar (Heb. palm-coast, Ges.), youngest son of AARON (Ex. vi. 23). After the deaths of Nadab and Abihu (Lev. x. 1), Eleazar and Ithamar were appointed to succeed to their places in the priestly office (Ex. xxviii. 1, 40, 43; Num. iii. 3, 4; 1 Chr. xxiv. 2). In the distribution of services belonging to the Tabernacle, and its transport on the march of the Israelites, the Gershonites and the Merarites were placed under the superintendence of Ithamar (Ex. xxxviii. 21; Num. iv. 21–33). The high-priesthood passed into the family of Ithamar in the person of ELI. ABIATHAR; HIGH-PRIEST; PRIEST.

Ith'i-el (Heb. God with me, Ges.). 1. A Benjamite, son of Jesaiah (Neh. xi. 7).—2. One of two persons—Ithiel and UCAL—to whom Agur the son of JAKEH delivered his discourse (Prov. xxx. 1).

Ith'mah (fr. Heb. = orphanage, Ges.), a Moabite, one of David's “valiant men” (1 Chr. xi. 46).

Ith'nan (fr. Heb. = bestowed, Ges.), one of the towns in the extreme S. of Judah (Josh. xv. 23). Wilton (The Negeb) would connect Ithnan with the Hazor preceding it (so the LXX.), and then identify Hazor-Ithnan with el-Hhora, E. of Beer-sheba. Rowlands (in Fairbairn, under “S. Country”) would place the compound name at or near the pass of el-Haudeh, perhaps at Abou Tareibeh, or Abou Tareifeh, about twenty miles S. E. from Beer-sheba.

Ith'ra (fr. Heb. = JETHER, Ges., FÜ.), an ISRAELITE (2 Sam. xvii. 25) or rather Ishmaelite (1 Chr. ii. 17 [A. V. “Ishmeelite”]), the father of AMASA by Abigail, David's sister.

Ith'ran (fr. Heb. = JETHER, Ges., FÜ.). 1. A son of Dishon, a Horite (Gen. xxxi. 26; 1 Chr. i. 41); and probably a phylarch of a tribe of the Horim (Gen. xxxvi. 30).—2. A descendant of Asher (1 Chr. vii. 37). JETHER 6.

Ith're-am (fr. Heb. = residue of the people, Ges.), sixth son of David, born to him in Hebron; the child of Eglah, David's wife (2 Sam. iii. 5; 1 Chr. iii. 3).

Ith'rite, the (fr. Heb. = descendant of JETHER, Ges.; native of JATTIR, FÜ.), the designation of two of David's “valiant men.” Ira and Gareb (2 Sam. xxiii. 38; 1 Chr. xi. 40). The “Ithrites” were among “the families of Kirjath-jearim” (ii. 53).

It'tah-ka'zin (fr. Heb. = time of the judge, Ges.), a border-town of Zebulun, named next to Gath-hepher (Josh. xix. 13); not identified.

It'tal, or It'ta-i (Heb. near? Ges.; being, living, FÜ.). 1. “Ittai the GITTITE,” i. e. the native of Gath, a Philistine in the army of King David. He appears only during the revolution of Absalom. We first discern him on the morning of David's flight. Last in the procession came the six hundred heroes who had formed David's band during his wanderings in Judah, and had been with him at Gath (2 Sam. xv. 18; compare 1 Sam. xxiii. 13, xxvii. 2, xxx. 9, 10). Among these, apparently commanding them, was Ittai the Gittite (2 Sam. xv. 19). He caught the eye of the king, who at once addressed him and besought him not to attach himself to a doubtful cause, but to return “with his brethren” and abide with the king (ver. 19, 20). But Ittai is firm, and wherever his master goes, he will go. Accordingly he is allowed by David to proceed. When the army was numbered and organized by David at Mahanaim, Ittai again appears, now in command of one-third of the force (xviii. 2, 5, 12).—2. Son of Ribai, from Gibeah of Benjamin; one of David's thirty "valiant men" (2 Sam. xxiii. 29); = ITHAI.

It-u-re'a (L. Iturea; see below), a small province on the N. W. border of Palestine, lying along the base of Mount Hermon (Lk. iii. 1 only). JETUR the son of Ishmael gave his name, like the rest of his brethren, to the little province he colonized (Gen. xxv. 15, 16), afterward occupied by the children of Manasseh (1 Chr. v. 19–23). In the second century B. C., Aristobulus, king of the Jews, reconquered the province. Iturea, with the adjoining provinces, fell into the hands of a chief called Zenodorus; but about B. C. 20 they were taken from him by the Roman emperor, and given to Herod the Great, who bequeathed them to his son Philip (Lk. iii. 1). Pliny rightly places Iturea N. of Bashan and near Damascus; and J. de Vitry describes it as adjoining Trachonitis, and lying along the base of Libanus between Tiberias and Damascus. At the place indicated is situated the modern province of Jedûr (Ar. = Heb. Jetur). It is bounded on the E. by Trachonitis, on the S. by Gaulanitis, on the W. by Hermon, and on the N. by the plain of Damascus. It is table-land with an undulating surface, and has little conical and cup-shaped hills at intervals. The surface of the ground is covered with jagged rocks. The rock is all basalt, and the formation similar to that of the Lejah. (ARAB.) Jedûr contains thirty-eight towns and villages, ten of which are now entirely desolate, and all the rest contain only a few families of poor peasants, living in wretched hovels amid heaps of ruins.

I'vah (fr. Heb. = overturning, ruin, Ges.; from a Babylonian god, Iva, who represents the sky or ether? Sir H. Rawlinson), or A'va, mentioned in Scripture twice (2 K. xviii. 34, xix. 13; compare Is. xxxvii. 18) in connection with Hena and Sepharvaim, and once (2 K. xvii. 24) in connection with Babylon and Cuthah, must be sought in Babylonia, and probably (so Rawlinson) the modern Hut. This town, famous for its bitumen springs, lay on the Euphrates, between Sippara (Sepharvaim) and Anah (Hena), with which it seems to have been politically united shortly before the time of Sennacherib (xix. 13). It is probably the Ahava of Ezr. viii. 15.

I'vo-ry (Heb. shên, in all passages, except 1 K. x. 22, and 2 Chr. ix. 21, where shenhabbîm is so rendered). The word shên, literally = the tooth of any animal, and hence more especially denotes the substance of the projecting tusks of elephants. (HORN.) It is remarkable that no word in Biblical Hebrew denotes an ELEPHANT, unless the latter portion of the compound shenhabbîm be supposed to have this meaning. Gesenius derives it from the Sanscrit ibhas, an elephant. The Assyrians appear to have carried on a great traffic in ivory. Their early conquests in India had made them familiar with it, and (according to one rendering of the passage) their artists supplied the luxurious Tyrians with carvings in ivory from the isles of Chittim (Ez. xxvii. 6). (BOX-TREE.) On the obelisk in the British Museum the captives or tribute-bearers are represented as carrying tusks. Among the merchandise of Babylon, enumerated in Rev. xviii. 12, are included "all manner vessels of ivory." The skilled workmen of Hiram, king of Tyre, fashioned the great ivory throne of Solomon, and overlaid it with pure gold (1 K. x. 18; 2 Chr. ix. 17). The ivory thus employed was supplied by the caravans of Dedan (Is. xxi. 13; Ez. xxvii. 16), or was brought with apes and peacocks by the navy of Tharshish (1 K. x. 22). The Egyptians, at a very early period, made use of this material in decoration. The ivory used by the Egyptians was principally brought from Ethiopia (Herodotus, iii. 114), though their elephants were originally from Asia. The Ethiopians, according to Diodorus Siculus, brought to Sesostrius "ebony and gold, and the teeth of elephants." According to Pliny, ivory was so plentiful on the borders of Ethiopia, that the natives made door-posts of it, and even fences and stalls for their cattle. The Egyptian merchants traded for ivory and onyx-stones to Barygaza, the port to which was carried down the commerce of Western India from Ozene. In the early ages of Greece, ivory was frequently employed for purposes of ornament. The "ivory house" of Ahab (1 K. xxii. 39) was probably a palace, the walls of which were panelled with ivory, like the palace of Menelaus described by Homer (Odys. iv. 73). Beds inlaid or veneered with ivory were in use among the Hebrews (Am. vi. 4), as also among the Egyptians. The great ivory throne of Solomon, the work of the Tyrian craftsmen, has been already mentioned (compare Rev. xx. 11); but it is difficult to determine whether the "tower of ivory" of Cant. vii. 4 is merely a figure of speech, or whether it had its original among the things that were. By the luxurious Phenicians, ivory was employed to ornament the boxwood rowing BENCHES (or "hatches," according to some) of their galleys (Ez. xxvii. 6).

I'vy (Gr. kixxos), a well-known creeping plant, the common Hedera Helix, of which the ancient Greeks and Romans describe two or three kinds, which appear to be only varieties. Ivy was sacred to BACCHUS (2 Mc. vi. 7).

Iz'e-har (fr. Heb.) = IZHAR (Num. iii. 19 only).

Iz'e-har-ites, the = the IZHARITES (Num. iii. 27).

Iz'har (fr. Heb. = oil, Ges.), son of Kohath, grandson of Levi, uncle of Aaron and Moses, and father of Korah (Ex. vi. 18, 21; Num. iii. 19, xvi. 1; 1 Chr. vi. 2, 18); head of the IZHARITES or IZE-HARITES.

Iz'har-ites (fr. Heb. = descendants of IZHAR), the, a family of Kohathite Levites, descendants from IZHAR (1 Chr. xxiv. 22, xxvi. 23, 29).

Iz-ra-hi'ah (fr. Heb. = whom Jehorah brings forth, Ges.), a chief of Issachar; son of Uzzi (1 Chr. vii. 3).

Iz'ra-hite (fr. Heb., probably = descendant of ZERAH 1, Ges.), the, the designation of SHAMUTH (1 Chr. xxvii. 8).

Iz'ri (fr. Heb. = descendant of Izzer, Ges.; erration [i. e. a creator] is Jah, Fû.), a Levite leader of the fourth course or ward in the service of the house of God (1 Chr. xxv. 11); in verse 3 called ZERI.

J

Ja'a-kan (fr. Heb. = AKAN, Ges.; a sagacious, intelligent one, Fû.), JAKAN, the forefather of the BENE-JAAKAN (Deut. x. 6).

Ja-a-ko'bah (fr. Heb. = JACOB, Ges.), a prince of Simeon (1 Chr. iv. 36).

Ja'a-la (fr. Heb.) = JAALAH, ancestor of certain "children of Solomon's servants" who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. vii. 58).

Ja'a-lah (fr. Heb. = wild she-goat, Ges.; elevation, Fū.) = JAAALA (Ezr. ii. 56).

Ja'a-lam (fr. Heb. = hidden, Ges.; ascender of the mountains, Fū.), a son of Esau (Gen. xxxvi. 5, 14, 18; compare 1 Chr. i. 35), and a phylarch (A. V. "duke") or head of a tribe of Edom.

Ja'a-nai (fr. Heb. = whom Jehovah answers, Ges.), a chief of Gad (1 Chr. v. 12).

Ja'a-re-or'e-gim (fr. Heb. = forests of the weavers, Ges.), according to the present text of 2 Sam. xxi. 19, a Bethlehemite, and the father of ELHANAN 1 who slew Goliath. JAIR 4.

Ja'a-sau (fr. Heb. = whom Jehovah has made, Ges.), one of the "sons" of Bani who had married a foreign wife, and had to put her away (Ezr. x. 37).

Ja'a-si-el (fr. Heb. = whom God has made, Ges.), ruler of Benjamin under David; son of Abner (1 Chr. xxvii. 21).

Ja-az-a-ni'ah (fr. Heb. = whom Jehovah hears, Ges.). 1. One of the captains who accompanied JOHANAN 3 to pay his respects to Gedaliah at Mizpah (2 K. xxv. 23), and who appears afterward to have assisted in recovering Ishmael's prey from his clutches (comp. Jer. xli. 11). Afterward he probably went to Egypt with the rest (Jer. xliii. 4, 5). (JEZANIAH).—2. Son of Shaphan (Ez. viii. 11); possibly = 3. Son of Azur; one of the princes of the people against whom Ezekiel was directed to prophesy (xi. 1).—4. A Rechabite, son of Jeremiah; apparently chief of the tribe (Jer. xxxv. 3).

Ja'a-zer, or Ja'zer (fr. Heb. = whom God helps, Ges.; a place hedged about, Fū.), a town E. of Jordan, in or near Gilead (Num. xxxii. 1, 3; 1 Chr. xvi. 31). We first hear of it in possession of the Amorites, and as taken by Israel after Heshbon, and on their way from thence to Bashan (Num. xxi. 32). It was rebuilt by the children of Gad and allotted from their territory to the Merarite Levites (xxxii. 35; Josh. xiii. 25, xxi. 39; 2 Sam. xxiv. 5; 1 Chr. vi. 81), but in David's time appears to have been occupied by Hebronites, i. e. descendants of Kohath (xxvi. 31). In the "burdens" against Moab, Jaazer is mentioned so as to imply that vineyards were there (Is. xvi. 8, 9; Jer. xlviii. 32). It seems to have given its name to a district of dependent towns (Num. xxi. 32, A. V. "villages"; 1 Mc. v. 8), the "land of Jazer" (Num. xxxii. 1). Eusebius and Jerome laid down its position as ten (or eight) Roman miles W. of Philadelphia (RABBAN 1; now Amman), and fifteen from Heshbon, and as the source of a river which falls into the Jordan. Seir, or Seir, is shown on the map of Van de Velde as nine Roman miles W. of Amman, and about twelve from Heshbon. And here, until further investigation, we must place Jazer.

Ja-a-zi'ah (fr. Heb. = whom Jehovah consoles, Ges.), apparently third son, or a descendant, of Merari the Levite (1 Chr. xxiv. 26, 27).

Ja-a-zi-el (fr. Heb. = whom God consoles, Ges.), one of the Levites appointed by David to perform the musical service before the ark (1 Chr. xv. 18). AZIEL.

Ja'hal (fr. Heb. = a stream, river, Ges.; mover, wanderer, nomad, Fū.), son of Lamech and Adah (Gen. iv. 20) and brother of Jubal; described as the "FATHER" of such as dwell in tents and have cattle.

Jab'bek (fr. Heb. = a pouring out, emptying, Sim., Ges.), a stream which intersects the mountain-range of Gilead (compare Josh. xii. 2, and 5), and falls into the Jordan about midway between the Sea of Galilee and the Dead Sea. It was anciently the border of the children of Ammon (Num. xxi. 24; Deut. ii. 37, iii. 16). When the Ammonites were driven out by Sihon from their ancient territory, they took possession of the eastern plain, and of a considerable section of the eastern defiles of Gilead, around the sources and upper branches of the Jabbok. It was on the S. bank of the Jabbok the interview took place between Jacob and Esau (Gen. xxxii. 22); and this river afterward became, toward its western part, the boundary between the kingdoms of Sihon and Og (Josh. xii. 2, 5). Its modern name is Wady Zurka (so Porter, with Robinson, Stanley, Winer, Gesenius, Fürst, Fairbairn, &c.). But Mr. Wilton (in Fairbairn, s. v. Joghbehah) maintains that the Jabbok = the Hieromax, the modern Nahr Yarmuk, which falls into the Jordan about five miles S. of the Lake of Gennesaret.

Ja'besh (fr. Heb. = dry, Ges.). 1. Father of SHALLUM, the fifteenth king of Israel (2 K. xv. 10, 13, 14).—2. The short form of JABESH-GILEAD (1 Sam. xi. 9, 10; 1 Chr. x. 12).

Ja'besh-gil'e-ad (fr. Heb., see JABESH and GILEAD), or Jabesh in the territory of Gilead. In its widest sense Gilead included the half-tribe of Manasseh (1 Chr. xxvii. 21) as well as the tribes of Gad and Reuben (Num. xxxii. 1-42) E. of the Jordan—and of the cities of Gilead, Jabesh was the chief. It is first mentioned in Judg. xxi. 8-14. For not coming up to Mizpeh in the war against Benjamin, every male was put to the sword, and all virgins (400) seized to be given in marriage to the 600 men of Benjamin that remained. Being attacked subsequently by Nabash the Ammonite, Saul displayed his prowess in its defence (1 Sam. xi. 1-15). When Saul and his three sons were slain, the men of Jabesh came by night and took down their corpses from the walls of Beth-shan, and paid them funeral honors (1 Sam. xxxi. 8-13). David blessed them for this (2 Sam. ii. 4 ff.). The site of the city is not defined in the O. T., but Eusebius places it beyond Jordan, six miles from Pella on the mountain-road to Gerasa; where its name is probably preserved in the Wady Yabes, which, flowing from the E., enters the Jordan below Beth-shan or Scythopolis. According to Robinson, the ruin ed-Deir, on the S. side of the Wady, still marks its site.

Ja'bez (fr. Heb. = he causes pain, Ges.). 1. Apparently a place at which the families of the scribes resided, who belonged to the families of the Kenites (1 Chr. ii. 55).—2. The name occurs again in the genealogies of Judah (iv. 9, 10), in a passage of remarkable detail inserted in a genealogy again connected with Bethlehem (ver. 4). Jabez was "more honorable than his brethren," though who they were is not ascertainable.

Ja'blin (fr. Heb. = whom God observes, Ges.). 1. King of HAZOR 1, who organized a confederacy of the northern princes against the Israelites (Josh. xi. 1-3). He assembled an army, which the Scripture narrative compares to the sands for multitude (ver. 4). Joshua surprised this vast host of allied forces by the waters of Merom (ver. 7) and utterly routed them. During the ensuing wars, Joshua again attacked Jabin and burnt his city (xi. 1-14).—2. A king of Hazor, who had 900 chariots of iron, and for twenty years oppressed the children of Israel. His great army under Sisera was defeated by BARAK near the river Kishon (Judg. iv. 3, 13, v. 21). Some have supposed this Jabin = No. 1, but in opposition to the plain narrative of the Scriptures. The common chronology makes the victory of Joshua over Jabin 1 about 150 years previous to that of DEBORAH and Barak over Jabin 2, who was probably a descendant of No. 1. During the interval the Canaanites evidently recovered their strength in northern Palestine, &c., and may have rebuilt the city of HAZOR. HAROSHETH.

Jabneel (fr. Heb. = God lets build, Ges.). 1. One of the points on the N. boundary of Judah, not quite at the sea, though near it (Josh. xv. 11). There is no sign, however, of its ever having been occupied by Judah. Josephus attributes it to the Danites. There was a constant struggle going on between that tribe (DAN) and the Philistines for the possession of all the places in the lowland plains, and we next meet with Jabneel in the hands of the latter (2 Chr. xxvi. 6). Uzziah dispossessed them of it, and demolished its fortifications. Here it is in the shorter form of JABNEH. Under the name of JAMNIA it is mentioned in 1 Mc. iv. 15, v. 58, x. 69, xv. 40, and was again a strong place. At this time there was a harbor on the coast, to which, and the vessels lying there, Judas set fire (2 Mc. xii. 9). At the time of the fall of Jerusalem, Jabneh was one of the most populous places of Judea, and contained a Jewish school of great fame. The modern village of Yebna, more accurately Ibna, stands about two miles from the sea on a slight eminence just S. of the Nahr Rubin. It is about eleven miles S. of Jaffa, seven from Ramleh, and four from Akir (Ekron). It probably occupies its ancient site.—2. One of the landmarks on the boundary of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 33 only). Little or no clue can be got to its situation. Doubtless it is the same place which, as Iamnia and Iamnilh, is mentioned by Josephus among the villages in Upper Galilee.

Jabneh (fr. Heb. = God lets build) = JABNEEL (2 Chr. xxvi. 6).

Ja'chin (L. fr. Heb. = whom God makes firm, Ges.), one of the two pillars set up "in the porch" (1 K. vii. 21) or before the TEMPLE (2 Chr. iii. 17) of Solomon. BOAZ 2.

Ja'chin (see above). 1. Fourth son of Simeon (Gen. xli. 10; Ex. vi. 15); founder of the family of the JACHINITES (Num. xxvi. 12). (JARIB 1).—2. Head of the twenty-first course of priests in the time of David. Some of the course returned from Babylon (1 Chr. ix. 10, xxiv. 17; Neh. xi. 10).

Ja'chin-ites (fr. Heb.), the = the family founded by JACHIN, son of Simeon (Num. xxvi. 12).

Ja'eluth [-sinth] (fr. Gr. hyakinthos = hyacinth), a precious stone, forming one of the foundations of the walls of the new Jerusalem (Rev. xxi. 20). The ancient Gr. hyakinthos (hyacinth or jacinth) = the modern SAPPHIRE (King). The modern jacinth or hyacinth is a red variety of zircon, found in square prisms, white, gray, red, reddish-brown, yellow, or pale-green. The expression in Rev. ix. 17, "of jacinth," applied to the breast-plate, is descriptive simply of a hyacinthine, i. e. dark-purple color. COLORS, II. 2.

Ja'rob (L. fr. Heb. ya'akób = heel-catcher, supplanter, her-in-wait, Ges.). 1. Second son of ISAAC and REBEKAH, born with ESAU, when Isaac was 69 and Abraham 159 years old, probably at the well Lahai-roi. His history is related in the latter half of Genesis. He bought the birth-right (FIRST-BORN) from his brother Esau; and afterward, at his mother's instigation, acquired the blessing intended for Esau, by practising a well-known deceit on Isaac. Hitherto the two sons shared the wanderings of Isaac in the S. Country; but now Jacob, in his seventy-eighth year, was sent from the family home, to avoid his brother, and to seek a wife among his kindred in PADAN-ARAM. As he passed through BETHEL, God appeared to him. After the lapse of twenty-one years he returned from PADAN-ARAM with two wives (LEAH; RACHEL), two concubines (BILHAH; ZILPAH; see CONCUBINE; MARRIAGE), eleven sons (REUBEN; SIMEON; LEVI; JUDAH; DAN; NAPHTALI; GAD; ASHER; ISSACHAR; ZEBULUN; JOSEPH), and a daughter (DINAH), and large property. He escaped from the angry pursuit of LABAN (GALEEN), from a meeting with Esau, and from the vengeance of the Canaanites provoked by the murder of Shechem; and in each of those three emergencies he was aided and strengthened by the interposition of God, and in sign of the grace won by a night of wrestling with God (PENIEL), his name was changed at Jabbok into ISRAEL. Deborah and Rachel died before he reached Hebron; BENJAMIN was born to him on the way; and at Hebron, in the 122d year of his age, he and Esau buried their father Isaac. Joseph, the favorite son of Jacob, was sold into Egypt eleven years before the death of Isaac; and Jacob had probably exceeded his 130th year when he went thither, being encouraged in a divine vision as he passed for the last time through Beer-sheba. He was presented to Pharaoh, and dwelt for seventeen years at Rameses and Goshen. After giving his solemn blessing to Ephraim and Manasseh, and his own sons one by one, and charging the ten to complete their reconciliation with Joseph, he died in his 147th year. His body was embalmed, carried with great care and pomp into the land of Canaan, and deposited with his fathers, and his wife Leah, in the cave of MACHPELAH.—The example of Jacob is quoted by the first and the last of the minor prophets. Hosea, in the latter days of the kingdom, seeks (xii. 3, 4, 12) to convert the descendants of Jacob from their state of alienation from God, by recalling to their memory the repeated acts of God's favor shown to their ancestor. And Malachi (i. 2) strengthens the desponding hearts of the returned exiles by assuring them that the love which God bestowed upon Jacob was not withheld from them. Besides the frequent mention of his name in conjunction with those of the other two patriarchs, there are distinct references to events in the life of Jacob in four books of the N. T. In Rom. ix. 11-13, St. Paul adduces the history of Jacob's birth to prove that the favor of God is independent of the order of natural descent. In Heb. xii. 16, and xi. 21, the transfer of the birthright and Jacob's dying benediction are referred to. His vision at Bethel and his possession of land at Shechem are cited in Jn. i. 51, and iv. 5, 12. And Stephen, in his speech (Acts vii. 12, 16), mentions the famine which was the means of restoring Jacob to his lost son in Egypt, and the burial of his sons in Shechem. We should also suppose, had we only this concise statement, that Jacob himself was buried at Shechem (see above). Such are the events of Jacob's life recorded in Scripture. In Jacob may be traced a combination of the quiet patience of his father with the acquisitiveness which seems to have marked his mother's family; and in Esau, as in Ishmael, the migratory and independent character of Abraham was developed into the enterprising habits of a warlike hunter-chief. Jacob, whose history occupies a larger space, leaves on the reader's mind a less favorable impression than either of the other patriarchs with whom he is joined in equal honor in the N. T. (Mat. viii. 11). But in considering his character we must bear in mind that we know not what limits were set in those days to the knowledge of God and the sanctifying influence of the Holy Spirit. A timid, thoughtful boy would acquire no self-reliance in a secluded home. There was little scope for the exercise of intelligence, wide sympathy, generosity, frankness. Growing up a stranger to the great joys and great sorrows of natural life—deaths, and wedlock, and births; inured to caution and restraint in the presence of a more vigorous brother; secretly stimulated by a belief that God designed for him some superior blessing, Jacob was perhaps in a fair way to become a narrow, selfish, deceitful, disappointed man. But, after dwelling for more than half a lifetime in solitude, he is driven from home by the provoked hostility of his more powerful brother. Then in deep and bitter sorrow the outcast begins life afresh long after youth has passed, and finds himself brought first of all unexpectedly into that close personal communion with God which elevates the soul, and then into that enlarged intercourse with men which is capable of drawing out all the better-feelings of human nature. An unseen world was opened. God revived and renewed to him that slumbering promise over which he had brooded for threescore years since he learned it in childhood from his mother. Angels conversed with him. Gradually he felt more and more the watchful care of an ever-present spiritual Father. Face to face he wrestled with the Representative of the Almighty. And so, even though the moral consequences of his early transgressions hung about him, and saddened him with a deep knowledge of all the evil of treachery and domestic envy, and partial judgment, and filial disobedience, yet the increasing revelations of God enlightened the old age of the patriarch; and at last the timid "supplanter," the man of subtle devices, waiting for the salvation of Jehovah, dies the "soldier of God" uttering the messages of God to his remote posterity. (PATRIARCH.)—2. Father of Joseph, the husband of Mary the mother of Jesus (Mat. i. 15, 16). GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST.

* Ja'cob's Well (Jn. iv. 6 ff.). SHECHEM.

Ja-cub's (fr. Gr.) = AKKUB 4 (1 Esd. ix. 48).

Ja'da (fr. Heb. = knowing, wise, Ges.), son of Onam, and brother of Shammai, in the genealogy of the sons of Jerahmeel by his wife Atarah (1 Chr. ii. 28, 32).

Ja'dau (fr. Heb. = Ido, Ges.), one of the sons of Nebo who had taken a foreign wife (Ezr. x. 43).

Ja'du-a (fr. Heb. = known, Ges.). 1. One of the chief laymen who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 21).—2. Son, and successor in the high-priesthood, of Jonathan or Johanan; the last HIGH-PRIEST mentioned in the O. T., and probably (so Lord A. C. Hervey) the latest name in the canon (xii. 11, 22). Probably also he was priest in the reign of the last Persian king Darius, and still high-priest after the Persian dynasty was overthrown, i. e. in the reign of ALEXANDER THE GREAT.

Ja'don (fr. Heb. = judge, Ges.), "the Meronothite," who assisted to repair the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 7).

Ja'el (fr. Heb. = wild [or mountain] goat, Ges.), the wife of Heber the KENITE. In the headlong rout which followed the defeat of the Canaanites by Barak, Sisera, abandoning his chariot the more easily to avoid notice, fled unattended, and in an opposite direction from that taken by his army, to the tent of the Kenite chieftainess. He accepted

Jael's invitation to enter, and she flung a mantle over him as he lay wearily on the floor. When thirst prevented sleep, and he asked for water, she brought him buttermilk in her choicest vessel, thus ratifying with the semblance of officious zeal the sacred bond of Eastern hospitality. At last, with a feeling of perfect security, the weary general resigned himself to the deep sleep of misery and fatigue. Then it was that Jael took in her left hand one of the great wooden pins which fastened down the cords of the tent, and in her right hand the mallet used to drive it into the ground, and with one terrible blow dashed it through Sisera's temples deep into the earth. With one spasm of fruitless agony, "at her feet he bowed, he fell dead" (Judg. v. 27). She then waited to meet the pursuing Barak, and led him into her tent that she might in his presence claim the glory of the deed! Many have supposed that by this act she fulfilled the saying of Deborah, that God would sell Sisera into the hand of a woman (iv. 9; Jos. v. 5, § 4); and hence they have supposed that Jael was actuated by some divine and hidden influence. But the Bible gives no hint of such an inspiration. If, therefore, we eliminate the still more monstrous supposition of the Rabbis that Sisera was slain by Jael because he attempted to offer her violence, the murder will appear in all its atrocity. We may question whether any moral commendation is directly intended in Judg. v. 24, "Blessed above women shall Jael . . . be," &c. What Deborah stated was a fact, viz. that the wives of the nomad Arabs would undoubtedly regard Jael as a public benefactress, and praise her as a popular heroine. "It is in reality the work of God's judgment through her instrumentality that is celebrated, not her mode of carrying it into execution" (so Fairbairn). The suggestion of Gesenius, Hollmann, Winer, &c., that the Jael in Judg. v. 6 is not the wife of Heber, but some unknown Israelitish judge, appears extremely unlikely (so Mr. Farrar).

Jagar (fr. Heb. = lodging-place, Ges.), a town of Judah, one of those furthest to the S., on the frontier of Edom (Josh. xv. 21). KINAH.

Jah (Heb. Yah), the abbreviated form of "JEHOVAH," used only in poetry. It occurs frequently in the Hebrew, but with a single exception (Ps. lxxviii. 4) is rendered "LORD" in the A. V. The identity of JAH and JEHOVAH is strongly marked in Is. xii. 2, xxvi. 4. The former of these should be translated "for my strength and song is JAH JEHOVAH" (compare Ex. xv. 2); and the latter, "trust ye in JEHOVAH for ever, for in JAH JEHOVAH is the rock of ages." "Praise ye the LORD," or Hallelujah, in all cases = "praise ye JAH." In Ps. lxxxix. 8 [Heb. 9] JAH stands in a parallelism with "JEHOVAH the God of hosts" in a passage which Mr. Wright would translate "Oh JEHOVAH, God of hosts, who like Thee is strong, O JAH!"

Ja'hath (fr. Heb. = union? Ges.; revival, comfort, Fū.). 1. Son of Libui, the son of Gershom and grandson of Levi (1 Chr. xi. 20).—2. Head of a later house in the family of Gershom; eldest son of Shimei, the son of Laadan (xxiii. 10, 11).—3. A man in the genealogy of Judah (iv. 2); son of Reaiah the son of Shobal.—4. A Kohathite Levite, son of Shelomoth (xxiv. 22).—5. A Merarite Levite in the reign of Josiah (2 Chr. xxxiv. 12).

Ja'haz, also Ja'ha-za, Ja'ha-zah, and Jah'zah (all fr. Heb. Yahats, Yah'zāh [= place trodden down, Ges.]). At Jahaz the decisive battle was fought between the children of Israel and Sihon, king of the Amorites, which ended in the overthrow of the latter, and in the occupation by Israel of the whole pastoral country included between the Arnon and the Jabbok, the Beika of the modern Arabs (Num. xxi. 23; Deut. ii. 32; Judg. xi. 20). It was in the allotment of Reuben (Josh. xiii. 18), and was given to the Merarite Levites (1 Chr. vi. 78). It was in the hands of Moab in later times (Is. xv. 4; Jer. xlviii. 21, 34). Probably Jahaz was just N. of the Arnon, but this question must await further research.

Ja'ha-za (see JAHAZ) = JAHAZ (Josh. xiii. 18).

Ja'ha-zah (see JAHAZ) = JAHAZ (Josh. xxi. 36; Jer. xlviii. 21).

Ja-ha-zil'ah (fr. Heb. = whom Jehovah beholds, Ges.), son of Tikvah, apparently a priest with Ezra (Ezr. x. 15).

Ja-ha-zil-el (fr. Heb. = whom God beholds, Ges.). 1. One of the heroes of Benjamin who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chr. xii. 4).—2. A priest whom David appointed to blow the trumpet before the ark (xvi. 6).—3. A Kohathite Levite, third son of Hebron (xxiii. 19, xxiv. 23).—4. Son of Zechariah; a Levite of the sons of Asaph, inspired to animate Jehoshaphat and Judah in the march against the Moabites, Ammonites, &c. (2 Chr. xx. 14).—5. The "son of Jahaziel" was the chief of the sons of Shecaniah who returned from Babylon with Ezra (Ezr. viii. 6).

Jah'dal, or Jah'da-l (fr. Heb. = whom Jehovah directs, Ges.), a man who appears to be thrust abruptly into the genealogy of Caleb, as the father of six sons (1 Chr. ii. 47).

Jah'd-el (fr. Heb. = whom God makes joyful, Ges.), a chieftain of Manasseh, E. of Jordan (1 Chr. v. 24).

Jah'do (fr. Heb. = his union, Ges.), a Gadite, son of Buz and father of Jeshishai (1 Chr. v. 14).

Jah'le-el (fr. Heb. = hoping in God, Ges.), the third of the three sons of Zebulun (Gen. xli. 14; Num. xxvi. 26); founder of the JAHLEELITES.

Jah'le-el-ites (fr. Heb.), the = a branch of the tribe of Zebulun, descendants of JAHLEEL (Num. xxvi. 26).

Jah'mal, or Jah'ma-l (fr. Heb. = whom Jehovah guards, Ges.), a man of Issachar; one of the heads of the house of Tolah (1 Chr. vii. 2).

Jah'zah (see JAHAZ) = JAHAZ (1 Chr. vi. 78).

Jah'ze-el (fr. Heb. = whom God allots, Ges.), the first of the four sons of Naphtali (Gen. xli. 24); founder of the family of the JAHZEELITES (Num. xxvi. 48); = JAHZIEL.

Jah'ze-el-ites (fr. Heb.), the = a branch of the Naphtalites, descended from JAHZEEL (Num. xxvi. 48).

Jah'ze-rah (fr. Heb. = whom God leads back), a priest of the house of Immer (1 Chr. ix. 12); = AHASAI.

Jah'zi-el (fr. Heb.) = JAHZEEL (1 Chr. vii. 18).

Ja'ir (fr. Heb. = whom God enlightens, Ges.; see No. 4). 1. A man who on his father's side was descended from Judah, and on his mother's from Manasseh. (BECHER 1.) During the conquest he performed one of the chief feats recorded. He took the whole of ARGOB (Deut. iii. 14), and some villages in Gilead, which he called after his own name, HAVOTH-JAIR (Num. xxxii. 41; 1 Chr. ii. 23).—2. "Ja'ir the GILEADITE," who judged Israel for two-and-twenty years (Judg. x. 3-5). He had thirty sons who rode thirty asses, and possessed thirty cities in the land of Gilead, which were called HAVOTH-JAIR.—3. A Benjamite, son of Kish and father of Mordecai (Esth. ii. 5).—4. (fr. Heb. = whom God awakes, Ges.), father of ELHANAN 1, one of the heroes of David's army (1 Chr. xx. 5).

Ja'ir-lite (fr. Heb. = descendant of Ja'ir, Ges.), the. IRA the Jairite was a priest (?) (A.V. "chief ruler") to David (2 Sam. xx. 26).

Ja'i-ras (L. probably = JAIR). 1. A ruler of a synagogue, probably in some town near the western shore of the Sea of Galilee. Our Lord restored his daughter to life (Mat. ix. 18; Mk. v. 22; Lk. viii. 41).—2. [pron. Ja'i-rus] JAIR 3 (Esth. xi. 2).

Ja'kan (fr. Heb. = JAAKAN), son of Ezer the Horite (1 Chr. i. 42); = JAAKAN = ARAN.

Ja'keh (fr. Heb. = pious, Ges.). The A. V. of Prov. xxx. 1, following the Targum and Syriac, has represented this as the proper name of the father of AGUR, whose sayings are collected in Prov. xxx., and such is the natural interpretation. But beyond this we have no clue to the existence of either Agur or Jakeh. Of course if Agur be Solomon, it follows that Jakeh was a name of David of some mystical significance; but for this there is not a shadow of support. If Jakeh be the name of a person, as there is every reason to believe, we know nothing more about him; if not, there is no limit to the symbolical meanings which may be extracted from the clause in which it occurs. Hitzig makes Agur and Lemuel brothers, both sons of a queen of Massa, the latter being the reigning monarch (Prov. xx. i. 1). The Heb. massâ ("prophecy" or burden) is considered as a proper name = the region named MASSA in Arabia. UCAL.

Ja'kim (fr. Heb. = whom God sets up, Ges.). 1. Head of the twelfth course of priests in the reign of David (1 Chr. xxiv. 12).—2. A Benjamite, son of Shimhi (viii. 19).—3. JEHOKIAKIM (Mat. i. 11, margin).

Ja'lon (fr. Heb. = passing the night, abiding, Ges.), a descendant of Judah; son of Ezra (1 Chr. iv. 17).

Jam'bri (L. probably fr. Heb. dmri = OMRI, so Mr. Westcott). Shortly after the death of Judas Maccabeus (B. C. 161), "the children of Jambri" are said to have made a predatory attack on a detachment of the Maccabean forces (1 Mc. ix. 36-41). The name does not occur elsewhere. It has been conjectured that the original text was "the sons of the Amorites."

James (fr. Gr. Jakôbos; L. Jacobus; all fr. Heb. = JACOB). 1. "James the son of Zebedee." This is the only APOSTLE of whose life and death we can write with certainty. Of his early life we know nothing. We first hear of him (so Mr. Meyrick, original author of this article) A. D. 27, when he was called to be our Lord's disciple; and he disappears from view A. D. 44, when he suffered martyrdom at the hands of Herod Agrippa I.—I. His History. In the spring or summer of the year 27, Zebedee, a fisherman (Mk. i. 20), was out on the Sea of Galilee with his two sons, James and John (JOHN THE APOSTLE), and some boatmen. He was engaged in his customary occupation of fishing, and near him was another boat belonging to Simon and Andrew, with whom he and his sons were in partnership. Finding themselves unsuccessful, the occupants of both boats came ashore, and began to wash their nets. At this time the new Teacher (JESUS CHRIST) appeared upon the beach. At his call they left all, and became, once and forever, His disciples, hereafter to catch men. For a full year we lose sight of James. He is then, in the spring of 28, called to the apostleship with his eleven brethren (Mat. x. 2; Mk. iii. 14; Lk. vi. 13; Acts i. 13). In the list of the apostles given us by Mark, and in the Acts, his name occurs next to that of Simon Peter: in Matthew and Luke it comes third. It is worthy of notice that with one exception (Lk. ix. 28), James is put before John, and that John is twice described as "the brother of James" (Mk. v. 37; Mat. xvii. 1). This would appear to imply that at this time James, either from age or character, took a higher position than his brother. It would seem to have been at the time of the appointment of the twelve apostles that the name of "Boanerges" was given to the sons of Zebedee. The "Sons of Thunder" had a burning and impetuous spirit, which twice exhibits itself in its unchastened form (Lk. ix. 54; Mk. x. 37). The first occasion on which this natural character manifests itself in James and his brother is at the commencement of our Lord's last journey to Jerusalem in the year 30. He was passing through Samaria, and "sent messengers before His face" into a certain village, "to make ready for Him" (Lk. ix. 52), i. e. probably to announce Him as the Messiah. The Samaritans, with their old jealousy strong upon them, refused to receive Him; and in their exasperation James and John entreated their Master to follow the example of Elijah, and call down fire to consume them. At the end of the same journey a similar spirit appears again (Mk. x. 33). From the time of the Agony in the Garden, A. D. 30, to the time of his martyrdom, A. D. 44, we know nothing of James, except that after the Ascension he persevered in prayer with the other apostles, and the women, and the Lord's brethren (Acts i. 13). In the year 44, HEROD AGRIPPA I. was ruler of all the dominions which at the death of his grandfather, Herod the Great, had been divided between Archelaus, Antipas, Philip, and Lyسانias. Policy and inclination would alike lead such a monarch "to lay hands" (xii. 1) "on certain of the church;" and accordingly, when the Passover of the year 44 had brought James and Peter to Jerusalem, he seized them both.—II. Chronological Recapitulation. In the spring or summer of the year 27 James was called to be a disciple of Christ. In the spring of 28 he was appointed one of the twelve apostles. In the autumn of the same year he was admitted to the miraculous raising of Jairus's daughter. In the spring of 29 he witnessed the Transfiguration. Very early in the year 30 he urged his Lord to call down fire from heaven to consume the Samaritan village. About three months later in the same year, just before the final arrival in Jerusalem, he and his brother made their ambitious request through their mother Salome. On the night before the Crucifixion he was present at the Agony in the Garden. On the day of the Ascension he is mentioned as persevering with the rest of the apostles and disciples in prayer. Shortly before the Passover, in 44, he was put to death. Thus during fourteen out of the seventeen years that elapsed between his call and his death we do not even catch a glimpse of him.—III. Tradition respecting him. Clement of Alexandria, who flourished as early as A. D. 195, relates, concerning James's martyrdom, that the prosecutor was so moved by witnessing his bold confession that he declared himself a Christian on the spot: accused and accuser were therefore hurried off together, and on the road the latter begged James to grant him forgiveness; after a moment's hesitation, the apostle kissed him, saying, "Peace be to thee!" and they were beheaded together.

—2. "James the son of Alphaeus" (Mat. x. 3; Mk. iii. 18; Lk. vi. 15; Acts i. 13).—3. "James the brother of the Lord" (Mat. xiii. 55; Mk. vi. 3; Gal. i. 19).—4. "James the son of Mary" (Mat. xxvii. 56; Lk. xxiv. 10); also called "the Little" (A. V. "the Less," Mk. xv. 40).—5. "James the brother of Jude" (Jude 1).—6. "James the brother (?) of Jude" (Lk. vi. 16; Acts i. 13).—7. "James" (Acts xii. 17, xv. 13, xxi. 18; 1 Cor. xv. 7; Gal. ii. 9, 12).—8. "James the Servant of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ" (Jas. i. 1). St. Paul identifies for us Nos. 3 and 7 (see Gal. ii. 9 and 12 compared with i. 19). If we may translate, in Lk. vi. 16 and Acts i. 13, "Judas the brother," rather than the son "of James," we may conclude that 5 = 6. We may identify 5 and 6 with 3, because we know that James the Lord's brother had a brother named Jude. We may identify 4 with 3, because we know James the son of Mary had a brother named Josés, and so also had James the Lord's brother. Thus there remain two only, James the son of Alphaeus (2.), and James the brother of the Lord (3.). Can we, or can we not, identify them? This requires a longer consideration. By comparing Mat. xxvii. 56 and Mk. xv. 40 with Jn. xix. 25, we find that the Virgin Mary (MARY, THE VIRGIN) had a sister named like herself, Mary, who was the wife of Clopas (A. V. "Cleophas"), and who had two sons, James the Little and Josés. By referring to Mat. xiii. 55 and Mk. vi. 3, we find that a James and a Josés, with two other brethren called Jude and Simon, and at least three sisters, were living with the Virgin Mary at Nazareth. By referring to Lk. vi. 16 and Acts i. 13, we find that there were two brethren named James and Jude among the apostles. It would certainly be natural to think that we had here but one family of four brothers and three or more sisters, the children of Clopas and Mary, nephews and nieces of the Virgin Mary. There are difficulties, however, in the way of this conclusion. For, 1. the four brethren in Mat. xiii. 55 are described as the brothers of Jesus, not as His cousins; 2. they are found living as at their home with the Virgin Mary, which seems unnatural if she were their aunt, their mother being, as we know, still alive; 3. the James of Lk. vi. 15 is described as the son not of Clopas, but of Alphaeus; 4. the "brethren of the Lord" appear to be excluded from the apostolic band by their declared unbelief in His Messiahship (Jn. vii. 3-5), and by being formally distinguished from the disciples by the gospel-writers (Mat. xii. 48; Mk. iii. 33; Jn. ii. 12; Acts i. 14); 5. James and Jude are not designated as the Lord's brethren in the list of the apostles; 6. Mary is designated as the mother of James and Josés, whereas she would have been called mother of James and Jude, had James and Jude been apostles, and Josés not an apostle (Mat. xxvii. 46). The following answers may be given:—Objection 1: "They are called brethren." Now it is clearly not necessary to understand the Greek plural adelphoi as = brothers in the nearest sense of brotherhood. It need not mean more than relative. (BROTHER.) But perhaps the circumstances of the case would lead us to translate it "brethren"? On the contrary, such a translation appears to produce very grave difficulties (see note 1 below). For (1.) it introduces two sets of four first-cousins, bearing the same names of James, Josés, Jude, and Simon; and (2.) it drives us to take our choice between three doubtful and improbable hypotheses as to the parentage of this second set of James, Josés, Jude, and Simon. There are three such hypotheses: (a.) The Eastern hypothesis, that they were the children of Joseph by a former wife (Epiphanius, Hilary, Ambrose, the later Greek Church, &c.). (b.) The Helvidian hypothesis, that James, Joses, Jude, Simon, and the three sisters, were children of Joseph and Mary (Bonosus, Helvidius, Jovinian, Strauss, Herder, Davidson, Alford, &c.). (c.) The Levirate hypothesis, that Joseph and Clopas were brothers, and that Joseph raised up seed to his dead brother (an attempt in the eleventh century to reconcile the Greek and Latin traditions).—Objection 2: "The four brothers and their sisters are always found living and moving about with the Virgin Mary." If they were the children of Clopas, the Virgin Mary was their aunt. Her own husband would appear without doubt to have died between A. D. 8 and A. D. 26. Nor have we any reason for believing Clopas to have been alive during our Lord's ministry. What difficulty is there in supposing that the two widowed sisters lived together, the more so as one of them had but one son, and He was often taken from her by His ministerial duties?—Objection 3: "James the apostle is said to be the son of Alphaeus, not of Clopas." But ALPHAEUS and Clopas are the same name.—Objection 4: Dean Alford considers Jn. vii. 5, compared with vi. 67-70, to decide that none of the brothers of the Lord were of the number of the twelve. If this verse, as he states, makes "the crowning difficulty" to the hypothesis of the identity of James the son of Alphaeus, the apostle, with James the brother of the Lord, the difficulties are not so formidable to be overcome. It is not at all necessary to suppose that John is here speaking of all the brethren. If Joses, Simon, and the three sisters disbelieved, it would be quite sufficient ground for the statement of the Evangelist. Nor does it necessarily follow that the disbelief of the brethren was of such a nature that James and Jude could have had no share in it.—Objection 5: The omission of a title is so slight a ground for an argument, that we may pass this by.—Objection 6: There is no such improbability as is alleged in this objection, if Joses was, as would seem likely, an elder brother of Jude, and next in order to James.<sup>1</sup> Had we not (so Mr. Meyrick, with Papias, Clemens Alexandrinus, Chrysostom, Jerome, Augustine, and the Western or Latin Church) identified James the son of Alphaeus with the brother of the Lord, we should have but little to write of him. Of his father, Alphaeus or Clopas, we know nothing, except that he married Mary, the sister of the Virgin Mary, and had by her four sons and three or more daughters. Probably these cousins, or, as they were usually called, brothers and sisters of the Lord, were older than Himself. Of James individually we know nothing till the spring of the year 28, when we find him, together with his younger brother Jude, called to the Apostolate. It is not likely (though far from impossible) that James and Jude took part with their brothers and sisters, and the Virgin Mary, in trying "to lay hold on" Jesus in the autumn of the same year (Mk. iii. 21); and it is likely, though not certain, that it is of the other brothers and sisters, without these two, that John says, "Neither did His brethren believe on Him" (Jn. vii. 5), in the autumn of A. D. 29. We hear no more of James till after the Crucifixion and the Resurrection. At some time in the forty days that intervened between the Resurrection and the Ascension the Lord appeared to him. This is not related by the Evangelists, but by St. Paul (1 Cor. xv. 7). We cannot fix the date of this appearance. It was probably only a few days before the Ascension. Again we lose sight of James for ten years, and when he appears once more it is in a far higher position than any that he has yet held. In the year 37 occurred the conversion of Saul. Three years after his conversion he paid his first visit to Jerusalem, but the Christians recollected what they had suffered at his hands, and feared to have any thing to do with him. Barnabas, at this time of far higher reputation than himself, took him by the hand, and introduced him to Peter and James (Acts ix. 27; Gal. i. 18, 19), and by their authority he was admitted into the society of the Christians, and allowed to associate freely with them during the fifteen days of his stay. Here we find James on a level with Peter, and with him deciding on the admission of St. Paul into fellowship with the Church at Jerusalem; and from henceforth we always find him equal, or in his own

<sup>1</sup> The preceding argument is from the article in Smith's Dictionary by Mr. Meyrick. Dr. Lange (Comm. on Mat. xiii. 55-57, &c.) has recently advocated the same theory, that James and the other "brethren" of Jesus were really his cousins, maintaining, not with Mr. Meyrick and most, that the two Marys (their mothers) were sisters, but that Joseph and Alphaeus were brothers, and, the latter dying early, the former adopted his brother's six or more children, and thus made them legally the brothers and sisters of Jesus. (Adoption.) But Rev. P. Schaff, D. D. (in B. S. xxi. 855 ff., Amer. Ed. of Lange on Mat., &c.), advocates the view that these "brethren" and "sisters" of Jesus were younger children of Joseph and Mary, or else older children of Joseph by a former marriage, on the following grounds:—(1.) The "brethren" of Jesus (Jacob or James, Joseph or Joses, Simon, Jude or Judas) are mentioned with or without their names fourteen or fifteen times in the N. T. (Mat. xii. 46, 47; Mk. iii. 31, 32; Lk. viii. 19, 20; Jn. vii. 3, 5, 10; Acts i. 14; 1 Cor. ix. 5; Gal. i. 19), twice with their "sisters" (Mat. xiii. 55, 56; Mk. vi. 3). (2.) The exegetical or grammatical a priori presumption favors the literal meaning of "brethren" and "sisters," especially as no parallel case of a wider meaning (except as "brethren," &c. = Christians) can be quoted from the N. T. (BROTHER.) (3.) There is no mention in the N. T. of cousins or kinmen of Jesus according to the flesh, though terms were not wanting to express this relationship (Mk. vi. 4; Lk. i. 36, 58; Il. 44, xiv. 12, xxi. 16; Jn. xviii. 26; Acts x. 24, xxiii. 26; Rom. ix. 3, xvi. 7, 11, 21; Col. iv. 10). (4.) The "brethren" and "sisters" of Jesus always (except in Jn. vii. and 1 Cor. ix.) appear in close connection with him and his mother Mary, as being under her care and direction, and forming one family; why never with their own supposed mother. Mary the wife of Cleophas or Alphaeus, who was living all the time and one of Christ's most faithful followers (Mat. xxvii. 56 ff.; Jn. xix. 25)? (5.) There is no intimation in the N. T., unless in Gal. i. 19 (see below 8), that Christ's "brethren" or any of them were of the twelve apostles. (6.) The "brethren" of Jesus are mentioned after the apostles and thus distinguished from them (Acts i. 13, 14; 1 Cor. ix. 5; compare Mat. xii. 46-50, 69). (7.) His "brethren" are represented in Jn. vii. 8-10, long after the call of the apostles, as unbelievers. (8.) There are no insurmountable objections; for (a) The objection from identity in name of three of these brothers with three of the apostles (James, Simon, Judas) is more than counterbalanced by the opposite difficulty of two sisters with the same name. (MARY, THE WIFE OF CLEOPHAS.) Josephus mentions twenty-one Simons, seventeen Joses, and sixteen Judas. There were among the twelve apostles two Simons, two Jameses, and two Judases. These were among the most common Jewish names. (b) The objection from Gal. i. 19—"But other of the apostles saw I none, save James the Lord's brother"—is destroyed, if, with Winer and other high authorities, we supply I saw before "James" (compare Lk. iv. 26, 27). Dr. Schaff thinks, with Meyer, that James is here distinguished from the Twelve to which Peter belonged, but numbered with the "apostles" in a wider sense, i. e. a man who from his close natural relationship to Christ, his weight of character, and his piety, enjoyed an apostolic dignity and authority among the strict Jewish Christians, being the acknowledged head and leader of this branch, and the first bishop of Jerusalem, where he permanently resided and department superior, to the very chiefest apostles, Peter, John, and Paul. For by this time, according to ecclesiastical tradition, he had been appointed to preside over the infant Church in its most important centre, in a position equivalent to that of bishop. This preëminence is evident throughout the after-history of the apostles, whether we read it in the Acts, in the Epistles, or in Ecclesiastical writers (Acts xii. 17, xv. 13, 19, xxi. 18; Gal. ii. 9). According to the tradition of his martyrdom, recorded by Hegesippus, James "called Just" was thrown down from the Temple (shortly before Vespasian commenced the siege of Jerusalem) by the Scribes and Pharisees; he was then stoned, and his brains dashed out by a fuller's club.

James (see above), the General Epistle of. I. Its Genuineness and Canonicity. In the third book of his Ecclesiastical History, Eusebius places James, 2d and 3d John, and Jude, among the disputed books of the N. T. Elsewhere he refers this epistle to the class of "spurious." It is found in the Syriac version, and appears to be referred to by Clement of Rome, Hermas, and Irenæus, and is quoted by almost all the Fathers of the 4th century, e. g. Athanasius, Cyril, Gregory Nazianzen, Epiphanius, and Chrysostom. In 397 the Council of Carthage accepted it as canonical, and from that time there has been no further question of its genuineness on the score of external testimony. (CANON; INSPIRATION.) But at the time of the Reformation the question of its authenticity was again raised, and now upon the ground of internal evidence; the chief objection being a supposed opposition between St. Paul and St. James, on the doctrine of Justification.—II. Its Author. The author of the Epistle must be either James the son of Zebedee, according to the subscription of the Syriac version; or James the son of Alphaeus; or James the brother of the Lord, which is the general opinion; or an unknown James. Internal evidence points unmistakably to James the Just as the writer, and we have, in the preceding article, identified James the Just with the son of Alphaeus (so Mr. Meyrick, original author of this article). It was written from Jerusalem, which St. James does not seem to have ever left. The time at which he wrote it has been fixed as late as A. D. 62, and as early as 45. Those who see in its writer a desire to counteract the effects of a misconstruction of St. Paul's doctrine of Justification by faith, in ii. 14-26, and those who see a reference to the immediate destruction of Jerusalem in v. 1, and an allusion to the name Christians in ii. 7, argue in favor of the later date. The earlier date is advocated chiefly on the ground that the Epistle could not have been written by St. James after the Council in Jerusalem, without some allusion to what was there decided, and because the Gentile Christian does not yet appear to be recognized.—III. Its Object. The main object of the Epistle is not to teach doctrine, but to improve morality. St. James is the moral teacher of the N. T. There are two ways of explaining this characteristic of the Epistle. Some commentators and writers see in St. James a man who had not realized the essential principles and peculiarities of Christianity, but was in a transition state, half-Jew and half-Christian. But there is another and much more natural way of accounting for the fact. St. James was writing for a special class of persons, and knew what that class especially needed. Those for whom he wrote were the Jewish Christians whether in Jerusalem or abroad. The two objects of the Epistle are—1. to warn against the sins (formalism, fanaticism, fatalism, meanness, falsehood, partisanship, evil speaking, boasting, oppression) to which as Jews they were most liable; 2. to console and exhort them under the sufferings to which as Christians they were most exposed.—IV. Two points in the Epistle demand a somewhat more lengthened notice. These are (a.) ii. 14-26, which has been represented as a formal opposition to St. Paul's doctrine of JUSTIFICATION BY FAITH, and (b.) v. 14, 15, which is quoted as the authority for the Sacrament of Extreme Unction. (a.) If we consider the meaning of the two apostles, we see at once that there is no contradiction either intended or possible. St. Paul was opposing the Judaizing party, which claimed to earn acceptance by good works, whether the works of the Mosaic law, or works of piety done by themselves. In opposition to these, St. Paul lays down the great truth that acceptance cannot be earned by man at all, but is died, while the "apostles" proper were not fixed in any particular diocese. (c) The objection that Christ on the cross could not have commended his mother to the care of John (Jn. xix. 26, 27), if she had other sons, applies also if James and Judas were apostles, cousins, and long inmates of the family, and must be solved on the ground of a deeper spiritual sympathy on the part of John. (See also 9. a. below.) (d) The objection from a belief in the perpetual virginity of Mary is a matter of religious doctrine or feeling to be treated with proper regard; but it applies only to the view that these "brethren" were younger children of Mary, not to their being older children of Joseph by a former marriage. Further, while Mary's virginity before Christ's birth is an article of faith, neither Christ's honor nor Mary's requires her perpetual virginity after his birth, unless there be something unholy or impure in the marriage relation itself (Heb. xiii. 4); the apostles and evangelists seem to have had no such feeling of repugnance to a real marriage between Joseph and Mary (compare Mat. i. 25; Lk. ii. 7, &c.); and Christ's sharing the common trials of family life in all its forms, moving as a brother among brothers and sisters, may be another proof of His true and full humanity and condescending love (compare Heb. iv. 15). (9.) Nor is the cousin-theory free from difficulties. It assumes (a) that Mary the mother of James and Joseph (Mat. xxvii. 56; Mk. xv. 40) was sister of the Virgin Mary, two sisters bearing the same name. (MARY, THE WIFE OF CLEOPHAS.) But the "mother's sister" in Jn. xix. 25 may be—SALOME. (b) That Cleophas = ALPHEUS. This, though not improbable, is not certain. Besides, MATTHEW (or LEVI) was also a son of Alphaeus (Mk. ii. 14), and if James's

Judas (JUDAS, THE BROTHER OF JAMES) and SIMON 5, two of the twelve, were likewise among Christ's brothers, we should have four apostles of whom it is said in Jn. vii. that they did not believe (compare Jn. ii. 11). Mary, too, is called the mother of James and Joseph (correctly Joseph) only, never of Simon and Jude, the other two "brethren" of Jesus, and supposed apostles. Lange avoids some of these difficulties by giving up the sisterhood of the two Marys, but he assumes without any exegetical proof the brotherhood of Cleophas (or Alphaeus) and Joseph, the early death of Alphaeus, and the adoption of his children into the holy family. (10.) The grammatical explanation of the terms "brethren" and "sisters" of Jesus is therefore far more easy and natural than the cousin-theory. But these may be (a) younger children of Joseph and Mary, and hence uterine brothers of Jesus, who was the son of Mary but had no human father. This view may be supported by Mat. i. 25 and Lk. ii. 7, and has been adopted by Tertullian, Helvidius, Herder, Neander, Winer, Meyer, Wieseler, Rothe, Stier, Alford, Farrar (in Smith's Dictionary, art. Brother), &c. (b) Older children of Joseph by a former marriage, and hence, in law and before the world, though not by blood, brothers and sisters of Christ. This view leaves the perpetual virginity of Mary untouched. It seems, moreover, to have been the oldest, and was held by Origen. Eusebius (who calls James of Jerusalem a "son of Joseph," but nowhere of Mary), Gregory of Nyssa, Cyril of Alexandria, Epiphanius (who even mentions the supposed order of births of the four sons and two daughters), Hilary, Ambrose, among the Ebionites, in the pseudo-apostolical constitutions, &c.

the free gift of God to the Christian man, for the sake of the merits of Jesus Christ, appropriated by each individual, and made his own by the instrumentality of faith.—St. James, on the other hand, was opposing the old Jewish tenet that to be a child of Abraham was all in all; that godliness was not necessary, so that the belief was correct. St. Paul's "faith" "worked by love;" but the "faith" which St. James is attacking, did not work by love, but was a bare assent of the head, not influencing the heart, a faith such as devils can have, and tremble. (b.) With respect to v. 14, 15, it is enough to say that the subject of Extreme Unction is a sick man about to die, and its object is not his cure: the subject of the ceremony described by St. James is a sick man not about to die, and the object is his cure and spiritual benefit.

Ja'min (L. fr. Heb. = right hand, prosperity, Ges.). 1. Second son of Simeon (Gen. xvi. 10; Ex. vi. 15; 1 Chr. iv. 24); founder of the family of the JAMINITES (Num. xxvi. 12).—2. A man of Judah; second son of Ram the Jerahmeelite (1 Chr. ii. 27).—3. One of the Levites who under Ezra and Nehemiah read and expounded the law to the people (Neh. viii. 7).

Ja'min-ites (fr. Heb.), the = the descendants of JAMIN the son of Simeon (Num. xxvi. 12).

Ja'm-lech [-lek] (fr. Heb. = whom God makes king, Ges.), a chief of Simeon (1 Chr. iv. 34).

Ja'mi-a (L.) = JABNEEL (1 Mc. iv. 15, v. 58, x. 69, xv. 40).

Ja'mnites (fr. L. Jamnites), the = the natives or inhabitants of Jamnia, i. e. of JABNEEL (2 Mc. xii. 8, 9, 40).

Ja'na (fr. Gr. = JOHN?), son of Joseph, and father of Melchi, in the genealogy of Christ (Lk. iii. 24).

Ja'nes [-neez] and Ja'm-bres [-breez] (both L., probably from Egyptian; see below), the names of two Egyptian magicians who opposed Moses. St. Paul alone of the sacred writers mentions them by name, and says no more than that they "withstood Moses," and that their folly in doing so became manifest (2 Tim. iii. 8, 9). It appears from the Jewish commentators that these names were held to be those of the magicians who opposed Moses and Aaron, spoken of in Exodus. We have been unable (so Mr. R. S. Poole) to discover an Egyptian name resembling Jambres or Mambres, which is another form. Jannes appears to be a transcription of the Egyptian name Aän, probably pronounced Ian. The signification of Aän is doubtful: the cognate word Aänt = a valley or plain. Whether Jannes and Jambres were mentioned in some long-lost book relating to the early history of the Israelites, or whether there was a veritable oral tradition respecting them cannot now be determined.

Ja-ne'ah (fr. Heb. = rest, quiet, Ges.), a place apparently in the N. of Galilee, of the "land of Naphthali;" taken by Tiglath-pileser in his first incursion into Palestine (2 K. xv. 29). Thomson (i. 463) finds its site at Yanoah, about ten miles E. N. E. from 'Akka.

Ja-ne'hah (fr. Heb. = JANOAH, Ges.), a place on the boundary of Ephraim (Josh. xvi. 6, 7). Eusebius gives it as twelve miles E. of Neapolis (Shechem). A little less than that distance S. E. from Nablus is the village of Yänün, with extensive and interesting ruins, doubtless = ancient Janohah.

* Ja'nus = JANUM (Josh. xv. 53, marg.).

Ja'pheth [-feth] (L. fr. Heb. = widely spreading, Ges.), one of the three sons of NOAH. From the order in which their names invariably occur (Gen. v. 32, vi. 10) we should naturally infer that Japheth was the youngest, but we learn from ix. 24 that HAM held that position. It has been generally supposed from x. 21 that Japheth was the eldest; but the word "elder" in that passage is better connected with "brother." (SHEM.) We infer therefore that Japheth was the second son of Noah (so Mr. Bevan, with Gesenius, Ayre, &c.; the A. V., LXX., Bush, &c., make Japheth the oldest son; Mr. Farrar [in Kitto] makes him the youngest). Japheth's sons were seven: GOMER, MAGOG, MADAI, JAVAN, TUBAL, MESHECH, and TIRAS. The descendants of Japheth occupied the "isles of the Gentiles" (x. 5.), i. e. the coast-lands of the Mediterranean Sea in Europe and Asia Minor, whence they spread N. over the whole continent of Europe and a considerable portion of Asia. (TONGUES, CONFUSION OF.)

Ja-ph'i'a (L. fr. Heb. = splendid, Ges.). The boundary of Zebulun ascended from Daberath to Japhia, and thence passed to Gath-hepher (Josh. xix. 12). Yäfa, two miles S. W. of Nazareth, not unlikely = Japhia. A tradition makes Yäfa the birth-place of Zebedee and of the Apostles James and John, his sons.

Ja-ph'i'a (see above). 1. King of Lachish, defeated and slain by the Israelites under Joshua (Josh. x. 3).—2. A son of David, born in Jerusalem (2 Sam. v. 15; 1 Chr. iii. 7, xiv. 6).

Japh'let (fr. Heb. = whom God delivers, Ges.), a descendant of Asher through Beriah (1 Chr. vii. 32, 33).

Japh'le-ti (fr. Heb. Yaphlett = one from Japhlet, Japhlette). The boundary of Japhleti is one of the landmarks on the S. boundary-line of Ephraim (Josh. xvi. 3). Possibly the name preserves the memory of some ancient tribe who at a remote age dwelt on these hills.

Japho (fr. Heb. Yäphö) = JOPPA, the modern Yäfa (Josh. xix. 46).

Ja'rah (fr. Heb. = honey, probably corrupted from JEHOADAH, Ges.; uncle, Fñ.), a descendant of Saul; son of Michal, and great-grandson of Mephibosheth (1 Chr. ix. 42, compare 40); = JEHOADAH.

Ja'reb (from Heb.; see below) is either to be explained as the proper name of a country or person, as a noun in apposition, or as a verb from a root rüb, to contend, plead. All these senses are represented in the A. V. and the marginal readings (Hos. v. 13, x. 6), and the least preferable (so Mr. Wright) has been inserted in the text. Kimchi explained Jareb as the name of some city of Assyria, or as another name of the country itself. The clause in which it occurs is supposed by many to refer to Judah, in order to make the parallelism complete; and with this in view Rashi interprets it of Ahaz, who sent to Tiglath-pileser (2 K. xvi. 8) to aid him against the combined forces of Syria and Israel. But Mr. Wright supposes that both the clauses refer to Ephraim, and the allusion would then be, as explained by Jerome, to Pul, who was subsidized by Menahem (xv. 19), and Judah would be indirectly included. If a Hebrew word, it is most probably a noun formed from the above-mentioned root, and applied to the land of Assyria, or to its king, as indicating their determined hostility to Israel, and their generally aggressive character. That it is rather to be applied to the country than to the king may be inferred from its standing in parallelism with Asshur. Gesenius makes it = an adversary, hence an adverse or hostile king, i. e. the king of Assyria. Fürst interprets one fighting, an adversary; but makes it a symbolic proper name of the warlike Asshur or Assyria, and says it may be an old Assyrian word.

Ja-red (L. fr. Heb. = descent, Ges.), one of the antediluvian patriarchs, the fifth from Adam; son of Mahalaleel, and father of Enoch (Gen. v. 15, 16, 18-20; Lk. iii. 37); = JERED 1.

Jar-e-si'ah (fr. Heb. = whom Jehovah makes fat, Ges.), a Benjamite chief, son of Jehoram (1 Chr. viii. 27).

Jar'ha (fr. Heb., probably of Egyptian origin, meaning unknown), the Egyptian servant of Sheshan, about the time of Eli, to whom his master gave his daughter and heir in marriage (1 Chr. ii. 31). In verse 31 we read "the children of Sheshan, Ahlai," and in verse 34, "Sheshan had no sons, but daughters." Hence some have imagined that Jarha on his marriage with Sheshan's daughter had the name of Ahlai given him by Sheshan, to signify his adoption into Israel. But the view which the A. V. adopts is undoubtedly right, viz. that Ahlai = Sheshan's daughter.

Jar'ib (L. fr. Heb. = an adversary, Ges.). 1. A son of Simeon (1 Chr. iv. 24 only); perhaps = JACHIN (Gen. xvi., Ex. vi., and Num. xxvi.).—2. One of the "chief men" who accompanied Ezra on his journey from Babylon to Jerusalem (Ezr. viii. 16).—3. A priest of the house of Jeshua, the son of Jozadak; husband of a foreign wife, whom he was compelled by Ezra to put away (Ezr. x. 18); = No. 2?—4. A contraction or corruption of JOARIB (1 Mc. xiv. 29).

Jar'moth (fr. Gr.) = JEREMOTH (1 Esd. ix. 28).

Jar'muth (fr. Heb. = height, Ges.). 1. A town in the low country of Judah, named with Adullam, Socoh, and others (Josh. xv. 35). Its king, PIRAM, was one of the five who conspired to punish Gibeon for having made alliance with Israel (x. 3, 5), and were routed at Beth-horon and put to death by Joshua at Makkedah (23). It was reinhabited after the Captivity (Neh. xi. 29). A site named Yarmuk, which may represent Jarmuth, with a contiguous eminence called Tell Ermüd, was visited by Robinson and Van de Velde. It is about one and a half miles from Beit Netif, which again is some eight miles from Beit Jibrin, or Eleutheropolis, on the left of the road to Jerusalem.—2. A city of Issachar, allotted to the Gershonite Levites (Josh. xxi. 29). REMETH; RAMOTH.

Ja-re'ah (fr. Heb. = moon, Ges.), a chief of Gad (1 Chr. v. 14).

Ja'sa-el (fr. Gr.) = SHEAL (1 Esd. ix. 30).

Jashen (fr. Heb. = sleeping, Ges.). "Sons of Jashen" are named in the catalogue of David's warriors in 2 Sam. xxiii. 32; "sons of Hashem the Gizonite" in 1 Chr. xi. 34. Kennicott would read "of the sons of Hashem, Gouni; Jonathan son of Shamha." Bertheau would omit "sons of," and read simply "Hashem the Gizonite."

Jasher (fr. Heb., see below), Book of, or, as the margin of the A. V. and Gesenius translate, "the book of the upright," a record alluded to in two passages only of the O. T. (Josh. x. 13 and 2 Sam. i. 18), and consequently the subject of much dispute. The Targum interprets it "the book of the law," and this is followed by Rashi. The same Rabbi, in his commentary on Samuel, refers to Genesis "the book of the upright, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob," to explain the allusion to the book of Jasher. Rabbi Eliezer thought that the book of Jasher = Deuteronomy. Rabbi Samuel ben Nachman makes it = Judges. Jerome, or rather the author of the Questiones Hebraice, understood by it the books of Samuel themselves, inasmuch as they contained the history of the just prophets, Samuel, Gad, Nathan. Rabbi Levi ben Gershom held that the book of Jasher perished in the Captivity. Sanctius conjectured that it was a collection of pious hymns written by different authors and sung on various occasions. That it was written in verse may reasonably be inferred from the only specimens extant, which exhibit unmistakable signs of metrical rhythm. Gesenius conjectured that it was an anthology of ancient songs, which acquired its name, "the book of the just or upright," from being written in praise of upright men, or from some other cause. Abicht, taking the lament of David as a sample of the whole, maintained that the fragment quoted in Joshua was part of a funeral ode composed upon the death of that hero, and narrating his achievements. Dr. Donaldson, more recently, attempts not only to decide what the book of Jasher was in itself, but to reconstruct it from the fragments which, according to his theory, he traces throughout the several books of the O. T. He supposes the compiler of the book to have been probably Nathan the prophet, assisted perhaps by Gad the seer. But his scheme is purely conjectural, and is recommended by no internal probability.—There are also extant, under the title of "the Book of Jasher," two Rabbinical works, one a moral treatise, written in A. D. 1394, by Rabbi Shabbatai, Carmuz Levita; the other, by Rabbi Tham, treats of the laws of the Jews in eighteen chapters, and was printed in Italy in 1544, and at Cracow in 1586. An anonymous work, printed at Venice and Prague in 1625, and said to have made its first appearance at Naples, was believed by some Jews to be the record alluded to in Joshua. It contains the historical narratives of the Pentateuch, Joshua, and Judges, with many fabulous additions. A clumsy forgery in English, which first appeared in 1751, under the title of "the Book of Jasher," deserves notice solely for the unmerited success with which it was palmed off upon the public.

Ja-sho'be-am (fr. Heb. = to whom the people turns, Ges.). Possibly one and the same follower of David, bearing this name, is described as a HACHMONITE (1 Chr. xi. 11), a Korhite (xii. 6), and son of Zabdiel (xxvii. 2). He came to David at Ziklag. His distinguishing exploit was that he slew 300 (or 800, 2 Sam. xxiii. 8) men at one time. He is named first among the chief of the mighty men of David (1 Chr. xi. 11), and was set over the first of the twelve monthly courses of 24,000 men who served the king (xxvii. 2). EZNITE; TACHMONITE.

Jashub, or Jash'ub (fr. Heb. = he turns, Ges.). 1. The third son of Issachar, and founder of the family of the JASHUBITES (Num. xxvi. 24; 1 Chr. vii. 1).—2. One of the sons of Bani in Ezra's time, who had to put away his foreign wife (Ezr. x. 29).

Jash'u-bi-le'hem (fr. Heb. = turner back to BETH-LEHEM, Fii.), a person or a place named among the descendants of Shelah, the son of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 22); probably a place (so Mr. Grove) on the W. side of the tribe, in or near the low country. PLAIN 6; SEPHELA

Ja'shub-ites, or Jash'ub-ites (fr. Heb.), the = the family founded by JASHUB, the son of Issachar (Num. xxvi. 24).

Ja'si-el (L. fr. Heb. = whom God has made, Ges.),

"the MESOBAITE," the last named on the list of David's heroes in 1 Chr. xi. 47).

Ja'son (L. fr. Gr. = the healer); frequently adopted by Hellenizing Greeks as = JESUS, JOSHUA. 1. "Jason the son of Eleazar" was one of the commissioners sent by Judas Maccabeus to conclude a treaty with the Romans B. C. 161 (1 Mc. viii. 17).—2. Jason the father of Antipater, who was an envoy to Rome at a later period (xii. 16, xiv. 22); probably = No. 1.—3. Jason of CYRENE, a Jewish historian who wrote "in five books" a history of the Jewish war of liberation which supplied the chief materials for 2 Mc. (MACCABEES, BOOKS OF.) His name and the place of his residence seem to mark Jason as a Hellenistic Jew, but nothing more is known of him that can be gathered from 2 Mc. ii. 19-23.—4. Jason the high-priest, second son of Simon II., and brother of Onias III., succeeded in obtaining the high-priesthood from ANTIOCHUS EPIPHANES (about B. C. 175) to the exclusion of his elder brother (2 Mc. iv. 7-26). He labored in every way to introduce Greek customs among the people, and that with great success (iv.). (GAMES.) After three years (about B. C. 172) he was in turn supplanted in the king's favor by his own emissary Menelaus, and was forced to take refuge among the Ammonites (iv. 26). On a report of the death of Antiochus (about B. C. 170) he made a violent attempt to recover his power (v. 6-7), but was repulsed, and again fled to the Ammonites. Afterward he was compelled to retire to Egypt, and thence to Sparta (v. 9), and there "perished in a strange land" (l. c.; compare Dan. xii. 30 ff.; 1 Mc. i. 12 ff.).—5. Jason the Thessalonian, entertained Paul and Silas, and was in consequence attacked by the Jewish mob (Acts xvii. 5, 6, 7, 9); probably = Jason mentioned in Rom. xvi. 21, as a companion of the apostle, and one of his kinsmen or fellow-tribesmen. Lightfoot conjectured that Jason = Secundus (Acts xx. 4).

Jas'per (Heb. yākhēphēh; Gr. iaspis), a precious stone frequently noticed in Scripture. It was the last of the twelve inserted in the high-priest's breastplate (Ex. xxviii. 20, xxix. 13), and the first of the twelve used in the foundations of the new Jerusalem (Rev. xxi. 19). It was employed in the superstructure of the walls of the new Jerusalem (xxi. 18). It adorned the king of Tyre (Ez. xxviii. 13). It is the emblematic image of the glory of the Divine Being (Rev. iv. 3). The characteristics of the stone, as far as specified in Scripture (xxi. 11), are "most precious," and "like crystal;" we may also infer from iv. 3, that it was a stone of brilliant and transparent light. Mr. Bevan thinks the diamond, not "jasper," is the stone meant. The ancient Greek iaspis is our CHALCEDONY, primarily a green variety (King). The modern "jasper" is an opaque variety of quartz, of a red, yellow, green, or mixed brownish-yellow hue, sometimes striped and sometimes spotted.

Ja'tal = ATER 1 (1 Esd. v. 28).

Jath'ni-el (fr. Heb. = whom God bestows, Ges.), a Korhite Levite, of the family of Meshelemiah (1 Chr. xxvi. 2).

Jat'tir (fr. Heb. = pre eminent, Ges.), a town of Judah in the mountain district (Josh. xv. 48), one of the group containing Socho, Eshtemoa, &c. It was allotted to the priests, and was one of the places which David used to haunt and to which he sent gifts (xxi. 14; 1 Sam. xxx. 27; 1 Chr. vi. 57). By Robinson it is identified with 'Atfir, six miles

N. of Molada, and ten miles S. of Hebron. IRITE.

Ja'van (fr. Heb. = the young, Pott, Fū.). 1. A son of Japheth, and father of Elishah and Tarshish, Kittim and Dodanim (Gen. x. 2, 4). The name appears in Is. lxvi. 19, where it is coupled with Tarshish, Pul, and Lud, and more particularly with Tubal and the "isles afar off," as representatives of the Gentile world: again in Ez. xxvii. 13, where it is coupled with Tubal and Meshech, as carrying on considerable commerce with the Tyrians, who imported from these countries slaves and bronz vessels: in Dan. viii. 21, x. 20, xi. 2, in reference to the Macedonian empire; and lastly in Zech. ix. 13, in reference to the Greco-Syrian empire. From a comparison of these various passages there can be no doubt that Javan was regarded as the representative of the Greek race. (GREEK.) The name was probably introduced into Asia by the Phenicians, to whom the Ionians were naturally better known than any other of the Hellenic races, on account of their commercial activity and the high prosperity of their towns on the W. coast of Asia Minor.—2. A town in the southern part of Arabia (Yemen), whither the Phenicians traded (Ez. xxvii. 19).

Jave'ila [jav-]. ARMS.

Ja'zar = JAAZER (1 Mc. v. 8).

Ja'zer (fr. Heb.) = JAAZER (Num. xxxii. 1, 3; Josh. xxi. 39; 2 Sam. xxiv. 5; 1 Chr. vi. 81, xxvi. 31; Is. xvi. 8, 9; Jer. xlviii. 32).

Ja'ziz (L. fr. Heb. = whom God moves, to whom He given life and motion, Ges.), a Hagarite who had charge of David's flocks (1 Chr. xxvii. 31).

Je'a-rim (fr. Heb. = forests), Mount, a place named in specifying the northern boundary of Jud: h (Josh. xv. 10). The boundary ran from Mount Sair to "the shoulder (A. V. 'side') of Mount Jearim, which is CHESALON," i. e. Chesalon was the landmark on the mountain. Kesla stands seven miles due W. of Jerusalem on a high point on the N. slope of the lofty ridge between Wady Ghurab and Wady Ismail. This ridge is probably Mount Jearim.

Je-at'e-ral (fr. Heb. = following the track of one, Fū.), a Gershonite Levite, son of Zerah (1 Chr. vi. 21); = ETHNI.

Jeb-er-e-chi'ah (fr. Heb. = whom Jehovah blesses, Ges.), father of a certain Zechariah, in the reign of Abaz, mentioned Is. viii. 2. As this form occurs nowhere else, and both the LXX. and Vulgate have Berechiah, it is probably (so Lord A. C. Hervey) only an accidental corruption.

Je'bus (fr. Heb. = place trodden down, threshing-floor, Ges.), one of the names of JERUSALEM, the city of the Jebusites, also called JEBUSI. It occurs only twice (Judg. xix. 10, 11; 1 Chr. xi. 4, 5).

Jeb'u-sal (fr. Heb.) = JEBUS (Josh. xv. 8, xviii. 16, 28).

Jeb'u-site, Jeb'n-site (both fr. Heb. sing. = people of JEBUS, Ges.), the. 1. According to the table in Gen. x. "the Jebusite" is the third son of Canaan. His place in the list is between Heth and the Amorites (x. 16; 1 Chr. i. 14). But in the formula by which the Promised Land is so often designated, the Jebusites are uniformly placed last (Gen. xv. 21; Ex. iii. 8, &c.). 2. Our first glimpse of the actual people is in the report of the spies (Num. xiii. 29). When Jabin organized his rising against Joshua, he sent among others "to the Amorite, the Hittite, the Perizzite, and the Jebusite in the mountains" (Josh. xi. 3). A mountain-tribe they were, and a mountain-tribe they remained. "Jebus, which is Jerusalem," lost its king in the slaughter of Beth-horon (x. 1, 5, 26; compare xii. 10)—was sacked and burned by the men of Judah (Judg. i. 21), and its citadel finally scaled and occupied by David (2 Sam. v. 6 ff.; 1 Chr. xi. 4 ff.). ARACNAH the Jebusite appears before us in true kingly dignity in his well-known transaction with David (2 Sam. xxiv. 23; 1 Chr. xix. 23). Solomon made the remnant tributary (1 K. ix. 20). They are named among "the people of the lands" in Ezr. ix. 1.

Jee-a-mi'ah (fr. Heb.) = JEKAMIAH, one of seven, including Salathiel and Pedaiah, who were introduced into the royal line (so Lord A. C. Hervey) on the failure of the person of Jehoiachin (1 Chr. iii. 18). GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST.

Jech-e-l'ah [jek] (fr. Heb. = able through Jehovah, Ges.), wife of Amaziah, king of Judah, and mother of Azariah or Uziah his successor (2 K. xv. 2); = JECOLIAH.

Jech-e-mi'as (L. fr. Gr.; see below). 1. The form of JECONIAH or JEOHIACHIN used in the A.V. in the books rendered from the Greek, viz. Esth. xi. 4; Bar. i. 3, 9; Mat. i. 11, 12.—2. SHECHANIAH (1 Esd. viii. 92).

Jee-e-l'ah = JECHOLIAH (2 Chr. xxvi. 3).

Jee-e-mi'ah (fr. Heb.), an altered form of JEOHIACHIN (1 Chr. iii. 16, 17; Jer. xxiv. 1, xxvii. 20, xxviii. 4, xxix. 1; Esth. ii. 6); = CONIAH; see also JECHONIAS and JOACIM 2.

Jee-e-mi'as (fr. Gr.) = CONANIAH (1 Esd. i. 9).

Je-dal'ah [-da'yah] (fr. Heb. = Jehovah cares for him, Ges.). 1. Head of the second course of priests in the time of David (1 Chr. xxiv. 7). Some of them survived to return to Jerusalem after the Babylonish Captivity, as appears from Ezr. ii. 36 and Neh. vii. 39. There were (so Lord A. C. Hervey) two priestly families of the name (Neh. xii. 6, 7, 19, 21). A corrupt reading in Neh. xi. 10 makes Jedaniah son of Joiarib (compare 1 Chr. ix. 10).—2. An associate of TOBIAH 2 in Joshua's time (Zech. vi. 10, 14).

Je-dal'ah (fr. Heb. = praise God [JAH], Ges.). 1. A Simeonite, forefather of Ziza (1 Chr. iv. 37).—2. Son of Harumaph; a man who did his part in the rebuilding of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 10).

Je'du (fr. Gr.) = JEDAJAH 1 (1 Esd. v. 24).

Je-de'us (fr. Gr.) = ADAJAH 5 (1 Esd. ix. 30).

Je-di'a-el (fr. Heb. = known of God, Ges.). 1. A chief patriarch of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Chr. vii. 6, 11). It is usually assumed that Jediel = Ashbel (Gen. xlv. 21; Num. xxvi. 38; 1 Chr. viii. 1). But this is not certain.—2. Second son of Meshelemiah, a Levite (xxvi. 1, 2).—3. Son of Suimri; one of David's heroes (xi. 45); = No. 4?—4. One of the chiefs of the thousands of Manasseh who joined David on his march to Ziklag (xii. 20; compare 1 Sam. xxix., xxx.).

Je-di'dah (fr. Heb. = darling; one beloved, Ges.), queen of Amon, and mother of the good king Josiah (2 K. xxii. 1).

Jed-i-dah (fr. Heb. = darling of Jehovah; beloved of Jehovah, Ges.), the name bestowed, through Nathan the prophet, on David's son SOLOMON (2 Sam. xii. 25). Bath-sheba's first child had died—"Jehovah struck it" (verse 15). A second son was born, David called his name Solomon = Peaceful; and Jehovah loved the child, i. e. allowed him to live. And David sent by the hand of Nathan, to obtain through him some oracle or token of the Divine favor on the babe, and the babe's name was called Jedidiah = Jedid-JAH. "Jedid" and "DAVID" are both derived from the same root, or from two closely related (Gesenius). To David himself, the

"darling" of his family and his people, no more precious seal of his restoration to the Divine favor after his late fall could have been afforded than this announcement by the prophet, that the name of his child was to combine his own name with that of Jehovah—Jedid-JAH, "darling of Jehovah."

Je-du'than (fr. Heb. = praising, celebrating, Ges.), a Levite associated with Heman the Kohathite, and Asaph the Gershonite, in the conduct of the musical service of the Tabernacle, in the time of David; according to what is said 1 Chr. xxiii. 6. He is probably = ETHAN, and therefore a Merarite (compare 1 Chr. xv. 17, 19, with xvi. 41, 42, xxv. 1, 3, 6; 2 Chr. xxxv. 15). His office was generally to preside over the music of the Temple-service, consisting of the nebel (A. V. "psaltery"), the harp, and the cymbals, together with the human voice. But his peculiar part, as well as that of his two colleagues, Heman and Asaph, was "to sound with cymbals of brass," while the others played on the "psaltery" and the harp. After the ark was taken to Jerusalem, Jeduthun and Heman were left with Zadok the priest, to give thanks "before the tabernacle of the Lord in the high place that was at Gibeon." Descendants of Jeduthun in Hezekiah's reign took part in purifying the Temple, and in Nehemiah's time were still employed about the singing (1 Chr. ix. 16; 2 Chr. xxxix. 13, 14; Neh. xi. 17). Jeduthun's name stands at the head of the thirty-ninth, sixty-second, and seventy-seventh PSALMS, indicating probably that they were to be sung by his choir (so Lord A. C. Hervey). MUSIC.

Je-e'll (fr. Gr.) = JAALAH (1 Esd. v. 33).

Je-e'lus (fr. Gr.) = JEHIEL (1 Esd. viii. 92).

Je-e'zer (fr. Heb. Ezer, contracted from ABI-EZER, Ges.), a descendant of Manasseh (Num. xxvi. 30); elsewhere called ABI EZER, founder of the JEEZERITES. Je-e'zer-ites, the = the family of JEEZER or ABI-EZER (Num. xxvi. 30).

Je-gar-sa-ha-du'tha (heap of testimony), the Aramean name given by Laban the Syrian to the heap of stones which he erected as a memorial of the compact between Jacob and himself, while Jacob commemorated the same by setting up a pillar (Gen. xxxi. 47), as was his custom on several other occasions. GALEED.

Je-hal'e-leel (fr. Heb. = who praises God, Ges.). Four "sons of Jehaleleel" are introduced abruptly into the genealogies of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 16).

Je-hal'e-lel (fr. Heb. = JEHALELEEL), a Merarite Levite, father of Azariah (2 Chr. xxix. 12).

Jeh-del'ah [-dee'yah] (fr. Heb. = whom Jehovah makes joyful, Ges.). 1. The representative of the sons of Shubael, in the time of David (1 Chr. xxiv. 20).—2. A Meronothite who had charge of David's she-asses (xxvii. 30).

Je-hez'e-kel (fr. Heb. = whom God makes strong, Ges.; = EZEKIEL), a priest to whom was given by David the charge of the twentieth course in the service of the house of Jehovah (1 Chr. xxiv. 16).

Je-hi'ah (fr. Heb. = Jehovah lives) and Obededom were "doorkeepers for the ark" at its establishment in Jerusalem (1 Chr. xv. 24).

Je-hi'el (L. fr. Heb. = Jehovah lives, Ges.; see No. 12 and 13 below). 1. One of the Levites appointed by David to assist in the service of the house of God (1 Chr. xv. 18, 20, xvi. 5).—2. Son of Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, put to death by his brother Jehoram (2 Chr. xxi. 2).—3. One of the rulers of the house of God at the time of Josiah's reforms (xxxv. 8).—4. A Gershonite Levite, head of the sons of Laadan in David's time (1 Chr. xxiii. 8), who had charge of the treasures (xxix. 8).—5. Son of Hachmoni, or of a Hachmonite, named in the list of David's officers (xxvii. 32) as "with the king's sons," probably as tutor.—6. A Levite of the sons of Ilemam, who took part in the restorations of King Hezekiah (2 Chr. xxix. 14).—7. Another Levite at the same period (xxxi. 13).—8. Father of Obadiah, of the sons of Joab (Ezr. viii. 9).—9. One of the children of Elam; father of Shechaniah (x. 2).—10. A member of the same family, who had to part with his wife (x. 26).—11. A priest, one of the sons of Harim, who also had to put away his foreign wife (x. 21).—12. (fr. Heb. = treasured of God? Ges.; God is snatching away, Fü.). A man described as father of Gibeon; a forefather of King Saul (1 Chr. ix. 35); = ABIEL 1? (NER).—13. (= No. 12 in meaning). Son of Hothan the Aroerite; one of David's "valiant men" (xi. 44).

Je-hi'e-ll (L. fr. Heb. = Jehielite; descendant of JEHIEL 1, Ges.), according to the A. V., a Gershonite Levite of the family of LAADAN (1 Chr. xxvi. 21, 22).

Je-hiz-ki'ah (fr. Heb. = HEZEKIAH), son of Shallum; one of the Ephraimite princes in Pekah's time, who succored and sent back the captives from Judah (2 Chr. xxviii. 12; compare 8, 13, 15).

Je-ho-a-dah (fr. Heb. = whom Jehovah adorns, Ges.), one of the descendants of Saul (1 Chr. viii. 36); great-grandson to Mephibosheth; = JARAH.

Je-ho-ad-dan (fr. Heb. fem. = whom Jehovah adorns, Ges.), queen to King Joash, and mother of Amaziah of Judah (2 K. xiv. 2; 2 Chr. xxv. 1).

Je-ho'a-haz (fr. Heb. = whom Jehovah holds or sustains, Ges.). 1. Son and successor of Jehu, reigned seventeen years over Israel in Samaria. (ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF.) His inglorious history is given in 2 K. xiii. 1-9. Throughout his reign (verse 22) he was kept in subjection by Hazael, king of Damascus. Jehoahaz maintained the idolatry of Jeroboam; but in the extremity of his humiliation he besought Jehovah; and Jehovah gave Israel a deliverer—probably either Jehoash (verses 23, 25), or Jeroboam II. (xiv. 24, 25).—2. Jehoahaz, otherwise called SHALLUM, the fourth (1 Chr. iii. 15), or third, if Zedekiah's age be correctly stated (2 Chr. xxxvi. 11), son of Josiah, whom he succeeded as king of Judah. He was chosen by the people in preference to his elder (compare 2 K. xxiii. 31 and 36) brother, and he reigned three months in Jerusalem. Pharaoh-necho on his return from Carchemish, perhaps resenting the election of Jehoahaz, sent to Jerusalem to depose him, and to fetch him to Riblah. There he was cast into chains, and from thence he was taken into Egypt, where he died.—3. The name given (2 Chr. xxi. 17) to AHAZIAH, king of Judah.

Je-ho'ash (fr. Heb. = whom Jehovah bestowed, Ges.; contracted to JOASH). 1. Eighth king of Judah; son of AHAZIAH (2 K. xi. 21, xii. 1, 2, 4, 6, 7, 18, xiv. 13); = JOASH 1.—2. Twelfth king of Israel; son of JEHOAHAZ (2 K. xiii. 10, 25, xiv. 8, 9, 11, 13, 15-17); = JOASH 2.

Je-ho-ha-nan (fr. Heb. = Jehoram's gift; contracted to JORANAN). 1. A Korhite Levite, one of the doorkeepers to the house of Jehovah, i. e. the Tabernacle, according to the appointment of David (1 Chr. xxvi. 3; compare xxv. 1); the sixth of the seven sons of Meshelemiah.—2. One of the principal men of Judah, under King Jehoshaphat (2 Chr. xvii. 13; compare 13 and 19); probably = No. 3.—3. Father of Ishmael, one of the "captains of hundreds" whom Jehoiada the priest took into his confidence about the restoration of the line of Judah (xxiii. 1).—4. One of the sons of Bebai, forced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezr. x. 28).—5. A priest (Neh. xii. 13); the representative of the house of Amariah (compare 2) during the high-priesthood of Joiakim (verse 12).—6. A priest who took part in the dedication of the walls of Jerusalem (xii. 42).

Je-hol'a-chin (fr. Heb. = whom Jehovah has appointed, Ges.; = JECONIAH), son of Jehoiakim and Nehushta, and for three months and ten days king of Judah. (ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF; JUDAH, KINGDOM OF.) According to 2 K. xxiv. 8, Jehoiachin was eighteen years old at his accession; but 2 Chr. xxxvi. 9 has eight years. Lord A. C. Hervey, Fairbairn, &c., prefer the latter reading; others prefer the former. One of them is doubtless a copyist's error. Jehoiachin came to the throne at a time when Egypt was still prostrate in consequence of the victory at Carchemish. Jerusalem was at this time defenceless, and unable to offer any resistance to the regular army which NEBUCHADNEZZAR sent to besiege it, and which he seems to have joined in person after the siege was commenced (2 K. xxiv. 10, 11). In a very short time, apparently, Jehoiachin surrendered at discretion; and he, and the queen-mother, and all his servants, captains, and officers came out and gave themselves up to Nebuchadnezzar, who carried them, with the harem and the eunuchs, to Babylon (Jer. xxix. 2; Ez. xvii. 12, xix. 9). There he remained a prisoner, actually in prison, and wearing prison garments, for thirty-six years, viz. till the death of Nebuchadnezzar, when Evil-merodach, succeeding to the throne of Babylon, treated him with much kindness, brought him out of prison, changed his garments, raised him above the other subject or captive kings, and made him sit at his own table. Whether Jehoiachin outlived the two years of Evil-merodach's reign or not does not appear, nor have we any particulars of his life at Babylon. The history of SUSANNA and the Elders apparently makes Jehoiachin an important personage; for, according to the author, the husband of Susanna was Joacim, a man of great wealth, and the chief person among the captives, to whose house all the people resorted for judgment, a description which suits Jehoiachin. Africanus expressly calls Susanna's husband king, and says that the king of Babylon had made him his royal companion. It does not appear certainly from Scripture, whether Jehoiachin was married or had any children. That Zedekiah, who in 1 Chr. iii. 16 is called "his son," is the same as Zedekiah his uncle (called "his brother," 2 Chr. xxxvi. 10), who was his successor on the throne, seems certain. GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST.

Je-hol'a-da (fr. Heb. = whom Jehovah knows or favors, Ges.; contracted to JOIADA). 1. Father of BENAIAH, David's well-known warrior (2 Sam. viii. 18; 1 K. i. ii.; 1 Chr. xviii. 17, &c.). From 1 Chr. xxvii. 5, we learn that Benaiah's father was the chief priest, and he is therefore doubtless identical with —2. Leader of the Aaronites, i. e. the priests; who joined David at Hebron (xii. 27).—3. According to 1 Chr. xxvii. 34, son of BENAIAH 1.—4. HIGH-PRIEST at the time of ATHALIAH's usurpation of the throne of Judah, and during the greater portion of the forty years' reign of JOASH 1. He probably succeeded Amariah. He married JEROSHIEBA, or JOHOSHABETH, daughter of King Jehoram, and sister of King Ahaziah (2 Chr. xxii. 11); and when Athaliah slew all the seed royal of Judah after Ahaziah had been put to death by Jehu, he and his wife stole Joash from among the king's sons, and hid him for six years in the Temple, and eventually replaced him on the throne of his ancestors. Having divided the priests and Levites into three bands, which were posted at the principal entrances, and filled the courts with people favorable to the cause, he produced the young king before the whole assembly, and crowned and anointed him, and presented to him a copy of the Law according to Deut. xvii. 18-20). The excitement of the moment did not make him forget the sanctity of God's house. None but the priests and ministering Levites were permitted by him to enter the Temple; and he gave strict orders that Athaliah should be carried without its precincts before she was put to death. The destruction of Baal worship and the restoration of the Temple were among the great works effected by Jehoiaada. He died B. C. 843? and though far advanced in years, too soon for the welfare of his country, and the weak, unstable character of Joash. The text of 2 Chr. xxiv. 15, supported by the LXX. and Josephus, makes him 130 years old at his death; but Lord A. C. Hervey, &c., regard this number as erroneous.—3. Second priest, or sagan, to Seraiah the high-priest (Jer. xxix. 25-29; 2 K. xxv. 18).—4. Son of Paseah, who assisted to repair the old gate of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 6).

Je-hoi'a-kim (fr. Heb. = whom Jehovah has set up, Ges.; contracted to JOIAKIM), eighteenth (or, counting Jehoahaz, nineteenth) king of Judah from David inclusive—twenty-five years old at his accession, and originally called ELIAKIM. (ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF; JUDAH, KINGDOM OF.) He was the son of Josiah and Zebudah, daughter of Pedaiah of Rumah. After deposing Jehoahaz, Pharaoh-necho set Eliakim, his elder brother, upon the throne, and changed his name to Jehoiaxim. Egypt played no part in Jewish politics during the seven or eight years of Jehoiaxim's reign. After the battle of Carchemish, Nebuchadnezzar came into Palestine as one of the Egyptian tributary kingdoms, the capture of which was the natural fruit of his victory over Necho. He found Jehoiaxim quite defenceless. After a short siege he entered Jerusalem, took the king prisoner, bound him in fetters to carry him to Babylon, and took also some of the precious vessels of the Temple, and carried them to the land of Shinar. (DANIEL 1.) But he seems to have changed his purpose as regarded Jehoiaxim, and to have accepted his submission, and reinstated him on the throne, perhaps in remembrance of the fidelity of his father Josiah. What is certain is, that Jehoiaxim became tributary to Nebuchadnezzar after his invasion of Judah, and continued so for three years, but at the end of that time broke his oath of allegiance and rebelled against him (2 K. xxiv. 1). What moved or encouraged Jehoiaxim to this rebellion it is difficult to say, for there is nothing to bear out Josephus's assertion, that there was anything in the attitude of Egypt at this time to account for such a step. Though Nebuchadnezzar was not able at that time to come in person to chastise his rebellious vassal, he sent against him numerous bands of Chaldeans, with Syrians, Moabites, and Ammonites, who were all now subject to Babylon (xxiv. 7), and who cruelly harassed the whole country. We are not acquainted with the details of the close of the reign. Probably as the time approached for Nebuchadnezzar himself to come against Judea, the desultory attacks and invasions of his troops became more concentrated.

Either in an engagement with some of these forces, or else by the hand of his own oppressed subjects, who thought to conciliate the Babylonians by the murder of their king, Jehoiaxim came to a violent end in the eleventh year of his reign. His body was cast out ignominiously on the ground; and then, after being left exposed for some time, was dragged away and buried "with the burial of an ass," without pomp or lamentation, "beyond the gates of Jerusalem" (Jer. xxii. 18, 19, xxxvi. 30). All the accounts we have of Jehoiaxim concur in ascribing to him a vicious and irreligious character. 2 K. xxiii. 37 tells us that "he did that which was evil in the sight of Jehovah," a statement which is repeated xxiv. 9, and 2 Chr. xxxvi. 5. But it is in Jeremiah that we have the fullest portraiture of him. If, as is probable, the nineteenth chapter of Jeremiah belongs to this reign, we have a detail of the abominations of idolatry practised at Jerusalem under the king's sanction, with which Ezekiel's vision of what was going on six years later, within the very precincts of the Temple, exactly agrees; incense offered up to "abominable beasts;" "women weeping for Tammuz," and men in the inner court of the Temple "with their backs toward the Temple of the Lord" worshipping "the sun toward the east" (Ez. viii.). The vindictive pursuit and murder of Urijah the son of Shemaiah, and the indignities offered to his corpse by the king's command, in revenge for his faithful prophesying of evil against Jerusalem and Judah, are samples of his irreligion and tyranny combined. Jeremiah only narrowly escaped the same fate (Jer. xxvi. 20-24). His daring impiety in cutting up and burning the roll containing Jeremiah's prophecy, at the very moment when the national fast was being celebrated, is another specimen of his character, and drew down upon him the sentence, "He shall have none to sit upon the throne of David" (Jer. xxxvi.). His oppression, injustice, covetousness, luxury, and tyranny, are most severely rebuked (xxii. 13-17), and it has been frequently observed, as indicating his thorough selfishness and indifference to the sufferings of his people, that at a time when the land was so impoverished by the heavy tributes laid upon it by Egypt and Babylon in turn, he should have squandered large sums in building luxurious palaces for himself (xxii. 14, 15). "Jehoiakim" in Jer. xxvii. 1 is probably a copyist's mistake for "Zedekiah" (compare ver. 3). The reign of Jehoiaxim extends from B. C. 609 to 598, or 599.

Je-hoi'a-rib (fr. Heb. = whom Jehovah defends, Ges.; contracted to JOIARIB), head of the first of the twenty-four courses of priests, according to the arrangement of David (1 Chr. xxiv. 7). Some of his descendants returned from the Babylonish Captivity (ix. 10; Neh. xi. 10). Their chief in the days of Joiakim the son of Jeshua was Mattenai (xii. 6, 19). They were probably of the house of Eleazar. To the course of Jehoia-rib belonged the Asmonean family (1 Mc. ii. 1), and Josephus, as he informs us. JOIARIB; PRIEST.

Je-hon'a-dab (fr. Heb. = whom Jehovah impels, Ges.; usually contracted to JONADAB), the son of Rechab, founder of the RECHABITES. It appears from 1 Chr. ii. 55, that his father or ancestor Rechab belonged to a branch of the Kenites, the Arabian tribe which entered Palestine with the Israelites. One settlement of them was established, under a fourfold division, at or near the town of Jabez in Judah (ii. 55). To these belonged Rechab and his son Jehonadab. The Bedouin habits, which were kept up by the other branches of the Kenite tribe, were inculcated by Jehonadab with the utmost minuteness on his descendants (Jer. xxxv. 6). Bearing in mind this general character of Jehonadab as an Arab chief, and the founder of a half-religious sect, we are the better able to understand the single occasion on which he appears before us in the historical narrative. JEHU was advancing, after the slaughter of Beth-eked, on the city of Samaria, when he suddenly met the austere Bedouin coming toward him (2 K. x. 15). The king was in his chariot; the Arab was on foot. The king blessed (A. V. "saluted") Jehonadab. The hand was offered and grasped. The king lifted him up to the edge of the chariot, apparently that he might whisper his secret into his ear, and said, "Come with me, and see my zeal for Jehovah." Having intrusted him with the secret, he (LXX.) or his attendants (Heb. and A. V.) caused Jehonadab to proceed with him to Samaria in the royal chariot. No doubt he acted in concert with Jehu throughout; the only occasion on which he is expressly mentioned is when he went with Jehu through the temple of Baal to turn out any servants of Jehovah that might be in the mass of Pagan worshippers (2 K. x. 23). This is the last we hear of him.

Je-hon'a-than (fr. Heb. = whom Jehovah gave, Ges.; contracted to JONATHAN). 1. Son of Uziah; superintendent of certain of King David's storehouses (1 Chr. xxvii. 25).—2. One of the Levites sent by Jehoshaphat through the cities of Judah, with a book of the Law, to teach the people (2 Chr. xvii. 8).—3. A priest (Neh. xii. 18); the representative of the family of Shemaiah (ver. 6), when Joiakim was high-priest.

Je-ho'ram (fr. Heb. = whom Jehovah has exalted, Ges.; contracted to JORAM). 1. Son of Ahab, king of Israel, who succeeded his brother Ahaziah, B. C. 896, and died B. C. 884. (ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF; JORAM 1.) The alliance between the kingdoms of Israel and Judah, commenced by his father and Jehoshaphat, was very close throughout his reign. We first find him associated with Jehoshaphat and the king of Edom, at that time a tributary of Judah in a war against the Moabites. Mesha, their king, on the death of Ahab, had revolted from Israel, and refused to pay the customary tribute of 100,000 lambs and 100,000 rams. Joram asked and obtained Jehoshaphat's help to reduce him to his obedience, and accordingly the three kings, of Israel, Judah, and Edom, marched through the wilderness of Edom to attack him. The three armies were in the utmost danger of perishing for want of water. The piety of Jehoshaphat suggested an inquiry of some prophet of Jehovah, and ELISHA the son of Shaphat (2 K. iii. 11) was found with the host. From him Joram received a severe rebuke, and was bid to inquire of the prophets of his father and mother, the prophets of Baal. Nevertheless, for Jehoshaphat's sake, Elisha inquired of Jehovah, and received the promise of an abundant supply of water, and of a great victory over the Moabites: a promise which was immediately fulfilled. The Moabites were put to the rout. The allies pursued them with great slaughter into their own land, which they utterly ravaged and destroyed with all its cities. Kir-haraseth alone remained, and there the king of Moab made his last stand. An attempt to break through the besieging army having failed, he resorted to the desperate expedient of offering up his eldest son, the heir to his throne, as a burnt-offering, upon the wall of the city, in the sight of the enemy. Upon this the Israelites retired and returned to their own land (2 K. iii.). A little later, when war broke out between Syria and Israel, we find Elisha befriending Jehoram. What happened after this to change the relations between the king and the prophet we can only conjecture. But probably when the Syrian inroads ceased, and he felt less dependent upon the aid of the prophet, he relapsed into idolatry, and was rebuked by Elisha, and threatened with a return of the calamities from which he had escaped. Refusing to repent, a fresh invasion by the Syrians, and a close siege of Samaria, actually came to pass, according probably to the word of the prophet. Hence, when the terrible incident arose, in consequence of the famine, of a woman boiling and eating her own child, the king immediately attributed the evil to Elisha the son of Shaphat, and determined to take away his life. The providential interposition by which both Elisha's life was saved and the city delivered, is narrated 2 K. vii., and Jehoram appears to have returned to friendly feeling toward Elisha (viii. 4). Very soon after the above events Elisha went to Damascus, and predicted the revolt of Hazael, and his accession to the throne of Syria, in the room of Ben-hadad. Jehoram seems to have thought the revolution in Syria, which immediately followed Elisha's prediction, a good opportunity to pursue his father's favorite project of recovering Ramoth-gilead from the Syrians. He accordingly made an alliance with his nephew AHAZIAH 2, who had just succeeded Jehoram 2 on the throne of Judah, and the two kings proceeded to occupy Ramoth-gilead by force. The expedition was an unfortunate one, Jehoram was wounded in battle, and obliged to return to Jezreel to be healed of his wounds (viii. 29, ix. 14, 15), leaving his army under Jehu to hold Ramoth-gilead against Hazael. Jehu, however, and the army under his command, revolted from their allegiance to Jehoram (ix.), and, hastily marching to Jezreel, surprised Jehoram wounded and defenceless as he was. Jehoram, going out to meet him, fell pierced by an arrow from Jehu's bow on the very plat of ground which Ahab had wrested from Naboth the Jezreelite; thus fulfilling to the letter the prophecy of Elijah (1 K. xxi. 21-29). With the life of Jehoram ended the dynasty of Omri.—2. Eldest son of Jehoshaphat, succeeded his father on the throne of Judah at the age of thirty-two, and reigned eight years, from B. C. 893-2 to 885-4. (JORAM 2; ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF; JUDAH, KINGDOM OF.) Jehosheba his daughter was wife to the high-priest Jehoiada. As soon as he was fixed on the throne, he put his six brothers to death, with many of the chief nobles of the land. He then, probably at the instance of his wife ATHALIAH the daughter of Ahab, proceeded to establish the worship of Baal. A prophetic writing from the aged prophet ELIJAH (2 Chr. xxi. 12) failed to produce any good effect upon him. This was in the first or second year of his reign (so Lord A. C. Hervey). The remainder of it was a series of calamities. First the Edomites, who had been tributary to Jehoshaphat, revolted from his dominion, and established their permanent independence. Next Libnah, one of the strongest fortified cities in Judah (2 K. xix. 8), rebelled against him. Then followed invasions of armed bands of Philistines and of Arabians, who stormed the king's palace, put his wives and all his children, except his youngest son AHAZIAH 2, to death (2 Chr. xxii. 1), or carried them into captivity, and plundered all his treasures. He died of a terrible disease (xxi. 19, 20) early in the twelfth year of his brother-in-law Jehoram's (No. 1) reign over Israel.—3. A priest sent by Jehoshaphat to teach the Law in the cities of Judah (2 Chr. xvii. 8).

Je-he-sha-be-ath (fr. Heb.) = JEHOSEBA (2 Chr. xxii. 11).

Je-hosh'a-phat (fr. Heb. = whom Jehovah judges, i. e. whose cause He sustains, Ges.; contracted to JOSHAPHAT and JOSAPHAT). 1. Son of ASA and AZUBAH, succeeded to the throne B. C. 914, when he was thirty-five years old, and reigned twenty-five years. (ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF; JUDAH, KINGDOM OF.) His history is among the events recorded in 1 K. xv. 24–2 K. viii. 16, or in a continuous narrative in 2 Chr. xvii. 1–xxi. 3. He was contemporary with AHAB, AHAZIAH 1, and JEHORAM 1. At first he strengthened himself against Israel by fortifying and garrisoning the cities of Judah and the Ephraimite conquests of Asa. But soon afterward the two Hebrew kings, perhaps appreciating their common danger from Damascus and the tribes on their eastern frontier, formed an alliance. Jehoshaphat's eldest son, JEHORAM 2, married ATHALIAH, the daughter of Ahab and Jezebel. In his own kingdom Jehoshaphat ever showed himself a zealous follower of the commandments of God: he tried, it would seem not quite successfully, to put down the high places and groves in which the people of Judah burnt incense. In his third year he sent out certain princes, priests, and Levites, to go through the cities of Judah, teaching the people out of the Book of the Law. Riches and honors increased around him. He received tributes from the Philistines and Arabians; and kept up a large standing army in Jerusalem. Probably about the sixteenth year of his reign (B. C. 898) he went to Samaria to visit Ahab and to become his ally in the great battle of Ramoth-gilead. From thence Jehoshaphat returned to Jerusalem in peace; and went himself through the people "from Beer-sheba to Mount Ephraim," reclaiming them to the Law of God. Turning his attention to foreign commerce, he built at Ezion-geber, with the help of Ahaziah, a navy designed to go to Tarshish; but it was wrecked at Ezion-geber. Before the close of his reign he was engaged in two additional wars. He was miraculously delivered from a threatened attack of the people of Ammon, Moab, and Seir. After this, perhaps, must be dated the war which Jehoshaphat, in conjunction with JEHORAM 1, king of Israel, and the king of Edom, carried on against the rebellious king of Moab (2 K. iii.). In his declining years the administration of affairs was placed (probably B. C. 891) in the hands of his son JEHORAM 2.—2. Son of Ahilud; recorder or annalist in the courts of David (2 Sam. viii. 16, &c.), and Solomon (1 K. iv. 3).—3. One of the priests appointed to blow trumpets before the ark when it was carried from the house of Obed-edom to Jerusalem (1 Chr. xv. 24).—4. Son of Paruah; one of the twelve purveyors of King Solomon (1 K. iv. 17).—5. Son of Nimshi, and father of King Jehu (2 K. ix. 2, 14).

Je-hosh'a-phat (see above), Valley of (Heb. 'émek, see VALLEY 1), a valley mentioned by Joel only, as the spot in which, after the return of Judah and Jerusalem from Captivity, Jehovah would gather all the heathen (Joel iii. 2 [iv. 2 Heb.]), and there sit to judge them for their misdeeds to Israel (iii. 12 [v. 4 Heb.]). The prophet seems to have glanced back to that triumphant day when King Jehoshaphat, the greatest king the nation had seen since Solomon, led out his people to a valley (BERACHAH) in the wilderness of Tekoa, and was there blessed with such a victory over the hordes of his enemies as was without a parallel in the national records (2 Chr. xx.). But though such a reference to Jehoshaphat is both natural and characteristic, it is not certain that it is intended. The name may only be an imaginary one conferred on a spot which existed nowhere but in the vision of the prophet. Such was the view of some of the ancient translators (Theodotion, Targum of Jonathan). By others, however, the prophet has been supposed to have had the end of the world in view. And not only this, but the scene of "Jehovah's judgment" has been localized, and the name has come down to us attached to the deep ravine (Heb. nahal, or nachal; see VALLEY 3) which separates Jerusalem from the Mount of Olives. At what period the name was first applied to this spot is not known. There is no trace of it in the Bible or in Josephus. In both the only name used for this gorge is KIDRON (N. T. CEDRON). We first encounter its new title in the middle of the fourth century in the Onomasticon of Eusebius and Jerome, and in the Commentary of Jerome on Joel. Since that time the name has been recognized and adopted by travellers of all ages and all faiths. Both Moslems and Jews believe that the last judgment is to take place there. The steep sides of the ravine, wherever a level strip affords the opportunity, are crowded—in places almost paved—by the sepulchres of the Moslems, or the simpler slabs of the Jewish tombs, alike awaiting the assembly of the last Judgment. The name would seem to be generally confined by travellers to the upper part of the glen, from about the "Tomb of the Virgin" to the S. E. corner of the wall of Jerusalem.

Je-hosh'e-ba (fr. Heb. = Jehovah is her oath, i. e. worshipper of Jehovah, Ges.; = JEHOSHABEATH), daughter of Joram (Jehoram 2), king of JUDAH, and wife of JEHOIADA the high-priest (2 K. xi. 2). Her name in the Chronicles is given JEHOSHABEATH. As she is called, 2 K. xi. 2, "the daughter of Joram, sister of Ahaziah," it has been conjectured that she was the daughter, not of ATHALIAH, but of Joram by another wife. This may be; but it is also possible that the omission of Athaliah's name may have been occasioned by the detestation in which it was held. She is the only recorded instance of the marriage of a princess of the royal house with a high-priest. On this occasion it was a providential circumstance (2 Chr. xxii. 11), as inducing and probably enabling her to rescue the infant JOASH from the massacre of his brothers.

Je-hesh'-ah (fr. Heb.) = JEHOSHUA and JOSHUA 1 (1 Chr. vii. 27).

Je-ho'-yah (Heb. usually Yehôvâh, i. e. with the vowel-points of Adonai [= LORD]; but when these two come together, the former is pointed Yehôvîh, i. e. with the vowels of Elôhim = God). The true pronunciation of this name, by which God was known to the Hebrews, has been entirely lost, the Jews themselves scrupulously avoiding every mention of it, and substituting in its stead one or other of the words with whose proper vowel-points it may happen to be written. This custom, which had its origin in reverence, and has almost degenerated into a superstition, was founded upon an erroneous rendering of Lev. xxiv. 16, from which it was inferred that the mere utterance of the name constituted a capital offence. According to Jewish tradition, it was pronounced but once a year by the high-priest on the day of Atonement when he entered the Holy of Holies; but on this point there is some doubt. From Maimonides we learn that it ceased with Simeon the Just (third century B. C.). But even after the destruction of the second Temple instances are met with of individuals who were in possession of the mysterious secret. Von Bohlen asserts that beyond all doubt the word Jehovah is not Shemitic in its origin. He connects it with the Sanscrit devas, devo, the Greek Dios, and Latin Jovis or Divus. That the Hebrews learned the word from the Egyptians is a theory which has found some advocates. There can be but little doubt that the process in reality was reversed, and that in this case the Hebrews were, not the borrowers, but the lenders. We have indisputable evidence that it existed among them, whatever may have been its origin, many centuries before it is found in other records; of the contrary we have no evidence whatever. One argument for the Egyptian origin of Jehovah is found in the circumstance that Pharaoh changed the name of Eliakim to Jehoiakim (2 K. xxiii. 34), which it is asserted is not in accordance with the practice of conquerors toward the conquered, unless the Egyptian king imposed upon the king of Judah the name of one of his own gods. But the same reasoning would prove that the origin of the word was Babylonian, for the king of Babylon changed the name of Mattaniah to Zedekiah (xxiv. 17). But many, abandoning as untenable the theory of an Egyptian origin, have sought to trace the name among the Phenicians and Canaanitish tribes. From the occurrence of Jehovah as a compound in the proper names of many who were not Hebrews, Hamaker contends that it must have been known among heathen people. But such knowledge, if it existed, was no more than might have been obtained by their necessary contact with the Hebrews. The names of Uriah the Hittite, of Araunah or Aranjah the Jebusite, of Tobiah the Ammonite, and of the Canaanitish town Bizjothjah, may be all explained without having recourse to Hamaker's hypothesis. Most of the authorities on the opposite side have taken for the basis of their explanations, and the different methods of punctuation which they propose, the passage in Ex. iii. 14, to which we must naturally look for a solution of the question. When Moses received his commission to be the deliverer of Israel, the Almighty, who appeared in the burning bush, communicated to him the name which he should give as the credentials of his mission: "And God said unto Moses, I AM THAT I AM (Heb. chych asher chych); and He said, Thus shalt thou say unto the children of Israel, I AM hath sent me unto you." That this passage is intended to indicate the etymology of Jehovah, as understood by the Hebrews, no one has ventured to doubt: it is in fact the key to the whole mystery. But, though it certainly supplies the etymology, the interpretation must be determined from other considerations. According to this view, then, it must be the third person singular masculine future of the substantive verb haydh, the older form of which was hadvh. Of the many punctuations proposed, the most correct appears to be Yahveh or Yahvêh, and we accept the former (so Mr. Wright, original author of this article), as the more probable, continuing at the same time for the sake of convenience to adopt the form "Jehovah" in what follows, on account of its familiarity to English readers.—The next point for consideration is of vastly more importance: what is the meaning of "Jehovah," and what does it express of the being and nature of God, more than or in distinction from the other names applied to the Deity in the O. T.? Elonim in many cases = the gods of the heathen, who included in the same title the Gon of the Hebrews, and generally = the Deity when spoken of a supernatural being, and when no national feeling influenced the speaker. But, although the distinction between Elôhim, as a general appellation of Deity, and Jehovah, the national God of the Israelites, contains some superficial truth, the real nature of their difference must be sought for far deeper, and as a foundation for the arguments which will be adduced recourse must again be had to etymology.—With regard to the derivation of Elonim, etymologists are divided in their opinions; some connecting it with Heb. el (God 1), and the unused Heb. root âl, to be strong. From whatever root, however, the word may be derived, most are of opinion that the primary idea contained in it is that of strength, power; so that Elôhim is the proper appellation of the Deity, as manifested in His creative and universally sustaining agency, and in the general divine guidance and government of the world. The question now arises, What is the meaning to be attached to the plural form of the word? Some have discovered therein the mystery of the Trinity, while others maintain that it points to polytheism. Probably the plural form Elôhim, instead of pointing to polytheism, is applied to God as comprehending in Himself the fulness of all power, and uniting in a perfect degree all that which the name signifies, and all the attributes which the heathen ascribe to the several divinities of their pantheon. The singular elôah (God 2), with few exceptions (Neh. ix. 17; 2 Chr. xxxii. 15), occurs only in poetry. It will be found, upon examination of the passages in which Elohim occurs, that it is chiefly in places where God is exhibited only in the plenitude of His power, and where no especial reference is made to His unity, personality, or holiness, or to His relation to Israel and the theocracy.—But while Elohim exhibits God displayed in His power as the creator and governor of the physical universe, the name Jehovah designates His nature as He stands in relation to man, as the only almighty, true, personal, holy Being, a spirit, and “the father of spirits” (Num. xvi. 22; compare Jn. iv. 24), who revealed Himself to His people, made a covenant with them, and became their lawgiver, and to whom all honor and worship are due. If the etymology above given be accepted, and the name be derived from the future tense of the substantive verb, it would denote, in accordance with the general analogy of proper names of a similar form, He that is, the Being, whose chief attribute is eternal existence. As the Israelites were in a remarkable manner distinguished as the people of Jehovah, who became their lawgiver and supreme ruler, it is not strange that He should be put in strong contrast with Chemosh (Judg. xi. 24), Ash-taroath (Judg. x. 6), and the Baalim (Judg. iii. 7), the national deities of the surrounding nations, and thus be preëminently distinguished in one aspect of His character as the tutelary deity of the Hebrews. (LAW OF MOSES.) Such and no more was He to the heathen (1 K. xx. 23); but all this and much more to the Israelites, to whom Jehovah was a distinct personal subsistence—the living God, who reveals Himself to man by word and deed, helps, guides, saves, and delivers, and is to the O. T. what Christ is to the N. T. Jehovah was no abstract name, but thoroughly practical, and stood in intimate connection with the religious life of the people. While Elohim represents God only in His most outward relation to man, and distinguishes Him as recognized in His omnipotence, Jehovah describes Him according to His innermost being. In Jehovah the moral attributes are presented as constituting the essence of His nature; whereas in Elohim there is no reference to personality or moral character. That Jehovah is identical with Elohim, and not a separate being, is indicated by the joint use of the names Jehovah-Elohim (A. V. “the LORD God;” PENTATEUCH). Mr. Tyler (Jehovah, the Redeemer God, &c.), Mr. MacWhorter (Yahveh Christ, or the Memorial Name; B. S. xiv. 98 ff.), and Mr. Macdonald (Introduction to the Pentateuch), make Jehovah = He who will be, and maintain that the name was used with reference to the future manifestation of God in Christ (compare Mat. xi. 3; Rev. i. 8, &c.).—The antiquity of the name Jehovah among the Hebrews has formed the subject of much discussion. That it was not known before the age of Moses has been inferred from Ex. vi. 3; while Von Bohlen assigns to it a much more recent date. But, on the other hand, it would seem from the etymology of the word that it originated in an age long prior to that of Moses, in whose time the Heb. root hāvāh (= hāvāh) was already antiquated. At the same time it is distinctly stated in Ex. vi. 3, that to the patriarchs God was not known by the name Jehovah. If, therefore, this passage has reference to the first revelation of Jehovah simply as a name and title of God, there is clearly a discrepancy which requires to be explained. In renewing His promise of deliverance from Egypt, “God spake unto Moses and said unto him, I am JEHOVAH (A. V. ‘the LORD’); and I appeared unto Abraham, unto Isaac, and unto Jacob (by the name of) GOD ALMIGHTY (Heb. Ēl Shaddai), but by my name JEHOVAH was I not known to them.” It follows then that, if the reference were merely to the name as a name, this passage would prove equally that before this time Elohim was unknown as an appellation of the Deity, and God would appear uniformly as Ēl Shaddai in the patriarchal history. Calvin saw at once that the knowledge there spoken of could not refer to the syllables and letters, but to the recognition of God’s glory and majesty. It was not the name, but the true depth of its significance which was unknown to and uncomprehended by the patriarchs. They had known God as the omnipotent, Ēl Shaddai (Gen. xvii. 1, xxviii. 3), the ruler of the physical universe, and of man as one of His creatures; as a God eternal, immutable, and true to His promises He was yet to be revealed. In the character expressed by the name Jehovah He had not hitherto been fully known; His true attributes had not been recognized in His working and acts for Israel. Referring to other passages in which the phrase “the name of God” occurs, it is clear that something more is intended by it than a mere appellation, and that the proclamation of the name of God is a revelation of His moral attributes, and of His true character as Jehovah (Ex. xxxiii. 19, xxxiv. 6, 7) the God of the covenant. Great stress has been laid, by those who deny the antiquity of the name Jehovah, upon the fact that proper names compounded with it occur but seldom before the age of Samuel and David. It is undoubtedly true that, after the revival of the true faith among the Israelites, proper names so compounded did become more frequent, but if it can be shown that prior to the time of Moses any such names existed, it will be sufficient to prove that the name Jehovah was not entirely unknown. Among those which have been quoted for this purpose are JOCHEBED the mother of Moses, and daughter of Levi, and MORIAH, the mountain on which Abraham was commanded to offer up Isaac. Against the former it is urged that Moses might have changed her name to Jochebed after the name Jehovah had been communicated by God; but this is very improbable, as he was at this time eighty years old, and his mother in all probability dead. If this only be admitted as a genuine instance of a name compounded with Jehovah, it takes us at once back into the patriarchal age, and proves that a word which was employed in forming the proper name of Jacob’s grand-daughter could not have been unknown to that patriarch himself. The name Moriah is of more importance, for in one passage in which it occurs it is accompanied by an etymology intended to indicate what was then understood by it (2 Chr. iii. 1).

Je-ho’vāh-Jl’reh (fr. Heb. = Jehovah will see, or provide), the name given by Abraham to the place on which he had been commanded to offer Isaac, to commemorate the interposition of the angel of Jehovah, who appeared to prevent the sacrifice (Gen. xxii. 14) and provided another victim. MORIAH 1.

Je-ho’vāh-nl’si (fr. Heb. = Jehovah my banner), the name given by Moses to the altar which he built in commemoration of the discomfiture of the Amalekites by Joshua and his chosen warriors at Rephidim (Ex. xvii. 15). The significance of the name is probably contained in the allusion to the staff which Moses held in his hand as a banner during the engagement.

Je-ho’vāh-sha’lem (fr. Heb. = Jehovah is peace, or Jehovah, the God of peace), the altar erected by Gideon in Ophrah in memory of the salutation addressed to him by the angel of Jehovah, "Peace be unto thee" (Judg. vi. 24).

* Je-ho'vah-sham-mah (fr. Heb. = Jehovah is there), a prophetic name of JERUSALEM, the holy city (Ez. xviii. 35, margin).

* Je-ho'vah-'tsid'ke-nu (fr. Heb. = Jehovah our righteousness), a prophetic name of the King to be raised up unto David, MESSIAH (Jer. xxiii. 6, margin); also of the holy city JERUSALEM (xxxiii. 16, margin). Henderson ascribes the name to the Messiah in both passages.

Je-hoz'a-bad (fr. Heb. = whom Jehovah bestows, Ges.; contracted to JOZABAD). 1. A Korahite Levite, second son of Obed-edom, and one of the porters of the S. gate of the Temple, and of the storehouse there in the time of David (1 Chr. xxvi. 4, 15, compared with Neh. xii. 25).—2. A Benjamite, captain of 180,000 armed men, in the days of King Jehoshaphat (2 Chr. xvii. 18).—3. Son of Shomer or Shimrith, a Moabitish woman, conspired with the son of an Ammonitess against King JOASH and slew him in his bed (2 K. xii. 21; 2 Chr. xxiv. 26).

Je-hoz'a-dak (fr. Heb. = whom Jehovah makes just, Ges.; contracted to JOZADAK), son of the high-priest SERAIHA (1 Chr. vi. 14, 15) in the reign of Zedekiah. When his father was slain at Riblah by order of Nebuchadnezzar, in the eleventh of Zedekiah (2 K. xxv. 18, 21), Jehozadak was led away captive to Babylon (1 Chr. vi. 15), where he doubtless spent the remainder of his days. He himself never attained the high-priesthood, but he was the father of JESHUA the HIGH-PRIEST—who with Zerubabel headed the Return from Captivity—and of all his successors till the pontificate of Alcimus (Ezr. iii. 2; Neh. xii. 26, &c.). Nothing more is known about him. JOSEDECH; JOZADAK.

Jehu (L. fr. Heb. = Jehovah is He). 1. Founder of the fifth dynasty of the kingdom of Israel. (ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF). His history was told in the lost "Chronicles of the Kings of Israel" (2 K. x. 34). His father's name was Jehoshaphat (ix. 2); his grandfather's was Nimsli. In his youth he had been one of the guards of Ahab. His first appearance in history is when, with a comrade in arms, Bidkar, he rode behind Ahab on the fatal journey from Samaria to Jezreel, and heard, and laid up in his heart, the warning of Elijah against the murderer of Naboth (ix. 25). But he had already, as it would seem, been known to Elijah as a youth of promise, and, accordingly, in the vision at Horeb he is mentioned as the future king of Israel, whom Elijah is to anoint as the minister of vengeance on Israel (1 K. xix. 16, 17). This injunction, for reasons unknown to us, Elijah never fulfilled. It was reserved long afterward for his successor Elisha. Jehu meantime, in the reigns of Ahaziah and Jehoram, had risen to importance. He was, under the last-named king, captain of the host in the siege of Ramoth-gilead. Whilst in the midst of the officers of the besieging army, a youth suddenly entered, of wild appearance (2 K. ix. 11), and insisted on a private interview with Jehu. They retired into a secret chamber. The youth uncovered a vial of the sacred oil which he had brought with him, poured it over Jehu's head, and, after announcing to him the message from Elisha, that he was appointed to be king of Israel and destroyer of the house of Ahab, rushed out of the house and disappeared. Jehu's countenance, as he reentered the assembly of officers, showed that some strange tidings had reached him. He tried at first to evade their questions, but then revealed the situation in which he found himself placed by the prophetic call. In a moment the enthusiasm of the army took fire. They threw their garments under his feet, so as to form a rough carpet of state, placed him on the top of the stairs, as on an extempore throne, blew the royal salute on their trumpets, and thus ordained him king. He then cut off all communication between Ramoth-gilead and Jezreel, and set off, full speed, with his ancient comrade, Bidkar, whom he had made captain of the host in his place, and a band of horsemen. From the tower of Jezreel a watchman saw the cloud of dust (A. V. "company") and announced his coming (ix. 17). The messengers that were sent out to him he detained, on the same principle of secrecy which had guided all his movements. It was not till he had almost reached the city, and was identified by the watchman, that alarm was taken. But it was not till, in answer to Jehoram's question, "Is it peace, Jehu?" that Jehu's fierce denunciation of Jezebel at once revealed the danger. Jehu seized his opportunity, and shot him through the heart (ix. 24). The body was thrown out on the fatal field, and whilst his soldiers pursued and killed the king of Judah (AHAZIAH 2) at Beth-gan (A. V. "the garden-house"), probably En-gannim, Jehu himself advanced to the gates of Jezreel and fulfilled the divine warning on Jezebel as already on Jehoram. He then entered on a work of extermination hitherto unparalleled in the history of the Jewish monarchy. All the descendants of Ahab that remained in Jezreel, together with the officers of the court, and hierarchy of Astarte (ASHTORETH), were swept away. His next step was to secure Samaria. Every stage of his progress was marked with blood. At the gates of Jezreel he found the heads of seventy princes of the house of Ahab, ranged in two heaps. Next, at "the shearing-house" (or Beth-eked) between Jezreel and Samaria he encountered forty-two sons or nephews (2 Chr. xx. 8) of the late king of Judah. These also were put to the sword at the fatal well. As he drove on he encountered a strange figure, such as might have reminded him of the great Elijah. It was JEHONADAB, the austere Arabian sectary, the son of Rechab. In him his keen eye discovered a ready ally. He took him into his chariot, and they concocted their schemes as they entered Samaria (2 K. x. 15, 16). Up to this moment there was nothing which showed any thing beyond a determination to exterminate in all its branches the personal adherents of Ahab. There was to be a new inauguration of the worship of Baal. A solemn assembly, sacred vestments, innumerable victims, were ready. The vast temple at Samaria raised by Ahab (1 K. xvi. 32) was crowded from end to end. The chief sacrifice was offered, as if in the excess of his zeal, by Jehu himself. Jehonadab joined in the deception. There was some apprehension lest worshippers of Jehovah might be found in the temple; such, it seems, had been the intermixture of the two religions. As soon, however, as it was ascertained that all, and none but, the idolaters were there, the signal was given to eighty trusted guards, and a sweeping massacre removed at one blow the whole heathen population of the kingdom of Israel. This is the last public act recorded of Jehu. The remaining twenty-seven years of his long reign are passed over in a few words, in which two points only are material:—He did not destroy the calf-worship of Jeroboam:—The Trans-jordanic tribes suffered much from the ravages of Hazael (2 K. x. 29-33). He was buried in state in Samaria, and was succeeded by his son JEHOAHAZ (x. 35). His name is the first of the Israelite kings which appears in the Assyrian monuments, having been read Yahua (Jehu), the son of Khumri (Omri), on the black obelisk from Nimroud now in the British Museum, among the kings bringing tribute (so Stanley, with Dr. Hincks, Rawlinson, &c.).—2. Son of Hanani; a prophet of Judah, but whose ministrations were chiefly directed to Israel. His father was probably the seer who attacked Asa (2 Chr. xvi. 7). He must have begun his career as a prophet when very young. He first denounced Baasha (1 K. xvi. 1, 7), and then, after an interval of thirty years, reappears to denounce Jehoshaphat for his alliance with Ahab (2 Chr. xix. 2, 3). He survived Jehoshaphat and wrote his life (xx. 34).—3. A man of Judah of the house of Hebron (1 Chr. ii. 38).—4. A Simeonite chief, son of Josiabiah (iv. 35).—5. "Jehu the Antiothite" was one of the chief of the heroes of Benjamin, who joined David at Ziklag (xii. 3).

Je-hub'bah (fr. Heb. = he will be hidden, Ayre), a man of Asher; son of Shamer or Shomer, of the house of Beriah (1 Chr. vii. 34).

Je-hu'eal (fr. Heb. = potent, Ges.; contracted to JUCAL), son of Shelemiah; one of two persons sent by King Zedekiah to Jeremiah, to entreat his prayers and advice (Jer. xxxvii. 3). JUCAL.

Je-hud (fr. Heb. = Judah, i. e. Judea, Ges.; place of renown, Fü.), a city of Dan (Josh. xix. 45), named between Baalath and Bene-berak; probably at the modern village el-Yehudiyyeh, seven miles E. of Jaffa and five N. of Lydd.

Je-hu'di (fr. Heb. = Jew), son of Nathaniah; a man employed by the princes of Jehoiakim's court to fetch Baruch to read Jeremiah's denunciation (Jer. xxxvi. 14), and then by the king to fetch the volume itself and read it to him (21, 23).

Je-hu-dijah (fr. Heb., see below) (1 Chr. iv. 18). If this is a proper name at all, it is (with the Hebrew article ha) Ha-jehudijah, like Ham-melech, Hak-koz, &c.; and it seems to be rather an appellative = the Jewess. As far as an opinion can be formed of so obscure and apparently corrupt a passage (so Lord A. C. Hervey), Mered married two wives—one a Jewess, the other an Egyptian, a daughter of Pharaoh. The Jewess was sister of Naham, the father of the cities of Keilah and Esh-temoa. HODIAH.

Je'hash (fr. Heb. = to whom God hastens, Ges.; a collector, Fü.), son of Eshek, a remote descendant of Saul (1 Chr. viii. 39).

Je-el (fr. Heb. = treasured of God? Ges.; God is snatching away, Fü.; = JEWEL and JEHIEL 12). 1. A Reubenite chief of the house of Joel (1 Chr. v. 7).—2. A Merarite Levite, one of the gate-keepers to the sacred tent (xv. 18). His duty was also to play the harp (ver. 21), or the psaltery and harp (xvi. 5), in the service before the Ark.—3. A Gershonite Levite, one of the sons of Asaph, forefather of JAHAZIEL in the time of King Jehoshaphat (2 Chr. xx. 14).—4. The scribe who kept the account of the numbers of King Uzziah's irregular predatory warriors (xxvi. 11).—5. A Gershonite Levite, one of the sons of Elizaphan (xxix. 13).—6. One of the chiefs of the Levites in the time of Josiah (xxxv. 9).—7. One of the sons of Adonikam in the caravan of Ezra from Babylon to Jerusalem (Ezr. viii. 13).—8. A layman, of the sons of Nebo, who had taken a foreign wife and had to relinquish her (x. 43).

Je-kab'ze-el (fr. Heb. = which God gathers, Ges.) = KABZEEL, the most remote city of Judah on the S. frontier (Neh. xi. 25).

Jek-a-me'am (fr. Heb. = who gathers the people, Ges.), a Levite in David's time; fourth of the sons of Hebron, the son of Kohath (1 Chr. xxiii. 19, xxiv. 23).

Jek-a-mi'ah (fr. Heb. = whom Jehovah gathers, Ges.), son of Shallum, in the line of Ahlai (1 Chr. ii. 41).

Je-ka'thi-el (fr. Heb. = piety toward God? Ges.; God is almightiness, Fü.), a man recorded in the genealogies of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 18) as the son of Ezra or Mered, by his Jewish wife (A. V. JEHUDIAH), and in his turn the father, or founder, of the town of Zanoah.

Je-mi'ma (fr. Heb. = dove, Ges.; the pure, as day-light, Fü.), the eldest of the three daughters born to Job after the restoration of his prosperity (Job xlii. 14).

* Jem'i-ni (fr. Heb. = my right hand). The margin of 1 Sam. ix. 1 has (literally from the Hebrew) "the son of a man of Jemini," for which the text has (probably correctly) "a BENJAMITE."

Jem-na-an (fr. Gr.) (Jd. ii. 28), no doubt = JABNEEL = JAMNIA.

Jem'u-el (L. fr. Heb. = day of God, Ges.), eldest son of Simeon (Gen. xli. 10; Ex. vi. 15); = NEMUEL.

Jeph'thæ [jef'the] (Gr. Iepthæ, fr. Heb.) = JEPHTHAH (Heb. xi. 32).

Jeph'thah (fr. Heb. = whom God sets free? Ges.; a breaker through, i. e. causing to bear, Fü.), a JUDGE, about B. C. 1148–1137. His history is contained in Judg. xi. 1–xii. 7. He was a Gileadite, the son of Gilead and a concubine. Driven by the legitimate sons from his father's inheritance, he went to Tob, and became the head of a company of freebooters in a debatable land probably belonging to Ammon (2 Sam. x. 6). His fame as a bold and successful captain was carried back to his native Gilead; and when the time was ripe for throwing off the yoke of Ammon, Jephthah consented to become their captain, on the condition (solemnly ratified before the Lord in Mizpeh) that in the event of his success against Ammon he should still remain as their acknowledged head. He collected warriors throughout Gilead and Manasseh, the provinces which acknowledged his authority; and then he vowed his vow unto the Lord. The Ammonites were routed with great slaughter. Twenty cities, from Aroer on the Arnon to Minnith and to Abel Ceramim, were taken from them. But as the conqueror returned to Mizpeh, there came out to meet him a procession of damsels with dances and timbrels, and among them—the first person from his own house—his daughter and only child. "Alas! my daughter, thou hast brought me very low," was the greeting of the heart-stricken father. But the high-minded maiden is ready for any personal suffering in the hour of her father's triumph. Only she asks for a respite of two months to withdraw to her native mountains, and in their recesses to weep with her virgin-friends over the early disappointment of her life. When that time was ended she returned to her father, and "he did unto her his vow." But Jephthah had not long leisure, even if he were disposed, for the indulgence of domestic grief. The proud tribe of Ephraim challenged his right to go to war, as he had done without their concurrence, against Ammon. He first defeated them, then intercepted the fugitives at the fords of Jordan, and there put 42,000 men to the sword. (SHIBBOLETH.) He judged Israel six years and died. It is generally conjectured that his jurisdiction was limited to the Trans-jordanic region. That the daughter of Jephthah was really offered up to God in sacrifice—slain by the hand of her father and then burnt—is a horrible conclusion, but one which it seems impossible to avoid (so Mr. Bullock, with Jonathan the paraphrast, Rashi, Josephus, Origen, and perhaps all the early Christian Fathers, Lightfoot, Kitto, &c.). Joseph Kimchi supposed that, instead of being sacrificed, she was shut up in a house which her father built for the purpose, and that she was there visited by the daughters of Israel four days in each year so long as she lived. This interpretation has been adopted by many eminent men (Drusus, Grotius, Estius, De Dieu, Bishop Hall, Waterland, Hales, Hengstenberg, &c.).

Jephun'neh (fr. Heb. = for whom is prepared? Ges.; who becomes visible, Fii.). 1. Father of CALEB the spy. He appears (so Lord A. C. Hervey) to have belonged to an Edomitish tribe called Kenzites, from Kenaz their founder (Num. xiii. 6, &c.; xxxiii. 12, &c.; Josh. xiv. 14, &c.; 1 Chr. iv. 15).—2. A descendant of Asher; eldest of the three sons of Jether (1 Chr. vii. 38).

Jerah (fr. Heb., see below), fourth in order of the sons of JOKTAN (Gen. x. 26; 1 Chr. i. 20), and progenitor of a tribe of southern ARABIA. He has not been satisfactorily identified with the name of any Arabian place or tribe, though a fortress named Yerakh is mentioned as belonging to the district of the Nijidd, which is in Mahreh, at the extremity of the Yemen. Bochart translates Jerah = the moon into Arabic, and finds the descendants of Jerah in the Alilae, a people dwelling near the Red Sea, on the strength of a passage in Herodotus (iii. 8), in which he says of the Arabs, "Bacchus they call in their language Orotal; and Urania, Alilat."

Jerah-me-el (fr. Heb. = on whom God has mercy, Ges.). 1. First-born son of Hezron, the son of Pharez, the son of Judah (1 Chr. ii. 9, 25–27, 38, 42). His descendants are given at length in the same chapter. (JERAHMEELITES).—2. A Merarite Levite, of the family of Kish, the son of Mahli (1 Chr. xxiv. 29; compare xxxiii. 21).—3. Son of Hammelech (compare JOASH 4; MAASEIAH 17; MALCHIAH 8); employed by Jehoiakim to make Jeremiah and Baruch prisoners, after he had burnt the roll of Jeremiah's prophecy (Jer. xxxvi. 26).

Jerah-me-el-ites (fr. Heb.), the = the descendants of JERAHMEEL 1 (1 Sam. xxvii. 10, xxx. 29). They dwelt in the S. of Judah.

Jer'e-chus (fr. Gr.) = JERICHO (1 Esd. v. 22).

Jer'ed (fr. Heb. = descent, Ges.; = JARED). 1. Son of Mahalaleel and father of Enoch (1 Chr. i. 2); = JARED.—2. A descendant of Judah; the "father—i. e. founder—of Gedor" (iv. 18).

Jer'e-mal (fr. Heb. = dwelling in heights, Ges.), a layman; one of the sons of Hashum, compelled by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezr. x. 33).

Jer'e-miah (fr. Heb. = whom Jehovah sets up, Ges.; Jah is the exalted one, Fii.). 1. A celebrated Hebrew PROPHET. (I.) Life and Work. (1.) Under Josiah B. C. 638–608 (see for chronology ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF). In the thirteenth year of the reign of Josiah, the prophet speaks of himself as still "a child" (Jer. i. 6). We cannot rely, indeed, on this word as a chronological datum. We may at least infer, however, as we can trace his life in full activity for upward of forty years from this period, that at the commencement of that reign he could not have passed out of actual childhood. He is described as "the son of Hilkiah of the priests that were in ANATHOTH" (i. 1). Some have identified this Hilkiah with the high-priest who bore so large a share in Josiah's work of reformation, but of this there is no evidence. The boy would hear among the priests of his native town, not three miles distant from Jerusalem, of the idolatries and cruelties of Manasseh and his son Amon. He would be trained in the traditional precepts and ordinances of the Law. He would become acquainted with the names and writings of older prophets. As he grew up toward manhood, he would hear also of the work which the king and his counsellors were carrying on, and of the teaching of the woman (HULDAH), who alone, or nearly so, in the midst of that religious revival, was looked upon as speaking from direct prophetic inspiration. In all likelihood he came into actual contact with them. Possibly, too, to this period of his life we may trace the commencement of that friendship with the family of Neriah which was afterward so fruitful in results. (BARUCH.) As the issue of all these influences we find in him all the conspicuous features of the devout ascetic character: intense consciousness of his own weakness, great susceptibility to varying emotions, a spirit easily bowed down. Left to himself, he might have borne his part among the reforming priests of Josiah's reign, free from their formalism and hypocrisy. But "the word of Jehovah came to him" (i. 2); and by that divine voice the secret of his future life was revealed to him, at the very time when the work of reformation was going on with fresh vigor (2 Chr. xxxiv. 3), when he himself was beginning to have the thoughts and feelings of a man. A life-long martyrdom was set before him, a struggle against kings, and priests, and people (Jer. i. 18). For a time, it would seem he held aloof from the work which was going on throughout the nation. His name is nowhere mentioned in the history of the memorable eighteenth year of Josiah. Though five years had passed since he entered on the work of a prophet, it is from Huldah, not from him, that the king and his princes seek for counsel. The discovery of the Book of the Law, however, could not fail to exercise an influence on a mind like Jeremiah's: his later writings show abundant traces of it; and the result apparently was, that he could not share the hopes which others cherished. He saw that the reformation was but a surface one. Israel had gone into captivity, and Judah was worse than Israel (iii. 11). It was as hard for him, as it had been for Isaiah, to find, among the princes and people who worshipped in the Temple, one just, truth-seeking man (v. 1, 28). His own work, as a priest and prophet, led him to discern the falsehood and lust of rule which were at work under the form of zeal (v. 31). The strange visions which had followed upon his call (i. 11–16) taught him that Jehovah would "hasten" the performance of His word. Hence, though we have hardly any mention of special incidents in the life of Jeremiah during the eighteen years between his call and Josiah's death, the main features of his life come distinctly enough before us. He had even then his experience of the bitterness of the lot to which God had called him. The duties of the priest, even if he continued to discharge them, were merged in those of the new and special office. Toward the close of the reign, however, he appears to have taken some part in the great national questions then at issue. Josiah, probably (so Professor Plumptre, the original author of this article) following the advice of Jeremiah, chose to attach himself to the new Chaldean kingdom, and lost his life in the vain attempt to stop the progress of the Egyptian king. We may think of this as one of the first great sorrows of Jeremiah's life.—(2.) Under Jehoahaz (= Shallum), B. C. 608. The short reign of this prince (chosen by the people on hearing of Josiah's death, and after three months deposed by Pharaoh-necho) gave little scope for direct prophetic action. The fact of his deposition, however, shows that he had been set up against Egypt, and therefore as representing the policy of which Jeremiah had been the advocate; and this may account for the tenderness and pity with which he speaks of him in his Egyptian exile (xxii. 11, 12).—(3.) Under Jehoiakim, B. C. 607–597. In the weakness and disorder which characterized this reign, the work of Jeremiah became daily more prominent. The king had come to the throne as the vassal of Egypt, and for a time the Egyptian party was dominant in Jerusalem. Others, however, held that the only way of safety lay in accepting the supremacy of the Chaldeans. Jeremiah appeared as the chief representative of this party. He had learned to discern the signs of the times; the evils of the nation were not to be cured by any half-measures of reform, or by foreign alliances. The king of Babylon was God's servant (xxv. 9, xxvii. 6), doing His work, and was for a time to prevail over all resistance. Hard as it was for one who sympathized so deeply with all the sufferings of his country, this was the conviction to which he had to bring himself. He had to expose himself to the suspicion of treachery by declaring it. Men claiming to be prophets had their "word of Jehovah" to set against his (xiv. 13, xxiii. 7), and all that he could do was to commit his cause to God, and wait for the result. Some of the most striking scenes in this conflict are brought before us with great vividness (xxvi.). If Jeremiah was not at once hunted to death, like Urijah (xxvi. 23), it was because his friend Ahikam was powerful enough to protect him. The fourth year of Jehoiakim was yet more memorable. The battle of Carchemish overthrew the hopes of the Egyptian party (xvi. 2), and the armies of Nebuchadnezzar drove those who had no defended cities to take refuge in Jerusalem (xxv. 11). As one of the consequences of this, we have the interesting episode of the RECHABITES. In this year, too, came another solemn message to the king: prophecies, which had been uttered here and there at intervals, were now to be gathered together, written in a book, and read as a whole in the hearing of the people. Baruch, already known as the prophet's disciple, acted as scribe; and in the following year, when a solemn fast-day called the whole people together in the Temple (xxxvi. 1–9), Jeremiah—hindered himself, we know not how—sent him to proclaim them. The result was as it had been before: the princes of Judah connived at the escape of the prophet and his scribe (xxxvi. 19). The king vented his impotent rage upon the scroll which Jeremiah had written. Jeremiah and Baruch, in their retirement, rewrote it with many added prophecies; among them, probably, the special prediction that the king should die by the sword, and be cast out unburied and dishonored (xxii. 30). In chapter xlv., which belongs to this period, we have a glimpse into the relations between the master and the scholar, and into the thoughts of each of them. In the absence of special dates for other events in the reign of Jehoiakim, we may bring together into one picture some of the most striking features of this period of Jeremiah's life. As the dangers from the Chaldeans became more threatening, the persecution against him grew hotter, his own thoughts were more bitter and desponding (xviii.). The people sought his life: his voice rose up in the prayer that God would deliver and avenge him. That thought he soon reproduced in act as well as word. Standing in the valley of the son of Hinnom, he broke the earthen vessel he carried in his hands, and prophesied to the people that the whole city should be defiled with the dead, as that valley had been, within their memory, by Josiah (xix. 10–13). The boldness of the speech and act drew upon him immediate punishment. The years that followed brought no change for the better. Famine and drought were added to the miseries of the people (xiv. 1), but false prophets still deceived them with assurances of plenty; and Jeremiah was looked on with dislike, as "a prophet of evil," and "every one cursed" him (xv. 10). He was set, however, "as a fenced brazen wall" (xv. 20), and went on with his work, reproving king, and nobles, and people.—(4.) Under Jehoiachin (= Jeconiah), B. C. 597. The danger which Jeremiah had so long foretold at last came near. First Jehoiakim, and afterward his successor, were carried into exile (2 K. xxiv.). Of the work of the prophet in this short reign we have but the fragmentary record of xxii. 24–30.—(5.) Under Zedekiah, B. C. 597–586. In this prince (probably as having been appointed by Nebuchadnezzar), we do not find the same obstinate resistance to the prophet's counsels as in Jehoiakim. He respects him, fears him, seeks his counsel; but he is a mere shadow of a king, powerless even against his own counsellors, and in his reign, accordingly, the sufferings of Jeremiah were sharper than they had been before. His counsel to the exiles was that they should submit to their lot, prepare for a long captivity, and wait quietly for the ultimate restoration. The king at first seemed willing to be guided by him, and sent to ask for his intercession (Jer. xxxvii. 3). He appears in the streets of the city with bonds and yokes upon his neck (xxvii. 2), announcing that they were meant for Judah and its allies. The approach of an Egyptian army, however, and the consequent departure of the Chaldeans, made the position of Jeremiah full of danger; and he sought to effect his escape from a city, in which, it seemed, he could no longer do good, and to take refuge in his own town of Anathoth or its neighborhood (xxxvii. 12). The discovery of this plan led, not unnaturally perhaps, to the charge of desertion: it was thought that he, too, was "falling away to the Chaldeans," as others were doing (xxxviii. 19), and, in spite of his denial, he was thrown into a dungeon (xxxvii. 16). The interposition of the king, who still respected and consulted him, led to some mitigation of the rigor of his confinement (xxxvii. 21); but, as this did not hinder him from speaking to the people, the princes of Judah, bent on an alliance with Egypt, and calculating on the king's being unable to resist them (xxxviii. 5), threw him into the prison-pit, to die there. From this horrible fate he was again delivered, by the friendship of the Ethiopian eunuch, Ebed-melech, and the king's regard for him; and was restored to the milder custody in which he had been kept previously, where we find (xxxii. 16) he had the companionship of Baruch. The return of the Chaldean army filled both king and people with dismay (xxxii. 1); and the risk now was that they would pass from their presumptuous confidence to the opposite extreme and sink down in despair, with no faith in God and no hope for the future. The prophet was taught how to meet that danger also. In his prison, while the Chaldeans were ravaging the country, he bought, with all requisite formalities, the field at Anathoth which his kinsman Hanameel wished to get rid of (xxxii. 6-9). His faith in the promises of God did not fail him. At last the blow came. The city was taken, the Temple burnt. The king and his princes shared the fate of Jehoiachin. The prophet gave utterance to his sorrow in the LAMENTATIONS.—(6.) After the capture of Jerusalem, B. C. 586-7. The Chaldean party in Judah had now the prospect of better things. We find a special charge given to Nebuzaradan (xxxix. 11) to protect the person of Jeremiah; and, after being carried as far as Ramah with the crowd of captives (xl. 1), he was set free, and Gedaliah, the son of his steadfast friend Ahikam, made governor over the cities of Judah. The feeling of the Chaldeans toward him was shown yet more strongly in the offer made him by Nebuzaradan (xl. 4, 5). For a short time there was an interval of peace (xl. 9-12), soon broken, however, by the murder of Gedaliah by Ishmael and his associates. We are left to conjecture in what way the prophet escaped from a massacre apparently intended to include all the adherents of Gedaliah. The fulness with which the history of the massacre is narrated in chapter xli. makes it, however, probable that he was among the prisoners whom Ishmael was carrying off to the Ammonites, and who were released by the arrival of Johanan. One of Jeremiah's friends was thus cut off, but Baruch still remained with him; and the people, under Johanan, who had taken the command on the death of Gedaliah, turned to him for counsel. His warnings and assurances were in vain, and did but draw on him and Baruch the old charge of treachery (xliii. 3). The people followed their own counsel, and—lest the two whom they suspected should betray or counteract it—took them also by force to Egypt. There, in the city of Tahpanhes, we have the last clear glimpses of the prophet's life. His words are sharper and stronger than ever. He does not shrink, even there, from speaking of the Chaldean king once more as the "servant of Jehovah" (xliii. 10). He declares that they should see the throne of the conqueror set up in the very place which they had chosen as the securest refuge. He utters a final protest (xliv.) against the idolatries of which they and their fathers had been guilty, and which they were even then renewing. After this all is uncertain. If we could assume that lli. 31 was written by Jeremiah himself, it would show that he reached an extreme old age, but this is so doubtful that we are left to other sources. On the one hand there is the Christian tradition, resting doubtless on some earlier belief, that the Jews at Tahpanhes, irritated by his rebukes, at last stoned him to death. An Alexandrian tradition reported that his bones had been brought to that city by Alexander the Great. On the other side there is the Jewish statement that on the conquest of Egypt by Nebuchadnezzar, he, with Baruch, made his escape to Babylon or Judea, and died in peace. As it is, the darkness and doubt that brood over the last days of the prophet's life are more significant than either of the issues which presented themselves to men's imaginations as the winding-up of his career. He did not need a death by violence to make him a true martyr.—(II.) Character and style. It will have been seen from this narrative that there fell to the lot of Jeremiah sharper suffering than any previous prophet had experienced. In every page of his prophecies we recognize the temperament which, while it does not lead the man who has it to shrink from doing God's work, however painful, makes the pain of doing it infinitely more acute, and gives to the whole character the impress of a deeper and more lasting melancholy. He has to appear as a prophet of evil, dashing to the ground the false hopes with which the people are buoying themselves up. Other prophets—Samuel, Elisha, Isaiah—had been sent to rouse the people to resistance. He has been brought to the conclusion, bitter as it is, that the only safety for his countrymen lies in their accepting that against which they are contending as the worst of evils; and this brings on him the charge of treachery and desertion. If it were not for his trust in the God of Israel, for his hope of a better future to be brought out of all this chaos and darkness, his heart would fail within him. But that vision is clear and bright, and it gives to him, almost as fully as to Isaiah, the character of a prophet of the Gospel. The prophet's hopes are not merely vague visions of a better future: they gather round the person of a Christ, and are essentially Messianic. In a deeper sense than that of the patristic divines, the life of the prophet was a type of that of Christ. The character of the man impressed itself with more or less force upon the language of the writer. As might be expected in one who lived in the last days of the kingdom, and had therefore the works of the earlier prophets to look back upon, we find in him reminiscences and reproductions of what they had written, which indicate the way in which his own spirit had been educated. Traces of the influence of the newly-discovered Book of the Law, and in particular of Deuteronomy, appear repeatedly in his, as in other writings of the same period. Throughout, too, there are the tokens of his individual temperament: a greater prominence of the subjective, elegiac element, than in other prophets, a less sustained energy, a less orderly and completed rhythm.—(III.) Arrangement. The absence of any chronological order in the present structure of the collection of Jeremiah's prophecies is obvious at the first glance. Confining ourselves, for the present, to the Hebrew order (reproduced in the A. V.), we have two great divisions:—(1.) Chs. i.-xlv. Prophecies delivered at various times, directed mainly to Judah, or connected with Jeremiah's personal history. (2.) Chs. xlv.-li. Prophecies connected with other nations. Ch. li., taken largely, though not entirely, from 2 K. xxv., may be taken either as a supplement to the prophecy, or as an introduction to the LAMENTATIONS. Looking more closely into each of these divisions, we have the following sections:—§ 1. Chs. i.-xxi. Containing probably the substance of the book of xxxvi. 32, and including prophecies from the thirteenth year of Josiah to the fourth of Jehoiakim: i. 3, however, indicates a later revision, and the whole of ch. i. may possibly have been added on the prophet's retrospect of his whole work from this its first beginning. Ch. xxi. belongs to a later period, but has probably found its place here as connected, by the recurrence of the name Pashur, with ch. xx.—§ 2. Chs. xxii.-xxv. Shorter prophecies, delivered at different times against the kings of Judah and the false prophets. xxv. 13, 14, evidently marks the conclusion of a series of prophecies; and that which follows, xxv. 15-38, the germ of the fuller predictions in xlii.-xlix., has been placed here as a kind of completion to the prophecy of the Seventy Years and the subsequent fall of Babylon.—§ 3. Chs. xxvi.-xxviii. The two great prophecies of the fall of Jerusalem, and the history connected with them. Ch. xxvi. belongs to the earlier, chs. xxvii. and xxviii. to the later period of the prophet's work. Jehoiaquim, in xxvii. 1, is evidently (compare ver. 3) a mistake for Zedekiah.—§ 4. Chs. xxix.-xxxii. The message of comfort for the exiles in Babylon.—§ 5. Chs. xxxii.-xlv. The history of the last two years before the capture of Jerusalem, and of Jeremiah's work in them and in the period that followed. The position of ch. xlv., unconnected with any thing before or after it, may be accounted for on the hypothesis that Baruch desired to place on record so memorable a passage in his own life, and inserted it where the direct narrative of his master's life ended. The same explanation applies in part to ch. xxxvi.—§ 6. Chs. xli.-li. The prophecies against foreign nations, ending with the great prediction against Babylon.—§ 7. The supplementary narrative of ch. lii.—(IV.) Text. The translation of the LXX. presents many remarkable variations in the order of the several parts. The two agree as far as xxv. 13. From that point all is different, and the following table indicates the extent of the divergency:

xxv. 14-18	— xlix. 34-39.

The genuineness of some portions of this book has been called in question by De Wette, Movers, Hitzig, Ewald, Knobel, &c., partly on the hypothesis that the version of the LXX. presents a purer text, partly on internal and more conjectural grounds. Hävernick, Hengstenberg, Küper, Keil, Umbreit, Henderson, are among its chief defenders. (CASON; INSPIRATION; OLD TESTAMENT; SEPTUAGINT.)—Jeremiah's reputation after his death became very great. In 2 Mc. ii. 1-9, Jeremiah is represented as having at the Captivity miraculously hid the Tabernacle and Ark and Altar of incense in a cave, and in xv. 13-16 Judas Maccabeus relates a dream in which Jeremiah appeared to him as "a man with gray hairs, and exceeding glorious, who was of a wonderful and excellent majesty," and gave him a sword of gold. Some in Christ's time expected his reappearance (Jn. i. 21), and even regarded Jesus as Jeremiah (Mat. xvi. 14). For the quotation in Mat. xxvii. 9, see OLD TESTAMENT C, and ZECHARIAH 1. For the Epistle of Jeremiah, see BARUCH, THE BOOK OF.—2. "Jeremiah of Libnah," father of Hamutal, wife of Josiah (2 K. xxiii. 31).—3, 4, 5. Three warriors—two of the tribe of Gad—in David's army (1 Chr. xii. 4, 10, 13).—6. One of the "mighty men of valor" of the Trans-jordanic half-tribe of Manasseh (1 Chr. v. 24).—7. A priest of high rank, head of the second or third of the twenty-one courses which are apparently enumerated in Neh. x. 2-8, xii. 1, 12. This course, or its chief, took part in the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. xii. 34).—8. Father of Jaazaniah the Rechabite (Jer. xxxv. 3).

1. JEREMIAH the prophet (Ecclus. xlix. 6; 2 Mc. xv. 14; Mat. xvi. 14).—2. JEREMAI (1 Esd. ix. 34).

Jer'e-moth (fr. Heb. = heights, Ges.). 1. A Benjaminite chief, a son of the house of Beriah of Elpaal (1 Chr. viii. 14; compare 12 and 18). His family dwelt at Jerusalem.—2. A Merarite Levite, son of Mushi (xxiii. 23); = JERIMOTH 4.—3. Son of Heman; head of the fifteenth course of musicians in the Divine service (xxv. 22); = JERIMOTH 5.—4. One of the sons of Elam, and—5. One of the sons of Zattu, who had taken strange wives (Ezr. x. 26, 27).—6. The Hebrew name which appears in the same list as "and Ramoth" (ver. 29).

Jer'e-my, an abbreviated English form of JEREMIAH 1 (1 Esd. i. 28, 32, 47, 57, ii. 1; 2 Esd. ii. 18; 2 Mc. ii. 1, 5, 7; Mat. ii. 17, xxvii. 9).

Jer'i-bal (fr. Heb. = for whom Jehovah pleads, Ges.), one of the sons of Elnaam, named among David's heroes (1 Chr. xi. 46).

Jer'i-cho (L. fr. Heb. = place of fragrance), a city of high antiquity, and of considerable importance, situated in a plain traversed by the JORDAN, and exactly over against where that river was crossed by the Israelites under Joshua (Josh. iii. 16). Gilgal, which formed their primary encampment, stood in its E. border (iv. 19). It had a king. Its walls were so considerable that houses were built upon them (ii. 15), and its gates were shut, as throughout the East still, "when it was dark" (v. 5). The spoil found in it (vi. 20-24) betokened its affluence. Jericho is first mentioned as the city to which the two spies were sent by Joshua from Shittim: they were lodged in the house of Rahab the harlot upon the wall, and departed, having first promised to save her and all that were found in her house from destruction (ii. 1-21). In the annihilation of the city that ensued, this promise was religiously observed. Jericho was the first city taken by the Israelites on the W. of the Jordan, its walls having supernaturally fallen down before them after being compassed about seven days; it was then burnt with fire (vi.). As it had been left by Joshua, it was bestowed by him upon the tribe of Benjamin (xviii. 21), and from this time a long interval elapses before Jericho appears again upon the scene. It is only incidentally mentioned in the life of David in connection with his embassy to the Ammonite king (2 Sam. x. 5). And the solemn manner in which its second foundation under Hiel the Bethelite is recorded (1 K. xvi. 34) would certainly seem to imply that up to that time its site had been uninhabited. It is true that mention is made of "a city of palm-trees" (Judg. i. 16, and iii. 13) in existence apparently at the time when spoken of. However, once actually rebuilt, Jericho rose again slowly into consequence. In its immediate vicinity the sons of the prophets sought retirement from the world: ELISHA "healed the spring of the waters;" and over against it, beyond Jordan, Elijah "went up by a whirlwind into heaven" (2 K. ii. 1-22). In its plains Zedekiah fell into the hands of the Chaldeans (xxv. 5; Jer. xxxix. 5). In the return under Zerubbabel the "children of Jericho," 345 in number, are comprised (Ez. iii. 34; Neh. vii. 36); and it is even implied that they removed thither again, for the "men of Jericho" assisted Nehemiah in rebuilding that part of the wall of Jerusalem that was next to the sheep-gate (iii. 2). Jericho was fortified by Bacchides (1 Mc. ix. 50). It was adorned with palaces, castles, and theatres by Herod the Great. He even founded, higher up the plain, a new town called Phasaelis, and died at Jericho. Soon after the palace was burnt, and the town plundered, by one Simon; but Archelaus rebuilt the former sumptuously, and founded a new town in the plain that bore his own name. The Jericho of the days of Josephus was distant 150 stadia (about seventeen English miles) from Jerusalem, and 50 from the Jordan. It lay in a plain, overhanging by a barren mountain whose roots ran northward toward Scythopolis, and southward in the direction of Sodom and the Dead Sea. These formed the western boundaries of the plain. Eastward its barriers were the mountains of Moab, which ran parallel to the former. In the midst of the plain—the great plain as it was called—flowed the Jordan, and at the top and bottom of it were two lakes: Tiberias (or Gennesaret), proverbial for its sweetness, and Asphaltites (or the Dead Sea) for its bitterness. Away from the Jordan it was parched and unhealthy during summer; but during winter, even when it snowed at Jerusalem, the inhabitants here wore linen garments. Hard by Jericho, bursting forth close to the site of the old city, which Joshua took on his entrance into Canaan, was a most exuberant fountain, whose waters, before noted for their contrary properties, had received, proceeds Josephus, through Elisha's prayers, their then wonderfully salutary and prolific efficacy. Jericho was once more "a city of palms" when our Lord visited it; such as Herod the Great and Archelaus had left it, such He saw it. Here He restored sight to the blind. (BARTIMEUS.) Here the descendant of Rahab did not disdain the hospitality of ZACCHEUS the publican—whose office was likely to be lucrative enough in so rich a city. Finally, between Jerusalem and Jericho was laid the scene of His parable of the good Samaritan (Lk. x. 30 ff.). Posterior to the Gospels the chronicle of Jericho may be briefly told. Vespasian found it one of the toparchies of Judea, but deserted by its inhabitants in a great measure when he encamped there. He left a garrison on his departure—not necessarily the 10th legion, which is only stated to have marched through Jericho—which was still there when Titus advanced upon Jerusalem. Is it asked how Jericho was destroyed? Evidently by Vespasian. The city pillaged and burnt in Josephus B. J. iv. 9, § 1, was clearly Jericho with its adjacent villages (so Mr. Ffoulkes). The site of ancient (the first) Jericho is with reason placed by Robinson in the immediate neighborhood of the fountain of ELISHA (Ain es-Sultán), and that of the second (the city of the N. T. and of Josephus) at the opening of the Wady Kelt (Cherith), half an hour from the fountain. These are precisely the sites that one would infer from Josephus. Riha or Eriha, the only modern representative of the ancient royal city of Jericho, is a small, poor, filthy hamlet, about one and a half miles from both the Jericho of the prophets and that of the evangelists (Porter in Kitto). (GILGAL 1.) A tradition represents the Saviour as having been baptized in the Jordan near Jericho, and hence thousands of pilgrims annually visit this place to bathe in the Jordan. The Quarantania mountain, one and a half miles W. of the fountain of Elisha, is the traditional scene of our Lord's temptation. ARABAH; JESUS CHRIST; PALESTINE, &c.

Je-ri'-ah (fr. Heb. = founded [i. e. constituted] of Jehovah, Ges.), a Kohathite Levite, chief of the great house of Hebron when David organized the service (1 Chr. xxiii. 19, xxiv. 23); = JERIAH.

Je-ri'-el (L. fr. Heb. = founded of God, Ges.), a man of Issachar; one of the six heads of the house of TOLA at the census in David's time (1 Chr. vii. 2).

Je-ri'-jah (fr. Heb.) = JERIAH (1 Chr. xxvi. 31).

Jer'-moth (L. fr. Heb. = heights, Ges.). I. A

Benjamite chief, son or descendant of Bela (1 Chr. vii. 7); perhaps the same as—2. who joined David at Ziklag (xii. 5).—3. Son of Becher (vii. 8), and head of another Benjamite house.—4. Son of Mushi, the son of Merari (xxiv. 30); = JEREMOTH 2.—5. A Levite and musician, son of Heman (xxv. 4, 22); = JEREMOTH 3.—6. Son of Azriel; ruler of the tribe of Naphtali in the reign of David (xxvii. 19).—7. Son of King David, whose daughter Mahalath was one of the wives of Rehoboam (2 Chr. xi. 18).—8. A Levite in Hezekiah's reign; an overseer of offerings and dedicated things (xxxi. 13).

Jér-i-oth (L. fr. Heb. = curtains, Ges.), one of the elder Caleb's wives (1 Chr. ii. 18); but according to the Vulgate she was his daughter by his first wife Azubah.

Jero-bo'am (L. fr. Heb. = whose people is many).

1. The first king of the divided kingdom of Israel. (ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF.) He was the son of an Ephraimite, of the name of Nebat; his father had died whilst he was young; his mother was Zeruah (Sarira, LXX.); their abode Zereda (Sarira, LXX.). When Solomon was constructing the fortifications of MILLO, his sagacious eye discovered the strength and activity of a young Ephraimite who was employed on the works, and he raised him to the rank of superintendent over the taxes and labors exacted from the tribe of Ephraim (1 K. xi. 28). This was Jeroboam. He made the most of his position. He completed the fortifications, and was long afterward known as the man who had "enclosed the city of David" (1 K. xi. 24, LXX.). He then aspired to royal state, and at last was perceived by Solomon to be aiming at the monarchy. These ambitious designs were probably fostered by the sight of the growing disaffection of the great tribe over which he presided, as well as by the alienation of the prophetic order from the house of Solomon. He was leaving Jerusalem, and he encountered, on one of the black-paved roads which ran out of the city, Ahijah, "the prophet" of the ancient sanctuary of Shiloh. Ahijah drew him aside from the road into the field (LXX.), and, when they found themselves alone, the prophet, who was dressed in a new outer garment (so Dean Stanley, original author of this article, after the LXX.), stripped it off, and tore it into twelve shreds, ten of which he gave to Jeroboam, with the assurance that, on condition of his obedience to His laws, God would establish for him a kingdom and dynasty equal to David's (1 K. xi. 29-40). The attempts of Solomon to cut short Jeroboam's designs occasioned his flight into Egypt. There he remained during the rest of Solomon's reign. On Solomon's death, he demanded Shishak's permission to return. The Egyptian king seems, in his reluctance, to have offered any gift which Jeroboam chose, as a reason for his remaining, and the consequence was the marriage with Ano, the elder sister of the Egyptian queen, Tahpenes, and of another princess who had married the Edomite chief, Hadad (LXX.). A year elapsed, and a son, Abijah, was born. Then Jeroboam again requested permission to depart, which was granted; and he returned with his wife and child to his native place, Sarira, or Zereda, which he fortified, and which in consequence became a centre for his fellow-tribesmen (1 K. xi. 41, xii. 24, LXX.). Still there was no open act of insurrection, and it was in this period of suspense (according to the LXX.) that a pathetic incident darkened his domestic history. His infant son fell sick. The anxious father sent his wife to inquire of Ahijah concerning him. She brought such gifts as were thought likely to be acceptable, and had disguised herself to avoid recognition. But the blind prophet knew who was coming; and bade his boy go out to meet her, and invite her to his house without delay. There he warned her of the uselessness of her gifts. There was a doom on the house of Jeroboam, not to be averted. This child alone would die before the calamities of the house arrived. The mother returned. As she reentered the town of Sarira (Heb. Tirzah, 1 K. xiv. 17), the child died. This incident, if it really occurred at this time (the A. V., Keil, Kittó, Fairbairn, and most commentators, with the Hebrew, place it long afterward during Jeroboam's reign over Israel, and after his setting up the golden calves; see xiv. 1-18), seems to have been the turning-point in Jeroboam's career. It drove him from his ancestral home, and it gathered the sympathies of the tribe of Ephraim round him. He left Sarira and came to Shechem. Then, for the second time, and in a like manner, the Divine intimation of his future greatness is conveyed to him. The prophet Shemaiah, the Enlamite (?; LXX.), addressed to him the same acted parable, in the ten shreds of a new unwashed garment. Then took place the conference with Rehoboam, and the final revolt; which ended in the elevation of Jeroboam to the throne of the northern kingdom. From this moment one fatal error crept, not unnaturally, into his policy, which undermined his dynasty and tarnished his name as the first king of Israel. The political disruption of the kingdom was complete; but its religious unity was as yet unimpaired. He feared that the yearly pilgrimages to Jerusalem would undo all the work which he effected, and he took the bold step of rending it asunder. Two sanctuaries of venerable antiquity existed already, one (BETHEL 1) at the southern, the other (DAN 2) at the northern extremity of his dominions. These he elevated into seats of the national worship, which should rival the newly-established Temple at Jerusalem. But he was not satisfied without another deviation from the Mosaic idea of the national unity. His long stay in Egypt had familiarized him with the outward forms under which the Divinity was there represented. A golden figure of Mnevis, the sacred CALF of Heliopolis, was set up at each sanctuary, with the address, "Behold thy God which brought thee up out of the land of Egypt." The sanctuary at DAN, as the most remote from Jerusalem, was established first (1 K. xii. 30). The more important one, as nearer the capital and in the heart of the kingdom, was BETHEL. The worship and the sanctuary continued till the end of the northern kingdom. It was while dedicating the altar at Bethel that a prophet from Judah (see IDDO 4) suddenly appeared, who denounced the altar, and foretold its desecration by Josiah, and violent overthrow. The king stretching out his hand to arrest the prophet, felt it withered and paralyzed, and only at the prophet's prayer saw it restored, and acknowledged his divine mission. Jeroboam was at constant war with the house of Judah, but the only act distinctly recorded is a battle with Abijah, son of Rehoboam; in which he was defeated. The calamity was severely felt; he never recovered the blow, and soon after died, in the twenty-second year of his reign (2 Chr. xiii. 20), and was buried in his ancestral sepulchre (1 K. xiv. 20). The name of Jeroboam long remained under a cloud as the king who had "caused Israel to sin." On the credibility of the LXX. in distinction from the Hebrew text, see ALEXANDRIA; CANON; SEPTUAGINT.—2. Jeroboam

II., son of Joash, and fourth of the dynasty of Jehu, was the most prosperous of the kings of Israel. He repelled the Syrian invaders, took their capital city Damascus (2 K. xiv. 28; Am. i. 3-6), and recovered the whole of the ancient dominion from Hamath to the Dead Sea (2 K. xiv. 25; Am. vi. 14). Ammon and Moab were reconquered (i. 13, ii. 1-3); the Trans-jordanic tribes were restored to their territory (2 K. xiii. 5; 1 Chr. v. 17-22). But it was merely an outward restoration. Amos prophesied the destruction of Jeroboam's house by the sword, and AMAZIAH, the high-priest of Bethel, complained to the king (Am. vii. 9-17).

Je-ro'-ham (L. fr. Heb. = who finds mercy, Ges.).

1. Father of Elkanah, the father of Samuel, of the house of Kohath (1 Chr. vi. 27, 34; 1 Sam. i. 1).—2. A Benjamite, and the founder of a family (1 Chr. viii. 27; probably = 3.—3. Father (or progenitor) of Ibneiah (ix. 8; compare 3 and 9).—4. A descendant of Aaron, of the house of Immer, the leader of the sixteenth course of priests; son of Pashur and father of Adaiah (ix. 12). He appears to be mentioned again in Neh. xi. 12 (so Mr. Grove, &c.).—5. "Jeroham of Gedor," some of whose sons joined David at Ziklag (1 Chr. xii. 7).—6. A Danite, whose son or descendant Azareel was head of his tribe in David's time (xxvii. 22).—7. Father of Azariah, one of the "captains of hundreds" in the time of Athaliah (2 Chr. xxiii. 1).

Je-rub'-ba-al or Je-rub'-ba'al (fr. Heb. = with whom Baal contends, Ges.), the surname of GIDEON which he acquired in consequence of destroying the altar of Baal, when his father defended him from the vengeance of the Abi-ezrites (Judg. vi. 32).

Je-rub'-be-sheth (fr. Heb. = with whom the idol contends, Ges.), a name of GIDEON (2 Sam. xi. 21); changed from JERUBBAAL (compare Esh-baal = Ish-bosheth, Merib-baal = Mephibosheth).

Jer'-u-el (L. fr. Heb. = founded of God, Ges.), the Wild-er-ness of, the place in which Jehoshaphat was informed by Jahaziel the Levite that he should encounter the hordes of Ammon, Moab, and the Melunims (2 Chr. xx. 16); identified by Mr. H. C. Groves (in Kitto) with el-Hunaiyah, a large tract of table-land on the road between Eng-gedi and Jerusalem, adjacent to the wilderness of Tekoa.

Je-ru'-sa-lem (L. fr. Heb. Yerushálaim, or Yi'ur-sháluyim = inheritance [or possession] of peace, Re-land, Sim., Ewald; foundation of peace, Ges., Fii.; Chal. forms Yerushélem, Yerushélem; Gr. Hierousalém, Hierosoloma; L. Hierusalem, Hierosolyma, Jerusalem, Jerosolyma). The subject of Jerusalem naturally divides itself into three heads:—I. The place itself: its origin, position, and physical characteristics. II. Annals of the city. III. Topography; relative localities of its various parts; sites of the "Holy Places" ancient and modern, &c.—I. The Place itself. The arguments—if arguments they can be called—for and against the identity of the "Salem" of Melchizedek (Gen. xiv. 18) with Jerusalem—the "Salem" of Ps. lxxvi. 2—are almost equally balanced. This question will be discussed under SALEM. Jerusalem is called "the holy city" (Neh. xi. 1, 18, &c.); "th city of God" (Ps. xlvi. 4, xlviii. 1, 8, &c.), "the city of the great King" (xlviii. 2), "ARIEL" (Is. xxix. 1, 2). The name is used figuratively or symbolically (Gal. iv. 25, 26; Heb. xii. 22; Rev. iii. 12, xxi. 2, &c.; compare Ez. xlv.-xlviii.; see III. § 7 below; EZEKIEL). It is during the conquest of the country that Jerusalem first appears in definite form on the scene in which it was destined to occupy so prominent a position. The earliest notice (so Mr. Grove, the original author of part I. of this article, and of part II. down to A. D. 70) is probably that in Josh. xv. 8 and xviii. 16, 28, describing the landmarks of the boundaries of Judah and Benjamin. Here it is styled (literally) the Jebusite (A. V. "Jebusi"), after the name of its occupiers, just as is the case with other places in these lists. Next, we find the form JEBUS (Judg. xix. 10, 11)—"Jebus, which is Jerusalem . . . the city of the Jebusites;" and lastly we have Jerusalem (Josh. x. 1, &c., xii. 10; Judg. i. 7, &c.). Jerusalem stands in latitude 31° 46' 35' N., and longitude 35° 18' 30' E. of Greenwich. It is thirty-two miles distant from the Mediterranean Sea, and eighteen from the Jordan; twenty from Hebron, and thirty-six from Samaria. The western ridge of the city, which forms its highest point, is about 2,600 feet above the level of the sea. The Mount of Olives rises slightly above this—2,724 feet. The situation of the city, in reference to the rest of Palestine, has been described by Dr. Robinson in a well-known passage, which is so complete and graphic a statement, that we take the liberty of giving it here: "Jerusalem, now called by the Arabs el-Kuds (the Holy), and also by Arabian writers Beit el-Mukdis or Beit el-Mukaddas (the Sanctuary), lies near the summit of a broad mountain-ridge. This ridge or mountainous tract extends, without interruption, from the plain of Esdrælon to a line drawn between the S. end of the Dead Sea and the S. E. corner of the Mediterranean: or more properly, perhaps, it may be regarded as extending as far S. as to Jebel 'Arâif in the desert, where it sinks down at once to the level of the great western plateau. This tract, which is everywhere not less than from twenty to twenty-five geographical miles in breadth, is in fact high uneven table-land. It everywhere forms the precipitous western wall of the great valley of the Jordan and the Dead Sea; while toward the W. it sinks down by an offset into a range of lower hills, which lie between it and the great plain along the coast of the Mediterranean. The surface of this upper region is everywhere rocky, uneven, and mountainous; and is moreover cut up by deep valleys which run E. or W. on either side toward the Jordan or the Mediterranean. The line of division, or water-shed, between the waters of these valleys—a term which here applies almost exclusively to the waters of the rainy season—follows for the most part the height of land along the ridge; yet not so but that the heads of the valleys, which run off in different directions, often interlap for a considerable distance. Thus, e. g. a valley which descends to the Jordan often has its head a mile or two westward of the commencement of other valleys which run to the western sea. From the great plain of Esdrælon onward toward the S., the mountainous country rises gradually, forming the tract anciently known as the mountains of Ephraim and Judah; until in the vicinity of Hebron it attains an elevation of nearly 3,000 Paris feet above the level of the Mediterranean Sea. Further N., on a line drawn from the N. end of the Dead Sea toward the true W., the ridge has an elevation of only about 2,500 Paris feet; and here, close upon the water-shed between the Dead Sea and the Mediterranean, lies the city of Jerusalem. . . Six or seven miles N. and N. W. of the city is spread out the open plain or basin round about el-Jib (Gibeon), extending also toward el-Dirh (Beeroth); the waters of which flow off at its S. E. part through the deep valley here called by the Arabs Wady Beit Hanina; but to which the monks and travellers have usually given the name of the Valley of the Terebinth, on the mistaken supposition that it is the ancient Valley of Elah. This great valley passes along in a S. W. direction an hour or more W. of Jerusalem; and finally opens out from the mountains into the western plain, at the distance of six or eight hours S. W. from the city, under the name of Wady es-Surâr. The traveller, on his way from Ramleh to Jerusalem, descends into and crosses this deep valley at the village of Kulôniah on its W. side, an hour and a half from the latter city. On again reaching the high ground on its E. side, he enters upon an open tract sloping gradually downward toward the S. and E.; and sees before him, at the distance of a mile and a half, the walls and domes of the Holy City, and beyond them the higher ridge or summit of the Mount of Olives. The traveller now descends gradually toward the city along a broad swell of ground, having at some distance on his left the shallow northern part of the Valley of Jehoshaphat; and close at hand on his right the basin which forms the beginning of the Valley of Hinnom. Further down, both these valleys become deep, narrow, and precipitous; that of Hinnom bends S. and again E. nearly at right angles, and unites with the other; which then continues its course to the Dead Sea. Upon the broad elevated promontory within the fork of these two hours" (Rbn. Bib. Researches, i. 258-260). The heights of the principal points in and round the city, above the Mediterranean Sea, as given by Van de Velde, in the Memoir accompanying his Map, 1858, are as follows:—

	Feet.
N. W. corner of the city ( Kaṣr Jâḥūd ).....	2,610
Mount Zion ( Canaculum ).....	2,537
Mount Moriah ( Harar esh-Sherif ).....	2,429
Bridge over the Kedron, near Gethsemane.....	2,281
Pool of Siloam.....	2,114
Bir Eyûd , at the confluence of Hinnom and Kidron.....	1,996
Mount of Olives, Church of Ascension on summit.....	2,724

—Roads. There appear to have been but two main approaches to the city. 1. From the Jordan valley by Jericho and the Mount of Olives. This was the route commonly taken from the N. and E. of the country—as from Galilee by our Lord (Lk. xvii. 11, xviii. 35, xix. 1, 29, 45, &c.), from Damascus by Pompey, to Mahanaim by David (2 Sam. xv., xvi.). It was also the route from places in the central districts of the country, as Samaria (2 Chr. xxviii. 15). The latter part of the approach, over the Mount of Olives, as generally followed at the present day, is identical with what it was, at least in one memorable instance, in the time of Christ. 2. From the great maritime plain of Philistia and Sharon. This road led by the two Beth-horons up to the high ground at Gibeon, whence it turned S., and came to Jerusalem by Ramah and Gibeah, and over the ridge N. of the city. 3. The communication with the mountainous districts of the south is less distinct. The roads out of Jerusalem were paved by Solomon with black stone—probably the basalt of the Trans-jordanic districts (Jos. viii. 7, § 4).—Gates. The situation of the various gates of the city is very uncertain. It may, however, be desirable to supply here a complete list of those named in the Bible and Josephus, with references:—1. Gate of Ephraim (2 K. xiv. 13; 2 Chr. xxv. 23; Neh. viii. 16, xii. 39; EPHRAIM, GATE OF); probably the same as the—2. Gate of Benjamin (Jer. xx. 2, xxxvii. 13; Zech. xiv. 10). (BENJAMIN, GATE OF.) If so, it was 400 cubits distant from the—3. CORNER GATE (2 Chr. xxv. 23, xxvi. 9; Jer. xxxi. 38; Zech. xiv. 10). 4. Gate of Joshua, governor of the city (2 K. xxiii. 8). 5. Gate between the two walls (2 K. xxv. 4; Jer. xxxix. 4). 6. HORSE GATE (2 Chr. xxiii. 15; Neh. iii. 38; Jer. xxxi. 40). 7. Ravine Gate (A. V. "VALLEY GATE"), i. e. opening on the ravine or valley of Hinnom (2 Chr. xxvi. 9; Neh. ii. 13, 15, iii. 13). 8. FISH GATE (2 Chr. xxxiii. 14; Neh. iii. 3, xii. 39; Zeph. i. 10). 9. DUNG GATE (Neh. ii. 13, iii. 13, 14, xii. 31). 10. SHEEP GATE (iii. 1, 32, xii. 39). 11. EAST GATE (iii. 29). 12. MIPHKAD (iii. 31). 13. FOUNTAIN GATE (Siloam?) (xii. 37). 14. WATER GATE (xii. 37). 15. OLD GATE (xii. 39). 16. PRISON GATE (xii. 39). 17. Gate Harsith (perhaps the Sun; A. V. "EAST GATE") (Jer. xix. 2). 18. First Gate (Zech. xiv. 10). 19. Gate Gennath (garden) (Jos. B. J. v. 4, § 2). 20. Essenes' Gate (ib.).—To these should be added the following gates of the Temple:—Gate SUR (2 K. xi. 6); called also Gate of the foundation (2 Chr. xxiii. 5). Gate of the guard, or behind the guard (2 K. xi. 8, 19); called the High Gate (2 Chr. xxiii. 20, xxvii. 3; 2 K. xv. 35). Gate SHALLECHETH (1 Chr. xxvi. 16).—Burial-grounds.

valleys, lies the Holy City. All around are higher hills; on the E., the Mount of Olives; on the S., the Hill of Evil Counsel, so called, rising directly from the Vale of Hinnom; on the W., the ground rises gently, as above described, to the borders of the great Wady; while on the N., a bend of the ridge connected with the Mount of Olives bounds the prospect at the distance of more than a mile. Toward the S. W. the view is somewhat more open; for here lies the plain of Rephaim, commencing just at the southern brink of the Valley of Hinnom, and stretching off S. W. where it is drained to the western plain. In the N. W., too, the eye reaches up along the upper part of the Valley of Jehoshaphat; and from many points can discern the mosque of Nebu Samuil, situated on a lofty ridge beyond the great Wady, at the distance of two

The main cemetery of the city seems from an early date to have been where it is still—on the steep slopes of the valley of the Kidron. (See the cuts under JEROSHAPHAT, VALLEY OF, and TOMB.) The tombs of the kings were in the city of David, i. e. Mount Zion. The royal sepulchres were probably chambers containing separate recesses for the successive kings. Other spots also were used for burial.—Wood; Gardens. The king's gardens of David and Solomon seem to have been in the bottom formed by the confluence of the Kidron and Hinnom (Neh. iii. 15). The Mount of OLIVES, as its name and those of various places upon it seem to imply, was a fruitful spot. At its foot was situated the Garden of GETHSEMANE. At the time of the final siege the space N. of the wall of Agrippa was covered with gardens, groves, and plantations of fruit-trees, enclosed by hedges and walls; and to level these was one of Titus's first operations. We know that the gate Gennath (i. e. of gardens) opened on this side of the city.—Water. How the gardens just mentioned on the N. of the city were watered it is difficult to understand, since at present no water exists in that direction. At the time of the siege there was a reservoir in that neighborhood called the Serpent's Pool; but it has not been discovered in modern times. (See part III. of this article; also BETHESDA; CONDUIT; DRAGON WELL; EN-ROGEL; GIHON; KIDRON; POOL; SILOAM, &c.)—Streets, Houses, &c. Of the nature of these in the ancient city we have only the most scattered notices. The "East street" (2 Chr. xxix. 4); the "street of the city"—i. e. the city of David (xxxii. 6); the "street facing the water gate" (Neh. viii. 1, 3)—or, according to the parallel account in 1 Esd. ix. 38, the "broad place of the Temple toward the E.;" the street of the house of God (Ezr. x. 9); the "street of the gate of Ephraim" (Neh. viii. 16); and the "open place of the first gate toward the E." must have been not "streets" in our sense of the word, so much as the open spaces found in Eastern towns round the inside of the gates. Streets, properly so called, there were (Jer. v. 1, xi. 13, &c.); but the name of only one, "the bakers' street" (xxxvii. 21), is preserved to us. To the houses we have even less clew; but there is no reason to suppose that in either houses or streets the ancient Jerusalem differed very materially from the modern. No doubt the ancient city did not exhibit that air of mouldering dilapidation which is now so prominent there. The whole of the slopes S. of the Haram area (the ancient Ophel), and the modern Zion, and the W. side of the valley of Jerushaphat, present the appearance of gigantic mounds of rubbish. In this point at least the ancient city stood in favorable contrast with the modern, but in many others the resemblance must have been strong.—Subterranean Quarries. Dr. Barclay discovered near the Damascus gate the entrance to vast excavations under the ridge which extends from the N. W. corner of the Temple area to the N. wall of the city. One of these is more than 3,000 feet in circumference, with a roof about thirty feet high, supported by rude pillars of the original rock, apparently left by the quarriers for this purpose. Thomson (ii. 492) says "the whole city might be stowed away in them," and supposes that "a great part of the very white stone of the Temple must have been taken from these quarries."

—Enviions of the City. The various spots in the neighborhood of the city are described at length under their own names. (ACELDAMA; EN-ROGEL; GETHSEMANE; HINNOM, VALLEY OF; KIDRON; OLIVES, MOUNT OF; SILOAM, &c.)—II. The Annals of the City. In considering the annals of Jerusalem, nothing strikes one so forcibly as the number and severity of the sieges which it underwent. We catch our earliest glimpse of it in the brief notice of Judg. i., which describes how the "children of Judah smote it with the edge of the sword, and set the city on fire;" and almost the latest mention of it in the N. T. is contained in the solemn warnings in which Christ foretold how Jerusalem should be "compassed with armies" (Lk. xxi. 20), and the abomination of desolation be seen standing in the Holy Place (Mat. xxiv. 15). In the fifteen centuries which elapsed between those two points the city was besieged no fewer than seventeen times; twice it was razed to the ground; and on two other occasions its walls were levelled. In this respect it stands without a parallel in any city ancient or modern. The fact is one of great significance. The first siege appears to have taken place almost immediately after the death of Joshua (about 1400 B. C.). Judah and Simeon "fought against it and took it, and smote it with the edge of the sword, and set the city on fire" (Judg. i. 8). To this brief notice Josephus makes a material addition. He tells us that the part which was taken at last, and in which the slaughter was made, was the lower city; but that the upper city was so strong, that they relinquished the attempt and moved off to Hebron. As long as the upper city remained in the hands of the Jebusites they practically had possession of the whole, and a Jebusite city in fact it remained for a long period after this. The Benjamites followed the men of Judah to Jerusalem, but with no better result (i. 21). And this lasted during the whole period of the Judges, the reign of Saul, and the reign of David at Hebron. DAVID advanced to the siege at the head of the men-of-war of all the tribes who had come to Hebron "to turn the kingdom of Saul to him." They are stated as 280,000 men, choice warriors of the flower of Israel (1 Chr. xii. 23-39). No doubt they approached the city from the S. As before, the lower city was immediately taken, and as before, the citadel held out. The undaunted Jebusites, believing in the impregnability of their fortress, manned the battlements "with lame and blind." David's anger was roused by the insult, and he proclaimed to his host that the first who would scale the rocky side of the fortress and kill a Jebusite should be made chief captain of the host. A crowd of warriors (Josephus) rushed forward to the attempt, but Joab's superior agility gained him the day, and the citadel, the fastness of Zion, was taken (about 1046 B. C.). David at once proceeded to secure himself in his new acquisition.

He enclosed the whole of the city with a wall, and connected it with the citadel. The sensation caused by the fall of this impregnable fortress must have been enormous. It reached even to the distant Tyre, and before long an embassy arrived from Hiram, the king of Phœnicia, with the characteristic offerings of artificers and materials to erect a palace for David in his new abode. The palace was built, and occupied by the fresh establishment of wives and concubines which David had acquired. The arrival of the Ark was an event of great importance. It was deposited with the most impressive ceremonies, and Zion became at once the great sanctuary of the nation. In the fortress of Zion, too, was the sepulchre of David. The only works of ornament which we can ascribe to him are the

"royal gardens," which appear to have been formed by him in the level space S. E. of the city, formed by the confluence of the valleys of Kidron and Hinnom. Until the time of Solomon we hear of no additions to the city. His three great works were the Temple, with its E. wall and cloister, his own Palace, and the Wall of Jerusalem. One of the first acts of the new king was to make the walls larger. But on the completion of the Temple he again turned his attention to the walls, and both increased their height and constructed very large towers along them. Another work of his in Jerusalem was the repair or fortification of MILLO (1 K. ix. 15, 24). His care of the roads leading to the city is the subject of a special panegyric from Josephus. REHOBAM (ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF; JUDAH, KINGDOM OF) had only been on the throne four years (about 970 B. C.) when Shishak, king of Egypt, invaded Judah with an enormous host, took the fortified places and advanced to the capital. Rehoboam did not attempt resistance (2 Chr. xii. 9). Jerusalem was again threatened in the reign of ASA, when Zerah the Cushite (A. V. "Ethiopian") invaded the country with an enormous horde of followers (xiv. 9). He came by the road through the low country of Philistia, where his chariots could find level ground. But Asa was more faithful and more valiant than Rehoboam had been. He did not remain to be blockaded in Jerusalem, but went forth and met the enemy at Mareshah, and repulsed him with great slaughter. The reign of his son JEHOASHAPHAT, though of great prosperity and splendor, is not remarkable as regards the city of Jerusalem. We hear of a "new court" to the Temple, but have no clew to its situation or its builder (2 Chr. xx. 5). Jehoshaphat's son JEHOHAM 2 was a prince of a different temper. He began his reign by a massacre of his brethren and of the chief men of the kingdom. The Philistines and Arabians attacked Jerusalem, broke into the palace, spoiled it of all its treasures, sacked the royal harem, killed or carried off the king's wives, and all his sons but one. This was the fourth siege. The next events in Jerusalem were the massacre of the royal children by Joram's widow ATHALIAH, and the six years' reign of that queen. But with the increasing years of JOASH 1, the spirit of the adherents of Jehovah returned. The king was crowned and proclaimed in the Temple by Jehoiada. Athaliah herself was hurried out to execution from the sacred precincts into the valley of the Kidron. But this zeal for Jehovah soon expired. The burial of the good priest in the royal tombs can hardly have been forgotten before a general relapse into idolatry took place, and his son Zechariah was stoned with his family in the very court of the Temple for protesting. The retribution invoked by the dying martyr quickly followed. Before the end of the year, Hazael, king of Syria, after possessing himself of Gath, marched against the much richer prize of Jerusalem. The visit was averted by a timely offering of treasure from the Temple and the royal palace (2 K. xii. 18; 2 Chr. xxiv. 28). The predicted danger to the city was, however, only postponed. After the defeat of AMAZIAH by JOASH 2, the gates were thrown open, the treasures of the Temple and the king's private treasures were pillaged, and for the first time the walls of the city were injured. A clear breach was made in them of 400 cubits in length "from the gate of Ephraim to the corner gate," and through this Joash drove in triumph, with his captive in the chariot, into the city. This must have been on the N. side, and probably at the present N. W. corner of the walls. The long reign of Uzziah (2 K. xv. 1-7; 2 Chr. xxvi.) brought about a material improvement in the fortunes of Jerusalem. The walls were thoroughly repaired and furnished for the first time with machines, then expressly invented for shooting stones and arrows against besiegers. Later in this reign happened the great earthquake described by Josephus (ix. 10, § 4), and alluded to by the prophets as a kind of era (see Stl. S. & P. 164, 125). A serious breach was made in the Temple itself, and below the city a large fragment was detached from the hill at En-rogel, and rolling down the slope, overwhelmed the king's gardens at the junction of the valleys of Hinnom and Kidron, and rested against the bottom of the slope of Olivet. JOTHAM inherited his father's sagacity, as well as his tastes for architecture and warfare. His works in Jerusalem were building the upper gateway to the Temple—apparently a gate communicating with the palace (2 Chr. xxiii. 20)—and porticoes leading to the same. He also built much on Ophel (2 K. xv. 35; 2 Chr. xxvii. 3), repaired the walls wherever they were dilapidated, and strengthened them by very large and strong towers. Before the death of Jotham the clouds of the Syrian invasion began to gather. They broke on the head of AHAZ his successor; Rezin, king of Syria, and Pekah, king of Israel, joined their armies and invested Jerusalem (2 K. xvi. 5). The fortifications of the two previous kings enabled the city to hold out during a siege of great length. In the fight which followed the men of Judah lost severely, but there is no mention of the city having been plundered. To oppose the confederacy which had so injured him, Ahaz had recourse to Assyria. To collect presents he went so far as to lay hands on part of the permanent works of the Temple (xvi. 17, 18). Whether the application to Assyria relieved Ahaz from one or both of his enemies, is not clear. From one passage it would seem that Tiglath-pileser actually came to Jerusalem (2 Chr. xxviii. 20). At any rate the intercourse resulted in fresh idolatries, and fresh insults in the Temple. The very first act of HEZEKIAH was to restore what his father had desecrated (2 Chr. xxix. 3; and see 36, "suddenly"). High places, altars, the mysterious and obscene symbols of BAAL and ASHERAH, the venerable brazen serpent of Moses itself, were torn down, broken to pieces, and the fragments cast into the valley of the Kidron (xxx. 14; 2 K. xviii. 4). It was probably at this time that the decorations of the Temple were renewed. And now approached the greatest crisis which had yet occurred in the history of the city: the dreaded Assyrian army was to appear under its walls. Hezekiah prepared for the siege. The springs round Jerusalem were stopped—i. e. their outflow was prevented, and the water diverted underground to the interior of the city (xx. 20; 2 Chr. xxxii. 4). This done, he carefully repaired the walls of the city, furnished them with additional towers, and built a second wall (xxxii. 5; Is. xxii. 10). He strengthened the fortifications of the citadel (2 Chr. xxxii. 5, "Millo;" Is. xxii. 9), and prepared abundance of ammunition. (SEKNACHERIB.) At the time of Titus's siege the name of "the Assyrian Camp" was still attached to a spot N. of the city in remembrance either of this or the subsequent visit of Nebuchadnezzar. The reign of MANASSEH must have been an eventful one in the annals of Jerusalem, though only meagre indications of its events are to be found in the documents. He built a fresh wall to the citadel, "from the W. side of Gihon in the valley to the fish-gate," i. e. apparently along the E. side of the central valley, which parts the upper and lower cities from S. to N. He also continued the works which had been begun by Jotham at Ophel, and raised that fortress or structure to a great height. The reign of JOSIAH was marked by a more strenuous zeal for Jehovah than even that of Hezekiah had been. He began his reign at eight years of age, and by his twentieth year (twelfth of his reign—2 Chr. xxxiv. 8) commenced a thorough removal of the idolatrous abuses of Manasseh and Amon, and even some of Ahaz, which must have escaped the purgations of Hezekiah (2 K. xlii. 12). His rash opposition to Pharaoh-necho cost him his life, his son his throne, and Jerusalem much suffering. Before JEHOIAH had been reigning three months, the Egyptian king found opportunity to send to Jerusalem, from Riblah, where he was then encamped, a force sufficient to depose and take him prisoner, to put his brother Eliakim (JEHOIAKIM) on the throne, and to exact a heavy fine from the city and country, which was paid in advance by the new king, and afterward extorted by taxation (xxiii. 33, 35). The fall of the city was now rapidly approaching. During the reign of Jehoiakim Jerusalem was visited by NEBUCHADNEZZAR with the Babylonian army lately victorious over the Egyptians at Carchemish. The visit was possibly repeated once, or even twice. A siege there must have been; but of this we have no account. Jehoiakim was succeeded by his son JEHOIACHIN. Hardly had his short reign begun before the terrible army of Babylon reappeared before the city, again commanded by Nebuchadnezzar (xxiv. 10, 11). Jehoiachin surrendered in the third month of his reign. The treasures of the palace and Temple were pillaged, certain golden articles of Solomon's original establishment, which had escaped the plunder and desecrations of the previous reigns, were cut up (xxiv. 13), and the more desirable objects out of the Temple carried off (Jer. xxvii. 19). The uncle of Jehoiachin was made king in his stead, by the name of ZEDEKIAH (2 Chr. xxxvi. 13; Ez. xvii. 13, 14, 18). He applied to Pharaoh-hophra for assistance (xvii. 15). Upon this Nebuchadnezzar marched in person to Jerusalem, and at once began a regular siege, at the same time wasting the country far and near (Jer. xxxiv. 7). The siege was conducted by erecting forts on lofty mounds round the city, from which, on the usual Assyrian plan, missiles were discharged into the town, and the walls and houses in them battered by rams (xxxii. 24, xxxiii. 4, lii. 4; Ez. xxi. 22). The city was also surrounded with troops (Jer. lii. 7). The siege was once abandoned, owing to the approach of the Egyptian army (xxvii. 5, 11). But the relief was only temporary, and in the eleventh of Zedekiah (B. C. 586; so Mr. Wright and Winer; but see CHRONOLOGY; ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF), on the ninth day of the fourth month (lii. 6), being just a year and a half from the first investment, the city was taken. It was at midnight. The whole city was wrapped in the pitchy darkness characteristic of an Eastern town, and nothing was known by the Jews of what had happened till the generals of the army entered the Temple (Josephus) and took their seats in the middle court (Jer. xxxix. 8; Jos. x. 8, § 2). Then the alarm was given to Zedekiah, and collecting his remaining warriors, he stole out of the city by a gate at the S. side, "betwixt the two walls," somewhere near the present Bab el-Mugharibet (DUNG-GATE), crossed the Kidron above the royal gardens, and made his way over the Mount of Olives to the Jordan valley. At break of day information of the flight was brought to the Chaldeans by some deserters. A rapid pursuit was made: Zedekiah was overtaken near Jericho, his people were dispersed, and he himself captured and reserved for a miserable fate at Riblah. Meantime the wretched inhabitants suffered all the horrors of assault and sack; the men were slaughtered, old and young, prince and peasant; the women violated in Mount Zion itself (Lam. ii. 4, v. 11, 12). (WAR.) On the seventh day of the following month (2 K. xxv. 8), Nebuzaradan, commander of the king's bodyguard, who seems to have been charged with Nebuchadnezzar's instructions as to what should be done with the city, arrived. Two days were passed, probably in collecting the captives and booty; and on the tenth (Jer. lii. 12) the Temple, the royal palace, and all the more important buildings of the city, were set on fire, and the walls thrown down and left as heaps of disordered rubbish on the ground (Neh. iv. 2). The previous deportations, and the sufferings endured in the siege, must to a great extent have drained the place of its able-bodied people, and thus the captives, on this occasion, were but few and unimportant. The land was practically deserted of all but the very poorest class. Five years afterward—the twenty-third of Nebuchadnezzar's reign—the insatiable Nebuzaradan, on his way to Egypt, again visited the ruins, and swept off 745 more of the wretched peasants (Jer. lii. 30). Thus Jerusalem at last had fallen, and the Temple, set up under such fair auspices, was a heap of blackened ruins. The spot, however, was none the less sacred because the edifice was destroyed. It was still the centre of hope to the people in CAPTIVITY, and the time soon arrived for their return to it. The decree of CYRUS authorizing the rebuilding of the "house of Jehovah, God of Israel, which is in Jerusalem," was issued B. C. 536. In consequence thereof, a very large caravan of Jews arrived in the country. (ZERUBABEL.) A short time was occupied in settling in their former cities, but on the first day of the seventh month (Ezr. iii. 6) a general assembly was called together at Jerusalem in "the open place of the first gate toward the East" (1 Esd. v. 47); the altar was set up, and the daily morning and evening sacrifices commenced. Arrangements were made for stone and timber for the fabric, and in the second year after their return (B. C. 534), on the first day of the second month (Ezr. iii. 8; 1 Esd. v. 57), the foundation of the Temple was laid. But the work was destined to suffer material interruptions. The chiefs of the people by whom Samaria had been colonized, annoyed and hindered them in every possible way; but ultimately the Temple was finished and dedicated in the sixth year of Darius (B. C. 516), on the third (or twenty-third, 1 Esd. vii. 5) of Adar—the last month, and on the fourteenth day of the new year the first Passover was celebrated. All this time the walls of the city remained as the Assyrians had left them (Neh. ii. 12, &c.). A period of fifty-eight years now passed, of which no accounts are preserved to us; but at the end of that time, in B. C. 457, EZRA arrived from Babylon with a caravan of priests, Levites, Nethinims, and lay people. He left Babylon on the first day of the year, and reached Jerusalem on the first of the fifth month (Ezr. vii. 9, viii. 32). We now pass another period of eleven years until the arrival of NEHEMIAH, about B. C. 445. After three days he collected the chief people and proposed the immediate rebuilding of the walls. One spirit seized them, and notwithstanding the taunts and threats of Sanballat, the ruler of the Samaritans, and Tobiah the Ammonite, in consequence of which one-half of the people had to remain armed while the other half built, the work was completed in fifty-two days, on the twenty-fifth of Elul. Nehemiah remained in the city for twelve years (Neh. v. 14, xiii. 6), during which time he held the office and maintained the state of governor of the province (v. 14) from his own private resources (v. 15). The foreign tendencies of the high-priest Eliashib and his family had already given Nehemiah some concern (xiii. 4, 28). Eliashib's son Joiada, who succeeded him in the high-priesthood, had two sons, the one Jonathan (xii. 11) or Johanan (xii. 22), the other Joshua (Jos.). The two quarrelled, and Joshua was killed by Johanan in the Temple (B. C. about 386). Johanan in his turn had two sons, Jaddua (Neh. xii. 11, 22), and Manasseh (Jos. xi. 7, § 2). Manasseh (so Josephus; but compare Neh. xiii. 28) married the daughter of Sanballat the Horonite, and eventually became the first priest of the Samaritan temple of GERIZIM. During the high-priesthood of Jaddua occurred the famous visit of ALEXANDER THE GREAT to Jerusalem. The result to the Jews of the visit was an exemption from tribute in the Sabbatical year: a privilege which they long retained. We hear nothing more of Jerusalem until it was taken by PTOLEMY SOTER, about B. C. 320, during his incursion into Syria. A stormy period succeeded—that of the struggles between Antigonus and Ptolemy for the possession of Syria, which lasted until the defeat of the former at Ipsus (B. C. 301), after which the country came into the possession of Ptolemy. SIMON the Just, who followed his father Onias in the high-priesthood (about B. C. 300), is one of the favorite heroes of the Jews. (SYNAGOGUE, THE GREAT.) Under his care the sanctuary was repaired, and some foundations of great depth added round the Temple, possibly to gain a larger surface on the top of the hill (Ecclus. i. 1, 2). The large cistern or "sea" of the principal court of the Temple, which hitherto would seem to have been but temporarily or roughly constructed, was sheathed in brass (ver. 3); the walls of the city were more strongly fortified to guard against such attacks as those of Ptolemy (ver. 4); and the Temple-service was maintained with great pomp and ceremonial (ver. 11–21). His death was marked by evil omens of various kinds presaging disasters. The intercourse with Greeks was fast eradicating the national character, but it was at any rate a peaceful intercourse during the reigns of the Ptolemies who succeeded Soter, viz. Philadelphus (B. C. 285), and Euergetes (B. C. 247). A description of Jerusalem at this period under the name of Aristæus still survives, which supplies a lively picture of both Temple and city. The Temple was "enclosed with three walls seventy cubits high, and of proportionate thickness. . . . The spacious courts were paved with marble, and beneath them lay immense reservoirs of water, which by mechanical contrivance was made to rush forth, and thus wash away the blood of the sacrifices." The city occupied the summit and the eastern slopes of the opposite hill—the modern Zion. The main streets appear to have run N. and S.; some "along the brow . . . others lower down but parallel, following the course of the valley, with cross streets connecting them." They were "furnished with raised pavements," either due to the slope of the ground, or possibly adopted for the reason given by Aristæus, viz. to enable the passengers to avoid contact with persons or things ceremonially unclean. The bazaars were then, as now, a prominent feature of the city. During the struggle between PTOLEMY PHILOPATOR and ANTIOCHUS THE GREAT, Jerusalem became alternately a prey to each of the contending parties. B. C. 203 it was taken by Antiochus. B. C. 199 it was retaken by Scopas the Alexandrian general, who left a garrison in the citadel. In the following year Antiochus again beat the Egyptians, and then the Jews, who had suffered most from the latter, gladly opened their gates to his army, and assisted them in reducing the Egyptian garrison. In the reign of Seleucus Soter Jerusalem was in much apparent prosperity. But the city soon began to be much disturbed by the disputes between Hyrcanus, the illegitimate son of Joseph the collector, and his elder and legitimate brothers. B. C. 175 Seleucus Soter died, and the kingdom of Syria came to his brother, the infamous ANTIOCHUS EPIPHANES. His first act toward Jerusalem was to sell the office of HIGH-PRIEST—still filled by the good ONIAS III.—to Onias's brother Joshua, who changed his name to JASON (2 Mc. iv. 7). B. C. 172 Jerusalem was visited by Antiochus. He entered the city at night by torch-light and amid the acclamations of Jason and his party, and after a short stay returned (iv. 22). During the absence of Antiochus in Egypt, JASON, who had been driven out by Menelaus, suddenly appeared before Jerusalem with a thousand men, drove Menelaus into the citadel, and slaughtered the citizens without mercy. The news of these tumults reaching Antiochus on his way from Egypt brought him again to Jerusalem (B. C. 170). He appears to have entered the city without much difficulty. An indiscriminate massacre of the adherents of Ptolemy followed, and then a general pillage of the contents of the Temple. The total extermination of the Jews was resolved on, and in two years (B. C. 168) an army was sent under Apollonius to carry the resolve into effect. Another great slaughter took place on the Sabbath, the city was now in its turn pillaged and burnt, and the walls destroyed. Antiochus next issued an edict to compel heathen worship in all his dominions. The Temple was reconsecrated to Zeus (A. V. "JUPITER") Olympius (vi. 2). And while the Jews were compelled not only to tolerate but to take an active part in these foreign abominations, the observance of their own rites and ceremonies—sacrifice, the Sabbath, circumcision—was absolutely forbidden. The battles of the MACCABEES were fought on the outskirts of the country, and it was not till the defeat of Lysias at Beth-zur that they thought it safe to venture into the recesses of the central hills. Then they immediately turned their steps to Jerusalem. The precincts of the Temple were at once cleansed, the polluted altar put aside, a new one constructed, and the holy vessels of the sanctuary replaced, and on the third anniversary of the desecration—the twenty-fifth of the month Chisleu, B. C. 165, the Temple was dedicated with a feast which lasted for eight days. After this the outer wall of the Temple was very much strengthened (1 Mc. iv. 60), and it was in fact converted into a fortress (compare vi. 26, 61, 62), and occupied by a garrison (iv. 61). The Acra was still held by the soldiers of Antiochus. Two years later (B. C. 163) Judas collected his people to take it, and began a siege with banks and engines. In the mean time Antiochus had died (B. C. 164), and was succeeded by his son ANTIOCHUS EUPATOR, a youth. The garrison in the Acra, finding themselves pressed by Judas, managed to communicate with the king, who brought an army from Antioch and attacked Beth-zur, one of the key-positions of the Maccabees. This obliged Judas to give up the siege of the Acra, and to march southward against the intruder (vi. 32). Antiochus's army proved too much for his little force, his brother Eleazar was killed, and he was compelled to fall back on Jerusalem and shut himself up in the Temple. Thither LYSIAS, Antiochus's general—and later, Antiochus himself—followed him (vi. 48, 51, 57, 62), and commenced an active siege. The death of Judas took place B. C. 161. After it BACCHIDES and ALCIMUS again established themselves at Jerusalem in the Acra (Jos. xiii. 1, § 3), and in the intervals of their contests with Jonathan and Simon, added much to its fortifications. In the second month (May) B. C. 160, the high-priest Alcimus began to make some alterations in the Temple, apparently doing away with the enclosure between one court and another, and in particular demolishing some wall or building to which peculiar sanctity was attached as "the work of the prophets" (1 Mc. ix. 64). Bacchides returned to Antioch, and Jerusalem remained without molestation for seven years. All this time the Acra was held by the Macedonian garrison (Jos. xiii. 4, § 9) and the malcontent Jews, who still held the hostages taken from the other part of the community (1 Mc. x. 6). B. C. 153 Jonathan was made high-priest. B. C. 145 he began to invest the Acra (xi. 20; Jos. xiii. 4, § 9), but, owing partly to the strength of the place, and partly to the constant dissensions abroad, the siege made little progress during fully two years. In the mean time Jonathan was killed at Ptolemais, and Simon succeeded him both as chief and as high-priest (1 Mc. xiii. 8, 42). The investment of the Acra proved successful, but three years still elapsed before this enormously strong place could be reduced, and at last the garrison capitulated only from famine (xiii. 49; compare 21). Simon entered it on the twenty-third of the second month B. C. 142. The fortress was then entirely demolished, and the eminence on which it had stood lowered, until it was reduced below the height of the Temple hill beside it. The valley N. of Moriah was probably filled up at this time. A fort was then built on the N., side of the Temple hill, apparently against the wall, so as directly to command the site of the Acra, and here Simon and his immediate followers resided (xiii. 52). One of the first steps of his son John Hyrcanus was to secure both the city and the Temple. Shortly after this, ANTIOCHUS SPERES, king of Syria, attacked Jerusalem. To invest the city, and cut off all chance of escape, it was encircled by a girdle of seven camps. The active operations of the siege were carried on as usual at the N., where the level ground comes up to the walls. The siege was ultimately relinquished. Antiochus wished to place a garrison in the city, but this the late experience of the Jews forbade, and hostages and a payment were substituted. After Antiochus's departure, Hyrcanus carefully repaired the damage done to the walls (5 Mc. xxi. 18). During the rest of his long and successful reign John Hyrcanus resided at Jerusalem, ably administering the government from thence, and regularly fulfilling the duties of the high-priest (xxiii. 3). He was succeeded (B. C. 107) by his son

Aristobulus. Like his predecessors he was HIGH-PRIEST; but unlike them he assumed the title as well as the power of a king (xxvii. 1). His brother Alexander Jannæus (B. C. 105), who succeeded him, was mainly engaged in wars at a distance from Jerusalem. About B. C. 95 the animosities of the PHARISEES and SADDUCEES came to an alarming explosion. Alexander's severities made him extremely unpopular with both parties, and led to their inviting the aid of Demetrius Eucærus, king of Syria, against him. The actions between them were fought at a distance from Jerusalem; but the city did not escape a share in the horrors of war; for when, after some fluctuations, Alexander returned successful, he crucified publicly 800 of his opponents, and had their wives and children butchered before their eyes, while he and his concubines feasted in sight of the whole scene (Jos. xiii. 14, § 2). Such an iron sway as this was enough to crush all opposition, and Alexander reigned till B. C. 79 without further disturbances. The "monument of King Alexander" was doubtless his tomb. In spite of opposition, the Pharisees were now by far the most powerful party in Jerusalem, and Alexander had therefore before his death instructed his queen, Alexandra—whom he left to succeed him with two sons—to commit herself to them. The elder of the two sons, Hyrcanus, was made high-priest, and Aristobulus had the command of the army. The queen lived till B. C. 70. On her death, Hyrcanus attempted to take the crown, but was opposed by his brother, to whom in three months he yielded its possession, Aristobulus becoming king B. C. 69. The brothers soon quarrelled again, when Hyrcanus called to his assistance Aretas, king of Damascus. Before this new enemy Aristobulus fled to Jerusalem, and took refuge within the fortifications of the Temple. The siege is interrupted and eventually raised by the interference of Scaurus, one of Pompey's lieutenants, to whom Aristobulus paid 400 talents for the relief. This was B. C. 65. Pompey advanced from Damascus by way of Jericho. As he approached Jerusalem, Aristobulus, who found the city too much divided for effectual resistance, met him and offered a large sum of money and surrender. Pompey sent forward Gabinius to take possession of the place; but the bolder party among the adherents of Aristobulus had meantime gained the ascendancy, and he found the gates closed. Pompey on this threw the king into chains, and advanced on Jerusalem. Hyrcanus was in possession of the city, and received the invader with open arms. The Temple, on the other hand, was held by the party of Aristobulus, which included the priests. Pompey appears to have stationed some part of his force on the high ground W. of the city, but he himself commanded in person at the N. The first efforts of his soldiers were devoted to filling up the ditch and the valley, and to constructing the banks on which to place the military engines, for which purpose they cut down all the timber in the environs. Pompey remarked that on the seventh day the Jews regularly desisted from fighting, and this afforded the Romans a great advantage, for it gave them the opportunity of moving the engines and towers nearer the walls. At the end of three months the besiegers had approached so close to the wall that the battering-rams could be worked, and a breach was effected in the largest of the towers, through which the Romans entered, and, after an obstinate resistance and loss of life, remained masters of the Temple. Hyrcanus was continued in his high-priesthood, but without the title of king; a tribute was laid upon the city, and the walls were entirely demolished. The Temple was taken in B. C. 63, in the third month (Sivan), on the day of a great feast; probably that for Jeroboam, which was held on the twenty-third of that month. During the next few years nothing occurred to affect Jerusalem. B. C. 56 it was made the seat of one of the five senates or Sanhedrim. B. C. 54 the rapacious Crassus plundered the city not only of the money which Pompey had spared, but of a considerable treasure accumulated from the contributions of Jews throughout the world, in all a sum of 10,000 talents, or about 2,000,000 sterling. (WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.) During this time Hyrcanus remained at Jerusalem, acting under the advice of Antipater the Idumean, his chief minister. B. C. 47 is memorable for the first appearance of Antipater's son HEROD in Jerusalem. Antigonus, the younger and only surviving son of Aristobulus, suddenly appeared in the country supported by a Parthian army. So sudden was his approach, that he got into the city and reached the palace in the upper market-place—the modern Zion—without resistance. Here, however, he was met by Hyrcanus and Phasaelus with a strong party of soldiers, and driven into the Temple. Pacorus, the Parthian general, was lying outside the walls, and at the earnest request of Antigonus, he and 500 horse were admitted, ostensibly to mediate. The result was, that Phasaelus and Hyrcanus were outwitted, and Herod overpowered; the Parthians got possession of the place, and Antigonus was made king. Thus did Jerusalem (B. C. 40) find itself in the hands of the Parthians. In three months Herod returned from Rome king of Judea, and in the beginning of 39 appeared before Jerusalem with a force of Romans, commanded by Silo, and pitched his camp on the W. side of the city. Other occurrences, however, called him away from the siege at this time. B. C. 37 Herod appeared again. He came, as Pompey had done, from Jericho, and, like Pompey, he pitched his camp and made his attack on the N. side of the Temple. For a short time after the commencement of the operations Herod absented himself for his marriage at Samaria with Mariamne. On his return he was joined by Sosius, the Roman governor of Syria, with a force of from 50,000 to 60,000 men, and the siege was then resumed in earnest. The first of the two walls was taken in forty days, and the second in fifteen more. The siege is said to have occupied in all five months. Herod's first care was to put down the Asmonean party. The appointment of the high-priest was the next consideration. Herod therefore bestowed the office (B. C. 36) on one Ananel, a former adherent of his, and a Babylonian Jew. Ananel was soon displaced through the machinations of Alexandra, mother of Herod's wife Mariamne, who prevailed on him to appoint her son Aristobulus, a youth of sixteen. But he was soon afterward murdered at Jericho, and then Ananel resumed the office. The intrigues and tragedies of the next thirty years are too complicated and too long to be treated of here. In 34 B. C. the city was visited by Cleopatra. In the spring of 31, the year of the battle of Actium (AUGUSTUS), Judea was visited by an earthquake, the effects of which appear to have been tremendous. The panic at Jerusalem was very severe. The following year was distinguished by the death of Hyrcanus, who, though more than eighty years old, was killed by Herod, to remove the last remnant of the Asmonean race. Herod now began to encourage foreign practices and usages. Amongst his acts of this description was the building of a theatre at Jerusalem. Of its situation no information is given, nor have any traces yet been discovered. The zealous Jews took fire at these innovations, and Herod only narrowly escaped assassination. At this time he occupied the old palace of the Asmoneans. He had now also completed the improvements of the Antonia, the fortress built by John Hyrcanus on the foundations of Simon Maccabeus. A description of this celebrated fortress will be given in treating of the TEMPLE. The year 25—the next after the attempt on Herod's life in the theatre—was one of great misfortunes. In this year or the next Herod took another wife, the daughter of an obscure priest of Jerusalem named Simon. It was probably on the occasion of this marriage that he built a new and extensive palace immediately adjoining the old wall, at the N. W. corner of the upper city, about the spot now occupied by the Latin convent. But all Herod's works in Jerusalem were eclipsed by the rebuilding of the TEMPLE in more than its former extent and magnificence. He announced his intention B. C. 19, probably when the people were collected in Jerusalem at the Passover. The completion of the sanctuary itself on the anniversary of Herod's inauguration, B. C. 16, was celebrated by lavish sacrifices and a great feast. About B. C. 8—eight years from the commencement—the court and cloisters of the Temple were finished. At this time equally magnificent works were being carried on in another part of the city, viz. in the old wall at the N. W. corner. In or about B. C. 7 Herod had fixed a large golden eagle, the symbol of the Roman empire (Judea was now a province), over the entrance to the sanctuary. This had excited the indignation of the Jews, and especially of two of the chief rabbis, who instigated their disciples to tear it down. Being taken before Herod, the rabbis defended their conduct and were burnt alive. The high-priest Matthias was deposed, and Joazar took his place. This was the state of things in Jerusalem when Herod died. The government of Judea, and therefore of Jerusalem, had by the will of Herod been bequeathed to ARCHELAUS. During Archelaus' absence at Rome, Jerusalem was in charge of Sabinus, the Roman procurator of the province, and tumults were renewed with worse results. In the year 3 B. C. Archelaus returned from Rome ethnarch of the southern province. He immediately displaced Joazar, whom his father had made high-priest after the affair of the eagle, and put Joazar's brother Eleazar in his stead. Judea was now reduced to an ordinary Roman province; the procurator of which resided, not at Jerusalem, but at CESAREA on the coast. The first appointed was Coponius, who accompanied Quirinus (CYRENIUS) to the country immediately on the disgrace of Archelaus. Two incidents at once most opposite in their character, and in their significance to that age and to ourselves, occurred during the procuratorship of Coponius: First, in A. D. 8, the finding of Christ in the Temple; the second, the pollution of the Temple by some Samaritans, who secretly brought human bones and strewed them about the cloisters during the night of the Passover. In or about A. D. 10, Coponius was succeeded by Marcus Ambivius, and he by Annus Rufus. A. D. 14 AUGUSTUS died, and with TIBERIUS came a new procurator—Valerius Gratus, who held office till A. D. 26, when he was replaced by PONTIUS PILATE.—A. D. 29. At the Passover of this year our Lord JESUS CHRIST made His first recorded visit to the city since His boyhood (Jn. ii. 13).—A. D. 33. At the Passover of this year occurred His crucifixion and resurrection. In A. D. 37, Pilate having been recalled to Rome, Jerusalem was visited by Vitellius, the prefect of Syria, at the time of the Passover. In the following year STEPHEN was stoned. The Christians were greatly persecuted, and all, except the apostles, driven out of Jerusalem (Acts viii. 1, xi. 19). In A. D. 40, Vitellius was superseded by Publius Petronius, who arrived in Palestine with an order to place in the Temple a statue of Caligula. This order was ultimately countermanded. With the accession of Claudius A. D. 41 came an edict of toleration to the Jews. Agrippa resided very much at Jerusalem, and added materially to its prosperity and convenience. The city had for some time been extending itself toward the N., and a large suburb had come into existence on the high ground N. of the Temple, and outside of the "second wall" which enclosed the northern part of the great central valley of the city. Hitherto the outer portion of this suburb—which was called Bezetha, or "New Town," and had grown up very rapidly—was unprotected by any formal wall, and practically lay open to attack. This defenceless condition attracted the attention of Agrippa, who, like the first Herod, was a great builder, and he commenced enclosing it in so substantial and magnificent a manner as to excite the suspicions of the prefect, at whose instance it was stopped by Claudius. Subsequently the Jews seem to have purchased permission to complete the work. The year 43 is memorable as that of St. Paul's first visit to Jerusalem after his conversion. The year 44 began with the murder of St. JAMES by Agrippa (Acts xii. 1), followed at the Passover by the imprisonment and escape of St. Peter. Shortly after Agrippa himself died. Cuspius Fadus arrived from Rome as procurator, and Longinus as prefect of Syria. In 45 commenced a severe famine, which lasted two years. At the end of this year St. Paul arrived in Jerusalem for the second time. In A. D. 48, Fadus was succeeded by Ventidius Cumanus. A frightful tumult happened at the Passover of this year, caused, as on former occasions, by the presence of the Roman soldiers in the Antonia and in the courts and cloisters of the Temple during the festival. Cumanus was recalled, and FELIX appointed in his room. A set of ferocious fanatics, whom Josephus calls Sicarii (L. plural = stabbers, assassins), had lately begun to make their appearance in the city. In fact, not only Jerusalem, but the whole country far and wide, was in the most frightful confusion and insecurity. At length a riot at Cesarea of the most serious description caused the recall of Felix, and in the end of 60, or the beginning of 61, PORCIUS FESTUS succeeded him as procurator. Festus was an able and upright officer (Jos. B. J. ii. 14, § 1), and at the same time conciliatory toward the Jews (Acts xxv. 9). In the brief period of his administration he kept down the robbers with a strong hand, and gave the province a short breathing-time. His interview with St. Paul (Acts xxv., xxvi.) took place, not at Jerusalem, but at Cesarea. In 62 (probably) Festus died, and was succeeded by Albinus. He began his rule by endeavoring to keep down the Sicarii and other disturbers of the peace; and indeed he preserved throughout a show of justice and vigor, though in secret greedy and rapacious. Bad as Albinus had been, Gessius Florus, who succeeded him in 65, was worse. At the Passover, probably in 66, when Cestius Gallus, the prefect of Syria, visited Jerusalem, the whole assembled people besought him for redress; but without effect. Florus' next attempt was to obtain some of the treasure from the Temple. He demanded seventeen talents in the name of the emperor. The demand produced a frantic disturbance. That night Florus took up his quarters in the royal palace—that of Herod, at the N. W. corner of the city. On the following morning he demanded that the leaders of the late riot should be given up. On their refusal he ordered his soldiers to plunder the upper city. This order was but too faithfully carried out. Foiled in his attempt to press through the old city up into the Antonia, he relinquished the attempt, and withdrew to Cesarea. Cestius Gallus, the prefect, now found it necessary for him to visit the city in person. Agrippa had shortly before returned from Alexandria, and had done much to calm the people. The seditious party in the Temple, led by young Eleazar, son of Ananias, rejected the offerings of the Roman emperor, which since the time of Julius Cesar had been regularly made. This, as a direct renunciation of allegiance, was the true beginning of the war with Rome. Hostilities at once began. The peace party, headed by the high-priest, and fortified by Agrippa's soldiers, threw themselves into the upper city. The insurgents held the Temple and the lower city. In the Antonia was a small Roman garrison. Fierce contests lasted for seven days, each side endeavoring to take possession of the part held by the other. At last the insurgents became masters of both city and Temple. But they were not to remain so long. Cestius Gallus advanced from Scopus on the city. He encamped opposite the palace at the foot of the second wall. The Jews retired to the upper city and to the Temple. For five days Cestius assaulted the wall without success; on the sixth he resolved to make one more attempt. He could effect nothing, and when night came he drew off to his camp at Scopus. Thither the insurgents followed him, and in three days gave him one of the most complete defeats that a Roman army had ever undergone. War with Rome was now inevitable. The walls were repaired, arms and warlike instruments and machines of all kinds fabricated, and other preparations made. In this attitude of expectation the city remained while Vespasian was reducing the N. of the country, and till the fall of Giscala (October or November, 67). Two years and a half elapsed before Titus appeared before the walls of Jerusalem. The whole of that time was occupied in contests between the moderate party and the Zealots or fanatics. At the beginning of 70, when Titus made his appearance, the Zealots themselves were divided into two parties—that of John of Giscala and Eleazar, who held the Temple and its courts, and the Antonia—8,400 men; that of Simon Bar-Gioras, whose headquarters were in the tower Phasaelus, and who held the upper city, the lower city in the valley, and the district where the old Acra had formerly stood, N. of the Temple—10,000 men, and 5,000 Idumeans, in all a force of between 23,000 and 24,000 soldiers trained in the civil encounters of the last two years to great skill and thorough recklessness. The numbers of the other inhabitants it is extremely difficult to decide. Titus's force consisted of four legions and some auxiliaries—at the outside 30,000 men. These were disposed on their first arrival in three camps—the 12th and 15th legions on the ridge of Scopus, about one mile N. of the city; the 5th a little in the rear, and the 10th on the top of the Mount of Olives, to guard the road to the Jordan valley. The first operation was to clear the ground between Scopus and the N. wall of the city. This occupied four days. The next step was to get possession of the outer wall. The point of attack chosen was in Simon's portion of the city, at a low and comparatively weak place near the monument of John Hyrcanus. Round this spot the three legions erected banks, from which they opened batteries, pushing up the rams and other engines of attack to the foot of the wall. Meantime from their camp on the Mount of Olives the 10th legion battered the Temple and the E. side of the city. A breach was made on the 7th Artemisius (about April 15); and here the Romans entered, driving the Jews before them to the second wall. Titus now lay with the second wall of the city close to him on his right. He preferred, before advancing, to get possession of the second wall. In five days a breach was again effected. The district into which the Romans had now penetrated was the great valley between the two main hills of the city. Before attacking the Antonia, Titus resolved to give his troops a few days' rest. He therefore called in the 10th legion from the Mount of Olives, and held an inspection of the whole army on the ground N. of the Temple. But the opportunity was thrown away upon the Jews, and after four days orders were given to recommence the attack. Hitherto the assault had been almost entirely on the city; it was now to be simultaneous on city and Temple. Accordingly two pairs of large batteries were constructed, the one pair in front of the Antonia, the other at the old point of attack—the monument of John Hyrcanus. They absorbed the incessant labor of seventeen days, and were completed on the 29th Artemisius (about May 7). But the Jews undermined the banks, and the labor of the Romans was totally destroyed. At the other point Simon had maintained a resistance with all his former intrepidity, and more than his former success. It now became plain to Titus that some other measure for the reduction of the place must be adopted. A council of war was therefore held, and it was resolved to encompass the whole place with a wall, and then recommence the assault. Its entire length was thirty-nine furlongs, —very near five miles; and it contained thirteen stations or guard-houses. The whole strength of the army was employed on the work, and it was completed in the short space of three days. The siege was then vigorously pressed. The N. attack was relinquished, and the whole force concentrated on the Antonia. On the 5th Panemus (June 11) the Antonia was in the hands of the Romans (Jos. B. J. vi. 1, § 7). Another week was occupied in breaking down the outer walls of the fortress for the passage of the machines, and a further delay took place in erecting new banks, on the fresh level, for the bombardment and battery of the Temple. But the Romans gradually gained ground. At length, on the 10th day of Ab (July 15), by the wanton act of a soldier, contrary to the intention of Titus, and in spite of every exertion he could make to stop it, the sanctuary itself was fired. It was by one of those rare coincidences that sometimes occur, the very same month and day of the month that the first Temple had been burnt by Nebuchadnezzar. The whole of the cloisters that had hitherto escaped were now all burnt and demolished. Only the edifice of the sanctuary itself still remained. The Temple was at last gained; but it seemed as if half the work remained to be done. The upper city was still to be taken. Titus first tried a parley. His terms, however, were rejected, and no alternative was left him but to force on the siege. The whole of the low part of the town was burnt. It took eighteen days to erect the necessary works for the siege: the four legions were once more stationed at the W. or N. W. corner where Herod's palace abutted on the wall, and where the three magnificent and impregnable towers of Hippicus, Phasaëlus, and Mariamne rose conspicuous. This was the main attack. It was commenced on the 7th of Gorpæus (about September 11), and by the next day a breach was made in the wall, and the Romans at last entered the city. The city being taken, such parts as had escaped the former conflagrations were burnt, and the whole of both city and Temple was ordered to be demolished, excepting the W. wall of the upper city, and Herod's three great towers at the N. W. corner, which were left standing as memorials of the massive nature of the fortifications.—From its destruction by Titus to the present time (by Mr. Wright). For more than fifty years after its destruction by Titus, Jerusalem disappears from history. During the revolts of the Jews in Cyrenaica, Egypt, Cyprus, and Mesopotamia, which disturbed the latter years of Trajan, the recovery of their city was never attempted. But in the reign of Hadrian it again emerged from its obscurity, and became the centre of an insurrection, which the best blood of Rome was shed to subdue. In despair of keeping the Jews in subjection by other means, the emperor had formed a design to restore Jerusalem, and thus prevent it from ever becoming a rallying-point for this turbulent race. In furtherance of this plan he had sent thither a colony of veterans, in numbers sufficient for the defence of a position so strong by nature against the then known modes of attack. The embers of revolt, long smouldering, burst into a flame soon after Hadrian's departure from the East in A. D. 132. Early in the revolt the Jews under Bar-Cocheba (= son of a star) became masters of Jerusalem, and attempted to rebuild the Temple. Hadrian, alarmed at the rapid spread of the insurrection, and the ineffectual efforts of his troops to repress it, summoned from Britain Julius Severus, the greatest general of his time, to take the command of the army of Judea. Two years were spent in a fierce guerilla warfare before Jerusalem was taken, after a desperate defence in which Bar-Cocheba perished. But the war did not end with the capture of the city. The Jews in great force had occupied the fortress of Bether,<sup>1</sup> and there maintained a struggle with all the tenacity of despair against the repeated onsets of the Romans. At length, worn out by famine and disease, they yielded on the 9th of the month Ab, A. D. 135. Bar-Cocheba has left traces of his occupation of Jerusalem in coins which were struck during the first two years of the war. Hadrian's first policy, after the suppression of the revolt, was to obliterate the existence of Jerusalem as a city. The ruins which Titus had left were razed to the ground, and the plough passed over the foundations of the Temple. A colony of Roman citizens occupied the new city, which rose from the ashes of Jerusalem, and their number was afterward augmented by the emperor's veteran legionaries. It was not, however, till the following year, A. D. 136, that Hadrian, on celebrating his Vicennalia, bestowed upon the new city the name of Ælia Capitolina, combining with his own family title the name of Jupiter of the Capitol, the guardian deity of the colony. Jews were forbidden to enter on pain of death. About the middle of the fourth century the Jews were allowed to visit the neighborhood, and afterward, once a year, to enter the city itself, and weep over it on the anniversary of its capture. So completely were all traces of the ancient city obliterated, that its very name was in process of time forgotten. It was not till after Constantine built the Martyrion on the site of the crucifixion, that its ancient appellation was revived.—After the inauguration of the new colony of Ælia, the annals of the city again relapse into obscurity. The aged Empress Helena, mother of Constantine, visited Palestine in A. D. 326, and, according to tradition, erected magnificent churches at Bethlehem, and on the Mount of Olives. Her son, fired with the same zeal, swept away the shrine of Astarte (ASHRORETH), which occupied the site of the resurrection, and founded in its stead a chapel or oratory (see III. § 10, below). In the reign of Julian (A. D. 362) the Jews, with the permission and at the instigation of the emperor, made an abortive attempt to lay the foundations of a temple. Materials of every kind were provided at the emperor's expense; but the work was interrupted by fire, which all attributed to supernatural agency (see III. § 11, below).—During the fourth and fifth centuries Jerusalem became the centre of attraction for pilgrims from all regions, and its bishops contended with those of Cesarea for the supremacy; but it was not till after the Council of Chalcedon (451–453) that it was made an independent patriarchate. In 529 the Emperor Justinian founded at Jerusalem a splendid church in honor of the Virgin, which has been identified by most writers with the building known as the Mosque el-Aksa, but of which probably no remains now exist (see III. § 12, below). For nearly five centuries the city had been free from the horrors of war. But this rest was roughly broken by the invading Persian army under Chosroes II. The city was invested, and taken by assault in June, 614. After a struggle of fourteen years the imperial arms were again victorious, and in 628 Heraclius entered Jerusalem on foot. The dominion of the Christians in the Holy City was now rapidly drawing to a close. After an obstinate defence of four months, in the depth of winter, against the impetuous attacks of the Arabs, the patriarch Sophronius surrendered to the Khalif Omar in person, A. D. 637. With the fall of the Abbassides the Holy City passed into the hands of the Fatimite conqueror Muezz, who fixed the seat of his empire at Muar el-Kührah, the modern Cairo (A. D. 969). Under the Fatimite dynasty the sufferings of the Christians in Jerusalem reached their height, when El-Hakem, the third of his line, ascended the throne (A. D. 996). About 1084 it was bestowed by Tutush, the brother of Melek Shah, upon Ortok, chief of a Turkman horde under his command. From this time till 1091 Ortok was emir of the city, and on his death it was held as a kind of fief by his sons Ilghazy and Sukmân, whose severity to the Christians became the proximate cause of the Crusades. On the 7th of June, 1099, the crusading army appeared before the walls. Their camp extended from the gate of St. Stephen to that beneath the tower of David. On the fifth day after their arrival the crusaders attacked the city, and at three o'clock on Friday the 15th of July Jerusalem was in the hands of the crusaders. Churches were established, and for eighty-eight years Jerusalem remained in the hands of the Christians. In 1187 it was retaken by Saladin after a siege of several weeks. In 1277 Jerusalem was nominally annexed to the kingdom of Sicily. In 1517 it passed under the sway of the Ottoman Sultan Selim I., whose successor Suliman built the present walls of the city in 1542. Mohammed Ali, the Pasha of Egypt, took possession of it in 1832. In 1834 it was seized and held for a time by the Fellâhin (Ar. = cultivators, tillers of the soil, Robinson), during the insurrection, and in 1840, after the bombardment of Acre, was again restored to the Sultan.—III. Topography of the City. (Originally by Mr. Fergusson, but essentially altered by the American editor.) There are at present before the public three distinct views of the topography of Jerusalem, so discrepant from one another in their most essential features, that a disinterested person might fairly feel himself justified in assuming that there existed no real data for the determination of the points at issue, and that the disputed questions must forever remain in the same unsatisfactory state as at present.—1. The first of these theories consists in the belief that all the sacred localities were correctly ascertained in the early ages of Christianity; and, what is still more important, that none have been changed during the dark ages that followed, or in the numerous revolutions to which the city has been exposed. The first person who ventured publicly to express his dissent from this view was Korte, a German printer, who travelled in Palestine about 1728, and on his return home published a work denying the authenticity of the so-called sacred localities. The arguments in favor of the present localities being the correct ones are well summed up by the Rev. George Williams, in his work on the Holy City, and with the assistance of Professor Willis all has been said that can be urged in favor of their authenticity.—2. Professor Robinson, on the other hand, in his elaborate works on Palestine, has brought together all the arguments which, from the time of Korte, have been accumulating against the authenticity of the mediæval sites and traditions. Robinson (iii. 206) sets down as admitted by himself and most writers (1.) that ZION was the S. W. hill of the city; (2.) that MORIAH, the site of the Jewish Temple, was the present Haram area, E. and N. E. of Zion; (3.)

that the ancient tower just S. of the Jaffa gate is the Hippicus of Josephus; (4.) that the ancient remains connected with the present Damascus gate are those of an ancient gate on that spot, belonging to the second wall of Josephus.—3. The third theory is that put forward by Mr. Fergusson in his "Essay on the Ancient Topography of Jerusalem." It agrees generally with the views urged by all those from Korte to Robinson, who doubt the authenticity of the present site of the sepulchre; but goes on to assert that the Mount Zion of the Scriptures is the hill on which the Temple stood (= Mount Moriah, or the E. hill of the city), and that the building now known to Christians as the Mosque of Omar, but by Moslems called the Dome of the Rock, is the identical church which Constantine erected over the rock which contained the Tomb of Christ. Josephus (B. J. v. 4) describes Jerusalem as fortified with three walls, wherever it was not encompassed with impassable ravines (there it had but one wall), and as built face to face on two hills, separated by a ravine between, at which the houses, one upon another, ended. Of these hills that which had the upper city was much higher and straighter in its length. The other, called Akra, on which stood the lower city, was gibbous. Over against this was a third hill, naturally lower than Akra, and formerly separated from it by another broad ravine; but afterward, when the Asmoneans ruled, desiring to join the city to the Temple, they filled up the ravine with earth, and then lowered the summit of Akra that the Temple might appear above it. The so-called ravine of the cheese-makers (Tyropæon), mentioned above as separating the hill of the upper city and the lower hill, extends down to Siloam. Externally the two hills of the city were encompassed by deep ravines; and it was nowhere approachable on account of the precipices on each side. (See also § 3 below.) In attempting to follow his description there are two points which it is necessary should be fixed, in order to understand what follows: (1.) the position and dimensions of the Temple; (2.) the position of the Tower Hippicus.—§ 1. Site of the Temple. Without any exception, all topographers are now agreed that the Temple stood within the limits of the great area now known as the Haram (which is [so Robinson] 907½ feet broad at the south end, and about 1,066 at the north end, and 1,528 feet long), though at least one author places it in the centre, and not at the southern extremity of the enclosure. With this exception all topographers are agreed that the southwestern angle of the Haram area was one of the angles of the ancient Jewish Temple. Mr. Ferguson regards the evidence as conclusive, that Josephus was literally correct when he said that the Temple was an exact square of a stadium, or 600

Greek feet, on each side. He therefore holds that the Temple extended from the southwestern angle of the Haram area about two-thirds of the whole distance to the southeastern angle, and about two-fifths of the distance to the northwestern angle, and thus places the Mosque of Omar just outside of the ancient Temple. Mr. Fergusson claims, as supporting his conclusion, that the Haram area is filled up perfectly solid, with the exception of the great tunnel-like entrance under the mosque el-Aksa, until, 600 feet E. from the southwestern angle, we arrive at a wall running N., beyond which the area is filled up with a series of light arches, supported on square piers, and incapable of sustaining the weight of any large building. The Talmud asserts that the Temple was a square of 500 cubits each side. Robinson (i. 290-292) holds "that the area of the Jewish Temple was identical on its W., E., and S. sides, with the present enclosure of the Haram," which he supposes "has been enlarged toward the N." He says (iii. 220), "On beholding the immense stones and the elaborate masonry of some of the lower portions of the exterior wall around the present Haram enclosure, the traveller receives at once the conviction, that they are of earlier date than the rest of the wall, and that he has before him the massive substructions of the ancient Jewish Temple. This is true especially of the Jewish walling-place and the southwest corner; of large portions of the southern wall, as also the southeast corner on its two sides. Such has been the impression received by travellers for centuries; and such it will probably continue to be so long as these remains endure." (See MORIAH 2, and §§ 10 11, below.)—§ 2. Hippicus. Of all the towers that once adorned the city of Jerusalem only one now exists in any thing like a state of perfection, viz. that called the tower, or castle, of David, in the centre of the citadel, near the Jaffa gate, which from its prominence now, and the importance which Josephus ascribes to the tower, has been generally assumed to be the tower Hippicus. The reasons, however, against this assumption are too cogent to allow of the identity being admitted. But at the northwestern angle of the present city there are the remains of an ancient building of bevelled masonry and large stones, the Kasr Jâhid, which Mr. Fergusson identifies with the Hippicus of Josephus. Dr. J. P. Thompson (in Kitto), and Dr. H. Bonar (in Fairbairn), without acquiescing fully in Mr. Fergusson's identification, are disposed to place Hippicus in this neighborhood.—§ 3. Walls. As described by Josephus, the first or old wall began on the N. at the tower called Hippicus, and, extending to the Xystus (an open place, in the extreme part of the upper city, where the people sometimes assembled, and which was connected with the Temple by a bridge [Robinson]), joined the council-house, and ended at the west cloister of the Temple. Its southern direction is described as passing the gate of the Es-senes (probably the modern Jaffa gate, so Mr. Fergusson; Kitto supposes it perhaps = the "dung-gate" on the south side), and, bending above the fountain of Siloam, it reached Ophel, and was joined to the eastern cloister of the Temple. The second wall began at the gate Gennath, in the old wall, probably near the Hippicus, and passed round the northern quarter of the city, and joined the fortress Antopia. The third wall was built by King Herod Agrippa; and was intended to enclose the suburbs which had grown out on the northern sides of the city, which before this had been left exposed. It began at the Hippicus, and reached as far as the tower Psephinus, till it came opposite the monument of Queen Helena of Adiabene; it then passed by the sepulchral monuments of the kings, and, turning south at the monument of the Fuller, joined the old wall at the valley called the valley of Kidron.

After describing these walls, Josephus adds that the whole circumference of the city was thirty-three stadia, or nearly four English miles. He then adds that the number of towers in the old wall was sixty, the middle wall forty, and the new wall ninety.—

§ 4. Antonia. The lower or castle of ANTONIA (also called Baris, the "castle" of Acts xxi. 24, 37, &c.) certainly was attached to the Temple buildings, and on the northern side of them; but whether covering the whole space, or only a portion, has been much disputed. After stating that the Temple was four square, and a stadium on each side, Josephus goes on to say that with Antonia it was six stadia in circumference. The most obvious conclusion from this would be (according to Mr. Fergusson) that the Antonia occupied practically the platform on which the so-called Mosque of Omar now stands. But, from certain facts connected with the siege, Mr. Fergusson concludes that the Antonia was a tower or keep attached to the northwestern angle of the Temple. Robinson (iii. 231 ff.) regards Antonia as a fortress, with the extent and arrangements of a palace, occupying perhaps the whole north part of the present Haram area, having in its northwestern part an inner citadel or acropolis of the same name, and, where it joined upon the northern and western porticoes of the Temple, flights of stairs descending to both.—§ 5. Hills and Valleys. Topographers are still at issue as to the true direction of the upper part of the Tyropæon (= cheese-makers') valley, and consequently, as to the position of Akra (Gr. Akra). Rev. J. P. Thompson, D. D. (in Kitto) enumerates seven theories:—(1.) Akra is the ridge between the Jaffa and Damascus gates, the principal Christian quarter of the modern city (Reland, Von Raumer, Robinson, Stanley, &c.). The Tyropæon then began at the Jaffa gate. (2.) Akra is N. of the Haram area, and contiguous to it, and E. of the valley that runs S. from the Damascus gate, which then becomes the Tyropæon: Zion thus extended N. so as to embrace in whole or in part the ridge which is the Akra of No. 1, and includes the whole of the Christian, Armenian, and Jewish quarters, while Akra lies wholly in the Mohammedan quarter of modern Jerusalem (Ritter, Schwartz). (3.) Akra, as in No. 2, = the hill of the Mohammedan quarter; but Zion is not extended N. so as to stand face to face with it (Williams, Smith's Dict. of Geog.). (4.) Akra was the portion of the Haram esh-Sherif not occupied by the Temple (Schultz, Krafft). (5.) Akra was the ridge S. of the Temple area and E. of Zion, commonly known as Ophel (Prof. Justus Olshausen). (6.) Akra was the lower E. portion of the hill commonly known as Zion, i. e. Akra = the Jewish quarter, and Zion = the Armenian quarter (Dr. Titus Tobler). (7.) Akra is the entire ridge of the Haram (Thrupp). Thrupp and Fergusson agree that the Temple-hill was the ancient Zion, the city of David. The first and second of the above theories (so Dr. Thompson) appear the most tenable.—§ 6. Population. Mr. Fergusson regards the assertions of Josephus that three millions were collected in Jerusalem at the Passover; that a million of people perished in the siege; that 100,000 escaped, &c., as greatly exaggerated. Mr. Fergusson estimates that the population of Jerusalem, in its days of greatest prosperity, may have amounted to from 30,000 to 45,000 souls, but could hardly ever have reached 50,000; and that there may have been 60,000 or 70,000 in the city when Titus came up against it. Thomson (ii. 589 ff.) considers that we are not required to find room for more than 200,000 regular inhabitants at Jerusalem in her highest prosperity and largest extent; and that no impartial person who has opportunity to examine modern Eastern cities, or to observe how densely the poor Jews can and do pack themselves away in the most wretched hovels, will deem it extravagant to suppose this number of residents in the ancient city, which had an area of about one square mile. The great numbers assembled in Jerusalem at the Passover, &c., were mostly strangers, not citizens. The great feasts occurred in the warm, non-rainy months when throughout southern Palestine the people do not hesitate to sleep in the open air, under trees, vines, and even in open gardens; and thus not only two, but six millions of people could find room to eat and sleep on the mountains "round about Jerusalem." The present population of Jerusalem has been variously estimated at from 10,000 to 26,000. Dr. Pierotti gives the number as 20,330, viz. 5,068 Christians of all sects, 7,556 Moslems (Arabs and Turks), 7,706 Jews (Dr. Bonar in Fairbairn).—§ 7. Zion. It cannot be disputed that from the time of Constantine downward to the present day, this name has been applied to the western hill on which the city of Jerusalem now stands, and in fact always stood. Notwithstanding this, Mr. Fergusson, in opposition to the almost unanimous opinion of scholars and travellers, maintains that, up to the time of the destruction of the city by Titus, the name was applied exclusively to the eastern hill, or that on which the Temple stood. From 2 Sam. v. 7, and 1 Chr. xi. 5-8, it is clear that Zion = the city of David. Here the ark of God dwelt in curtains; here was the abode of David and of Jehovah before the Temple was built; here was the seat of the theocracy. "The term Zion," says Rev. S. Wolcott, D. D. (B. S. xxiii. 691), "came, naturally, to be employed, both by sacred and profane writers, as the representation of the whole city, of which it formed so prominent a part. It was thus used by the later prophets (Jer. xxxi. 6; Joel iii. 17, 21, &c.), as also in Maccabees (1 Mc. iv. 37, 60, vii. 33), where it evidently includes the Temple and adjacent mount." "To one who approaches it from the S., the precipitous brow of Zion inverts the description—"the sides of the N." (Ps. xlviii. 2)—with a force and beauty which would be lost by a transfer to the other eminence." Dr. Bonar (in Fairbairn) considers "the sides of the N." (Ps. xlviii. 2; Is. xiv. 13) = the "city" proper, or lower market, on Akra, as contrasted with Zion, the upper city. "It is a mistaken impression," says Dr. Wolcott (l. c.), "that greater sanctity is ascribed to Zion than to Jerusalem, or that the two names are, in this respect, carefully distinguished" (see Ps. cxxxv. 21, cxxxviii.; Is. lii. 1, 2; 2 Chr. vi. 6; Ezr. vii. 15; Zech. viii. 3, &c.; compare Num. xxiii. 7, xxiv. 5, &c.). "Our Saviour expressly forbade the profanation of the name (Mat. v. 35); and through the force of the same sacred associations, the beloved disciple could find no more fitting type of heaven itself, as he beheld it in vision—the New Jerusalem of the saints in glory" (Rev. xxi. 2).—§ 8. Topography of Nehemiah. The only description of the ancient city of Jerusalem which exists in the Bible, so extensive in form as to enable us to follow it as a topographical description, is that found in Nehemiah, and although it is hardly sufficiently distinct to enable us to settle all the moot points, it contains such valuable indications that it is well worthy of the most attentive examination. The easiest way to arrive at any correct conclusion regarding it, is to take first the description of the Dedication of the Walls in chapter xii. (31-40), and drawing such a diagram as this, we easily get at the main features of the old wall at least. If from this we turn to chapter iii., which gives a description of the repairs of the wall, we have no difficulty (so Mr. Fergusson; but see above) in identifying all the places mentioned in the first sixteen verses, with those enumerated in chapter xii.—§ 9. Waters of Jerusalem. "Jerusalem lies in the midst of a rocky limestone region, throughout which fountains and wells are comparatively rare" (Rbn. i. 323). Yet, according to Dr. Barclay (City of the Great King), there are, within a radius of seven miles, some thirty or forty natural springs. "The artificial provision for supply of water in Jerusalem in ancient times was perhaps the most complete and extensive ever undertaken for a city. The aqueduct of Solomon (winding along for twelve and a quarter miles) pours the waters of the three immense pools into the enormous temple-wells, cut out like caverns in the rock; and the pools, which surround the city in all directions, supply to a great extent the want of a river or lake. The ancient pools were: (1.) The upper pool (2 K. xviii. 17). (2.) The king's pool (Neh. ii. 14). (SILLOAM?) (3.) The pool of Siloah (iii. 15). (SILLOAM?) (4.) The pool that was made (iii. 16). (5.) The lower pool

(Is. xxii. 9). (6.) The old pool (xxii. 4). (7.) The pool of BETHESDA (Jn. v. 2). (8.) The pool of SILOAM (ix. 7). The chief modern pools are: (1.) Silwān (SILOAM). (2.) Birket es-Sultān, S. of the city, along the side of which the Bethlehem road runs; perhaps = "the pool that was made" (No. 4 above). (3.) Birket el-Mamilla, W. of the present Jaffa gate; perhaps = the waters of the upper pool, from which Hezekiah made a conduit, and led the water into the heart of the city, down the Tyropæon. (4.) Birket Hammam el-Batrak, within the city walls, called traditionally the Pool of Hezekiah. (5.) Birket es-Serain, or Birket Israel, near the modern St. Stephen's gate; probably = BETHESDA. There have been pools also in former ages, not small in size, which have disappeared. These pools and wells are not kept in very good repair, and seldom contain much or good water. The Um ed-Deraġ, the traditional Fountain of the Virgin (see SILOAM), is always filled and flowing, supplying water to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, but especially to those of the village Silwān. It is to tanks or pools that Jerusalem has to look for its water-supply; and since its annual rain-fall is twice as much as that of England, there ought not to be any lack" (Dr. H. Bonar in Fairbairn). Of the above-mentioned modern pools, Robinson, Thomson, Wilson, Van de Velde, &c., identify No. 3 with the ancient "upper pool," or "watercourse" of GIHON, and No. 2 with the "lower pool." Robinson (i. 346, &c.) supposes the fountain of Gihon, which supplied these pools, anciently existed on the W. side of Jerusalem in the basin or head of the valley of Hinnom, down which its waters naturally flowed till Hezekiah covered the fountain and brought down its waters by subterranean channels into the city. Mr. Williams (Holy City) and others suppose Gihon = the Tyropæon valley, that the upper pool of Gihon was on the N. side of Jerusalem, not far from the Tombs of the Kings, and that the lower Gihon was the pool of Siloam. Mr. Lewin, &c., consider Gihon = the valley of Jehoshaphat, the lower Gihon = the Fountain of the Virgin, and the upper Gihon = some spring further N. (CISTERN; DRAGON-WELL; POOL, &c.)—§ 10. Site of Holy Sepulchre. As the question now stands, the fixation of the site depends mainly on the answers that may be given to two questions:—(1.) Did Constantine and those who acted with him (A. D. 326) possess sufficient information to enable them to ascertain exactly the precise localities of the crucifixion and burial of Christ? (2.) Is the present church of the Holy Sepulchre that which he built, or does it stand on the same spot? Mr. Fergusson answers the first question in the affirmative, and claims that the account given by Eusebius of the uncovering of the rock expresses no doubt or uncertainty about the matter. Robinson (iii. 257) maintains that "the whole tenor of the language both of Eusebius and Constantine shows that the discovery of the sepulchre was held to be the result, not of a previous knowledge derived from tradition, but of a supernatural intimation." Mr. Fergusson maintains that the language of Eusebius is minutely descriptive of the site of the building now known as the Mosque of Omar, but wholly inapplicable to the site of the present Church of the Holy Sepulchre. Of the buildings which Constantine or his mother, Helena, erected, Mr. Fergusson maintains that two now remain—the one the Anastasis (Gr. = Resurrection, now [so Mr. Fergusson] known as the "Mosque of Omar" and the "Dome of the Rock" [Ar. es-Sukhrā]), a circular building erected over the tomb itself; the other the "Golden Gateway" (GATE), which (so Mr. Fergusson) was the propylea described by Eusebius as leading to the atrium (hall) of the basilica. The "Golden Gateway," which projects from the wall into the interior of the Haram, is now used as a Moslem place of prayer (Robinson). Mr. Fergusson argues that the site of the Mosque of Omar was both outside of the ancient Temple (see § 1 above) and outside of the ancient walls of the city. To this Rev. S. Wolcott, D. D., formerly an American Protestant missionary in Palestine, replies: "The site of the so-called Mosque of Omar could not have been, in our Saviour's day, outside of the walls. The theory would break up the solid masonry of the ancient substructions of the Temple-area, still existing, making one portion modern, the other ancient in a way which is simply incredible" (B. S. xliii. 695).—The Church of the Holy Sepulchre was erected by the Emperor Constantine A. D. 326–335. "Probably no one at the present day, except Mr. Fergusson and his followers, supposes there has been any transfer of the site, since it was originally fixed in the fourth century" (Robinson). The Church itself has been repeatedly destroyed (A. D. 614, 969, 1010, 1808) and rebuilt (Bonar in Fairbairn). It is esteemed by the Armenians, Greeks, Roman Catholics, &c., the holy place of Jerusalem. Chateaubriand, Von Raumer, Tischendorf, Olin, Williams, Pierotti, &c., defend its claims as marking the true site of our Lord's burial; but Robinson, Thomson, Van de Velde, Wilson, Bonar, Tobler, Barclay, and many others, discredit them (compare Jn. xix. 20; Heb. xiii. 12). (CALVARY; CRUCIFIXION; GOLGOTHA; PRETORIUM; TOMB).—§ 11. Rebuilding of the Temple by Julian. Even if we have not historical evidence of the facts (see II. above), the appearance of the S. wall of the Haram would lead us to suspect that something of the sort had been attempted at this period. The great tunnel-like vault under the Mosque El-Aksa, with its four-domed vestibule, is almost certainly part of the temple of Herod, and coeval with his period; but externally to this, certain architectural decorations have been added, and that so slightly that daylight can be perceived between the old walls and the subsequent decorations, except at the points of attachment. These adjuncts may with very tolerable certainty be ascribed to the age of Julian, while, from the historical accounts, they are just such as we should expect to find them.—§ 12. Church of Justinian. Nearly two centuries after the attempt of Julian, Justinian erected a magnificent church at Jerusalem in honor of the Virgin Mary, "on the loftiest hill of the city, where there was not space enough to allow of the prescribed dimensions, so that they were obliged to lay the foundation at the S. E. side at the bottom of the hill, and build up a wall with arched vaults in order to support that part of the building" (Procopius in Robinson). Almost all topographers (so Mr. Fergusson) have jumped to the conclusion that the Mosque El-Aksa is the identical church referred to, but the architecture of that building (in Mr. Fergusson's view) is alone sufficient to refute any such idea. Notwithstanding this there is no difficulty in fixing on the site of this church, inasmuch as the vaults that fill up the southeastern angle of the Haram area are almost certainly of the age of Justinian, and are just such as Procopius describes; so that if it were situated at the northern extremity of the vaults, all the arguments that apply to the Aksa equally apply to this situation. But this "is purely a conjectural site," "where not the slightest trace appears of a foundation ancient or modern" (so Dr. Wolcott in B. S. xxiv. 124).

Jesh-u-a (a later Hebrew contraction for JOSHUA or rather JHOSHUA). 1. JOSHUA, the son of Nun (Neh. viii. 17).—2. A priest in David's reign, head of the ninth course (1 Chr. xxiv. 11, A. V. "Jeshuah;" Ezr. ii. 36; Neh. vii. 39; see JEDAJAH 1.—3. A Levite in the reign of Hezekiah (2 Chr. xxxi. 15).—4. Son of Jehozadak; first HIGH-PRIEST after the Babylonish Captivity, and ancestor of the fourteen high-priests his successors down to Joshua or Jason, and Onias or Menelaus, inclusive (Ezr. ii. 2, iii. 2, 8, 9, iv. 3, v. 2, x. 18; Neh. vii. 7, xli. 1, 7, 10, 26); = JOSHUA 4. Jeshua, like his contemporary Zerubbabel, was probably born in Babylon, whither his father, Jehozadak, had been taken captive while young (1 Chr. vi. 15, A. V.). He came up from Babylon in the first year of Cyrus with Zerubbabel, and took a leading part with him in the rebuilding of the Temple, and the restoration of the Jewish commonwealth. Besides the great importance of Jeshua as an historical character, from the critical times in which he lived, and the great work which he accomplished, his name (= Jesus), his restoration of the Temple, his office as high-priest, and especially the two prophecies concerning him in Zech. iii. and vi. 9-15, point him out as an eminent type of Christ.—5. Head of a Levitical house, one of those which returned from the Babylonish captivity, and took an active part under Zerubbabel, Ezra, and Nehemiah. The name is used to designate either the whole family or the successive chiefs of it (Ezr. ii. 40, iii. 9; Neh. iii. 19, viii. 7, ix. 4, 5, x. 9, xii. 8, &c.).—6. A branch of the family of Pahath-moab, one of the chief families, probably of Judah (Neh. x. 14, vii. 11, &c.; Ezr. x. 30).

Jesh'u-a (see above), one of the towns reinhabited by the people of Judah after the Captivity (Neh. xi. 26 only); apparently in the extreme S. (so Mr. Grove). Mr. Wilton (in Fairbairn) suggests = the modern village Yeshu'a, about twelve miles W. of Jerusalem.

Jesh'u-ah (fr. Heb. = JESHUA, or JOSHUA), a priest in the reign of David (1 Chr. xxiv. 11); = JESHUA 2.

Jesh'u-ran (fr. Heb., see below), and once in A. V. Jes'u-ran (Is. xlv. 2), a symbolical name for ISRAEL in Deut. xxxii. 15, xxxiii. 5, 26; Is. xlv. 2, for which various etymologies have been suggested. It is most probably derived from a root signifying to be blessed (so Mr. Wright). With the intensive termination Jeshurun would then denote Israel as supremely happy or prosperous, and to this signification the context in Deut. xxxii. 15 points. Gesenius and Fürst regard the termination as an affectionate diminutive from a Hebrew word signifying upright, and Jeshurun therefore as = the good little people. Michaelis, Grotius, Vitrina, and formerly Gesenius considered it as a diminutive of Israel, as it contracted from Heb. yisra'elûn; but for this there is not the slightest foundation.

Jesh'ah (fr. Heb. = ISHIAH, ISHIAH, ISSHIAH). 1. A Korhite, one of the mighty men who joined David's standard at Ziklag (1 Chr. xii. 6).—2. Second son of Uzziel, the son of Kohath (1 Chr. xxiii. 20); = ISSHIAH 2.

Jesh'm-el (fr. Heb. = whom God has set up, Ges.), a Simeonite chief, of the family of Shimeh (1 Chr. iv. 36).

Jesse (L. fr. Heb., perhaps = firm, strong, Ges.; Jah is existing or living, Fii.), father of DAVID. He was the son of OBEH, who again was the fruit of the union of Boaz and the Moabitess Ruth. Nor was Ruth's the only foreign blood that ran in his veins; for his great-grandmother was Rahab the Canaanite, of Jericho (Mat. i. 5). Jesse's genealogy is twice given in full in the O. T. (Ru. iv. 18-22; 1 Chr. ii. 5-12), and twice in the N. T. (Mat. i.; Lu. iii.). He is commonly designated as "Jesse the Bethlehemite" (1 Sam. xvi. 1, 18). So he is called by his son David, then fresh from home (xvii. 58); but his full title is "the Ephrathite of Bethlehem-judah" (xvii. 12). He is an "old man" when we first meet with him (xvii. 12), with eight sons (xvi. 10, xvii. 12), residing at Bethlehem (xvi. 4, 5). Jesse's wealth seems to have consisted of a flock of sheep and goats, which were under the care of David (xvi. 11, xvii. 34, 35). When David's rupture with Saul had finally driven him from the court, and he was in the cave of Adullam, "his brethren and all his father's house" joined him (xxii. 1). Anxious for their safety, he took his father and mother into the country of Moab, and left them under the king's protection, and there they disappear from our view in the records of Scripture. In his name Isaiah (xi. 1, 10) announces the most splendid of his promises. (MESSIAH.) Who the wife of Jesse was we are not told. NAHASH 2.

Jes'se (fr. Gr. form of JESUS, JESHUA, &c.), a Levite = JESHUA (1 Esd. v. 26; compare Ezr. ii. 40).

Jes's (L. form of JESUS, JESHUA, &c.), JESHUA

the Levite, the father of Jozabad (1 Esd. viii. 63; see Ezr. viii. 33); also called JESSUR and JESUS.

Jes'u-l (fr. Heb. = ISHUA, ISUI), son of Asher, whose descendants the JESUITES were numbered in the plains of Moab (Num. xxvi. 44); elsewhere called ISUI (Gen. xlii. 17) and ISHUA (1 Chr. vii. 30).

Jes'u-ites, the = a family of Asher, descended from JESUI (Num. xxvi. 44).

Jes'u-ran = JESHURUN.

Jes'us [-zus] (the Latinized Gr. form of JOSHUA or JESHUA, a contraction of JEHOSHUA = help of Jehovah or Saviour). 1. JOSHUA the priest, the son of Jehozadak (1 Esd. v. 5, 8, 24, 48, 56, 68, 70, vi. 2, ix. 19; Eccus. xlix. 12); = JESHUA 4.—2. JESHUA the Levite (1 Esd. v. 58, iv. 48).—3. JOSHUA the son of Nun (2 Esd. vii. 37; Eccus. xlii. 1; 1 Mc. ii. 55; Acts vii. 45; Heb. iv. 8).

Jes'us (see above) the Father of Sirach, and grandfather of the following (Eccus. prologue). ECCLESIASTICUS.

Jes'us (see above) the son of Sirach is described in ECCLESIASTICUS (l. 27) as the author of that book, which in the LXX., and generally, except in the Western Church, is called by his name the Wisdom of Jesus the son of Sirach, or simply the Wisdom of Sirach. The same passage speaks of him as a native of Jerusalem; and the internal character of the book confirms its Palestinian origin. Among the later Jews the "Son of Sirach" was celebrated under the name of Ben Sira as a writer of proverbs.

Jes'us (L. fr. Heb. through Gr. = Saviour; see above) Christ (fr. Gr. Christos [L. form Christus] = anointed = MESSIAH). Priests were anointed among the Jews, as their inauguration to their office (1 Chr. xvi. 22; Ps. cv. 15), and kings also (2 Mc. i. 24; Eccus. xlii. 19). (ANOINTING.) In the N. T. the name Christ = MESSIAH (Jn. i. 41, A. V. "Messias"), the name given to the long-promised Prophet and King whom the Jews had been taught by their prophets to expect (Acts xix. 4; Mat. xi. 3). The use of this name, as applied to the Lord, has always a reference to the promises of the prophets. "Jesus" is the proper name of our Lord, and "Christ" is added to identify Him with the promised MESSIAH. The Life, the Person, and the Work of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ occupy the whole of the N. T. Of this threefold subject the present article includes the first part, viz., the Life and Teaching. (SAVIOR; SON OF GOD.) According to the received chronology, which is in fact that of Dionysius Exiguus in the sixth century, the Birth of Christ occurred in the year of Rome 754; but from other considerations it is probable (so Archbishop Thomson, original author of this article) that the Nativity took place some time before April v. c. 750, and if it happened only a few months before Herod's death (HEROD 1), then its date would be four years earlier than the Dionysian reckoning. (See the end of this article.) The salutation addressed by the Angel to Mary His mother, "Hail! Thou that art highly favored," was the prelude to a new act of divine creation. (GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST; JAMES 3; JOSEPH 11; MARY, the VIRGIN.) Mary received the announcement of a miracle, the full import of which she could not have understood, with the submission of one who knew that the message came from God; and the Angel departed from her. The prophet Micah had foretold (Mic. v. 2) that the future king should be born in BETHLEHEM of Judea, the place where the house of David had its origin; but Mary dwelt in Nazareth. Augustus, however, had ordered a general census of the Roman empire. From the well-known and much-canvassed passage (Lk. ii. 2) it appears that the TAXING was not completed till the time of Quirinus (CYRENIUS), some years later; and how far it was carried now, cannot be determined: all that we learn is that it brought Joseph, who was of the house of David, from his home to Bethlehem, where the Lord was born. As there was no room in the inn, a MANGER was the cradle in which Christ the Lord was laid. But signs were not wanting of the greatness of the event that seemed so unimportant. Lowly shepherds were the witnesses of the wonders that accompanied the lowly Saviour's birth; an angel proclaimed to them "good tidings of great joy;" and then the exceeding joy that was in heaven among the angels about this mystery of love broke through the silence of night with the words, "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, goodwill toward men" (ii. 8-20). The child Jesus is circumcised in due time, is brought to the Temple, and the mother makes the offering for her purification. Simeon and Anna, taught from God that the object of their earnest longings was before them, prophesied of His divine work: the one rejoicing that his eyes had seen the salvation of God, and the other speaking of Him "to all that looked for redemption in Jerusalem" (ii. 28-38). Thus recognized among His own people, the Saviour was not without witness among the heathen. "Wise men from the East"—i. e. Persian MAGI of the Zend religion, in which the idea of a Zoziosh or Redcemer was clearly known—guided miraculously by a star or meteor (STAR OF THE WISE MEN) created for the purpose, came and sought out the Saviour to pay Him homage. A little child made the great Herod quake upon his throne. When he knew that the magi were come to hail their King and Lord, and did not stop at his palace, but passed on to a humbler roof, and when he found that they would not return to betray this child to him, he put to death all the children in Bethlehem that were under two years old. The crime was great; but the number of the victims, in a little place like Bethlehem, was small enough to escape special record among the wicked acts of Herod from Josephus and other historians, as it had no political interest. Joseph, warned by a dream, flees to Egypt with the young child, beyond the reach of Herod's arm. After the death of Herod, in less than a year, Jesus returned with his parents to their own land, and went to NAZARETH, where they abode. (NAZARENE.) Except as to one event, the Evangelists are silent upon the succeeding years of our Lord's life down to the commencement of His ministry. When He was twelve years old He was found in the Temple, hearing the doctors and asking them questions (ii. 40-52). We are shown this one fact that we may know that at the time when the Jews considered childhood to be passing into youth, Jesus was already aware of His mission, and consciously preparing for it, although years passed before its actual commencement. Thirty years had elapsed from the birth of our Lord to the opening of His ministry. In that time great changes had come over the chosen people. Herod the Great had united under him almost all the original kingdom of David; after the death of that prince it was dismembered forever. It was in the fifteenth year of Tiberius the emperor, reckoning from his joint rule with Augustus (January v. c. 765), and not from his solo rule (August v. c. 767), that JOHN THE BAPTIST began to teach. He was the last representative of the prophets of the old covenant; and his work was twofold—to enforce repentance and the terrors of the old law, and to revive the almost forgotten expectation of the Messiah (Mat. iii. 1-10; Mk. i. 1-8; Lk. iii. 1-18). The career of John seems to have been very short. Jesus came to Jordan with the rest to receive BAPTISM at John's hands: (1.) that the sacrament by which all were hereafter to be admitted into His kingdom might not want His example to justify its use (Mat. iii. 15); (2.) that John might have an assurance that his course as the herald of Christ was now completed by His appearance (Jn. i. 33); (3.) that some public token might be given that He was indeed the Anointed of God (Heb. v. 5). Immediately after this inauguration of His ministry, Jesus was led up of the Spirit into the wilderness to be tempted of the devil (Mat. iv. 1-11; Mk. i. 12, 13; Lk. iv. 1-13). The three temptations are addressed to the three forms in which the disease of sin makes its appearance on the soul—to the solace of sense, and the love of praise, and the desire of gain (1 Jn. ii. 16). But there is one element common to them all—they are attempts to call up a wilful and wayward spirit in contrast to a patient, self-denying one. There are internal marks that Matthew assigns them their historical order; Luke transposes the two last.—Deserting for a time the historical order, we shall find that the records of this first portion of His ministry, from the temptation to the transfiguration, consist mainly—(1.) of miracles, which prove His divine commission; (2.) of discourses and parables on the doctrine of "the kingdom of heaven;" (3.) of incidents showing the behavior of various persons when brought into contact with our Lord. The two former may require some general remarks; the last will unfold themselves with the narrative.—1. The Miracles. The expectation that Messiah would work MIRACLES existed among the people, and was founded on the language of prophecy. Our Lord's miracles are described in the N. T. by several names: they are "signs," "wonders," "works" (most frequently in Jn.), and "mighty works," according to the point of view from which they are regarded. They are indeed astonishing works, wrought as signs of the might and presence of God; and they are powers or mighty works, because they are such as no power short of the divine could have effected. But if the object had been merely to work wonders, without any other aim than to astonish the minds of the witnesses, the miracles of our Lord would not have been the best means of producing the effect, since many of them were wrought for the good of obscure people, before witnesses chiefly of the humble and uneducated class, and in the course of the ordinary life of our Lord, which lay not among those who made it their special business to inquire into the claims of a prophet. The miracles of our Lord were to be not wonders merely, but signs; and not merely signs of preternatural power, but of the scope and character of His ministry, and of the divine nature of His Person. This will be evident from an examination of those which are more particularly described in the Gospels. Nearly forty cases of this kind appear; but they are only examples taken out of a very great number (Jn. ii. 23; Mat. viii. 16, iv. 23, xii. 15, &c.). There are three instances of restoration to life (Mat. ix. 18; Lk. vii. 11, 12; Jn. xi. 1, &c.). There are about six cases of demoniac possession (Mk. i. 24, v. 2; Mat. ix. 32, xvii. 15; Lk. xi. 15; Mat. xv. 22). (DEMONIACS.) There are about seventeen recorded cases of the cure of bodily sickness, including fever, leprosy, palsy, inveterate weakness, the maimed limb, the issue of blood of twelve years' standing, dropsy, blindness, deafness, and dumbness (Jn. iv. 47; Mat. viii. 2, 14, ix. 2; Jn. v. 5; Mat. xii. 10, viii. 5, ix. 20, 27; Mk. viii. 22; Jn. ix. 1; Lk. xiii. 10, xvii. 11, xviii. 35, xxii. 51). These three groups of miracles pertain to one class: they brought help to the suffering or sorrowing, and proclaimed what love the Man that did them bore toward the children of men. There is another class, showing a complete control over the powers of nature: first, by acts of creative power (Jn. ii. 7, vi. 10; Mat. xv. 32); secondly, by setting aside natural laws and conditions (Lk. iv. 30, v. 4; Jn. xxi. 6; Mat. viii. 26, xiv. 25, xvii. 1, 27). In a third class of these miracles we find our Lord overawing the wills of men; as when He twice cleared the Temple of the traders (Jn. ii. 13; Mat. xxi. 12); and when His look staggered the officers that came to take Him (Jn. xviii. 6). And in a fourth subdivision will stand one miracle only, where His power was used for destruction—the case of the barren fig-tree (Mat. xxi. 18). On reviewing all the recorded miracles, we see at once that they are signs of the nature of Christ's Person and mission. They show how active and unwearying was His love: they also show the diversity of its operation. The miracles were intended to attract the witnesses of them to become followers of Jesus and members of the kingdom of heaven. They have then two purposes, the proximate and subordinate purpose of doing a work of love to them that need it, and the higher purpose of revealing Christ in His own Person and nature as the Son of God and Saviour of men.—2. The Parables. Nearly fifty parables are preserved in the Gospels, and they are only selected from a larger number (Mk. iv. 33). In the PARABLE some story of ordinary doings is made to convey a spiritual meaning, beyond what the narrative itself contains. In reference to this kind of teaching, some have hastily concluded from our Lord's words (Lk. viii. 10) that the parable was employed to conceal knowledge from those who were not susceptible of it, and that this was its chief purpose. But it was chosen not for this negative object, but for its positive advantages in the instruction of the disciples. If there was any mode of teaching better suited than another to the purpose of preserving truths for the memory that were not accepted by the heart, that mode would be the best suited to their peculiar position. Eastern teachers have made this mode of instruction familiar: the originality of the parables lay not in the method of teaching by stories, but in the profound and new truths which the stories taught so aptly.—Besides the parables, the more direct teaching of our Lord is conveyed in many discourses dispersed through the Gospels, of which three may be here selected as examples: the Sermon on the Mount (Mat. v.-vii.), the discourse after the feeding of the five thousand (Jn. vi. 22-65), and the final discourse and prayer which preceded the Passion (xiv.-xvii.). Notwithstanding the endeavor to establish that the Sermon on the Mount of St. Matthew is different from the Sermon on the Plain of St. Luke, the evidence for their being one and the same discourse greatly preponderates. If so, then its historical position must be fixed from Luke; and its earlier place in Matthew must be owing to the Evangelist's wish to commence the account of the ministry of Jesus with a summary of His teaching. From Luke we learn that Jesus had gone up into a mountain to pray, that on the morning following He made up the number of His twelve apostles, and solemnly appointed them; and then descending He stood upon a level place (Lk. vi. 17), not necessarily at the bottom of the mountain, but where the multitude would stand round and hear; and there He taught them in a solemn address the laws and constitution of His new kingdom, the kingdom of Heaven. The differences between the reports of the two Evangelists are many. In the former Gospel the sermon occupies one hundred and seven verses; in the latter, thirty. The longer report includes the exposition of the relation of the Gospel to the Law: it also draws together, as we have seen, some passages which Luke reports elsewhere and in another connection; and where the two contain the same matter, that of Luke is somewhat more compressed. But in taking account of this, the purpose of Matthew is to be borne in mind: the morality of the Gospel is to be fully set forth at the beginning of our Lord's ministry, and especially in its bearing on the Law as usually received by the Jews, for whose use especially this Gospel was designed. And when this discourse is compared with the later examples to which we shall presently refer, the fact comes out more distinctly, that we have here the Code of the Christian Lawgiver rather than the whole Gospel.—The next example of the teaching of Jesus must be taken from a later epoch in His ministry. Probably the great discourse in Jn. vi. took place about the time of the Transfiguration. The effect of His personal work on the disciples now becomes the prominent subject. He had taught them that He was the Christ, and had given them His law, wider and deeper far than that of Moses. But the objection to every law applies more strongly the purer and higher the law is; and "how to perform that which I will" is a question that grows more difficult to answer as the standard of obedience is raised. It is that question which our Lord proceeds to answer here. The Redeemer alludes to His death, to the body which shall suffer on the Cross, and to the blood which shall be poured out. This great sacrifice is not only to be looked on, but to be believed: and not only believed, but appropriated to the believer, to become part of his very heart and life. Faith, here as elsewhere, is the means of apprehending it: but when it is once laid hold of, it will be as much a part of the believer as the food that nourishes the body becomes incorporated with the body. Many of the disciples went back and walked no more with Jesus, because their conviction that He was the Messiah had no real foundation. The rest remained with Him for the reason so beautifully expressed by Peter: "Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life. And we believe and are sure that Thou art that Christ, the Son of the living God" (Jn. vi. 68, 69).—The third example of our Lord's discourses is that which closes His ministry. This great discourse, recorded only by St. John, extends from the thirteenth to the end of the seventeenth chapter. It hardly admits of analysis. It announces the Saviour's departure in the fulfilment of His mission; it imposes the new commandment on the disciples of a special love toward each other which should be the outward token to the world of their Christian profession; it consoles them with the promise of the Comforter who should be to them instead of the Saviour; it tells them all that He should do for them, teaching them, reminding them, reproving them, and guiding the disciples into all truth. It offers them, instead of the bodily presence of their beloved Master, free access to the throne of His Father, and spiritual blessings such as they had not known before. Finally, it culminates in that sublime prayer (chapter xvii.) by which the High-priest as it were consecrates Himself the victim. These three discourses are examples of the Saviour's teaching—of its progressive character from the opening of His ministry to the close.—The Scene of the Lord's Ministry. As to the scene of the ministry of Christ, no less than as to its duration, the three evangelists seem at first sight to be at variance with the fourth. Matthew, Mark, and Luke record only our Lord's doings in Galilee; if we put aside a few days before the Passion, we find that they never mention His visiting Jerusalem. John, on the other hand, whilst he records some acts in Galilee, devotes the chief part of his gospel to the transactions in Judea. But when the supplemental character of John's gospel is borne in mind there is little difficulty in explaining this. The three evangelists do not profess to give a chronology of the ministry, but rather a picture of it; notes of time are not frequent in their narrative. And as they chiefly confined themselves to Galilee, where the Redeemer's chief acts were done, they might naturally omit to mention the feasts, which, being passed by our Lord at Jerusalem, added nothing to the materials for His Galilean ministry. (GOSPELS.)—Duration of the Ministry. It is impossible to determine exactly from the GOSPELS the number of years during which the Redeemer exercised His ministry before the Passion; but the doubt lies between two and three; for the opinion adopted from an interpretation of Is. lxi. 2 by more than one of the ancients, that it lasted only one year, cannot be borne out. The data are to be drawn from John. This evangelist mentions six feasts, at five of which Jesus was present; the Passover that followed His baptism (Jn. ii. 13); "a feast of the Jews" (v. 1); a Passover during which Jesus remained in Galilee (vi. 4); the feast of Tabernacles to which the Lord went up privately (vii. 2); the feast of Dedication (x. 22); and lastly the feast of Passover, at which He suffered (xii., xiii.). There are certainly three Passovers, and it is possible that "a feast" (v. 1) may be a fourth. Upon this possibility the question turns. But if this feast is not a Passover, then no Passover is mentioned by John between the first (ii. 13) and that which is spoken of in the sixth chapter; and the time between those two must be assumed to be a single year only. Now, although the record of John of this period contains but few facts, yet when all the evangelists are compared, the amount of labor compressed into this single year would be too much for its compass (see the Harmony under GOSPELS). It is, to say the least, easier to suppose that the "feast" (v. 1) was a Passover, dividing the time into two, and throwing two of these circuits into the second year of the ministry. Upon the whole, though there is nothing that amounts to proof, it is probable that there were four Passovers, and consequently that our Lord's ministry lasted somewhat more than three years, the "beginning of miracles" (Jn. ii.) having been wrought before the first Passover. The year of the first of these Passovers was u. c. 780, and the baptism of our Lord took place either in the beginning of that year or the end of the year preceding.—After this sketch of the means, the scene, and the duration of the Saviour's ministry, the historical order of the events may be followed without interruption. Our Lord has now passed through the ordeal of temptation, and His ministry is begun. At Bethabara, to which He returns, disciples begin to be drawn toward Him; Andrew and another, probably John, the sole narrator of the fact, see Jesus, and hear the Baptist's testimony concerning Him. Andrew brings Simon Peter to see Him also; and he receives from the Lord the name of Cephas. Then Philip and Nathanael are brought into contact with our Lord. The two disciples last named saw Him as He was about to set out for Galilee, on the third day of his sojourn at Bethabara. The third day after this interview Jesus is at Cana in Galilee, and works His first miracle, by making the water wine (Jn. i. 29, 35, 43, ii. 1). He now betakes Himself to Capernaum, and, after a sojourn there of "not many days," sets out for Jerusalem to the Passover, which was to be the beginning of His ministry in Judea (ii. 12, 13). The cleansing of the Temple is associated by John with this first Passover (ii. 12-22), and a similar cleansing is assigned to the last Passover by the other evangelists. These two cannot be confounded without throwing discredit on the historical character of one narrative or the other; the notes of time are too precise. But a host of interpreters have pointed out the probability that an action symbolical of the power and authority of the Messiah should be twice performed, at the opening of the ministry and at its close. The expulsion of the traders was not likely to produce a permanent effect, and at the end of three years Jesus found the tumult and the traffic defiling the court of the Temple as they had done when He visited it before. The visit of Nicodemus to Jesus took place about this first Passover. It implies that our Lord had done more at Jerusalem than is recorded of Him even by John; since we have here a Master of Israel (iii. 10), a member of the Sanhedrim (vii. 50) expressing his belief in Him, although too timid at this time to make an open profession. The object of the visit, though not directly stated, is still clear; he was one of the better Pharisees, who were expecting the kingdom of Messiah, and having seen the miracles that Jesus did, he came to inquire more fully about these signs of its approach. It has been well said that this discourse contains the whole gospel in epitome. After a sojourn at Jerusalem of uncertain duration, Jesus went to the Jordan with His disciples; and they were baptized in His name. The Baptist was now at Enon, near Salim; and the jealousy of his disciples against Jesus drew from John an avowal of his position, which is remarkable for its humility (iii. 27-30). How long this sojourn in Judea lasted is uncertain. But in order to reconcile Jn. iv. 1 with Mat. iv. 12, we must suppose that it was much longer than the "twenty-six or twenty-seven" days to which Mr. Greswell would limit it. In the way to Galilee Jesus passed by the shortest route, through Samaria. In the time of our Lord the Samaritans were hated by the Jews even more than if they had been Gentiles. Yet even in Samaria were souls to be saved. Jesus came in His journey to Sychar. Wearied and athirst He sat on the side of Jacob's well. A woman from the neighboring town came to draw from the well, and was astonished that a Jew should address her as a neighbor, with a request for water. The conversation that ensued might be taken for an example of the mode in which Christ leads to Himself the souls of men. In this remarkable dialogue the living water which Christ would give, the announcement of a change in the worship of Jew and Samaritan, the confession that He who speaks is truly the Messiah, are all noteworthy. Jesus now returned to Galilee, and came to Nazareth, His own city. In the Synagogue He expounded to the people a passage from Isaiah (lxi. 1), telling them that its fulfilment was now at hand in His person. The same truth that had filled the Samaritans with gratitude, wrought up to fury the men of Nazareth, who would have destroyed Him if He had not escaped out of their hands (Lk. iv. 16-30). He came now to Capernaum. On His way hither, when He had reached Cana, He healed the son of one of the courtiers of Herod Antipas (Jn. iv. 46-54), who "himself believed, and his whole house." This was the second Galilean miracle. At Capernaum He wrought many miracles for them that needed. Here two disciples who had known Him before, namely, Simon Peter and Andrew, were called from their fishing to become "fishers of men" (Mat. iv. 19), and the two sons of Zebedee received the same summons. After healing on the Sabbath a demoniac in the Synagogue, a miracle which was witnessed by many, and was made known everywhere, He returned the same day to Simon's house, and healed the mother-in-law of Simon, who was sick of a fever. At sunset, the multitude, now fully aroused by what they had heard, brought their sick to Simon's door to get them healed. He did not refuse His succor, and healed them all (Mk. i. 29-34). He now, after showering down on Capernaum so many cures, turned His thoughts to the rest of Galilee, where other "lost sheep" were scattered:—"Let us go into the next towns that I may preach there also, for therefore came I forth" (i. 38). The journey through Galilee, on which he now entered, must have been a general circuit of that country.—Second Year of the Ministry. Jesus went up to Jerusalem to "a feast of the Jews," which was probably the Passover. At the pool Bethesda (= house of mercy), which was near the sheep-gate (Neh. iii. 1) on the N. E. side of the Temple, Jesus saw many infirm persons waiting their turn for the healing virtues of the water (Jn. v. 1-18). Among them was a man who had an infirmity thirty-eight years: Jesus made him whole by a word, bidding him take up his bed and walk. The miracle was done on the Sabbath; and the Jews who acted against Jesus, rebuked the man for carrying his bed. It was a labor, and as such forbidden (Jer. xvii. 21). In our Lord's justification of Himself, "My Father worketh hitherto, and I work" (Jn. v. 17), there is an unequivocal claim to the divine nature. Another discussion about the Sabbath arose from the disciples plucking the ears of corn as they went through the fields (Mat. xii. 1-8). The time of this is somewhat uncertain; some would place it a year later, just after the third Passover: but its place is much more probably here. Our Lord quotes cases where the law is superseded or set aside, because He is One who has power to do the same. And the rise of a new law is implied in those words which Mark alone (ii. 27) has recorded: "The Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath." The law upon the Sabbath was made in love to men, to preserve for them a due measure of rest, to keep room for the worship of God. The Son of Man has power to readjust this law, if its work is done, or if men are fit to receive a higher. This may have taken place on the way to Jerusalem after the Passover. On another Sabbath, probably at Capernaum, to which Jesus had returned, the Pharisees gave a far more striking proof of the way in which their hard and narrow and unloving interpretation would turn the beneficence of the Law into a blighting oppression. Our Lord entered into the Synagogue, and found there a man with a withered hand—some poor artisan perhaps whose handiwork was his means of life. Jesus was about to heal him—which would give back life to the sufferer—which would give joy to every beholder who had one touch of pity in his heart. The Pharisees interfere: "Is it lawful to heal on the Sabbath-day?" Their doctors would have allowed them to pull a sheep out of a pit; but they will not have a man rescued from the depth of misery. Rarely is that loving Teacher wroth, but here His anger, mixed with grief, showed itself: He looked round about upon them "with anger, being grieved at the hardness of their hearts," and answered their cavils by healing the man (Mat. xii. 9-14; Mk. iii. 1-6; Lk. vi. 6-11). In placing the ordination or calling of the twelve apostles just before the Sermon on the Mount, we are under the guidance of Luke (vi. 13, 17). But this more solemn separation for their work by no means marks the time of their first approach to Jesus. That which takes place here is the appointment of twelve disciples to be a distinct body, under the name of apostles. (APOSTLES.) They are not sent forth to preach until later in the same year. The number must have reference to the number of the Jewish tribes; it is a number selected on account of its symbolical meaning, for the work confided to them might have been wrought by more or fewer. In the four lists of the names of the apostles preserved to us (Mat. x.; Mk. iii.; Lk. vi.; Acts i.), there is a certain order preserved, amidst variations. The two pairs of brothers, Simon and Andrew, and the sons of Zebedee, are always named the first; and of these Simon Peter ever holds the first place. Philip and Bartholomew, Thomas and Matthew, are always in the next rank; and of them Philip is always the first. In the third rank James the son of Alphaeus is the first, as Judas Iscariot is always the last, with Simon the Zealot and Thaddeus between. Some of the apostles were certainly poor, and unlearned men; probably the rest were of the same kind. Four of them were fishermen, not indeed the poorest of their class; and a fifth was a "publican," one of the tax-gatherers, who collected the taxes farmed by Romans of higher rank. From henceforth the education of the twelve apostles will be one of the principal features of the Lord's ministry. First He instructs them; then He takes them with Him as companions of His wayfaring; then He sends them forth to teach and heal for Him. The Sermon on the Mount, although it is meant for all the disciples, seems to have a special reference to the chosen Twelve (Mat. v. 11). About this time it was that John the Baptist, long a prisoner with little hope of release, sent his disciples to Jesus with the question, "Art thou He that should come, or do we look for another?" (Mat. xi. 1-6; Lk. vii. 18-23). In all the Gospels there is no more touching incident. The great privilege of John's life was that he was appointed to recognize and bear witness to the Messiah (Jn. i. 81). After languishing a year in a dungeon, after learning that even yet Jesus had made no steps toward the establishment of His kingdom of the Jews, and that His following consisted of only twelve poor Galileans, doubts began to cloud over his spirit. Was the kingdom of Messiah as near as he had thought? Was Jesus not the Messiah, but some forerunner of that Deliverer, as he himself had been? There is no unbelief; he does not suppose that Jesus has deceived; when the doubts arise, it is to Jesus that he submits them. But it was not without great depression and perplexity that he put the question, "Art thou He that should come?" The scope of the answer given lies in its recalling John to the grounds of his former confidence. (JOHN THE BAPTIST.) Now commences the second circuit of Galilee (Lk. viii. 1-3), to which belong the parables in Mat. xiii.; the visit of our Lord's mother and brethren (Lk. viii. 19-21), and the account of His reception at Nazareth (Mk. vi. 1-6). During this time the twelve have journeyed with Him. But now a third circuit in Galilee is recorded, which probably occurred during the last three months of this year (Mat. ix. 35-38); and during this circuit, after reminding them how great is the harvest and how pressing the need of laborers, He carries the training of the disciples one step further by sending them forth by themselves to teach (x., xi.). They went forth two and two; and our Lord continued His own circuit (xi. 1), with what companions does not appear. After a journey of perhaps two months' duration the twelve return to Jesus, and give an account of their ministry. The third Passover was now drawing near; but the Lord did not go up to it. He wished to commune with His apostles privately upon their work, and, we may suppose, to add to the instruction they had already received from Him (Mk. vi. 30, 31). He therefore went with them from the neighborhood of Capernaum to a mountain on the eastern shore of the Sea of Tiberias, near Bethsaida Julia, not far from the head of the sea. Great multitudes pursued them; and here the Lord, moved to compassion by the hunger and weariness of the people, wrought for them one of His most remarkable miracles. Out of five barley loaves and two small fishes, He produced food for 5,000 men besides women and children. After the miracle the disciples crossed the sea, and Jesus retired alone to a mountain to commune with the Father. They were toiling at the oar, for the wind was contrary, when, as the night drew toward morning, they saw Jesus walking to them on the sea, having passed the whole night on the mountain. They were amazed and terrified. He came into the ship and the wind ceased. When they reached the shore of Gennesaret the whole people showed their faith in Him as a Healer of disease (Mk. vi. 53-56); and He performed very many miracles on them. Yet on the next day the great discourse already examined (Jn. vi.) was uttered, and "from that time many of His disciples went back and walked no more with Him" (vi. 66).—Third Year of the Ministry. Hearing perhaps that Jesus was not coming to the feast, Scribes and Pharisees from Jerusalem went down to see Him at Capernaum (Mat. xv. 1). They found fault with His disciples for breaking the tradition about purifying, and eating with unwashed hands. Our Lord in His answer tries to show them how far external rule, claiming to be religious, may lead men away from the true spirit of the Gospel. Leaving the neighborhood of Capernaum our Lord now travels to the N. W. of Galilee, to the region of Tyre and Sidon. The time is not strictly determined, but it was probably the early summer of this year. It does not appear that He retired into this heathen country for the purpose of ministering; more probably it was a retreat from the machinations of the Jews. Here, in answer to the admirable faith and humility of the Syrophenician woman, He healed her daughter who was tormented with an evil spirit (xv. 21-28; Mk. vii. 24-30). Returning thence He passed round by the N. of the Sea of Galilee to the region of Decapolis on its eastern side (vii. 31-37). In this district He performed many miracles, and especially the restoration of a deaf man who had an impediment in his speech, remarkable for the seeming effort with which He wrought it. To these succeeded the feeding of the 4,000 with the seven loaves (Mat. xv. 32). He now crossed the lake to Magdala, where the Pharisees and Sadducees asked and were refused a "sign." After they had departed Jesus crossed the lake with His disciples. At Bethsaida Julia, He restored sight to a blind man; and here, as in a former case, the form and preparation which He adopted are to be remarked (Mk. viii. 22-26). The ministry in Galilee is now drawing to its close. Through the length and breadth of that country Jesus has proclaimed the kingdom of Christ, and has shown by mighty works that He is the Christ that was to come. The lengthened journeys through the land, the miracles, far more than are recorded in detail, had brought the Gospel home to all the people. Capernaum was the focus of His ministry. Through Chorazin and Bethsaida He had no doubt passed with crowds behind Him, drawn together by wonders that they had seen, and by the hope of others to follow them. Many thousands had actually been benefited by the miracles; but the great mass had heard without earnestness the preached word, and forgotten it without regret. With this rejection an epoch of the history is connected. He begins to unfold now the doctrine of His passion more fully. The doctrine of a suffering Messiah, so plainly exhibited in the prophets, had receded from sight in the current religion of that time. The announcement of it to the disciples was at once new and shocking. Turning now to the whole body of those who followed Him, He published the Christian doctrine of self-denial. The apostles had just shown that they took the natural view of suffering, that it was an evil to be shunned. They shrank from conflict, and pain, and death, as it is natural men should. But Jesus teaches that, in comparison with the higher life, the life of the soul, the life of the body is valueless (Mat. xvi. 21-28; Mk. viii. 31-38; Lk. ix. 22-27). The Transfiguration, which took place just a week after this conversation, is to be understood in connection with it. The minds of the twelve were greatly disturbed at what they had heard. Now, if ever, they needed support for their perplexed spirits, and this their loving Master failed not to give them. He takes with Him three chosen disciples, Peter, John, and James, who formed as it were a smaller circle nearer to Jesus than the rest, into a high mountain apart by themselves. (HEZEMON; TABOR.) The three disciples were taken up with Him, who should afterward be the three witnesses of His agony in the garden of Gethsemane: those who saw His glory in the holy mount would be sustained by the remembrance of it when they beheld His lowest humiliation. The calmness and exactness of the narrative preclude all doubt as to its historical character. He was praying, and a great change came over Him. "His face did shine as the sun" (Mat.); "and His raiment became shining, exceeding white as snow; so as no fuller on earth can white them" (Mk.). Beside Him appeared Moses and Elijah; and they spake of His departure, as though it was something recognized both by Law and prophets. The three disciples were at first asleep with weariness; and when they woke, they saw the glorious scene. As Moses and Elijah were departing (Lk.), Peter, wishing to arrest them, uttered those words, "Lord, it is good for us to be here, and let us make three tabernacles, one for Thee, and one for Moses, and one for Elijah." Just as he spoke, a cloud came over them, and the voice of the Heavenly Father attested once more His Son—"This is My beloved Son; hear Him." There has been much discussion on the purport of this great wonder. But thus much seems highly probable: (1.) as it was connected with the prayer of Jesus, to which it was no doubt an answer, it is to be regarded as a kind of inauguration of Him in His new office as the High-priest who should make atonement for the sins of the people with His own blood: (2.) as the witnesses of this scene were the same three disciples who were with the Master in the garden of Gethsemane, it may be assumed that the one was intended to prepare them for the other. As they came down from the mountain He charged them to keep secret what they had seen till after the Resurrection; which shows that this miracle took place for His use and for theirs, rather than for the rest of the disciples (Mat. xvii. 1-13; Mk. ix. 2-13; Lk. ix. 28-36). Meantime amongst the multitude below a scene was taking place which formed the strongest contrast to the glory and the peace which they had witnessed, and which seemed to justify Peter's remark, "It is good for us to be here." A poor youth, lunatic and possessed by a devil, was brought to the disciples who were not with Jesus, to be cured. They could not prevail; and when Jesus appeared amongst them the agonized and disappointed father appealed to Him, with a kind of complaint of the impotence of the disciples. What the disciples had failed to do, Jesus did at a word. He then explained to them that their want of faith in their own power to heal, and in His promises to bestow the power upon them, was the cause of their inability (Mat. xvii. 11-21; Mk. ix. 14-29; Lk. ix. 37-43). Once more did Jesus foretell His sufferings on their way back to Capernaum; but "they understood not that saying, and were afraid to ask Him" (Mk. ix. 30-32).

—From the Feast of Tabernacles, Third Year. The Feast of Tabernacles was now approaching. His brothers set out for the feast without Him, and He abode in Galilee for a few days longer (Jn. vii. 2-10). Afterward He set out, taking the more direct but less frequented route by Samaria. Luke alone (x. 1-16) records, in connection with this journey, the sending forth of the seventy disciples. This event is to be regarded in a different light from that of the twelve. The seventy had received no special education from our Lord, and their commission was of a temporary kind. The number has reference to the Gentiles, as twelve had to the Jews; and the scene of the work, Samaria, reminds us that this is a movement directed toward the stranger. After healing the ten lepers in Samaria, He came about the midst of the feast to Jerusalem. The Pharisees and rulers sought to take Him; some of the people, however, believed in Him, but concealed their opinion for fear of the rulers. To this division of opinion we may attribute the failure of the repeated attempts on the part of the Sanhedrim to take One who was openly teaching in the Temple (Jn. vii. 11-53: see especially ver. 30, 32, 44, 45, 46). The officers were partly afraid to seize in the presence of the people the favorite Teacher; and partly were themselves awed and attracted by Him. The history of the woman taken in adultery (viii. 1-11) belongs to this time. To this place belongs the account, given by John alone, of the healing of one who was born blind, and the consequences of it (ix. 1-41, x. 1-21). The well-known parable of the good shepherd is an answer to the calumny of the Pharisees, that He was an impostor and breaker of the law, "This man is not of God, because he keepeth not the Sabbath-day" (ix. 16).

—We now approach a difficult portion of the sacred history. The note of time given us by John immediately afterward is the Feast of the Dedication, which was celebrated on the 25th of Chisleu, answering nearly to December. According to this Evangelist our Lord does not appear to have returned to Galilee between the Feast of Tabernacles and that of Dedication, but to have passed the time, in and near Jerusalem. Matthew and Mark do not allude to the Feast of Tabernacles. Luke appears to do so in ix. 51: but the words there used would imply that this was the last journey to Jerusalem. Now in Luke a large section (ix. 51-xviii. 14) seems to belong to the time preceding the departure from Galilee; and the question is, how is this to be arranged, so that it shall harmonize with the narrative of John? In most Harmonies a return of our Lord to Galilee has been assumed, in order to find a place for this part of Luke. In the table of the Harmony of the GOSPELS, Lk. x. 17-xviii. 14 is inserted entire between Jn. x. 21 and 22, because there are no points of contact with the other Gospels to assist us in breaking it up. Some of the most striking parables, preserved only by Luke, belong to this period. The parables of the good Samaritan, the prodigal son, the unjust steward, the rich man and Lazarus, and the Pharisee and publican, all peculiar to this Gospel, belong to the present section. The instructive account of Mary and Martha and the miracle of the ten lepers belong to this portion of the narrative. Besides these, scattered sayings that occur in Matthew are here repeated in a new connection. The account of the bringing of young children to Jesus unites again the three Evangelists (Mat. xix. 13-15; Mk. x. 13-16; Lk. xviii. 15-17). The ruler to whom our Lord gave the special advice to sell all his possessions, and to give to the poor, discovered then for the first time that his devotion to God and his yearning after eternal life were not so perfect as he had thought; and he went away sorrowful, unable to bear this sacrifice. Peter now contrasts the mode in which the disciples had left all for Him, with the conduct of this rich ruler. Our Lord tells them that those who have made any sacrifice shall have it richly repaid (Mat. xix. 16-30; Mk. x. 17-31; Lk. xviii. 18-30). Words of warning close the narrative, and in Matthew only the parable of the laborers in the vineyard is added to caution the apostles against thinking too much of their early calling and arduous labors. Not merit, not self-sacrifice, but the pure love of God and His mere bounty confer salvation (Mat. xx. 1-16). On the way to Jerusalem through Perea, to the Feast of Dedication, Jesus again puts before the minds of the twelve what they are never now to forget, the sufferings that await Him. They "understood none of these things," for they could not reconcile this foreboding of suffering with the signs and announcements of the coming of His kingdom (Mat. xx. 17-19; Mk. x. 32-34; Lk. xviii. 31-34). In consequence of this new, though dark, intimation of the coming of the kingdom, Salome, with her two sons, James and John, came to bespeak the two places of highest honor in the kingdom. Jesus tells them that they know not what they ask; that the places of honor in the kingdom shall be bestowed, not by Jesus in answer to a chance request, but upon those for whom they are prepared by the Father. As sin ever provokes sin, the ambition of the ten was now aroused, and they began to be much displeased with James and John. Jesus once more recalls the principle that the childlike disposition is that which He approves (Mat. xx. 20-28; Mk. x. 35-45). The healing of the two blind men at Jericho is chiefly remarkable among the miracles from the difficulty which has arisen in harmonizing the accounts. Matthew speaks of two blind men, and of the occasion as the departure from Jericho; Mark, of one whom he names, and of their arrival at Jericho; and Luke agrees with him. This point has received much discussion; but the view of Lightfoot finds favor with many eminent expositors, that there were two blind men, and both were healed under similar circumstances, except that BARTIMEUS was on one side of the city, and was healed by Jesus as He entered, and the other was healed on the other side as they departed (Mat. xx. 29-34; Mk. x. 46-52; Lk. xviii. 35-43). The calling of ZACCHAEUS has more than a mere personal interest. He was a publican, one of a class hated and despised by the Jews. But he was one who sought to serve God. From such did Jesus wish to call His disciples, whether they were publicans or not (Lk. xix. 1-10). We have reached now the Feast of Dedication; but, as has been said, the exact place of the events in Luke about this part of the ministry has not been conclusively determined. After being present at the feast, Jesus returned to Bethabara beyond Jordan, where John had formerly baptized, and abode there. How long He remained here does not appear. It was probably for some weeks. The sore need of a family in Bethany, who were what men call the intimate friends of our Lord, called Him thence. LAZARUS was sick, and his sisters sent word of it to Jesus, whose power they well knew. It was not till Lazarus had been four days in the grave that the Saviour appeared on the scene. But with the power of God He breaks the fetters of brass in which Lazarus was held by death, and at His word the man, on whom corruption had already begun to do its work, came forth alive and whole (Jn. xi. 1-45). A miracle so public, for Bethany was close to Jerusalem, and the family of Lazarus well known to many people in the mother-city, could not escape the notice of the Sanhedrim. A meeting of this Council was called without loss of time, and the matter discussed. The members believed that a popular outbreak, with Jesus at its head, was impending, and that it would excite the jealousy of the Romans, and lead to the taking away of their "place and nation." CAIAPHAS the high-priest gave it as his opinion that it was expedient for them that one man should die for the people, and that the whole nation should not perish. The Evangelist adds that these words bore a prophetic meaning, of which the speaker was unconscious. The connection between his office and the prophecy was not a necessary one; but if a prophecy was to be uttered by unwilling lips, it was natural that the high-priest, who offered for the people, should be the person compelled to utter it. The death of Jesus was now resolved on, and He fled to Ephraim for a few days, because His hour was not yet come (xi. 45-47). We now approach the final stage of the history, and every word and act tend toward the great act of suffering. Each day is marked by its own events or instructions. Our Lord entered into Bethany on Friday the 8th of Nisan, the eve of the Sabbath, and remained over the Sabbath.—Saturday the 9th of Nisan (April 1st). As He was at supper in the house of one Simon, surnamed "the leper," a relation of Lazarus, who was at table with Him, Mary, full of gratitude for the wonderful raising of her brother from the dead, took a vessel containing a quantity of pure ointment of spikenard, and anointed the feet of Jesus, and wiped His feet with her hair, and anointed his head likewise.—Passion Week. Sunday the 10th day of Nisan (April 2d). When He arrives at the Mount of Olives He commands two of His disciples to go into the village near at hand, where they would find an ass, and a colt tied with her. With these beasts, impressed as for the service of a king, He was to enter into Jerusalem. The disciples spread upon the ass their ragged cloaks for Him to sit on. And the multitudes cried aloud before Him, in the words of the 118th Psalm, "Hosanna, Save now! blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord." All the city was moved. Blind and lame came to the Temple when He arrived there, and were healed. But Christ wept over the city that was hailing Him as its king, and prophesied its destruction, just as it afterward came to pass. After working miracles in the Temple He returned to Bethany. The 10th of Nisan was the day for the separation of the paschal lamb (Ex. xii. 3). Jesus, the Lamb of God, entered Jerusalem and the Temple on this day, and although none but He knew that He was the Paschal Lamb, the coincidence is not undesigned (Mat. xxi. 1-11, 14-17; Mk. xi. 1-11; Lk. xix. 29-44; Jn. xii. 12-19).—Monday the 11th of Nisan (April 3d). The next day Jesus returned to Jerusalem, again to take advantage of the mood of the people to instruct them. On the way he approached one of the many fig-trees which grew in that quarter, and found that it was full of foliage, but without fruit. (Fig.) He said, "No man eat fruit of thee hereafter forever!" and the fig-tree withered away (Mat. xxi. 18, 19; Mk. xi. 12-14). Proceeding now to the Temple, He cleared its court of the crowd of traders that gathered there (Mat. xxi. 12, 13; Mk. xi. 15-19; Lk. xix. 45-48). In the evening He returned again to Bethany.—Tuesday the 12th of Nisan (April 4th). On this the third day of Passion week, Jesus went into Jerusalem as before, and visited the Temple. The Sanhedrim came to Him to call Him to account for the clearing of the Temple. "By what authority doest thou these things?" The Lord answered their question by another—what was their opinion of the baptism of John? They refused to answer, and Jesus refused in like manner to answer them. To this time belong the parables of the two sons (Mat. xxi. 28-32; Mk. xi. 27-33; Lk. xx. 1-8), of the wicked husbandman, and of the wedding garment (Mat. xxi. 33-46, xxii. 1-14; Mk. xii. 1-12; Lk. xx. 9-19). Not content with their plans for His death, the different parties, first the Pharisees and Herodians, next the Sadducees, unsuccessfully try to entangle Him in argument, and to bring Him into contempt. Jesus now retorts the argument on the Sadducees (Mat. xxii. 15-33; Mk. xii. 13-27; Lk. xx. 20-40). Fresh questions awaited Him; but His wisdom never failed to give the appropriate answer. And then He uttered to all the people that terrible denunciation of woe to the Pharisees with which we are familiar (Mat. xxiii. 1-39). After an indignant denunciation of the hypocrites, He apostrophizes Jerusalem in words full of compassion, yet carrying with them a sentence of death (xxiii.). Another great discourse belongs to this day, which, more than any other, presents Jesus as the great Prophet of His people. On leaving the Temple, His disciples drew attention to the beauty of its structure, "its goodly stones and gifts," their remarks probably arising from the threats of destruction which had so lately been uttered by Jesus. Their Master answered that not one stone of the noble pile should be left upon another. When they reached the Mount of Olives, the disciples, or rather the first four (Mk.), speaking for the rest, asked him when this destruction should be accomplished. To understand the answer, it must be borne in mind that Jesus warned them that He was not giving them an historical account such as would enable them to anticipate the events. "Of that day and hour knoweth no man, no, not the angels of heaven, but my Father only." Exact data of time are to be purposely withheld from them. Accordingly two events, analogous in character but widely sundered by time, are so treated in the prophecy that it is almost impossible to disentangle them. The destruction of Jerusalem and the day of judgment—the national and the universal days of account—are spoken of together or alternately without hint of the great interval of time that separates them (Mat. xxiv.; Mk. xiii.; Lk. xxi.). The conclusion which Jesus drew from His own awful warning was, that they were not to attempt to fix the date of His return. The lesson of the parable of the Ten Virgins is the same (Mat. xxiv. 44, xxv. 13). And the parable of the Talents, here repeated in a modified form, teaches how precious to souls are the uses of time (xxv. 14-30). In concluding this momentous discourse, our Lord puts aside the destruction of Jerusalem, and displays to our eyes the picture of the final judgment (xxv. 31-46). With these weighty words ends the third day.—Wednesday the 13th of Nisan (April 5th). This day was passed in retirement with the apostles. Satan had put it into the mind of one of them to betray Him; and JUDAS ISCARIOT made a covenant to betray Him to the chief priests for thirty pieces of silver (Mat. xxvi. 14-16; Mk. xiv. 10, 11; Lk. xxii. 1-6).—Thursday the 14th of Nisan (April 6th). On "the first day of unleavened bread," the disciples asked their Master where they were to eat the Passover. He directed Peter and John to go into Jerusalem, and to follow a man whom they should see bearing a pitcher of water, and to demand of him, in their Master's name, the use of the guestchamber in his house for this purpose. All happened as Jesus had told them, and in the evening they assembled to celebrate, for the last time, the paschal meal. The sequence of the events is not quite clear, but the order seems to be as follows. When they had taken their places at table, and the supper had begun, Jesus gave them the first cup to divide among themselves (Lk.). It was customary to drink at the paschal supper four cups of wine mixed with water; and this answered to the first of them.

(PASSOVER.) There now arose a contention among the disciples which of them should be the greatest; perhaps in connection with the places which they had taken at this feast (Lk.). After a solemn warning against pride and ambition, Jesus performed an act which, as one of the last of His life, must ever have been remembered by the witnesses as a great lesson of humility. He rose from the table, poured water into a basin, girded Himself with a towel, and proceeded to wash the disciples' feet (Jn.). After all had been washed, the Saviour explained to them the meaning of what He had done. "If I, your Lord and Master, have washed your feet, ye also ought to wash one another's feet. For I have given you an example, that ye should do as I have done to you" (Mat. xxvi. 17-20; Mk. xiv. 12-17; Lk. xxii. 7-30; Jn. xiii. 1-20). (WASHING THE HANDS AND FEET.) From this act of love it does not seem that even the traitor Judas was excluded. But his treason was thoroughly known; and now Jesus denounces it. One of them should betray Him. The traitor having gone straight to his wicked object, the end of the Saviour's ministry seemed already at hand. He gave them the new commandment, to love one another, as though it were a last bequest to them (Mat. xxvi. 21-25; Mk. xiv. 18-21; Lk. xxii. 21-23; Jn. xiii. 21-35). Toward the close of the meal Jesus instituted the sacrament of the LORD'S SUPPER (Mat. xxvi. 26-29; Mk. xiv. 22-25; Lk. xxii. 19, 20; 1 Cor. xi. 23-25). The denial of Peter is now foretold, and to no one would such an announcement be more incredible than to Peter himself (Mat. xxvi. 31-35; Mk. xiv. 27-31; Lk. xxii. 31-38; Jn. xiii. 36-38). That great final discourse, which John alone has recorded, is now delivered (see above). Although in the middle of it there is a mention of departure (Jn. xiv. 31), this perhaps only implies that they prepared to go; and then the whole discourse was delivered in the house before they proceeded to Gethsemane (xiv.-xvii.).—Friday the 15th of Nisan (April 7th), including part of the eve of it. "When they had sung a hymn," which perhaps means, when they had sung the second part of the Hallel (HALLELUJAH), or song of praise, which consisted of Ps. cxv.-cxviii., the former part (cxlii.-cxlv.) having been sung at an earlier part of the supper, they went out into the Mount of Olives. Jesus takes only His three proved companions, Peter, James, and John, and passes with them farther into the garden, leaving the rest seated, probably near the entrance. No pen can attempt to describe what passed that night in that secluded spot. He tells them "My soul is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death: tarry ye here and watch with me," and then leaving even the three He goes farther, and in solitude wrestles with an inconceivable trial. The words of Mark are still more expressive—"He began to be sore amazed, and to be very heavy" (xiv. 33). The former word means that He was struck with a great dread; not from the fear of physical suffering, however excruciating, we may well believe, but from the contact with the sins of the world, of which, in some inconceivable way, He felt the bitterness and the weight. He did not merely contemplate them, but bear and feel them. It is impossible to explain this scene in GETHSEMANE in any other way. The disciples have sunk to sleep. It was in search of consolation that He came back to them. The disciple who had been so ready to ask "Why cannot I follow thee now?" must hear another question, that rebukes his former confidence—"Couldst not thou watch one hour?" A second time He departs and wrestles in prayer with the Father. A second time He returns and finds them sleeping. The same scene is repeated yet a third time; and then all is concluded. Henceforth they may sleep and take their rest; never more shall they be asked to watch one hour with Jesus, for His ministry in the flesh is at an end. This scene is in complete contrast to the Transfiguration (Mat. xxvi. 36-46; Mk. xiv. 32-42; Lk. xxii. 39-46; Jn. xviii. 1). (AGONY; SWEAT, BLOODY.) Judas now appeared to complete his work. In the doubtful light of torches, a kiss from him was the sign to the officers whom they should take. Peter, whose name is first given in John's Gospel, drew a sword and smote a servant of the high-priest and cut off his ear; but His Lord refused such succor, and healed the wounded man. All the disciples forsook him and fled (Mat. xxvi. 47-56; Mk. xiv. 43-52; Lk. xxii. 47-58; Jn. xviii. 2-12). There is some difficulty in arranging the events that immediately follow, so as to embrace all the four accounts. On the capture of Jesus He was first taken to the house of ANNAS, the father-in-law of Caiaphas the high-priest. It might appear from the course of John's narrative that the examination of our Lord, and the first denial of Peter, took place in the house of Annas (Jn. xviii. 13, 14). But the 24th verse is retrospective; and probably all that occurred after verse 14 took place not at the house of Annas, but at that of Caiaphas. The house of the high-priest consisted probably, like other Eastern houses, of an open central court with chambers round it. Into this court a gate admitted them, at which a woman stood to open. As Peter passed in, the portress took note of him; and afterward, at the fire which had been lighted, asked him, "Art not thou also one of this man's disciples?" (Jn.). All the zeal and boldness of Peter seems to have deserted him. He had come as in secret; he is determined so to remain, and he denies his Master! Feeling now the danger of his situation, he went out into the porch, and there some one, or, looking at all the accounts, probably several persons, asked him the question a second time, and he denied more strongly. About an hour after, when he had returned into the court, the same question was put to him a third time, with the same result. Then the cock crew; and Jesus, who was within sight, probably in some open room communicating with the court, "turned and looked upon Peter. And Peter remembered the word of our Lord, how He had said unto him, Before the cock crow thou shalt deny me thrice. And Peter went out and wept bitterly" (Mat. xxvi. 57, 58, 69-75; Mk. xiv. 53, 54, 66-72; Lk. xxii. 54-62; Jn. xviii. 13-18, 24-27). The first interrogatory to which our Lord was subject (xviii. 19-24) was addressed to Him by Caiaphas, probably before the Sanhedrim had time to assemble. It was the questioning of an inquisitive person who had an important criminal in his presence, rather than a formal examination. The Lord's refusal to answer is thus explained and justified. When the more regular proceedings begin He is ready to answer. A servant of the high-priest, knowing that he should thereby please his master, smote the cheek of the Son of God with the palm of his hand. But this was only the beginning of horrors. At the dawn of day the Sanhedrim, summoned by the high-priest in the course of the night, assembled, and brought their band of false witnesses, whom they must have had ready before. These gave their testimony, but even before this unjust tribunal it could not stand; it was so full of contradictions. At last two false witnesses came, and their testimony was very like the truth (Mk. xiv. 58; see Jn. ii. 19). Even these two fell into contradictions. The high-priest now with a solemn adjuration asks Him whether He is the Christ the Son of God. He answers that He is, and foretells His return in glory and power at the last day. This is enough for their purpose. They pronounce Him guilty of a crime for which death should be the punishment (Jn. xviii. 19-24; Lk. xxii. 63-71; Mat. xxvi. 58-68; Mk. xiv. 55-65). Although they had pronounced Jesus to be guilty of death, the Sanhedrim possessed no power to carry out such a sentence. As soon as it was day they took Him to Pilate (PONTIUS PILATE), the Roman procurator. The hall of judgment, or PRÆTORIUM, was probably a part of the tower of Antonia near the Temple, where the Roman garrison was. Pilate, hearing that Jesus was an offender under their law, was about to give them leave to treat Him accordingly; and this would have made it quite safe to execute Him. But the council, wishing to shift the responsibility from themselves, said it was not lawful for them to put any man to death; and having condemned Jesus for blasphemy, they now strove to have Him condemned by Pilate for a political crime, for calling Himself the King of the Jews. The Jewish punishment was stoning; whilst crucifixion was a Roman punishment; and thus it came about that the Lord's saying as to the mode of His death was fulfilled (Mat. xx. 19 with Jn. xii. 32, 38). From the first Jesus found favor in the eyes of Pilate, and he pronounced that he found no fault in Him. Not so easily were the Jews to be cheated of their prey. They heaped up accusations against Him as a disturber of the public peace (Lk. xxiii. 5). Pilate was no match for their vehemence. Finding that Jesus was a Galilean, he sent Him to Herod (HEROD ANTIPAS) to be dealt with; but Herod, after cruel mockery and persecution, sent Him back to Pilate. Now commenced the fearful struggle between the Roman procurator, a weak as well as cruel man, and the Jews. The well-known incidents of the second interview are soon recalled. After the examination by Herod, and the return of Jesus, Pilate proposed to release Him, as it was usual on the feast-day to release a prisoner to the Jews out of grace. Pilate knew well that the priests and rulers would object to this; but it was a covert appeal to the people. The multitude, persuaded by the priests, preferred another prisoner, called Barabbas. Pilate took water and washed his hands before them, and said, "I am innocent of the blood of this just person; see ye to it." The people imprecated on their own heads and those of their children the blood of Him whose doom was thus sealed. Now came the scourging, and the blows and insults of the soldiers, who, uttering truth when they thought they were only reviling, crowned Him and addressed Him as King of the Jews. According to John, Pilate now made one more effort for His release. He thought that the scourging might appease their rage, and brought the Saviour forth again to them, and said, "Behold the Man!" Not even so was their violence assuaged. He still sought to release Jesus: but the last argument, which had been in the minds of both sides all along, was now openly applied to him: "If thou let this man go, thou art not Cæsar's friend." This decided the question. He delivered Jesus to be crucified (Mat. xxvii. 15-30; Mk. xv. 6-19; Lk. xxiii. 18-25; Jn. xviii. 39, 40, xix. 1-16). John mentions that this occurred about the sixth hour, whereas the crucifixion, according to Mark, was accomplished at the third hour; but there is every reason to think that John reckons from midnight, and that this took place at six in the morning, whilst in Mark the Jewish reckoning from six in the morning is followed, so that the crucifixion took place at nine o'clock, A. M., the intervening time having been spent in preparations. One Person alone has been calm amidst the excitements of that night of horrors. On Him is now laid the weight of His cross, or at least of the transverse beam of it; and, with this pressing Him down, they proceed out of the city to GOLGOTHA or Calvary, a place the site of which is now uncertain. As He began to droop, His persecutors, unwilling to defile themselves with the accursed burden, lay hold of Simon of Cyrene and compel him to carry the cross after Jesus. After offering him wine and myrrh (GALL), they crucified Him between two thieves. Nothing was wanting to His humiliation; a thief had been preferred before Him, and two thieves share His punishment. Pilate set over Him in three languages the inscription, "Jesus, the King of the Jews." The chief-priests took exception to this that it did not denounce Him as falsely calling Himself by that name, but Pilate refused to alter it. Robinson (Harmony) and others suppose the evangelists give this inscription and, in general, the expressions used by our Lord, &c., according to the sense, and not according to the letter; but Mr. Coker Adams (quoted in Treasury of Bible Knowledge) believes that John records the very words written by Pilate, and that Matthew preserves the inscription as written in Hebrew, Mark in Latin, Luke in Greek. Mr. Adams supposes "Jesus of Nazareth" was placed in larger characters above the inscriptions given by Matthew, Mark, and Luke, thus:

JESUS OF NAZARETH.

THIS IS THE KING OF THE JEWS.

THE KING OF THE JEWS.

According to Mr. Adams, then, John gives the title at the top, together with that given by Mark. One of the two thieves underwent a change of heart even on the cross; he reviled at first (Mat.) and then, at the sight of the constancy of Jesus, repented (Luke) (Mat. xxvii.; Mk. xv.; Lk. xxiii.; Jn. xix.). In the depths of His bodily sufferings, Jesus calmly commended to John (?), who stood near, the care of Mary His mother. "Behold thy son! behold thy mother!" From the sixth hour to the ninth there was darkness over the whole land. At the ninth hour (three, P. M.) Jesus uttered with a loud voice the opening words of the twenty-second Psalm, all of which (so Abp. Thomson) referred to the suffering MESSIAH. "The use of these words by our Saviour on the cross, with a slight variation from the Hebrew, shows how eminently true the whole description is of Him, but does not make Him the exclusive subject" (so Prof. J. A. Alexander on Psalm xxii. 1). One of those present dipped a sponge in the common sour wine (VINEGAR) of the soldiers and put it on a reed to moisten the sufferer's lips. Again He cried with a loud voice, "It is finished" (John), "Father, into Thy hands I commend My spirit" (Luke); and gave up the ghost (Mat. xxvii. 51-56; Mk. xv. 40-41; Lk. xxiii. 46-49; Jn. xix. 30-31). On the death of Jesus the veil which covered the most Holy Place of the Temple, the place of the more especial presence of Jehovah, was rent in twain. There was a great earthquake. Many who were dead rose from their graves, although they returned to the dust again after this great token of Christ's quickening power had been given to many (Matthew). The centurion who kept guard, witnessing what had taken place, came to the same conclusion as Pilate and his wife, "Certainly this was a righteous man;" he went beyond them, "Truly, this man was the Son of God" (Mark). Even the people who had joined in the mocking and reviling were overcome by the wonders of His death, and "smote their breasts and returned" (Lk. xxiii. 48). The Jews, very zealous for the Sabbath in the midst of their murderous work, begged Pilate that he would put an end to the punishment by breaking the legs of the criminals that they might be taken down and buried before the Sabbath for which they were preparing (Deut. xxi. 23; Jos. B. J. iv. 5, § 2). Those who were to execute this duty found that Jesus was dead and the thieves still living. The death of the Lord before the others was, no doubt, partly the consequence of the previous mental suffering which He had undergone, and partly because His will to die lessened the natural resistance of the frame to dissolution. Joseph of Arimathea, a member of the council, but a secret disciple of Jesus, came to Pilate to beg the body of Jesus, that he might bury it. Nicodemus assisted in this work of love, and they anointed the body and laid it in Joseph's new tomb (Mat. xxvii. 50-61; Mk. xv. 37-47; Lk. xxiii. 46-56; Jn. xix. 30-42).—Saturday the 16th of Nisan (April 8th). The chief priests and Pharisees, with Pilate's permission, set a watch over the tomb, "lest His disciples come by night and steal Him away, and say unto the people He is risen from the dead" (Mat. xxvii. 62-66).—Sunday the 17th of Nisan (April 9th). The Sabbath ended at six on the evening of Nisan 16th. Early the next morning the resurrection of Jesus took place. Although He had lain in the grave for about thirty-six or forty hours, yet these formed part of three days, and thus, by a mode of speaking not unusual to the Jews, were reckoned as three days (see INSPIRATION III., 3; ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF). The order of the events that follow is somewhat difficult to harmonize; for each evangelist selects the facts which belong to his purpose. The exact hour of the resurrection is not mentioned by any of the evangelists. Of the great mystery itself, the resurrection of life by Him who was truly dead, we see but little (Mat. xxviii. 2-4). The women, who had stood by the cross of Jesus, had prepared spices on the evening before, perhaps to complete the embalming of our Lord's body, already performed in haste by Joseph and Nicodemus. They came very early on the first day of the week to the sepulchre. When they arrive they find the stone rolled away, and Jesus no longer in the sepulchre. He had risen from the dead. Mary Magdalene at this point goes back in haste; and at once, believing that the body has been removed by men, tells Peter and John that the Lord has been taken away. The other women, however, go into the sepulchre, and they see an angel (Matthew, Mark). The two angels, mentioned by Luke, are probably two separate appearances to different members of the group; for he alone mentions an indefinite number of women. They now leave the sepulchre, and go in haste to make known the news to the apostles. As they were going, "Jesus met them, saying, All hail." The eleven do not believe the account when they receive it. In the mean time Peter and John came to the sepulchre. They ran, in their eagerness, and John arrived first and looked in; Peter afterward came up, and the awe which had prevented the other disciple from going in appears to have been unfelt by Peter, who entered at once, and found the grave-clothes lying, but not Him who had worn them. This fact must have suggested that the removal was not the work of human hands. They then returned, wondering at what they had seen. Mary Magdalene, however, remained weeping at the tomb, and she too saw the two angels in the tomb, though Peter and John did not. They address her, and she answers, still, however, without any suspicion that the Lord is risen. As she turns away she sees Jesus, but in the tumult of her feelings does not even recognize Him at His first address. But He calls her by name, and then she joyfully recognizes her Master. The third appearance of our Lord was to Peter (Luke, Paul); the fourth to the two disciples going to Emmaus in the evening (Mark, Luke); the fifth in the same evening to the eleven as they sat at meat (Mark, Luke, John). All of these occurred on the first day of the week, the very day of the resurrection. Exactly a week after, He appeared to the apostles, and gave Thomas a convincing proof of His resurrection (John); this was the sixth appearance. The seventh was in Galilee, where seven of the apostles were assembled, some of them probably about to return to their old trade of fishing (John). The eighth was to the eleven (Mat.), and probably to five hundred brethren assembled with them (Paul) on a mountain in Galilee. The ninth was to James (Paul); and the last to the apostles at Jerusalem just before the Ascension (Acts) (Mat. xxviii.; Mk. xvi.; Lk. xxiv.; Jn. xx., xxi.; Acts i.; 1 Cor. xv.; Rbn. B. S. ii. 162 ff.).—CHRONOLOGY. Year of the Birth of Christ. It is certain that our Lord was born before the death of Herod the Great. Herod died in the first part of Nisan A. v. c. 750 (= B. C. 4, Wieseler). It follows, therefore, that the Dionysian era (the vulgar Christian era), which corresponds to A. v. c. 754, is at least four years too late. Many have thought that the star seen by the wise men gives grounds for an exact calculation of the time of our Lord's birth; but this is not the case. (STAR OF THE WISE MEN.) THE CENSUS (CYRENIUS; TAXING) taken by Augustus Cesar, which led to the journey of Mary from Nazareth just before the birth of the Lord, has also been looked on as an important note of time in reference to the chronology of the life of Jesus. The value of this census, as a fact in the chronology of the life of Christ, depends on the connection which is sought to be established between it and the insurrection which broke out under Matthias and Judas, the son of Saripheus, in the last illness of Herod (Jos. xvii. 6, § 2). If the insurrection arose out of the census, a point of connection between the sacred history and that of Josephus is made out. Such a connection, however, has not been clearly made out. The age of Jesus at His baptism (Lk. iii. 23) affords an element of calculation. "And Jesus Himself began to be about thirty years of age." Born in the beginning of A. v. c. 750 (or the end of 749), Jesus would be thirty in the beginning of A. v. c. 780 (A. D. 27). To the first Passover after the baptism attaches a note of time which will confirm the calculations already made. "Then said the Jews, Forty and six years was this Temple in building, and wilt thou rear it up in three days?" There can be no doubt that this refers to the rebuilding of the Temple by Herod. It is inferred from Josephus (xv. 11, §§ 5 & 6) that it was begun in the month Chisleu, A. v. c. 734. And if the Passover at which this remark was made was that of A. v. c. 780, then forty-five years and some months have elapsed, which, according to the Jewish mode of reckoning, would be spoken of as forty and six years. One datum remains: the commencement of the preaching of John the Baptist is connected with the fifteenth year of the reign of Tiberius Cesar (Lk. iii. 1). The rule of Tiberius may be calculated either from the beginning of his sole reign, after the death of Augustus, A. v. c. 767, or from his joint government with Augustus, i. e. from the beginning of A. v. c. 765. In the latter case the fifteenth year would correspond with A. v. c. 779, which goes to confirm the rest of the calculations relied on in this article. Differences will be found amongst eminent writers in every part of the chronology of the gospels. The birth of our Lord is placed in B. C. 1 by Pearson and Hug; B. C. 2 by Scaliger; B. C. 3 by Baronius, Calvisius, Siskind, and Paulus; B. C. 4 by Lamy, Bengel, Anger, Wieseler, and Greswell; B. C. 5 by Usher and Petavius; B. C. 7 by Ideler and Sanelemente. The calculations given above seem sufficient to determine us to the close of B. C. 5, or early part of B. C. 4. "In regard to the time of the year when Jesus was born, there is still less certainty. . . . There is, on this point, no valid tradition. According to the earliest accounts, the sixth of January, or Epiphany, was celebrated by the Eastern churches in the third and fourth century as the festival of the birth and baptism of Jesus. In the Western churches, after the middle of the fourth century, the 25th of December (Christmas) began to be kept as the festival of Christ's nativity" (Robinson, Harmony, 169). Wieseler concludes "that the day must be left undecided, and that of the months, the close of December, together with January and February, should be taken into consideration, of which, however, December has the least, January a greater, and February decidedly the greatest probability in its favor" (B. S. iii. 673). The exact date of our Lord's death is likewise much disputed. Wieseler, Bishop Ellicott, Dr. P. Holmes (in Kitto), &c., place it on the 7th of April, A. D. 30, or A. v. c. 783 (see also above); Browne makes it March 18th, A. D. 29; Usher, April 3d, A. D. 33. Roger Bacon, Scaliger, Pearson, Newton, and the A. V. agree with Usher as to the year. The date as given by critics varies from A. D. 29 to 35. But let it never be forgotten that there is a distinction between these researches, which the Holy Spirit has left obscure and doubtful, and "the weightier matters" of the gospel, the things which directly pertain to man's salvation.

Je'ther (fr. Heb. = excellence, preeminence, Ges., Fü.). 1. JETHRO, the father-in-law of Moses (Ex. iv. 18, margin).—2. First-born of Gideon's seventy sons (Judg. viii. 20).—3. Father of Amasa, captain-general of Absalom's army; = ITHRA (2 Sam. xvii. 25), the latter being probably a corruption. He is described in 1 Chr. ii. 17 as an Ishmaelite, which again is more likely to be correct than the "Israelite" of the Heb. in 2 Sam. xvii., or the "Jezreelite" of the LXX. and Vulgate in the same passage.—4. Son of Jada, a descendant of Hezron, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chr. ii. 32).—5. Son of Ezra, in the genealogy of Judah (iv. 17).—6. Chief of a family of warriors of the line of Asher (vii. 38); probably = ITHRA in the preceding verse.

jagation, subjection, Fū.), one of the phylarchs (A. V. "dukes") who came of Esau (Gen. xxxvi. 40; 1 Chr. i. 51). This record of the Edomite phylarchs may point specially to the places and habitations, or towns, named after, or occupied by, them. El-Wetideh, supposed to be etymologically connected with Jetheth, is a place in Nejd; there is also a place called El-Wetid; and El-Wetidat, which is the name of mountains belonging to Bence 'Abd-Allah Ibn Ghatfian. ARABIA.

Jeth'lah (fr. Heb. = hanging, high, Ges.; hill-place, Fū.), a city of Dan (Josh. xix. 42).

Je'thro (L. fr. Heb. = excellence, preëminence, Ges., Fū.), also called JETHUR, priest or prince of Midian, both offices probably being combined in one person. MOSES spent the forty years of his exile from Egypt with him, and married his daughter Zipporah. By the advice of Jethro, Moses appointed deputies to judge the congregation and share the burden of government with himself (Ex. xviii.). On account of his local knowledge he was entreated to remain with the Israelites throughout their journey to Canaan (Num. x. 31, 33). It is said in Ex. ii. 18 that the priest of Midian whose daughter Moses married was Reuel (RAGUEL); afterward at ch. iii. 1, he is called Jethro, as also in ch. xviii.; but in Num. x. 29 "HOBAB the son of Raguel the Midianite" is apparently called Moses' father-in-law (compare Judg. iv. 11). Some commentators take Jethro = Reuel, and call Hobab the brother-in-law of Moses. The present punctuation of our Hebrew Bibles does not warrant this (so Prof. Leathes).

Je'tur (fr. Heb., probably = an enclosure, nomadic camp, Ges.), a son of Ishmael. (Gen. xxv. 15; 1 Chr. i. 31, v. 19). ITUREA.

Jen'el (L. fr. Heb. = JIEL, Ges., Fū.). 1. A chief man of Judah, one of the sons of Zerah (1 Chr. ix. 6, compare 2).—2. One of the sons of Adonikam who returned to Jerusalem with Esdras (1 Esd. viii. 39). JIEL.

Je'msh (fr. Heb. = to whom God hastens, Ges.). 1. Son of Esau, by Aholibamah (Gen. xxxvi. 5, 14, 18; 1 Chr. i. 35).—2. A Benjamite chief, son of Bilhan (vii. 10, 11).—3. A Gershonite Levite, of the house of Shimei (xxiii. 10, 11).—4. Son of Rehoboam, king of Judah, by Abihail (2 Chr. xi. 18, 19).

Je'uz (fr. Heb. = counselling, Ges.), head of a Benjamite house (1 Chr. viii. 10); apparently son of Shaharaim and Hodesh his third wife, and born in Moab.

Jew (fr. Heb. Yehûdi = descendant of Judah, or man of Judah; Gr. form Ioudaios; L. Judeus). This name was properly applied to a member of the kingdom of Judah after the separation of the ten tribes (ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF; JUDAH, KINGDOM OF). In this sense it occurs twice in 2 K. (xvi. 6, xxv. 25), and seven times in the later chapters of Jer. (xxxii. 12, xxxiv. 9 with "Hebrew," xxxviii. 19, xl. 12, xli. 3, xlii. 1, lii. 28). The term first makes its appearance just before the captivity of the ten tribes, and then is used to denote the men of Judah who held Elath, and were driven out by Rezin, king of Syria (2 K. xvi. 6). The fugitives in Egypt (Jer. xlii. 1) belonged to the two tribes, and were distinguished by the name of the more important. After the Return the word received a larger application. Partly from the predominance of the members of the old kingdom of Judah among those who returned to Palestine, partly from the identification of Judah with the religious ideas and hopes of the people, all the members of the new state were called Jews (Judeans), and the name was extended to the remnants of the race scattered throughout the nations (Dan. iii. 8, 12; Ezr. iv. 12, 23, &c.; Neh. i. 2, ii. 16, v. 1, &c.; Esth. iii. 4 ff., &c.). Under the name of "Judeans," the people of Israel were known to classical writers (Tac. H. v. 2, &c.). The force of the title "Jew" is seen particularly in the Gospel of St. John, who very rarely uses any other term to describe the opponents of our Lord. The name, indeed, appeared at the close of the apostle's life to be the true antithesis to Christianity, as describing the limited and definite form of a national religion; but at an earlier stage of the progress of the faith, it was contrasted with GREEK as implying an outward covenant with God (Rom. i. 16, ii. 9, 10; Col. iii. 11, &c.). In this sense it was of wider application than "HEBREW," which was the correlative of HEBLENIST, and marked a division of language subsisting within the entire body, and at the same time less expressive than ISRAELITE, which brought out with especial clearness the privileges and hopes of the children of Jacob (2 Cor. xi. 22; Jn. i. 47; 1 Mc. i. 43, 53, and often). The history of Judaism is divided by Jost—the most profound writer who has investigated it—into two great eras, the first extending to the close of the collections of the oral laws, 538 B. C.—600 A. D.; the second reaching to the present time. Jews' Language, in the: literally Jewishly (2 K. xviii. 26, 28; 2 Chr. xxxii. 18; Is. xxxvi. 11, 13; Neh. xiii. 24). The term denotes as well the pure Hebrew as the dialect acquired during the Captivity, which was characterized by Aramaic forms and idioms. SEMITIC LANGUAGES; WRITING.

Jew'el STONES, PRECIOUS.

Jew'ess (fr. JEW), a woman of Hebrew birth, without distinction of tribe (Acts xvi. 1, xxiv. 24).

Jew'ish (fr. JEW), of or belonging to Jews; an epithet applied to their Rabbinical legends (Tit. i. 14).

Jew'ry, the A. V. translation of Heb. Yehûd and Gr. Ioudaia, elsewhere rendered JUDAH and JUDAEA. It occurs several times in the Apocrypha (1 Esd. i. 32, &c.) and N. T. (Lk. xxiii. 5; Jn. vii. 1), once only in the O. T. (Dan. v. 13). Jewry comes to us through the Norman-French, and is of frequent occurrence in Old English. JEW.

Jez-a-ni'ah (fr. Heb. = JAAZANIAH, Ges.), son of Hoshaiiah, the Maachathite; = JAAZANIAH; perhaps also = AZARIAH 28; one of the captains of the forces, who had escaped from Jerusalem during the final attack of the Chaldeans. When the Babylonians had departed, Jezaniah with his men returned to GEDALIAH at Mizpah. In the events which followed the assassination of that officer Jezaniah took a prominent part (2 K. xxv. 23; Jer. xl. 8, xlii. 1, xliii. 2). ISHMAEL 6; JOHANAN 3.

Jez'e-bel (fr. Heb. = not cohobated, chaste, Ges.; Father [= Baal] of the heavenly dwelling, Fū.), wife of AHAH, king of Israel, and mother of ATHALIAH, queen of Judah, and AHASIAH 1 and Joram (JEHO- RAM 1), kings of Israel. She was a Phœnician princess, daughter of "ETHBAAL, king of the Zidonians." Her marriage with Ahab was a turning-point in the history of Israel. She was a woman in whom, with the reckless and licentious habits of an Oriental queen, were united the sternest and fiercest qualities inherent in the Phenician people. In her hands her husband became a mere puppet (1 K. xxi. 25). The first effect of her influence was the immediate establishment of the Phenician worship on a grand scale in the court of Ahab. At her table were supported no less than 450 prophets of Baal, and 400 of Astarte (xvi. 31, 32, xviii. 19). The prophets of Jehovah, who up to this time had found their chief refuge in the northern kingdom, were attacked by her orders and put to the sword (xviii. 13; 2 K. ix. 7). When at last the people, at the instigation of ELIJAH, rose against her ministers, and slaughtered them at the foot of Carmel, and when Ahab was terrified into submission, she alone retained her presence of mind; and when she received in the palace of JEZREEL the tidings that her religion was all but destroyed (1 K. xix. 1), her only answer was one of those fearful vows which have made the leaders of Shemitic nations so terrible whether for good or evil—expressed in a message to the very man who, as it might have seemed but an hour before, had her life in his power (xix. 2). Elijah fled for his life. The next instance of her power is still more characteristic and complete. When she found her husband cast down by his disappointment at being thwarted by NABOTH, she took the matter into her own hands (xxi. 7). She wrote a warrant in Ahab's name, and sealed it with his seal. To her, and not to Ahab, was sent the announcement that the royal wishes were accomplished (14), and she bade her husband go and take the vacant property; and on her accordingly fell the prophet's curse, as well as on her husband (23). We hear no more of her for a long period. But she survived Ahab for fourteen years, and still, as queen-mother (after the Oriental custom), was a great personage in the court of her sons, and, as such, became the special mark for the vengeance of JEHU. But in that supreme hour of her house the spirit of the aged queen rose within her, equal to the dreadful emergency. She was in the palace, which stood by the gate of the city, overlooking the approach from the E. Beneath lay the open space under the city walls. She determined to face the destroyer of her family, whom she saw rapidly advancing in his chariot. She painted her eyelids in the Eastern fashion with antimony, so as to give a darker border to the eyes, and make them look larger and brighter (PAINT), possibly to induce Jehu, after the manner of Eastern usurpers, to take her, the widow of his predecessor, for his wife, but more probably as the last act of regal splendor. She tired her head, and, looking down upon him from the high latticed window in the tower, she met him by an allusion to a former act of treason in the history of her adopted country. Jehu looked up from his chariot. Two or three eunuchs of the royal harem showed their faces at the windows, and, at his command, dashed the ancient princess down from the chamber. She fell immediately in front of the conqueror's chariot. The blood flew from her mangled corpse over the palace-wall behind, and over the advancing horses in front. The merciless destroyer passed on; and the last remains of life were trampled out by the horses' hoofs. The body was left in that open space called in modern Eastern language "the mounds," where offal is thrown from the city-walls. The dogs of Eastern cities, which prowled around these localities, and which the present writer (Stanley) met on this very spot by the modern village which occupies the site of Jezreel, pounced upon this unexpected prey. Nothing was left by them but the hard portions of the human skeleton, the skull, the hands, and the feet (2 K. ix.). Long afterward her name lived as the byword for all that was execrable. It is given to a church or an individual in Asia Minor, combining in like manner fanaticism and prodigality (Rev. ii. 20).

Je-ze'lus (fr. Gr.). 1. JAHAZIEL (1 Esd. viii. 32). —2. JEWIEL, father of Obadiah (viii. 35).

Je'zer (tr. Heb. = formation, imagination, Ges.), third son of Naphtali (Gen. xli. 24; Num. xxvi. 49; 1 Chr. vii. 13), and father of the family of the JEZERITES.

Je'zer-ites, the = a family of Naphtali, descendants of JEZER (Num. xxvi. 49).

Je-zí'ah (fr. Heb. = whom Jehovah sprinkles, Ges.), a descendant of Parosh; husband of a foreign wife (Ezr. x. 25).

Je-zí-el (fr. Heb. = assembly of God, Ges.), a Benjaminite who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chr. xii. 3).

Je-zí'ah (fr. Heb. = whom God draws out or preserves, Ges.), a Benjaminite of the sons of Elpaal (1 Chr. viii. 18).

Je-zó'ar (fr. Heb. = ZOHAR), son of Helah, one of the wives of Asher (1 Chr. iv. 7).

Je-zí-ra-hí'ah (fr. Heb. = IZRAHIAH), a Levite, leader of the choristers at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem under Nehemiah (Neh. xii. 42).

Je-zí-re-el (fr. Heb. = God has planted, Ges.), a descendant of the father or founder of Etam, of the line of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 3). But as the verse now stands, we must supply some such word as "families;" "these (are the families of) the father of Etam."

Je-zí-re-el (see above). 1. The name "Jezreel" is used in 2 Sam. ii. 9 and (?) iv. 4, and Hos. i. 5, for the valley or plain between Gilboa and Little Hermon; and to this plain, in its widest extent, the general form of the name ESDRELON (first used in Jd. i. 8) has been applied in modern times. In its more limited sense, as applied to the city, it first appears in Josh. xix. 18. But its historical importance dates from the reign of AHAH, who chose it for his chief residence. The situation of the modern village of Zer'in (= Jezreel) shows the fitness of his choice. It is on one of the gentle swells which rise out of the fertile plain of Esdrelon; but with two peculiarities which mark it out from the rest. One is its strength. On the N. E. the hill presents a steep rocky descent of at least 100 feet. The other is its central locality. It stands at the opening of the middle branch of the three eastern forks of the plain, and looks straight toward the wide western level; thus commanding the view toward the Jordan on the E. (2 K. ix. 17), and visible from Carmel on the W. (1 K. xviii. 46). In the neighborhood, or within the town probably, was a temple and grove of Astarte (ΑΣΤΟΡΕΤΑ), with an establishment of 400 priests supported by JEZREEL (xvi. 38; 2 K. x. 11). The palace of Ahab (1 K. xxi. 1, xviii. 46), probably containing his "ivory house" (xxii. 39), was on the eastern side of the city, forming part of the city wall (compare xxi. 1; 2 K. ix. 25, 30, 33). The seraglio, in which Jezebel lived, was on the city wall, and had a high window facing eastward (2 K. ix. 30). Close by, if not forming part of this seraglio, was a watch-tower, on which a sentinel stood, to give notice of arrivals from the disturbed district beyond the Jordan (ix. 17). An ancient square tower which stands among the hovels of the modern village may be its representative. The gateway of the city on the E. was also the gateway of the palace (ix. 31). A little further E., but adjoining the royal domain (1 K. xxi. 1), was a smooth tract of land cleared out of the uneven valley, which belonged to NABOTH (2 K. ix. 25). Whether the vineyard of Naboth was here or at Samaria is a doubtful question. Still in the same eastern direction are two springs, one twelve minutes from the town, the other twenty minutes. The latter, probably both from its size and situation, was known as "the spring of Jezreel" (mistranslated A. V. "a fountain," 1 Sam. xxix. 1). With the fall of the house of Ahab the glory of Jezreel departed.—2. A town in Judah, in the neighborhood of the southern CARMEL (Josh. xv. 56). Here David in his wanderings took Ahinoam the Jezreelitess for his first wife (1 Sam. xxvii. 3, xxx. 5).—3. Eldest son of the prophet Hosea (Hos. i. 4).

Jezre-el-ite = an inhabitant of JEZREEL (1 K. xxi. 1, 4, 6, 7, 15, 16; 2 K. ix. 21, 25).

Jezre-el-ites [i pronounced as in Jezreelite] = a woman of JEZREEL (1 Sam. xxvii. 3, xxx. 5; 2 Sam. ii. 2, iii. 2; 1 Chr. iii. 1).

Jib'sam (fr. Heb. = pleasant, Ges.), a son of Tola, the son of Issachar (1 Chr. vii. 2).

Jid'aph (fr. Heb. = tearful, Ges.), a son of Nahor (Gen. xxii. 22).

Jim'na (fr. Heb. = IMNAH = JIMNAH), the first-born of Asher (Num. xvi. 44); elsewhere called in the A. V. JIMNAH and IMNAH 1.

Jim'nah (fr. Heb.) = JIMNA = IMNAH 1 (Gen. xlv. 17).

Jim'nites, the = the descendants of JIMNA (Num. xxvi. 44).

Jiph'tah (fr. Heb. = JEPHTHAH), a city of Judah in the maritime lowland (Josh. xv. 43). Wilton (in Fbn., article Libnah) identifies Jiph'tah with Bat-hah near Gaza.

Jiph'tah-el (fr. Heb. = which God opens, Ges.), the Val'ley of, a valley (VALLEY 2) which served as one of the landmarks for the boundary both of Zebulun (Josh. xix. 14) and Asher (ver. 27). Robinson suggests that Jiph'tah-el = Jotapata, the city which so long withstood Vespasian (Jos. B. J. iii. 7), and that they survive in the modern Jefât, a village in the mountains of Galilee, half-way between the Bay of Acre and the Lake of Gennesaret. In this case the valley is the great Wady 'Abilin, which has its head in the hills near Jefât, and runs thence W. to the maritime plain.

Je'ab (fr. Heb. = whose father is Jehovah, Ges.), the most remarkable, though perhaps not the eldest (1 Chr. ii. 16) of the three nephews of DAVID, the children of Zeruah, David's sister. Their father is unknown, but seems to have resided at Bethlehem, and to have died before his sons, as we find mention of his sepulchre at that place (2 Sam. ii. 32). Joab first appears after David's accession to the throne at Hebron. He with his two brothers (ABISHAI; ASAHAI) went out from Hebron at the head of David's "servants," or guards, to keep a watch on the movements of ABNER. The two parties sat opposite each other, on each side of the tank by GIBEON. Abner's challenge, to which Joab assented, led to a desperate struggle between twelve champions from either side. This roused the blood of the rival tribes; a general encounter ensued; Abner and his company were defeated, and in his flight, being hard pressed by the swift-footed Asahel, he reluctantly killed the unfortunate youth. His two brothers, on seeing the corpse, only hurried on with greater fury in the pursuit. In answer to the appeal of Abner, Joab withdrew his men, but his revenge was only postponed. He had been on another of these predatory excursions from Hebron, when he was informed on his return that Abner had in his absence paid a visit to David, and been received into favor (2 Sam. iii. 23). He broke out into a violent remonstrance with the king, and then, without David's knowledge, immediately sent messengers after Abner, who was overtaken by them at the well of Sirah. Abner returned at once. Joab and Abishai met him in the gateway of the town; Joab took him aside (iii. 27), as if with a peaceful intention, and then struck him a deadly blow "under the fifth rib." There was now no rival left in the way of Joab's advancement, and at the siege of Jebus he was appointed for his prowess commander-in-chief—"captain of the host"—the same office that Abner had held under Saul, the highest in the state after the king (1 Chr. xi. 6; 2 Sam. viii. 16). In this post he was content, and served the king with undeviating fidelity. In the wide range of wars which David undertook, Joab was the acting general. He had a chief armor-bearer of his own, Naharai, a Beerothite (2 Sam. xxiii. 37; 1 Chr. xi. 39), and ten attendants to carry his equipment and baggage (2 Sam. xviii. 15). He had the charge of giving the signal by trumpet for advance or retreat (xviii. 16). He was called by the almost regal title of "Lord" (xi. 11), "the prince of the king's army" (1 Chr. xxvii. 34). His usual residence was in Jerusalem—but he had a house and property, with barley-fields adjoining, in the country (2 Sam. xiii. 23), in the "wilderness" (1 K. ii. 34), probably on the N. E. of Jerusalem (compare 1 Sam. xiii. 18; Josh. viii. 15, 20), near Baal-hazor (2 Sam. xiii. 23, compare with xiv. 30), where there were extensive sheep-walks.—1. His great war was that against Ammon, which he conducted in person. It was divided into three campaigns. (a) The first was against the allied forces of Syria and Ammon. (HABAREZER.) (b) The second was against Edom. The decisive victory was gained by David himself in the "valley of salt" (SALT, VALLEY OF), and celebrated by a triumphal monument (2 Sam. viii. 13). But Joab had the charge of carrying out the victory, and remained for six months, extirpating the male population, whom he then buried in the tombs of Petra (1 K. xi. 15, 16). (c) The third was against the Ammonites. They were again left to Joab (2 Sam. x. 7-19). At the siege of RABBAH 1, the ark was sent with him, and the whole army was encamped in booths or huts round the beleaguered city (xi. 1, 11). After a sortie of the inhabitants, which caused some loss to the Jewish army, Joab took the lower city on the river, and then sent to urge David to come and take the citadel (xii. 26-28).—2. The services of Joab to the king were not confined to these military achievements. In the entangled relations which grew up in David's domestic life, he bore an important part. (a) The first occasion was the unhappy correspondence which passed between him and the king during the Ammonite war respecting URIAH the Hittite (xi. 1-25). (b) The next occasion on which it was displayed was in his successful endeavor to reinstate ABSALOM in David's favor, after the murder of Amnon (xiv. 1-20). (c) The same keen sense of his master's interests ruled the conduct of Joab no less, when the relations of the father and son were reversed by the successful revolt of Absalom. His former intimacy with the prince did not impair his fidelity to the king. He followed him beyond the Jordan, and in the final battle of Ephraim assumed the responsibility of taking the rebel prince's dangerous life in spite of David's injunction to spare him, and when no one else had courage to act so decisive a part (xviii. 2, 11-15). The king transferred the command to AMASA. (d) Nothing brings out more strongly the good and bad qualities of Joab than his conduct in this trying crisis of his history. With his own guard and the mighty men under Abishai he went out in pursuit of the remnants of the rebellion. In the heat of pursuit he encountered his rival Amasa, more leisurely engaged in the same quest. At "the great stone" in Gibeon, the cousins met. Joab's sword was attached to his girdle; by design or accident it protruded from the sheath; Amasa rushed into the treacherous embrace, to which Joab invited him, holding fast his beard by his own right hand, whilst the unsheathed sword in his left hand plunged into Amasa's stomach; a single blow from that practised arm, as in the case of Abner, sufficed to do its work. (e) At the moment, all were absorbed in the pursuit of the rebels. Once more a proof was given of the wide-spread confidence in Joab's judgment (xx. 16-22). (ABELL 1; SHEBA.) (f) His last remonstrance with David was on the announcement of the king's desire to number the people (xxiv. 1-4; 1 Chr. xxi. 6).—3. There is something mournful in the end of Joab. At the close of his long life, his loyalty, so long unshaken, at last wavered. "Though he had not turned after Absalom, he turned after ADONIJAH" (1 K. ii. 28). This was in direct opposition to the divine designation of Solomon (1 Chr. xxii. 9, 10, xxviii. 5). The revival of the pretensions of Adonijah after David's death was sufficient to awaken the suspicions of Solomon. Joab fled to the shelter of the altar at Gibeon, and was there slain by Benaiah.—2. Son of SERAIAH, and descendant of Kenaz (1 Chr. iv. 14).—3. The head of a family, not of priestly or Levitical rank, whose descendants, with those of Jeshua, were the most numerous of all who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr. ii. 6, viii. 9; Neh. vii. 11; 1 Esd. viii. 35). PAHATH-MOAB.

Jo'a-chaz [-kaz] (Gr. fr. Heb.) = JEOHAZ (1 Esd. i. 34), the son of Josiah.

Jo'a-chim [-kim]. 1. JEOIAKIM (Bar. i. 3) = JOACIM 1.—2. A "high-priest" at Jerusalem in the time of Baruch "the son of Cheleas," i. e. Hilkiah (Bar. i. 7).

Jo'a-cim [-sim] (L. fr. Heb.). 1. JEOIAKIM (1 Esd. i. 37, 38, 39) = JOACHIM 1.—2. JEOIACHIN (i. 43).—3. JOIAKIM, the son of Jeshua (v. 5).—4. "The high-priest which was in Jerusalem" (Jd. iv. 6, 14) in the time of Judith (xv. 8 ff.). It is impossible to identify him with any historical character.—5. The husband of Susanna (Sus. 1 ff.).

Jo-a-da-nus (fr. Gr., probably corrupted from GEDALIAH), a son of Jeshua, the son of Jozaçak (1 Esd. ix. 19); = GEDALIAH 3?

Jo'ah (fr. Heb. = whose brother (i. e. helper) is JHovah, Ges.). 1. Son of Asaph, and chronicler, or keeper of the records, to Hezekiah (Is. xxxvi. 3, 11, 22).—2. Son or grandson of Zimnah, a Gershonite (1 Chr. vi. 21); apparently = Ethan (ver. 42).—3. Third son of Obed-edom (xxvi. 4), a Korhite, and one of the doorkeepers appointed by David.—4. A Gershonite, son of Zimnah, and father of Eden; active with his son in Hezekiah's reformation (2 Chr. xxix. 12).—5. Son of Joahaz, and keeper of the records, or annalist to Josiah (xxxiv. 8).

Jo'a-haz (fr. Heb. = JEOHAZ, Ges.), father of Joah 5 (2 Chr. xxxiv. 8).

Jo'a-nan (Gr. fr. Heb.) = JOHANAN, son of Elia-shib (1 Esd. ix. 1).

Jo-an-na (L. = JEOHANAN), son of Rhessa, according to Lk. iii. 27, and one of the ancestors of Christ. But, according to Lord A. C. Hervey in the GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST, son of Zerubbabel, and the same as Hananiah in 1 Chr. iii. 19.

Jo-an-na (see above), one of the women who ministered unto Jesus, and brought spices and ointments to embalm His body (Lk. viii. 3, xxiv. 10); "wife of Chusa, steward of Herod," i. e. Antipas, tetrarch of Galilee.

Jo-an-nan (fr. Gr. = JEOHANAN), surnamed CADPIS, eldest brother of Judas Maccabeus (1 Mc. ii. 2).

the twenty-four courses of priests in the reign of David, and ancestor of the Maccabees (1 Mc. ii. 1).

Jo'ash (fr. Heb., contracted fr. JEHOASH, except No. 7, 8). 1. Son of AHAZIAH 2, king of Judah, and the only one of his children who escaped the murderous hand of Athaliah. After his father's sister JEHOASHABETH, the wife of JEHOIADA, had stolen him from among the king's sons, he was hid for six years in the chambers of the Temple. In the seventh year of his age, and of his concealment, a successful revolution placed him on the throne of his ancestors, and freed the country from the tyranny and idolatries of Athaliah. For at least twenty-three years, while Jehoiada lived, this reign was very prosperous. Excepting that the high-places were still resorted to for incense and sacrifice, pure religion was restored, large contributions were made for the repair of the Temple, which was accordingly restored; and the country seems to have been free from foreign invasion and domestic disturbance. But, after the death of Jehoiada, Joash fell into the hands of bad advisers, at whose suggestion he revived the worship of Baal and Ashtaroth. When he was rebuked for this by Zechariah, the son of Jehoiada, Joash caused him to be stoned to death in the very court of the Lord's house (Mat. xxiii. 35). The vengeance imprecated by the murdered high-priest was not long delayed. That very year, Hazael, king of Syria, came up against Jerusalem, and carried off a vast booty as the price of his departure. Joash had scarcely escaped this danger, when he fell into another and fatal one. Two of his servants, taking advantage of his severe illness, some think of a wound received in battle, conspired against him, and slew him in his bed in the fortress of Millo. Joash's reign lasted forty years. (ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF; JUDAH, KINGDOM OF).—2. Son and successor of JEHOAHAZ 1, on the throne of Israel, and for two years a contemporary sovereign with the preceding (2 K. xiv. 1; compare with xii. 1, xiii. 10). When he succeeded to the crown, the kingdom was in a deplorable state from the devastations of Hazael and Ben-hadad, kings of Syria. On occasion of a friendly visit paid by Joash to ELISHA on his death-bed, the prophet promised him deliverance from the Syrian yoke in Aphek (1 K. xx. 26-30). He then bid him smite upon the ground, and the king smote thrice and then stayed. The prophet rebuked him for staying, and limited to three his victories over Syria. Accordingly Joash did beat Ben-hadad three times on the field of battle, and recovered from him the cities which Hazael had taken from Jehoahaz. The other great military event of Joash's reign was his successful war with AMAZIAH, king of Judah. The grounds of this war are given fully in 2 Chr. xxv. The two armies met at Beth-shemesh, that of Joash was victorious, put the army of Amaziah to the rout, took him prisoner, brought him to Jerusalem, broke down the wall of Jerusalem, and plundered the city. He died in the fifteenth year of Amaziah, king of Judah, and was succeeded by his son Jeroboam II.—3. Father of GIDEON, and a wealthy man among the Abiezrites (Judg. vi. 11, 29-31, vii. 14, viii. 13, 29, 32).—4. Apparently a younger son of Ahab, who held a subordinate jurisdiction in the lifetime of his father, or was appointed viceroy (2 Chr. xviii. 25) during his absence in the attack on Ramoth-gilead (1 K. xxii. 26; 2 Chr. xviii. 25). Or he may have been merely a prince of the blood-royal (compare MALCHIAH 8).—5. A descendant of Shelah the son of Judah, but whether his son or the son of Jokim, is not clear (1 Chr. iv. 22).—6. A Benjamite hero, son of Shemaah of Gibeah (xii. 8). He joined David at Ziklag.—7. (fr. Heb. = to whom Jehovah hastens, sc. with help, Ges.). One of the officers of David's household (xxvii. 28).—8. Son of Becher, and head of a Benjamite house (vii. 8).

Jo'a-tham (L.) = JOTHAM the son of Uzziah (Mat. i. 9).

Jo-a-zab'dus (fr. Gr.) = JOZABAD the Levite (1 Esd. ix. 48; compare Neh. viii. 7).

Job [o as in note] (L. fr. Heb. yôb = returner, returner home, = JASHUB, Fû.), third son of Issachar (Gen. xlv. 13), called in another genealogy JASHUB (1 Chr. vii. 1).

Job (L. fr. Heb. lyôb = one persecuted, Ges.; converted, Fû.). 1. A patriarch of Uz, distinguished for his afflictions, uprightness, and patience (Ez. xiv. 14 ff.; Jas. v. 11); the chief character in—2. The Book of Job. This book consists of five parts: the introduction, the discussion between Job and his three friends (ELIPHAZ; BILDA; ZOPHAR), the speech of ELIHU, the manifestation and address of Almighty God, and the concluding chapter.—I. Analysis.—1. The introduction supplies all the facts on which the argument is based. Job, a chieftain in the land of Uz, of immense wealth and high rank, "the greatest of all the men of the East," is represented as a man of perfect integrity, blameless in all the relations of life, declared indeed by the Lord Himself to be "without his like in all the earth," "a perfect, and an upright man, one that feareth God, and escheweth evil." One question could be raised by envy; may not the goodness which secures such direct and tangible rewards be a refined form of selfishness? In the world of spirits, where all the mysteries of existence are brought to light, Satan, the accusing angel, suggests the doubt, "doth Job fear God for nought?" and asserts boldly that if those external blessings were withdrawn, Job would cast off his allegiance—"he will curse thee to thy face." The problem is thus distinctly propounded which this book is intended to discuss and solve. Can goodness exist irrespective of reward, can the fear of God be retained by man when every inducement to selfishness is taken away? The accuser receives permission to make the trial. He destroys Job's property, then his children; and afterward, to leave no possible opening for a cavil, is allowed to inflict upon him the most terrible disease known in the East. (MEDICINE.) Job's wife breaks down entirely under the trial. Job remains steadfast. He repels his wife's suggestion with the simple words, "What, shall we receive good at the hand of the Lord, and shall we not receive evil?" "In all this Job did not sin with his lips." The question raised by Satan was thus answered.—2. Still it is clear that many points of deep interest would have been left in obscurity. Entire as was the submission of Job, he must have been inwardly perplexed by events to which he had no clew, which were quite unaccountable on any hypothesis hitherto entertained, and seemed repugnant to the ideas of justice engraven on man's heart. An opportunity for the discussion of the providential government of the world is afforded in the most natural manner by the introduction of three men, representing the wisdom and experience of the age, who came to condole with Job on hearing of his misfortunes. The meeting is described with singular beauty. At a distance they greet him with the wild demonstrations of sympathizing grief usual in the East; coming near they are overpowered by the sight of his wretchedness, and sit seven days and seven nights without uttering a word. This awful silence drew out all his anguish. In an agony of desperation he curses the day of his birth. With the answer to this outburst begins a series of discussions, continued probably with some intervals, during several successive days. The results of the first discussion (Job iii.-xiv.) may be thus summed up. We have on the part of Job's friends a theory of the divine government resting upon an exact and uniform correlation between sin and punishment (iv. 6, 11, and throughout). Afflictions are always penal, issuing in the destruction of those who are radically opposed to God, or who do not submit to His chastisements. They lead of course to correction and amendment of life when the sufferer repents, confesses his sins, puts them away, and turns to God. In that case restoration to peace, and even increased prosperity may be expected (v. 17-27). Still the fact of the suffering always proves the commission of some special sin, while the demeanor of the sufferer indicates the true internal relation between him and God. These principles are applied by them to the case of Job. In this part of the dialogue the character of the three friends is clearly developed. Eliphaz represents the true patriarchal chieftain, grave and dignified, and erring only from an exclusive adherence to tenets hitherto unquestioned, and influenced in the first place by genuine regard for Job and sympathy with his afflictions. Bildad, without much originality or independence of character, reposes partly on the wise saws of antiquity, partly on the authority of his older friend. Zophar seems to be a young man; his language is violent, and at times even coarse and offensive. He represents the prejudiced and narrow-minded bigots of his age. In order to do justice to the position and arguments of Job, it must be borne in mind, that the direct object of the trial was to ascertain whether he would deny or forsake God, and that his real integrity is asserted by God Himself. He knows that he is not an offender in the sense of his opponents; and this consciousness enables him to examine fearlessly their position. He denies the assertion that punishment follows surely on guilt, or proves its commission. In the government of Providence he can see but one point clearly, viz. that all events and results are absolutely in God's hand (xii. 9-25), but as for the principles which underlie those events he knows nothing. In fact, he is sure that his friends are equally uninformed. Still he doubts not that God is just. There remains then but one course open to him, and that he takes. He turns to supplication, implores God to give him a fair and open trial (xiii. 18-28). Believing that with death all hope connected with this world ceases, he prays that he may be hidden in the grave (xiv. 13), and there reserved for the day when God will try his cause and manifest Himself in love (ver. 15). In the second discussion (xv.-xvi.), there is a more resolute elaborate attempt on the part of Job's friends to vindicate their theory of retributive justice. This requires an entire overthrow of the position taken by Job. They cannot admit his innocence. Eliphaz (xv.), who, as usual, lays down the basis of the argument, does not now hesitate to impute to Job the worst crimes of which man could be guilty. Bildad (xviii.) takes up this suggestion of ungodliness, and concludes that the special evils which had come upon Job are peculiarly the penalties due to one who is without God. Zophar not only accounts for Job's present calamities, but menaces him with still greater evils (xx.). In answer Job recognizes the hand of God in his afflictions (xvi. 7-16, and xix. 6-20), but rejects the charge of ungodliness; he has never forsaken his Maker, and never ceased to pray. He argues that since in this life the righteous certainly are not saved from evil, it follows that their ways are watched and their sufferings recorded, with a view to a future and perfect manifestation of the divine justice. On the other hand, stung by the harsh and narrow-minded bigotry of his opponents, Job draws out (xxi.) with terrible force the undeniable fact, that from the beginning to the end of their lives ungodly men, avowed atheists (ver. 14, 16), persons, in fact, guilty of the very crimes imputed, out of mere conjecture, to himself, frequently enjoy great and unbroken prosperity. In the third dialogue (xxii.-xxxi.) no real progress is made by Job's opponents. Eliphaz (xxii.) makes a last effort, and raises one new point. The station in which Job was formerly placed presented temptations to certain crimes; the punishments which he undergoes are precisely such as might be expected had those crimes been committed; hence he infers they actually were committed. Bildad has nothing to add but a few solemn words on the incomprehensible majesty of God and the nothingness of man. Zophar is put to silence. In his last two discourses Job does not alter his position, nor, properly speaking, adduce any new argument, but he states with incomparable force and eloquence the chief points which he regards as established (xxvi.). He then (xxvii.) describes, even more completely than his opponents had done, the destruction which, as a rule, ultimately falls upon the hypocrite. Then follows (xxviii.) the grand description of Wisdom. The remainder of this discourse (xxix.-xxxi.) contains a singularly beautiful description of his former life, contrasted with his actual misery, together with a full vindication of his character from all the charges made or insinuated by his opponents.—3. Thus ends the discussion in which it is evident both parties had partially failed. Job has been betrayed into very hazardous statements, while his friends had been on the one hand disingenuous, on the other bigoted, harsh, and pitiless. The points which had been omitted, or imperfectly developed, are now taken up by a new interlocutor (xxxii.-xxxvii.). Elihu, a young man, descended from a collateral branch of the family of Abraham, has listened in indignant silence to the arguments of his elders (xxxii. 7), and, impelled by an inward inspiration, he now addresses himself to both parties in the discussion, and specially to Job. He shows that they had accused Job upon false or insufficient grounds, and failed to convict him, or to vindicate God's justice. Job again had assumed his entire innocence, and had attributed that justice (xxxiii. 9-11). These errors he traces to their both overlooking one main object of all suffering. God speaks to man by chastisement. This statement does not involve any charge of special guilt, such as the friends had alleged and Job had repudiated. Again, Elihu argues (xxxiv. 10-17) that any charge of injustice, direct or implicit, against God involves a contradiction in terms. God is the only source of justice; the very idea of justice is derived from His governance of the universe. Job is silent, and Elihu proceeds (xxxvi.)

to show that the Almightyness of God is not, as Job seems to assert, associated with any contempt or neglect of His creatures. The rest of the discourse brings out forcibly the lessons taught by the manifestations of goodness, as well as greatness, in creation. The last words are evidently spoken while a violent storm is coming on.—4. It is obvious that many weighty truths have been developed in the course of the discussion—nearly every theory of the objects and uses of suffering has been reviewed—while a great advance has been made toward the apprehension of doctrines hereafter to be revealed, such as were known only to God. But the mystery is not as yet really cleared up. Hence the necessity for the Theophany—from the midst of the storm Jehovah speaks. In language of incomparable grandeur He reproves and silences the murmurings of Job. God does not condescend, strictly speaking, to argue with His creatures. The speculative questions discussed in the colloquy are unnoticed, but the declaration of God's absolute power is illustrated by a marvellously beautiful and comprehensive survey of the glory of creation, and His all-embracing Providence by reference to the phenomena of the animal kingdom. Job confesses his inability to comprehend and therefore to answer his Maker (xl. 3, 4). A second address completes the work. It proves that a charge of injustice against God involves the consequence that the accuser is more competent than He to rule the universe.—5. Job's unreserved submission terminates the trial. In the rebuke then addressed to Job's opponents the integrity of his character is distinctly recognized, while they are condemned for untruth, which is pardoned on the intercession of Job. The restoration of his external prosperity, which is an inevitable result of God's personal manifestation, symbolizes the ultimate compensation of the righteous for all sufferings undergone upon earth. The great object of the book must surely be that which is distinctly intimated in the introduction, and confirmed in the conclusion, to show the effects of calamity in its worst and most awful form upon a truly religious spirit (so Mr. Cook, original author of this article).—II. Integrity of the Book. Four parts of the book have been most generally attacked. 1. Objections have been made to the introductory and concluding chapters—(a) on account of the style. Of course there is an obvious and natural difference between the prose of the narrative and the highly poetical language of the colloquy. Yet the best critics now acknowledge that the style of these portions is quite as antique in its simple and severe grandeur, as that of the Pentateuch itself. (b) It is said that the doctrinal views are not in harmony with those of Job. This is wholly unfounded. (ANGELS; SATAN.) The form of worship belongs essentially to the early patriarchal type. (c) It is alleged that there are discrepancies between the facts related in the introduction, and statements or allusions in the dialogue. But these are only apparent, not real. Thus children of my womb ([“children of mine own body,” A. V.] xix. 17, compare i. 18, 19) = my brethren, not my children (compare iii. 10, viii. 4, xxix. 5). (d) The omission in the last chapter of all reference to the defeat of Satan is in accordance with the simplicity of the poem.—2. Strong objections are made to the passage xxvii. 7–23. Here Job describes the ultimate fate of the godless hypocrite in terms which some critics hold to be in direct contradiction to the whole tenor of his arguments in other discourses. The fact of the contradiction is denied by able writers, who have shown that it rests upon a misapprehension of the patriarch's character and fundamental principles. The whole chapter is thoroughly coherent: the first part is admitted by all to belong to Job; nor can the rest be disjoined from it without injury to the sense. As for the style, Rénan, a most competent authority in a matter of taste, declares that it is one of the finest developments in the poem.—3. The last two chapters of the address of the Almighty have been rejected as interpolations by many writers, partly because of an alleged inferiority of style, partly as not relevant to the argument. (See I. 4, above.)—4. The speech of Elihu presents greater difficulties, and has been rejected by several, whose opinion, however, is controverted not only by orthodox writers, but by some of the most skeptical commentators. The former support their decision chiefly on the manifest, and to a certain extent the real, difference between this and other parts of the book in tone and thought, in doctrinal views, and more positively in language and general style. Much stress also is laid upon the facts that Elihu is not mentioned in the introduction nor at the end, and that his speech is unanswered by Job, and unnoticed in the final address of the Almighty. A candid and searching examination, however, proves that there is a close internal connection between this and other parts of the book; there are references to numerous passages in the discourses of Job and his friends; so covert as only to be discovered by close inquiry, yet, when pointed out, so striking and natural as to leave no room for doubt. Elihu supplies exactly what Job repeatedly demands—a confutation of his opinions by rational and human arguments. There is no difficulty in accounting for the omission of Elihu's name in the introduction. No persons are named in the book until they appear as agents, or as otherwise concerned in the events. Again, the discourse being substantially true did not need correction, and is therefore left unnoticed in the final decision of the Almighty. More weight is to be attached to the objection resting upon diversity of style, and dialectic peculiarities. It may be accounted for on the supposition that the author adhered strictly to the form in which tradition handed down the dialogue, or that the Chaldaic forms and idioms are such as peculiarly suit the style of the young and fiery speaker.—III. Historical Character of the Work. Three distinct theories have been maintained at various times; some believing the book to be strictly historical; others a religious fiction; others a composition based upon facts. Until a comparatively late time, the prevalent opinion was, not only that the persons and events which it describes are real, but that the very words of the speakers were accurately recorded. It was supposed either that Job himself employed the latter years of his life in writing it (A. Schultens), or that at a very early age some inspired Hebrew collected the facts and sayings, faithfully preserved by oral tradition, and presented them to his countrymen in their own tongue. By some the authorship of the work was attributed to Moses. The fact of Job's existence, and the substantial truth of the narrative, were not likely to be denied by Hebrews or Christians, considering the terms in which the patriarch is named in Ez. xiv. and Jas. v. 11. It is, to say the least, highly improbable that a Hebrew, had he invented such a character as that of Job, should have represented him as belonging to a race which, though descended from a common ancestor, was never on friendly, and generally on hostile, terms with his own people. To this it must be added that there is a singular air of reality in the whole narrative, such as must either proceed naturally from a faithful adherence to objective truth, or be the result of the most consummate art. Forceful as these arguments may appear, many critics have adopted the opinion either that the whole work is a moral or religious apologue, or that, upon a substratum of a few rudimental facts preserved by tradition, the genius of an original thinker has raised this, the most remarkable monument of the Shemitic mind. While the Rabbins in general maintain its historical character, Samuel Bar Nachman declares his conviction, "Job did not exist, and was not a created man, but the work is a parable." Luther first suggested the theory, which, in some form or other, is now most generally received. He says: "I look upon the book of Job as a true history, yet I do not believe that all took place just as it is written, but that an ingenious, pious, and learned man brought it into its present form."—IV. Probable age, country, and position of the Author. The language alone does not, as some have asserted, supply any decisive test as to the date of the composition. The fact that the language of this work approaches far more nearly to the Arabic than any other Hebrew production was remarked by Jerome, and is recognized by the soundest critics. On the other hand, there are undoubtedly many Aramaic words, and grammatical forms, which some critics have regarded as strong proof that the writers must have lived during, or even after the Captivity. At present this hypothesis is universally given up as untenable. It is proved that the Aramaisms of the book of Job are such as characterize the antique and highly poetic style. It may be regarded as a settled point that the book was written long before the exile; while there is absolutely nothing to prove a later date than the Pentateuch, or even those parts of the Pentateuch which appear to belong to the patriarchal age. This impression is borne out by the style. All critics have recognized its grand archaic character. The extent to which the influence of this book is perceptible in the later literature of the Hebrews, is a subject of great interest and importance; but it has not yet been thoroughly investigated. Considerable weight must be attached to the fact that Job is far more remarkable for obscurity than any Hebrew writing. There is an obscurity which results from confusion of thought, from carelessness and inaccuracy, or from studied involutions and artificial combination of metaphors indicating a late age. But when it is owing to obsolete words, intense concentration of thought and language, and incidental allusions to long-forgotten traditions, it is an all but infallible proof of primeval antiquity. Such are precisely the difficulties in this book. We arrive at the same conclusion from considering the institutions, manners, and historical facts described or alluded to. Ewald, whose judgment in this case will not be questioned, asserts very positively that in all the descriptions of manners and customs, domestic, social, and political, and even in the indirect allusions and illustrations, the genuine coloring of the age of Job, i. e. of the period between Abraham and Moses, is very faithfully observed; that all historical examples and allusions are taken exclusively from patriarchal times, and that there is a complete and successful avoidance of direct reference to later occurrences, which in his opinion may have been known to the writer. All critics concur in extolling the fresh, antique simplicity of manners described in this book, the genuine air of the wild, free, vigorous life of the desert, the stamp of hoar antiquity, and the thorough consistency in the development of characters, equally remarkable for originality and force. Moreover, there is sufficient reason to believe that under favorable circumstances a descendant of Abraham, who was himself a warrior, and accustomed to meet princes on terms of equality, would at a very early age acquire the habits, position, and knowledge, which we admire in Job. No positive historical fact or allusion can be produced from the book to prove that it could not have been written before the time of Moses. The single objection which presents any difficulty is the mention of the Chaldeans in the introductory chapter. It is certain that they appear first in Hebrew history about B. C. 770. But the name of Chæzed, ancestor of the race, is found in the genealogical table in Genesis xxii. (verse 22), a fact quite sufficient to prove the early existence of the people as a separate tribe. The arguments which have induced the generality of modern critics to assign a later date to this book may be reduced to two heads:—1. We are told that the doctrinal system is considerably in advance of the Mosaic; in fact that it is the result of a recoil from the stern, narrow dogmatism of the Pentateuch. Still even rationalistic criticism cannot show that there is a demonstrable difference in any essential point between the principles recognized in Genesis and those of our author. Again it is said that the representation of ANGELS, and still more specially of SATAN, belongs to a later epoch. It is also to be remarked that no charge of idolatry is brought against Job by his opponents when enumerating all the crimes which they can imagine to account for his calamities. The only allusion to the subject (Job xxxi. 26) refers to the earliest form of false religion known in the East. To an Israelite, living after the introduction of heathen rites, such a charge was the very first which would have suggested itself, nor can any satisfactory reason be assigned for the omission.—2. Nearly all modern critics, even those who admit the inspiration of the author, agree in the opinion that the composition of the whole work, the highly systematic development of the plot, and the philosophic tone of thought indicate a considerable progress in mental cultivation far beyond what can, with any show of probability, be supposed to have existed before the age of Solomon. It should, however, be remarked that the persons introduced in this book belong to a country celebrated for wisdom in the earliest times; inasmuch that the writer who speaks of those schools (Rénan) considers that the peculiarities of the writings of Solomon were derived from intercourse with its inhabitants. The book of Job differs from those writings chiefly in its greater earnestness, vehemence of feeling, vivacity of imagination, and free independent inquiry into the principles of divine government; characteristics as it would seem of a primitive race, acquainted only with the patriarchal form of religion, rather than of a scholastic age. There is indeed nothing in the composition incompatible with the Mosaic age, admitting the authenticity and integrity of the PENTATEUCH. These considerations lead of course to the conclusion that the book must have been written before the promulgation of the Law, by one speaking the Hebrew language, and thoroughly conversant with the traditions preserved in the family of Abraham. One hypothesis, lately brought forward by Stickel, followed by Schlottmann, and supported by very ingenious arguments, deserves a more special notice. That supposition is, that Job may have been written after the settlement of the Israelites by a dweller in the south of Judea, in a district immediately bordering upon the Idumean desert. The inhabitants of that district were to a considerable extent isolated from the rest of the nation. A resident there would have peculiar opportunities of collecting the varied and extensive information possessed by the author of Job. The local coloring, so strikingly characteristic of this book, and so evidently natural, is just what might be expected from such a writer. The people appear also to have been noted for freshness and originality of mind; qualities seen in the woman of Tekoa, or still more remarkably in Amos, the poor and unlearned herdsman, also of Tekoa. Some weight may also be attached to the observation that the dialectic peculiarities of southern Palestine, especially the softening of the aspirants and exchanges of the sibilants, resemble the few divergencies from pure Hebrew which are noted in the book of Job. The controversy about the authorship cannot ever be finally settled. From the introduction it may certainly be inferred that the writer lived many years after the death of Job. From the strongest internal evidence it is also clear that he must either have composed the work before the Law was promulgated, or under most peculiar circumstances which exempted him from its influence (so Mr. Cook). Jobab (fr. Heb. = desert, Ges.). 1. The last in order of the sons of JOKTAN (Gen. x. 29; 1 Chr. i. 23). His name has not been discovered among the Arab names of places in southern ARABIA, where he ought to be found with the other sons of Joktan. —2. One of the "kings" of EDOM (Gen. xxxvi. 33, 34; 1 Chr. i. 44, 45), enumerated after the genealogy of Esau, and Seir, and before the phylarchs descended from Esau. —3. King of MADON; one of the northern chieftains who attempted to oppose Joshua's conquest, and were routed by him at Merom (Josh. xi. 1, only). —4. Head of a Benjamite house (1 Chr. viii. 10).

Joeh'e-bed [jok-] (fr. Heb. = whose glory is Jehovah, Ges.), the wife and at the same time the aunt of AMRAM; mother of MOSES, Aaron, and Miriam (Ex. ii. 1, vi. 20; Num. xxvi. 59).

Jo'ed (fr. Heb. = his witness is Jehovah, Ges.), a Benjamite, son of Pedaiah (Neh. xi. 7).

Jo'el (fr. Heb. = Jehovah is his God, i. e. worshipper of Jehovah, Ges.). 1. Eldest son of Samuel the prophet (1 Sam. viii. 2; 1 Chr. vi. 33, xv. 17), and father of Heman the singer. (ABIAH 3; VASHNI.) —2. In 1 Chr. vi. 30, A. V., Joel seems = SHAUL in verse 24. —3. One of the twelve minor prophets (BIBLE; CANON; INSPIRATION; PROPHET); son of Pethuel, or, according to the LXX., Bethuel. Beyond this fact all is conjecture as to the personal history of Joel. Pseudo-Epiphanius records a tradition that he was of the tribe of Reuben, born and buried at Beth-horon, between Jerusalem and Cesarea. It is most likely that he lived in Judea. Many different opinions have been expressed about the date of Joel's prophecy. Credner has placed it in the reign of Joash; Bertholdt of Hezekiah; Kimchi, Jahn, &c., of Manasseh; and Calmet of Josiah. The majority of critics and commentators (Abarbanel, Vitringa, Hengstenberg, Winer, &c.) fix upon the reign of Uzziah. — The Nature, Style, and Contents of the Prophecy. We find, what we should expect on the supposition of Joel being the first prophet to Judah, only a grand outline of the whole terrible scene, which was to be depicted more and more in detail by subsequent prophets. The scope, therefore, is not any particular invasion, but the whole day of the Lord. The proximate event to which the prophecy related was a public calamity, then impending upon Judea, of a twofold character: want of water, and a plague of locusts, continuing for several years. The prophet exhorts the people to turn to God with penitence, fasting, and prayer; and then (he says) the plague shall cease, and the rain descend in its season, and the land yield her accustomed fruit. Nay, the time will be a most joyful one; for God, by the outpouring of His Spirit, will impart to His worshippers increased knowledge of Himself, and after the excision of the enemies of His people, will extend through them the blessings of true religion to heathen lands. This is the simple argument of the book; only that it is beautified and enriched with variety of ornament and pictorial description. The style of the original is perspicuous (except toward the end) and elegant, surpassing that of all other prophets, except Isaiah and Habakkuk, in sublimity. The locusts of chapter ii. were regarded by many interpreters of the last century (Lowth, Shaw, &c.) as figurative, and introduced by way of comparison to a hostile army of men from the north country. This view is now generally abandoned. Maurice strongly maintains the literal interpretation. And yet the plague contained a parable in it, which it was the prophet's mission to unfold. The "afterward" (ii. 28, A. V.) raises us to a higher level of vision, and brings into view Messianic times and scenes. (MESSIAH.) Here, says Steudel, we have a Messianic prophecy altogether. If this prediction has ever yet been fulfilled, we must certainly refer the event to Acts ii. Lastly, the accompanying portents and judgments upon the enemies of God find their various solutions, according to the interpreters, in the repeated deportations of the Jews by neighboring merchants, and sale to the Macedonians (1 Mc. iii. 41, and Ez. xxvii. 13), followed by the sweeping away of the neighboring nations (Maurice); in the events accompanying the crucifixion, in the fall of Jerusalem, in the breaking up of all human polities. But here again the idea includes all manifestations of judgment, ending with the last (so Mr. Bailey). —4. A Simeonite chief (1 Chr. iv. 35). —5. A descendant of Reuben. Junius and Tremellius make him the son of Hanoch, while others trace his descent through Carmi (v. 4). —6. Chief of the Gadites in Bashan (v. 12). —7. Son of Izrahiah; a chief of Issachar (vii. 8). —8. Brother of Nathan of Zobah (xi. 38), and one of David's "valiant men;" = IGAL. —9. Chief of the Gershonites in David's reign (xv. 7, 11). —10. A Gershonite Levite in David's reign; son of Jebiel, a descendant of Laadan, and probably = No. 9 (xxiii. 8, xxvi. 22). —11. Son of Pedaiah, and a chief of Manasseh, W. of Jordan, in David's reign (xxvii. 20). —12. A Kohathite Levite in Hezekiah's reign (2 Chr. xxix. 12). —13. One of the sons of Nebo who returned with Ezra, and had married a foreign wife (Ezr. x. 43). —14. A Benjamite chief, son of Zichri (Neh. xi. 9).

Jeg-be-lah (fr. Heb. = elevated, Ges.), one of the cities E. of Jordan built and fortified by the tribe of Gad when they took possession (Num. xxxii. 35); mentioned with Nobah in the account of Gideon's pursuit of the Midianites (Judg. viii. 11). Mr. Wilton (in Fbn.) makes two different places, that in Numbers at Sebeia, a ruin about four miles N. of Ammdn (Rabbah), that in Judges at Tell Jâbich, N. E. of Pik (Aphek); but most suppose both passages refer to the same place.

Jeg'll (fr. Heb. = exiled, Ges.), father of Bukki, a Danite chief (Num. xxxiv. 22).

Jo-ha (fr. Heb. = whom Jehovah revives? Ges.; Jehovah is living, Fii.). 1. A son of Beriah, the Benjamite (1 Chr. viii. 16).—2. The Tizite, one of David's "valiant men" (xi. 45).

Jo-ha-nan (L. fr. Heb.; contracted from JEHOHANAN). 1. Son of AZARIAH 1, and grandson of Ahi-maaz the son of Zadok; father of AZARIAH 6 (1 Chr. vi. 9, 10, A. V.); probably (so Lord A. C. Hervey) HIGH-PRIEST in Rehoboam's reign.—2. Son of Eli-oenai, in the line of Zerubbabel's heirs (iii. 24).—3. Son of Kareah, and one of the captains of the scattered remnants of the army of Judah, who escaped in the final attack upon Jerusalem by the Chaldeans. He warned GEDALIAH against the plot of ISHMAEL 6, but in vain. After the murder of Gedaliah, Johanan was one of the foremost in the pursuit of his assassin, and rescued the captives he had carried off from Mizpah. Fearing the vengeance of the Chaldeans, the captains, with Johanan at their head, notwithstanding the warnings of Jeremiah, retired into Egypt (2 K. xiv. 23; Jer. xl. xliii.).—4. First-born son of Josiah, king of Judah (1 Chr. iii. 15).—5. A valiant Benjamite who joined David at Ziklag (xii. 4).—6. A Gadite warrior who followed David (xii. 12).—7. An Ephraimite, father of Azariah in the time of Ahaz (2 Chr. xxviii. 12).—8. Son of Hakkatan, and chief of the sons of Azgad who returned with Ezra (Ezr. viii. 12).—9. Son of Eliashib; (a priest?) to whose chamber Ezra retired to mourn over the foreign marriages (x. 6).—10. Son of Tobiah the Ammonite (Neh. vi. 18).—11. Eldest son of Mattathias surnamed Caddis, slain by "the children of Jambri" (ii. 2, ix. 36-38).—3. Father of Eupolemus, one of the envoys whom Judas Maccabeus sent to Rome (viii. 17; 2 Mc. iv. 11).—4. Son of Simon, the brother of Judas Maccabeus (1 Mc. xiii. 58, xvi. 1); a "valiant man," who, under the title of John Hyrcanus, nobly supported the glory of his house. (HIGH-PRIEST; MACCABEES).—5. An envoy from the Jews to Lysias (2 Mc. xi. 17).—6. One of the high-priest's family, who, with Annas and Caiaphas, sat in judgment upon the apostles Peter and John (Acts iv. 6). Lightfoot identifies him with Rabbi Johanan ben Zaccal, president of the great synagogue after its removal to Jamnia.—7. A name of the Evangelist MARK (Acts xii. 12, 25, xlii. 5, 13, xv. 37).

will be convenient to divide his life into periods corresponding both to the great critical epochs which separate one part of it from another, and to marked differences in the trustworthiness of the sources from which our materials are derived. One portion of the apostle's life and work stands out before us as in the clearness of broad daylight. Over those which precede and follow it there brood the shadows of darkness and uncertainty.—I. Before the call to the discipleship. We have no data for settling with any exactitude the time of the apostle's birth. The general impression left on us by the Gospel-narrative is that he was younger than the brother (JAMES 1) whose name commonly precedes his (Mat. iv. 21, x. 3, xvii. 1, &c.; but compare Lk. ix. 28, where the order is inverted), younger than his friend Peter, possibly also than his Master. The Gospels give us the name of his father ZEBEDEE (Mat. iv. 21) and his mother Salome (xxvii. 56, compare Mk. xv. 40, xvi. 1). They lived, it may be inferred from Jn. i. 44, in or near the same town (BRTHSAIDA) as those who were afterward the companions and partners of their children. There, on the shores of the Sea of Galilee, the apostle and his brother grew up. The mention of the "hired servants" (Mk. i. 20), of his mother's "substance" (Lk. viii. 8), of "his own house" (Jn. xix. 27), implies a position removed by at least some steps from absolute poverty. We infer (so Professor Plumptre) that Zebedee had died before his wife followed her children in their work of ministration. Her character meets us as presenting the same marked features as those which were conspicuous in her son.—II. From the call to the discipleship to the departure from Jerusalem. The ordinary life of the fisherman of the Sea of Galilee was at last broken in upon by the news that a prophet had once more appeared. The voice of John the Baptist was heard in the wilderness of Judea, and the publicans, peasants, soldiers, and fishermen of Galilee gathered round him. Among these were the two sons of Zebedee and their friends. With them perhaps was One whom as yet they knew not. Assuming that the unnamed disciple of Jn. i. 37-40 was the Evangelist himself, we are led to think of that meeting, of the lengthened interview that followed it, as the starting-point of the entire devotion of heart and soul which lasted through his whole life. Then Jesus loved him as he loved all earnest seekers after righteousness and truth (compare Mk. x. 21). The words of that evening, though unrecorded, were mighty in their effect. The disciples (John apparently among them) followed their new teacher to Galilee (Jn. i. 44), were with him, as such, at the marriage-feast of Cana (ii. 2), journeyed with him to Capernaum, and thence to Jerusalem (ii. 12, 22), came back through Samaria (iv. 8), and then, for some uncertain interval of time, returned to their former occupations. From this time they take their place among the company of disciples—soon, in the number of the twelve apostles. They come within the innermost circle of their Lord's friends. The three, Peter, James, and John, are with him when none else are, in the chamber of death (Mk. v. 37), in the glory of the transfiguration (Mat. xvii. 1), when he forewarns them of the destruction of the Holy City (Mk. xiii. 3, Andrew in this instance with them), in the agony of Gethsemane. Peter is throughout the leader of that band; to John belongs the yet more memorable distinction of being the disciple whom Jesus loved. They hardly sustain the popular notion, fostered by the received types of Christian art, of a nature gentle, yielding, feminine. The name Boanerges (iii. 17) implies a vehemence, zeal, intensity, which gave to those who had it the might of Sons of Thunder. That spirit broke out, once and again (Mat. xx. 20-24; Mk. x. 35-41; Lk. ix. 49, 54). Through his mother, we may well believe, John first came to know that Mary Magdalene whose character he depicts with such a life-like touch, and that other Mary (MARY, THE VIRGIN) to whom he was afterward to stand in so close and special a relation. The fulness of his narrative of what the other Evangelists omit (Jn. xi.) leads to the conclusion that he was united also by some special ties of intimacy to the family of Bethany. At the Last Supper, he is, as ever, the disciple whom Jesus loved; and reclines at table with his head upon his Master's breast (xiii. 23). To him the eager Peter—they had been sent together to prepare the supper (Lk. xxii. 8)—makes signs of impatient questioning that he should ask what was not likely to be answered if it came from any other (Jn. xiii. 24). As they go out to the Mount of Olives the chosen three are nearest to their Master. They only are within sight or hearing of the conflict in Gethsemane (Mat. xxvi. 37). When the betrayal is accomplished, Peter and John, after the first moment of confusion, follow afar off, while the others simply seek safety in a hasty flight (Jn. xviii. 15). The personal acquaintance between John and Caiaphas enabled him to gain access both for himself and Peter, but the latter remains in the porch, with the officers and servants, while John himself apparently is admitted to the council-chamber, and follows Jesus thence, even to the pretorium of the Roman Procurator (xviii. 16, 19, 28). Thence, as if the desire to see the end, and the love which was stronger than death, sustained him through all the terrors and sorrows of that day, he followed, accompanied probably by his own mother, Mary the mother of Jesus, and Mary Magdalene, to the place of crucifixion. The Teacher who had been to him as a brother leaves to him a brother's duty. He is to be as a son to the mother left desolate (xix. 26, 27). The Sabbath that followed was spent, it would appear, in the same company. He receives Peter, in spite of his denial, on the old terms of friendship. To them Mary Magdalene first runs with the tidings of the emptied sepulchre (xx. 2); they are the first to go together to see what the strange words meant. John is the more impetuous, running on most eagerly to the rock-tomb; Peter, the least restrained by awe, the first to enter in and look (xx. 4-6). For at least eight days they continued in Jerusalem (xx. 26). Then, in the interval between the resurrection and the ascension, we find them still together on the Sea of Galilee (xxi. 1). Here, too, there is a characteristic difference. John is the first to recognize in the morning twilight his risen Lord; Peter the first to plunge into the water and swim toward the shore where He stood calling to them (xxi. 7). The last words of the Gospel reveal to us the deep affection which united the two friends. It is not enough for Peter to know his own future. That at once suggests the question, "And what shall this man do?" (xxi. 21). The history of the Acts shows the same union. They are of course together at the ascension and on the day of Pentecost. Together they enter the Temple as worshippers (Acts iii. 1) and protest against the threats of the Sanhedrim (iv. 13). They are fellow-workers in the first great step of the Church's expansion. The apostle whose wrath had been roused by the unbelief of the Samaritans, overcomes his national exclusiveness, and receives them as his brethren (viii. 14). The persecution pushed on by Saul of Tarsus did not drive him or any of the apostles from their post (viii. 1). When the persecutor came back as the convert, he, it is true, did not see him (Gal. i. 19), but this does not involve the inference that he had left Jerusalem. The sharper though shorter persecution under Herod Agrippa brought a great sorrow to him in the martyrdom of his brother (Acts xii. 2). His friend was driven to seek safety in flight. Fifteen years after St. Paul's first visit he was still at Jerusalem and helped to take part in the settlement of the great controversy between the Jewish and the Gentile Christians (xv. 6). His position and reputation there were those of one ranking among the chief "pillars" of the Church (Gal. ii. 9). Of the work of the apostle during this period we have hardly the slightest trace. The traditions of the Church ascribe to him a life of celibacy.—III. From his departure from Jerusalem to his death. The traditions of a later age come in, with more or less show of likelihood, to fill up the great gap which separates the apostle of Jerusalem from the bishop of Ephesus. It was a natural conjecture to suppose that he remained in Judea till the death of the Virgin released him from his trust. When this took place we can only conjecture. There are no signs of his being in Jerusalem at the time of St. Paul's last visit (Acts xxi.). The pastoral epistles set aside the notion that he had come to Ephesus before the work of the apostle of the Gentiles was brought to its conclusion. Out of many contradictory statements, fixing his departure under Claudius, or Nero, or as late even as Domitian, we have hardly any data for doing more than rejecting the two extremes. Nor is it certain that his work as an apostle was transferred at once from Jerusalem to Ephesus. Assuming the authorship of the Epistles (JOHN, 1ST, 2D, AND 3D EPISTLES OF) and the REVELATION to be his, the facts which the N. T. writings assert or imply are—(1.) that, having come to Ephesus, some persecution, local or general, drove him to Patmos (Rev. i. 9); (2.) that the seven churches, of which Asia was the centre, were special objects of his solicitude (i. 11); that in his work he had to encounter men who denied the truth on which his faith rested (1 Jn. iv. 1; 2 Jn. 7), and others who, with a railing and malignant temper, disputed his authority (3 Jn. 9, 10). The picture which tradition fills up for us has the merit of being full and vivid, but it blends together, without much regard to harmony, things probable and improbable. He is shipwrecked off Ephesus, and arrives there in time to check the progress of the heresies which sprang up after St. Paul's departure. Then, or at a later period, he numbers among his disciples Polycarp, Ignatius, Papias. In the persecution under Domitian he is taken to Rome, and there, by his boldness, though not by death, gains the crown of martyrdom. The boiling oil into which he is thrown has no power to hurt him. He is then sent to labor in the mines, and Patmos is the place of his exile. The accession of Nerva frees him from danger, and he returns to Ephesus. There he settles the canon of the Gospel-history by formally attesting the truth of the first three Gospels, and writing his own (JOHN, GOSPEL OF) to supply what they left wanting. Heresies continue to show themselves, but he meets them with the strongest possible protest. He refuses to pass under the same roof (that of the public baths of Ephesus) as their foremost leader (Cerinthus), lest the house should fall on them and crush them. Through his agency the great temple of Artemis (DIANA) is at last left of its magnificence, and even levelled with the ground. He introduces and perpetuates the Jewish mode of celebrating the Easter feast. At Ephesus, he appears as one who was a true priest of the Lord, bearing on his brow the plate of gold, with the sacred name engraved on it. Clemens Alexandrinus relates that he sought a robber chief, formerly his scholar, and won him to repentance: Jerome, that in his old age he used to be carried into Christian assemblies where he would repeat the exhortation, "Little children, love one another." The very time of his death lies within the region of conjecture rather than of history, and the dates that have been assigned for it range from A. D. 89 to A. D. 120. The result of all this accumulation of apocryphal materials is, from one point of view, disappointing enough. We find it better and more satisfying to turn again, for all our conceptions of the apostle's mind and character, to the scanty records of the N. T., and the writings which he himself has left. The truest thought that we can attain to is still that he was "the disciple whom Jesus loved;" returning that love with a deep, absorbing, unwavering devotion. He is the Apostle of Love, not because he starts from the easy temper of a general benevolence, nor again as being of a character soft, yielding, feminine, but because he has grown, ever more and more, into the likeness of Him whom he loved so truly.

John (see above) the Baptist (fr. Gr. baptistês = one who baptizes, a baptizer; see BAPTISM), a saint more signally honored of God than any other in the O. or N. T. He was of the priestly race by both parents, for his father Zacharias was himself a priest of the course of Abia, or Abijah (1 Chr. xxiv. 10), offering incense at the very time when a son was promised to him; and his mother Elisabeth was of the daughters of Aaron (Lk. i. 5). The divine mission of John was the subject of prophecy many centuries before his birth (Mat. iii. 3; Is. xl. 3; Mal. iii. 1). His birth—a birth not according to the ordinary laws of nature, but through the miraculous interposition of almighty power—was foretold by an angel sent from God, who proclaimed the character and office of this wonderful child. These marvellous revelations as to the character and career of the son, for whom he had so long prayed in vain, were too much for the faith of the aged Zacharias; and when he sought some assurance of the certainty of the promised blessing, God gave it to him in the privation of speech until the event foretold should happen. And now the Lord's gracious promise tarried not: Elisabeth was afterward visited in "a city of Juda" (JUDAH?) in "the hill-country" (evidently her home [Lk. i. 23, 39, 40]) by her kinswoman Mary. (MARY THE VIRGIN.) Three months after this, and while Mary still remained with her, Elisabeth was delivered of a son. The birth of John preceded by six months that of our Lord. (JESUS CHRIST.) On the eighth day the child was, in conformity with the law of Moses (Lev. xii. 3), brought to the priest for circumcision, and as this was the accustomed time for naming a child, the friends of the family proposed to call him Zacharias after his father. The mother, however, required that he should be called John; a decision which Zacharias, still speechless, confirmed by writing on a tablet, "his name is John." The judgment on his want of faith was then at once withdrawn. God's wonderful interposition in the birth of John had impressed the minds of many with a certain solemn awe and expectation (Lk. iii. 15). A single verse contains all that we know of John's history for thirty years; the whole period between his birth and the commencement of his public ministry. "The child grew and waxed strong in spirit, and was in the deserts till the day of his showing unto Israel" (i. 80). John was ordained to be a NAZARITE from his birth (i. 15). Dwelling by himself in the wild and thinly-peopled region W. of the Dead Sea, he prepared himself by self-discipline, and by constant communion with God, for the wonderful office to which he had been divinely called. His very appearance was of itself a lesson to his countrymen; his dress was that of the old prophets—a garment woven of camel's hair (2 K. i. 8), attached to the body by a leathern girdle. His food was such as the desert afforded—locusts (Lev. xi. 22) and wild honey (Ps. lxxxi. 16). And now the long-secluded hermit came forth to the discharge of his office. His supernatural birth—his hard, ascetic life—his reputation for extraordinary sanctity—and the generally prevailing expectation that some great one was about to appear—these causes, without the aid of miraculous power (Jn. x. 41), were sufficient to attract to him a great multitude from "every quarter" (Mat. iii. 5). Brief and startling was his first exhortation to them: "Repent ye; for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." Some score of verses contain all that is recorded of John's preaching, and the sum of it all is repentance; not mere legal ablation or expiation, but a change of heart and life. Many of every class pressed forward to confess their sins and to be baptized. The preparatory BAPTISM of John was a visible sign to the people, and a distinct acknowledgment by them that a hearty renunciation of sin and a real amendment of life were necessary for admission into the kingdom of heaven, which the Baptist proclaimed to be at hand. But the fundamental distinction between John's BAPTISM unto repentance, and that baptism accompanied with the gift of the Holy Spirit which our Lord afterward ordained, is clearly marked by John himself (iii. 11, 12). As a preacher, John was eminently practical and discriminating. His mission—an extraordinary one for an extraordinary purpose—was not limited to those who had openly forsaken the covenant of God, and so forfeited its privileges. It was to the whole people alike. Jesus Himself came from Galilee to Jordan to be baptized of John. But here a difficult question arises—How is John's acknowledgment of Jesus at the moment of His presenting Himself for baptism compatible with his subsequent assertion that he knew Him not, save by the descent of the Holy Spirit upon Him, which took place after His baptism? It must be borne in mind that their places of residence were at the two extremities of the country, with but little means of communication between them. It is possible therefore that the Saviour and the Baptist had never before met. It was certainly of the utmost importance that there should be no suspicion of concert or collusion between them. The true meaning would seem to be—And I, though standing in so close a relation to Him, both personally and ministerially, had no assured knowledge of Him as the Messiah. I did not know Him, and I had not authority to proclaim Him as such, till I saw the predicted sign in the descent of the Holy Spirit upon Him. With the baptism of Jesus, John's more especial office ceased. He still continued, however, to present himself to his countrymen in the capacity of witness to Jesus. From incidental notices in Scripture, we learn that John and his disciples continued to baptize some time after our Lord entered upon His ministry (see Jn. iii. 23, iv. 1; Acts xix. 3). We gather also that John instructed his disciples in certain moral and religious duties, as fasting (Mat. ix. 14; Lk. v. 33) and prayer (xi. 1). But shortly after he had given his testimony to the Messiah, John's public ministry was brought to a close. In daring disregard of the divine laws, HEROD ANTIPAS had taken to himself HERODIAS, the wife of his brother Philip; and when John reproved him for this, as well as for other sins (iii. 19), Herod cast him into prison. The place of his confinement was the castle of Machærus—a fortress on the eastern shore of the Dead Sea. Here reports reached him of the miracles which our Lord was working in Judea. With a view, therefore, to overcome the scruples of his disciples (so Mr. Hawkins; see JESUS CHRIST), John sent two of them to Jesus Himself to ask the question, "Art Thou He that should come?" They were answered not by words, but by a series of miracles wrought before their eyes; and while Jesus bade the two messengers carry back to John as His only answer the report of what they had seen and heard, He took occasion to guard the multitude who surrounded Him, against supposing that the Baptist himself was shaken in mind, by a direct appeal to their own knowledge of his life and character. Jesus further proceeds to declare that John was, according to the true meaning of the prophecy, the ELIJAH of the new covenant, foretold by Malachi (iii. 4). The event indeed proved that John was to Herod what Elijah had been to Ahab. Nothing but the death of the Baptist would satisfy the resentment of Herodias. A court festival was kept at Machærus in honor of the king's birthday. After supper, the daughter of Herodias came in and danced before the company, and so charmed was the king by her grace that he promised with an oath to give her whatsoever she should ask. Salome, prompted by her abandoned mother, demanded the head of John the Baptist. Herod gave instructions to an officer of his guard, who went and executed John in the prison, and his head was brought to feast the eyes of the adulteress whose sins he had denounced. His death is supposed to have occurred just before the third passover, in the course of the Lord's ministry. His life is marked with self-denial, humility, and holy courage.

John, Gospel of (see JOHN THE APOSTLE; GOSPELS). 1. Authority. No doubt has been entertained at any time in the Church, either of the canonical authority of this Gospel, or of its being written by St. John. No other book of the N. T. is authenticated by testimony of so early a date as that of the disciples which is embodied in the Gospel itself (xxi. 24, 25). Among the Apostolic Fathers, Ignatius appears to have known and recognized this Gospel. The fact that this Gospel is not quoted by Clement of Rome (A. D. 68 or 96) serves merely to confirm the statement that it is a very late production of the Apostolic age. Polycarp in his short epistle, Ilermas, and Barnabas do not refer to it. But its phraseology may be clearly traced in the Epistle to Diognetus, and in Justin Martyr, A. D. 150. Tatian, A. D. 170, wrote a harmony of the four Gospels; and he quotes St. John's Gospel in his only extant work; so do his contemporaries Apollinaris of Hierapolis, Athenagoras, and the writer of the Epistle of the churches of Vienne and Lyons. The Valentinians made great use of it; and one of their sect, Heracleon, wrote a commentary on it. And, to close the list of writers of the second century, the numerous and full testimonies of Irenæus in Gaul and Tertullian at Carthage, with the obscure but weighty testimony of the Roman writer of the Muratorian Fragment on the Canon, sufficiently show the authority attributed in the Western Church to this Gospel. The third century introduces equally decisive testimony from the Fathers of the Alexandrian Church, Clement and Origen. Cerdon, Marcion, the Montanists, and other ancient heretics, did not deny that St. John was the author of the Gospel, but they held that the apostle was mistaken, or that his Gospel had been interpolated in those passages which are opposed to their tenets. The Alogi, a sect in the beginning of the third century, were singular in rejecting the writings of St. John. Later opponents of the Gospel have been Evanson (1792), Bretschneider (1820), Baur, &c. The rejection of John's Gospel by Baur and other critics of the Tübingen school has its root in a determined unwillingness to admit the historical reality of the MIRACLES which this Gospel records, and is a part of their attempted reconstruction of early Christian history. Starting with the assertion of a radical difference and hostility between the Jewish and Gentile types of Christianity—between the party of the Church that adhered to Peter and the original disciples, and the party that adhered to Paul and his doctrine—they ascribe several books of the N. T. (ACTS OF THE APOSTLES, Gospel of John, &c.) to the effort, made at a later time, to bridge over this gulf. Now, their fundamental assertion not only cannot be proved, but is abundantly contradicted by both external and internal evidence. And it is incredible that a work of the power and loftiness of the fourth Gospel should either have sprung up in the second century, or have been received as genuine by Christians universally in the latter part of this century, if it were not the genuine production of the apostle whose work it professes to be (Prof. G. P. Fisher, in B. S. xxi. 225 ff., and Essays on the Supernatural Origin of Christianity. (BIBLE; CANON; INSPIRATION; JESUS CHRIST, &c.)—2. Place and time at which it was written. Ephesus and Patmos are the two places mentioned by early writers; and the weight of evidence seems to preponderate in favor of Ephesus. The apostle's sojourn at Ephesus probably began after St. Paul's Epistle to the Ephesians was written, i. e. after A. D. 62. Eusebius specifies the fourteenth year of Domitian, i. e. A. D. 95, as the year of his banishment to Patmos. Probably the date of the Gospel may lie about midway between these two, about A. D. 78 (so Mr. Bullock). Dr. Alford supposes it written between A. D. 70 and 85; many others between 94 and 98 (Rev. T. Scott in Fairbairn) or between 90 and 100 (Dr. W. L. Alexander in Kitto).—3. Occasion and Scope. After the destruction of Jerusalem, A. D. 70, EPHEsus probably became the centre of the active life of Eastern Christendom. This half-Greek, half-Oriental city contained a large church of faithful Christians, a multitude of zealous Jews, an indigenous population devoted to the worship of a strange idol whose image was borrowed from the East, its name from the West. It was the place to which Cerinthus chose to bring the doctrines which he devised or learned at ALEXANDRIA. The Gospel was obviously addressed primarily to Christians, not to heathens (Jn. xx. 31). The object of the writer, according to some, was to supplement the earlier Gospels; according to others, to confute the Nicolaitans and Cerinthus; according to others, to state the true doctrine of the divinity of Christ. It has indeed been pronounced by high critical authority that the supplementary theory is entirely untenable; and so it becomes if put forth in its most rigid form. But though St. John may not have written with direct reference to the earlier three Evangelists, he did not write without any reference to them. He intended to set forth the faith alone; and in so doing he has written passages that do confute Gnostic and other errors. Theodore of Mopsuestia relates the early tradition that at the suggestion of the Christians of Asia who had brought him the other three Gospels, the apostle wrote the things which he judged the most important for instruction and which he saw omitted by the others.—4. Contents and Integrity. The following is an abridgment of Lampe's synopsis of its contents:—A. The Prologue (i. 1-18).—B. The History (i. 19-xx. 29). a. Various events relating to our Lord's ministry, narrated in connection with seven journeys (i. 19-xii. 50):—1. First journey, into Judea and beginning of His ministry (i. 19-ii. 12). 2. Second journey, at the Passover in the first year of His ministry (ii. 13-iv.). 3. Third journey, in the second year of His ministry, about the Passover (v.). 4. Fourth journey, about the Passover, in the third year of His ministry, beyond Jordan (vi.). 5. Fifth journey, six months before His death, begun at the Feast of Tabernacles (vii.-x. 21). 6. Sixth journey, about the Feast of Dedication (x. 22-42). 7. Seventh journey in Judea toward Bethany (xi. 1-54). 8. Eighth journey, before His last Passover (xi. 55-xii.). b. History of the death of Christ (xiii.-xx. 29). 1. Preparation for His Passion (xiii.-xvii.). 2. The circumstances of His Passion and Death (xviii., xix.). 3. His Resurrection, and the proofs of it (xx. 1-29).—C. The Conclusion (xx. 30-xxi.). —1. Scope of the foregoing history (xx. 30, 31). 2. Confirmation of the authority of the Evangelist by additional historical facts, and by the testimony of the elders of the Church (xxi. 1-24). 3. Reason of the termination of the history (xxi. 25).—Some portions of the Gospel have been regarded by certain critics as interpolations. Thus ch. v. 4 is rejected by Tholuck, Tischendorf, &c.; but Fairbairn says, "The external evidence appears to be very strong in its favor." As to ch. vii. 53-viii. 11, commentators and critics have been much divided. Against it are Beza, Calvin, Wetstein, Lachmann, Tischendorf, Tregelles, &c.; for it, Mill, Michaelis, Kuinoel, Bloomfield, Stier, Ebrard, &c. Luthardt, Lücke, Knapp, Ewald, &c., hold it to be a genuine Apostolic tradition, probably committed to writing by some one who had heard it from John or from one of the other Evangelists. (NEW TESTAMENT I., § 89.) The genuineness of ch. xxi. has been questioned on internal grounds; but Dr. Alford expresses his full conviction that it was added by the apostle himself, some years probably after the completion of the Gospel. The 25th verse and the latter half of the 24th of ch. xxi., which are regarded by Luthardt, Dr. John Owen, &c., as an addition by the elders of the Ephesian Church, where the Gospel was first published, Dr. Alford regards as written, like the rest of the chapter, by the apostle himself, probably in the decline of life. He says, "The two last verses, from their contents, we might expect to have more of the epistolary form; and accordingly, we find them singularly in style resembling the Epistles of John." (Compare 1 Jn. i. 1, 3; also Jn. xix. 35, xx. 30, 31.) The claim of some German critics that the hyperbole in xxi. 25 disproves its being from the Apostle John, who uniformly used plain, unexaggerated language, would disprove likewise the genuineness of other well-attested passages in both sacred and secular writers (compare Dan. iv. 11, 20; Mat. xix. 24; Mk. i. 33, 37; Jn. iii. 26, iv. 29, &c.), and is therefore inconclusive, especially when we take into view the fact that both MSS. and critical editors of the Greek N. T. uniformly present these verses as genuine.

John (see above), the First Epistle General of. —Its Authenticity. The external evidence is of the most satisfactory nature. Eusebius places it in his list of "acknowledged" books, and we have ample proof that it was received as the production of the Apostle John (JOHN THE APOSTLE) in the writings of Polycarp, Papias, Irenæus, Origen, Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, Cyprian, and there is no voice in antiquity raised to the contrary. On the other hand, the internal evidence for its being the work of St. John from its similarity in style, language, and doctrine to the Gospel is overwhelming. The allusion again of the writer to himself is such as would suit St. John the Apostle, and very few but St. John (1 Jn. i. 1). (BIBLE; CANON; INSPIRATION.)—With regard to the time at which St. John wrote the Epistle there is considerable diversity of opinion. It was probably (so Mr. Meyrick, with Lardner, Lampe, Mill, Davidson, &c.) written at the close of the first century, from Ephesus. Lardner is clearly right when he says that it was primarily meant for the Churches of Asia under St. John's inspection, to whom he had already orally delivered his doctrine (i. 3, ii. 7).—The main object of the Epistle does not appear to be that of opposing the errors of the Docetæ, or of the Gnostics, or of the Nicolaitans, or of the Cerinthians, or of all of them together, or of the Sabians, or of Judaizers, or of apostates to Judaism: the leading purpose of the apostle appears to be rather constructive than polemical. In the introduction (i. 1-4) the apostle states the purpose of his Epistle. It is to declare the Word of life to those whom he is addressing, in order that he and they might be united in true communion with each other, and with God the Father, and His Son Jesus Christ. The first part of the Epistle may be considered to end at ii. 28. The apostle begins afresh with the doctrine of sonship or communion at ii. 29, and returns to the same theme at iv. 7. His lesson throughout is, that the means of union with God are, on the part of Christ, His atoning blood (i. 7, ii. 2, iii. 5, iv. 10, 14, v. 6) and advocacy (ii. 1)—on the part of man, holiness (i. 6), obedience (ii. 3), purity (iii. 3), faith (iii. 23, iv. 3, v. 5), and above all love (ii. 7, iii. 14, iv. 7, v. 1).—There are two doubtful passages in this Epistle, ii. 23, "but he that acknowledgeth the Son hath the Father also," and v. 7, "For there are three that bear record in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost, and these three are one." The former is omitted in the Received Greek Text, and is printed in italics in the A. V., but is inserted as genuine by Griesbach, Lachmann, Tischendorf, &c. The latter passage is probably not genuine. It is contained in four only of the 150 MSS. of the Epistle, the Codex Guelpherbytanus of the 17th century, the Codex Ravianus, a forgery subsequent to the year 1514, the Codex Britannicus or Monfortii of the 15th or 16th century, and the Codex Ottobonianus of the 15th century. It is not found in any ancient version except the Latin; and the best editions of even the Latin version omit it. It was not quoted by one Greek Father, or writer previous to the 14th century. NEW TESTAMENT II. § 8.

John (see above), the Second and Third Epistles of.—Their Authenticity. These two Epistles are placed by Eusebius in the class of "disputed" books, and he appears himself to be doubtful whether they were written by the Evangelist, or by some other John. The evidence of antiquity in their favor is not very strong, yet it is considerable. Clement of Alexandria speaks of the first Epistle as "the larger" (Strom. lib. ii.). Origen appears to have had the same doubts as Eusebius. Dionysius and Alexander of Alexandria attribute them to St. John. So does Irenæus. In the 5th century they are almost universally received. If the external testimony is not as decisive as we might wish, the internal evidence is peculiarly strong. Mill has pointed out that of the thirteen verses which compose the Second Epistle, eight are to be found in the First Epistle. The title and contents of the Epistle are strong arguments against a fabricator, whereas they would account for its non-universal reception in early times. (BIBLE; CANON; INSPIRATION.)—The Second Epistle is addressed in Greek "eklekta kuria," A. V. "to the elect lady." An individual woman who had children, and a sister and nieces, is clearly indicated. Whether her name is given, and if so, what it is, has been doubted. According to one interpretation she is "the Lady Electa" (Clement of Alexandria, Wetstein, Grotius, Middleton); to another, "the elect Kyria" (Carpzov, Schleusner, Bengel, De Wette, Rosenmüller, Neander, Davidson, &c.); to a third, "the elect Lady" (A. V., Mill, Wolf, Le Clerc, Lardner, Beza, Eichhorn, Macknight, &c.). The English version is probably right (so Mr. Meyrick).—The Third Epistle is addressed to GAIUS = Roman Gaius. We have no reason for identifying him with Gaius of Macedonia (Acts xix. 29), or with Gaius of Derbe (xx. 4), or with Gaius of Corinth (Rom. xvi. 23; 1 Cor. i. 14), or with Gaius, Bishop of Ephesus, or with Gaius, Bishop of Thessalonica, or with Gaius, Bishop of Pergamos. He was probably a convert of St. John (8 Jn. 4), and a layman of wealth and distinction (5), in some city near Ephesus.—The object of St. John in writing the Second Epistle was to warn the lady, to whom he wrote, against abetting the teaching known as that of Basilides and his followers, by perhaps an undue kindness displayed by her toward the preachers of the false doctrine.—The Third Epistle was written for the purpose of commending to the kindness and hospitality of Gaius some Christians who were strangers in the place where he lived. Probably these Christians carried this letter with them to Gaius as their introduction.—We may conjecture that the two Epistles were written shortly after the First Epistle from Ephesus. They both apply to individual cases of conduct the principles which had been laid down in their fulness in the First Epistle.—The title "Catholic" does not properly belong to the Second and Third Epistles. It became attached to them, because they were regarded as appendices to the First Epistle of John. See the preceding article; also, JOHN THE APOSTLE.

Joh'a-da (L. fr. Heb., contr. fr. JEHOIADA), HIGH-PRIEST after his father ELIASHIB (Neh. xii. 10, 11, 22, xiii. 28).

Joh'a-kim (fr. Heb., contr. fr. JEHOIAKIM), a HIGH-PRIEST, son of the renowned JESHUA (Neh. xii. 10).

Joh'a-rib (L. fr. Heb., contr. fr. JEHOARIB). 1. A layman who returned from Babylon with Ezra (Ezr. viii. 16).—2. Founder of one of the courses of priests; elsewhere called JEHOARIB. His descendants after the Captivity are given (Neh. xi. 10, xii. 6, 19).—3. A Shilonite—i. e. probably a descendant of SHELAH the son of Judah (xi. 5).

Jok'de-am (fr. Heb. = possessed by the people, Ges.), a city of Judah, in the mountains (Josh. xv. 56), apparently south of Hebron.

Jok'im (fr. Heb., contr. fr. JOIAKIM, Ges.), a son of Shelah the son of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 22).

Jok'me-am (fr. Heb. = gathered by the people, Ges.), a city of Ephraim, given to the Kohathite Levites (1 Chr. vi. 68). In Josh. xxi. 22, KIBZAIM occupies the place of Jokmeam. In 1 K. iv. 12 (Heb.; "JOKNEAM," A. V.) it is named with places in the Jordan valley at the extreme east boundary of the tribe.

Jok'ne-am (fr. Heb. = possessed by the people, Ges.), a city of Zebulun, allotted to the Merarite Levites (Josh. xxi. 34, omitted in 1 Chr. vi. 77); doubtless the Canaanite town whose king was killed by Joshua (Josh. xii. 22, xix. 11). It is the modern site Tell Kaimón, an eminence which stands just below the eastern termination of Carmel. CYAMON; JOKNEAM.

Jok'shan (fr. Heb. = fowler, Ges.), a son of Abraham and Keturah (Gen. xxv. 2, 3; 1 Chr. i. 32), whose sons were SHEBA and DEDAN. While the settlements of his two sons are presumptively placed on the borders of Palestine, those of Jokshan are not known. Arab writers mention a dialect of Jokshan as formerly spoken near 'Aden and El-Jened, in Southern Arabia; but that Midianites penetrated so far into the peninsula Mr. E. S. Poole holds to be highly improbable.

Jok'tan (fr. Heb. = who is made small, Ges.), son of Eber (Gen. x. 25; 1 Chr. i. 19); and father of the Joktanite Arabs. Scholars are agreed in placing the settlements of Joktan in the south of the peninsula (ARABIA). The original limits are stated in the Bible, "their dwelling was from MESHA, as thou goest unto SEPHAR, a mount of the East" (Gen. x. 80). The native traditions respecting Joktan commence with a difficulty. The ancestor of the great southern peoples was called Kahtán, who, say the Arabs, = Joktan. To this some European critics have objected that there is no good reason to account for the change of name, and that the identification of Kahtán with Joktan is evidently a Jewish tradition adopted by Mohammed or his followers, and consequently at or after the promulgation of El-Islám. A passage in the Mir'at ez-Zemán, hitherto unpublished, throws new light on the point. It is as follows:—"Ibn-El-Kelbee says, Yuktán (whose name is also written Yuktán) is the same as Kahtán son of A'bir," i. e. Eber, and so say the generality of the Arabs. If the traditions of Kahtán be rejected (and in this rejection we cannot agree [so Mr. E. S. Poole]), they are, it must be remembered, immaterial to the fact that the peoples called by the Arabs descendants of Kahtán, are certainly Joktanites. His sons' colonization of Southern Arabia is proved by indisputable, and undisputed, identifications, and the great kingdom which there existed for many ages before our era, and in its later days was renowned in the world of classical antiquity, was as surely Joktanite.

Jok'the-el (fr. Heb. = subdued of God, Ges.). 1. A city in the low country of Judah (Josh. xv. 38), named next to Lachish; identified by Mr. Wilton (in Fairbairn) with a ruined site Kituldneh. —2. The title given by Amaziah to the cliff (A. V. "SELAH")—the stronghold of the Edomites—after he had captured it from them (2 K. xiv. 7). 2 Chr. xxv. 11-13 supplies fuller details.

Jo'na (L. = JOHANAN or JONAH; see BAR-JONA), father of the Apostle PETER (Jn. i. 42), who is hence addressed as "Simon Bar-jona" in Mat. xvi. 17. JONAS 3.

Jon'a-dab (L. fr. Heb., contr. fr. JEHONADAB). 1. Son of Shimeah and nephew of David. He is described as "very subtil" (2 Sam. xiii. 3). His age naturally made him the friend of his cousin Amnon, heir to the throne (xiii. 3). He gave him the fatal advice for ensnaring his sister Tamar (5, 6). Again, when, in a later stage of the same tragedy, Amnon was murdered by Absalom, and the exaggerated report reached David that all the princes were slaughtered, Jonadab was already aware of the real state of the case (xiii. 32, 33). —2. JEHONADAB (Jer. xxxv. 6, 8, 10, 14, 16, 18, 19).

Jon'ah (fr. Heb. = dove, Ges.), in Apocrypha and N. T. JONAS; a PROPHET, son of Amittai. (BIBLE; CANON; INSPIRATION; OLD TESTAMENT.) We learn from 2 K. xiv. 25, he was of GATH-HEPHER, a town of lower Galilee, in Zebulun. He lived after the reign of Jehu, when the losses of Israel (2 K. x. 32) began; and probably not till the latter part of the reign of Jeroboam II. The general opinion is that Jonah was the first of the prophets. The king of Nineveh at this time is supposed (Usher, &c.) to have been Pul, who is placed B. C. 750; but an earlier king, Adrammelech II., B. C. 840, is regarded more probable by Drake. Our English Bible gives B. C. 862. The personal history of Jonah is brief, and well known; but is of such an exceptional and extraordinary character, as to have been set down by many German critics to fiction, either in whole or in part. The book, say they, was composed, or compounded, some time after the death of the prophet, perhaps at the latter part of the Jewish kingdom, during the reign of Josiah, or even later. The supposed improbabilities are accounted for by them in a variety of ways; e.g. as merely fabulous, or fanciful ornaments to a true history, or allegorical, or parabolical and moral, both in their origin and design. We feel ourselves precluded from any doubt of the reality of the transactions recorded in this book, by the simplicity of the language itself; by the accordance with other authorities of the historical and geographical notices; above all, by the explicit words and teaching of our blessed Lord Himself (Mat. xii. 39, 41, xvi. 4; Lk. xi. 29). We shall derive additional arguments for the same conclusion from the history and meaning of the prophet's mission. Having already, as it seems, prophesied to Israel, he was sent to NINEVEH. The time was one of political revival in Israel; but ere long the Assyrians were to be employed by God as a scourge upon them. The prophet shrank from a commission which he felt sure would result (Jon. iv. 2) in the sparing of a hostile city. He attempted therefore to escape to TARSISH. The providence of God, however, watched over him, first in a storm, and then in his being swallowed by a large FISH (WHALE) for the space of three days and three nights. After his deliverance, Jonah executed his commission; and the king, "believing him to be a minister from the supreme deity of the nation," and having heard of his miraculous deliverance, ordered a general fast, and averted the threatened judgment. But the prophet, not from personal but national feelings, grudged the mercy shown to a heathen nation. He was therefore taught, by the significant lesson of the "GOURD," whose growth and decay brought the truth at once home to him, that he was sent to testify by deed, as other prophets would afterward testify by word, the capacity of Gentiles for salvation, and the design of God to make them partakers of it. This was "the sign of the prophet Jonas" (Lk. xi. 29, 30). But the resurrection of Christ itself was also shadowed forth in the history of the prophet. The mission of Jonah was highly symbolical. The facts contained a concealed prophecy. The old tradition made the burial-place of Jonah to be Gath-hepher: the modern tradition places it at Nebi Yunus (= Prophet Jonah), opposite Mosul. See cut, under NINEVEH.

Jon'an (fr. Gr. = JOHN or JOHANAN, fr. JEHONAN), son of Eliakim, in the genealogy of Christ (Lk. iii. 30).

Jon'as (L. fr. Gr. Jónas = JONAH, Rbn. N. T. Iez.). 1. This name occupies the same position in 1 Esd. ix. 23, as Eliezer in Ezr. x. 23.—2. The prophet JONAH (2 Esd. i. 39; Tob. xiv. 4, 8; Mat. xii. 39, 40, 41, xvi. 4.—3. JONA (Jn. xxi. 14-17).

Jon'a-than (L. fr. Heb., contracted from JEHONATHAN). 1. Eldest son of King SAUL. The name (= the gift of Jehovah) seems to have been common at that period. He first appears some time after his father's accession (1 Sam. xiii. 2). If his younger brother Ish-bosheth was forty at the time of Saul's death (2 Sam. ii. 8), Jonathan must have been at least thirty when first mentioned. Of his own family we know nothing, except the birth of one son, five years before his death (iv. 4). He was regarded in his father's lifetime as heir to the throne. Like Saul, he was a man of great strength and activity (i. 23), of which the exploit at Michmash was a proof. He was also famous for the peculiar martial exercises in which his tribe excelled—archery and slinging (1 Chr. xii. 2). His bow was to him what the spear was to his father: "the bow of Jonathan turned not back" (2 Sam. i. 22). It was always about him (1 Sam. xviii. 4, xx. 35). It is through his relation with DAVID that he is chiefly known to us. But there is a background, not so clearly given, of his relation with his father. From the time that he first appears he is Saul's constant companion. He was always present at his father's meals. The whole story implies, without expressing, the deep attachment of the father and son. Their mutual affection was indeed interrupted by the growth of Saul's insanity. But he cast his lot with his father's decline, not with his friend's rise, and "in death they were not divided" (2 Sam. i. 23; 1 Sam. xxiii. 16). His life may be divided into two main parts.—1. The war with the Philistines; commonly called, from its locality, "the war of MICHMASH" (xiii. 21). In the previous war with the Ammonites (xi. 4-16) there is no mention of him. He is already of great importance in the state. Of the 3,000 men of whom Saul's standing army was formed (xiii. 2, xxiv. 2, xxvi. 1, 2), 1,000 were under the command of Jonathan at Gibeah. The Philistines were still in the general command of the country; an officer was stationed at Geba, either the same as Jonathan's position or close to it. In a sudden act of youthful daring, Jonathan (so Dean Stanley, original author of this article) slew this officer (A. V. "GARRISON"), and thus gave the signal for a general revolt. Saul took advantage of it, and the whole population rose. But it was a premature attempt. The Philistines poured in from the plain, and the tyranny became more deeply rooted than ever. From this oppression, as Jonathan by his former act had been the first to provoke it, so now he was the first to deliver his people. Without communicating his project to any one, except the young man, whom, like all the chiefs of that age, he retained as his armor-bearer, he sallied forth from Gibeah to attack the garrison of the Philistines stationed on the other side of the steep defile of Michmash (xiv. 1). A panic seized the garrison, thence spread to the camp, and thence to the surrounding hordes of marauders; an earthquake combined with the terror of the moment; the confusion increased; the Israelites who had been taken slaves by the Philistines during the last three days (?; LXX.) rose in mutiny; the Israelites who lay hid in the numerous caverns and deep holes in which the rocks of the neighborhood abound, sprang out of their subterranean dwellings. Saul and his little band had watched in astonishment the wild retreat from the heights of Gibeah; he now joined in the pursuit. Jonathan had not heard of the rash curse (xiv. 21) which Saul invoked on any one who ate before the evening. In the dizziness and darkness (see Heb. 1 Sam. xiv. 27) that came on after his desperate exertions, he put forth the staff which apparently had (with his sling and bow) been his chief weapon (ARMS), and tasted the honey which lay on the ground as they passed through the forest. Jephthah's dreadful sacrifice would have been repeated; but the people interposed in behalf of the hero of that great day, and Jonathan was saved (xiv. 24-46).—2. This is the only great exploit of Jonathan's life. But the chief interest of his career is derived from the friendship with David, which began on the day of David's return from the victory over the champion of Gath, and continued till his death. Their last meeting was in the forest of Ziph, during Saul's pursuit of David (xxiii. 16-18). From this time forth we hear no more till the battle of Gilboa. In that battle he fell, with his two brothers and his father, and his corpse shared their fate (xxi. 2, 8). His ashes were buried first at Jabesh-gilead (ib. 13), but afterward removed with those of his father to Zelah in Benjamin (2 Sam. xxi. 12). The news of his death occasioned the celebrated elegy of David (2 Sam. i. 17 ff.). (MEPHIBOSHETH).—3. Shimeah's son, brother of Jonadab, and nephew of DAVID (2 Sam. xxi. 21; 1 Chr. xx. 7). He inherited the union of civil and military gifts, so conspicuous in his uncle. Like David, he engaged in a single combat and slew a gigantic Philistine of Gath (2 Sam. xxi. 21). Perhaps he is the same as Jonathan ("David's uncle," A. V.; Stanley would translate nephew) in 1 Chr. xxvii. 32.—4. Son of Abiathar, the high-priest. He is the last descendant of Eli, of whom we hear any thing. He appears as the swift and trusty messenger (1.) on the day of David's flight from Absalom (2 Sam. xv. 36, xvii. 15-21); and (2.) on the day of Solomon's inauguration (1 K. i. 42, 48).—5. Son of Shage the Hararite (1 Chr. xi. 34; 2 Sam. xxiii. 32). He was one of David's heroes.—6. Son, or descendant, of Gershom the son of Moses (A. V. "Manasseh," see MANASSEH 5) (Judg. xviii. 30). While wandering through the country in search of a home, the young Levite of Bethlehem-judah came to the house of MICAH 1, the rich Ephraimite, and was by him appointed to be a kind of private chaplain. When the Danites went northward to found a city, Jonathan went with them, stole the ephod and teraphim of Micah, and became priest of the Danites at Laish or Dan (Judg. xviii.). (IDOLATRY).—6. One of the sons of Adin (Ezr. viii. 6; 1 Esd. viii. 32).—7. A priest (?), the son of Asahel; one of the four who assisted Ezra in investigating the marriages with foreign women (Ezr. x. 15).—8. A priest of the family of Melicu, in the days of Joiakim, son of Jeshua (Neh. xii. 14).—9. Son of Kareah, and brother of Johanan (Jer. xl. 8); one of the captains of the army who had escaped from Jerusalem in the final assault by the Chaldeans, and with his brother Johanan resorted to Gedaliah at Mizpah.—10. Son of Joiada, and his successor as HIGH-PRIEST; = JOHANAN 11. The only fact connected with his pontificate recorded in Scripture, is that the genealogical records of the priests and Levites were kept in his day (Neh. xii. 11, 22), and that the chronicles of the state were continued to his time (23). Josephus relates that he murdered his own brother Jesus in the Temple, because Jesus was endeavoring to get the high-priesthood from him through the influence of Bagoses, the Persian general.—11. Father of Zechariah, a priest who blew the trumpet at the dedication of the wall (xii. 35).—12. A scribe, in whose house was the prison where Jeremiah was confined (Jer. xxxvii. 15, 20, xxxviii. 26).—13. A son of MATTATHIAS 2, and leader of the Jews after the death of his brother Judas Maccabeus (1 Mc. ix. 19 ff.). (MACCABEES).—14. A son of Absalom (xiii. 11), sent by Simon with a force to occupy Joppa (xii. 38); probably a brother of MATTATHIAS 3 (xi. 70).—15. A priest who is said to have offered up a solemn prayer at the sacrifice made by Nehemiah after the recovery of the sacred fire (2 Mc. i. 23 ff.).

Jon'a-thas (L. fr. Heb.) = JONATHAN (Tob. v. 13). Jon'ath-e'lem-re-cho'kim (an English form of Heb. = a dumb done of [in] distant places), a phrase found once only in the Bible as a heading to Ps. lvi. Critics and commentators are very far from being agreed on its meaning. Rashi considers that David employed the phrase to describe his own unhappy condition when, exiled from the land of Israel, he was living with Achish. Aben Ezra, who regards it as merely indicating the modulation or the rhythm of the psalm, appears to come the nearest to the meaning of the passage in his explanation, "after the melody of the air which begins Jonath-elem-rechokim." In the commentary to Mendelssohn's version of the Psalms Jonath-elem-rechokim is mentioned as a musical instrument which produced dull, mournful sounds.

Jop'pa (Eng. form of Gr. Ioppé, L. Joppe, fr. Heb. Yāphō = beauty, now Yāfa or Jaffa), a town on the S. W. coast of Palestine, the port of Jerusalem in the days of Solomon, as it has been ever since. It originally belonged to the Phenicians (Jos. xiii. 15, § 4). Here, writes Strabo, some say Andromeda was exposed to the whale. "Japho" or Joppa was situated in the portion of Dan (Josh. xix. 46) on the coast toward the S. Having a harbor attached to it—though always, as still, a dangerous one—it became the port of Jerusalem, when Jerusalem became metropolis of the kingdom of the house of David, and certainly never did port and metropolis more strikingly resemble each other in difficulty of approach both by sea and land. Hence, except in journeys to and from Jerusalem, it was not much used. But Joppa was the place fixed upon for the cedar and pine-wood, from Mount Lebanon, to be landed by the servants of Hiram, king of Tyre. By way of Joppa, similarly, like materials were conveyed from the same locality, by permission of Cyrus, for the rebuilding of the second Temple under Zerubbabel (1 K. v. 9; 2 Chr. ii. 16; Ezr. iii. 7). Here JONAH "took ship to flee from the presence of the Lord" (Jon. i. 3). Here, lastly, on the house-top of Simon the tanner, "by the seaside," St. Peter raised Tabitha to life (Acts ix. 36 ff.), and had his vision of tolerance (x.). These are the great Biblical events of which Joppa has been the scene. In the interval which elapsed between the Old and New Dispensations it experienced many vicissitudes. It had sided with Apollonius, and was attacked and captured by Jonathan Maccabeus (1 Mc. x. 76). It witnessed the meeting between the latter and Ptolemy (xi. 6). Simon had his suspicions of its inhabitants, and set a garrison there (xii. 34), which he afterward strengthened considerably (xiii. 11). But when peace was restored, he reestablished it once more as a haven (xiv. 5). He likewise rebuilt the fortifications (34). This occupation of Joppa was one of the grounds of complaint urged by Antiochus, son of Demetrius, against Simon; but the latter alleged in excuse the mischief which had been done by its inhabitants to his fellow-citizens (xv. 30-35). It would appear that Judas Maccabeus had burnt their haven some time back for a gross act of barbarity (2 Mc. xii. 6). Tribute was subsequently exacted for its possession from Hyrcanus by Antiochus Sidetes. By Pompey it was once more made independent, and comprehended under Syria; but by Cesar it was not only restored to the Jews, but its revenues, whether from land or from export duties, were bestowed upon the second Hyrcanus and his heirs. (HIGH-PRIEST; MACCABEES.) When HEROD THE GREAT commenced operations, it was seized by him, lest he should leave a hostile stronghold in his rear, when he marched upon Jerusalem, and Augustus confirmed him in its possession. It was afterward assigned to Archelaus, when constituted ethnarch, and passed with Syria under Cyrenius, when Archelaus had been deposed. Under Cestius (i. e. Gessius Florus) it was destroyed amidst great slaughter of its inhabitants; and such a nest of pirates had it become, when Vespasian arrived in those parts, that it underwent a second and entire destruction, together with the adjacent villages, at his hands. Thus it appears that this port had already begun to be the den of robbers and outcasts which it was in Strabo's time. When Joppa first became the seat of a Christian bishop is unknown. It was taken possession of by the forces of Godfrey de Bouillon previously to the capture of Jerusalem. Saladin, A. D. 1188, destroyed its fortifications; but Richard of England, who was confined here by sickness, rebuilt them. Its last occupation by Christians was that of St. Louis of France, A. D. 1253, and when he came it was still a city and governed by a count. After this it came into the hands of the Sultans of Egypt, together with the rest of Palestine, by whom it was once more laid in ruins. Finally, Jaffa fell under the Turks, in whose possession it still is. It was sacked by the Arabs in 1722; by the Mamelukes in 1775; and by Napoleon I. in 1799. The existing town Yafa or Jaffa contains in round numbers about 4,000 inhabitants (so Mr. Ffoulkes); Porter (in Kitto) says "about 5,000;" Thomson (ii. 274) "15,000 at least." Its oranges are the finest in all Palestine and Syria, and its GARDENS and orange and citron groves deliciously fragrant and fertile.

Jop'pe (L.) = JOPPA (1 Esd. v. 35; 1 Mc. x. 75, 76, xi. 6, xii. 33, xiii. 11, xiv. 5, 34, xv. 28, 35; 2 Mo. iv. 21, xii. 3, 7).

* Jo'ra = JORAH (Neh. vii. 24, margin).

Jorah (fr. Heb. = sprinkling, watering, the early rain, Ges.), the ancestor of a family of 112 who returned from Babylon with Ezra (Ezr. ii. 18); in Neh. vii. 24 HARIPH (margin "Jora").

Jo'ral, or Jo'ra-l (L. fr. Heb. = whom Jehovah teaches, Ges.), a Gadite, dwelling in Gilcad in Bashan, in the reign of Jotham, king of Judah (1 Chr. v. 13).

Jo'ram (L. fr. Heb., contracted from JEHORAM).
1. Son of Ahab, king of Israel (2 K. viii. 16, 25, 28, 29, ix. 14, 17, 21-23, 29); = JEHORAM 1.—2. Son of Jehoshaphat, king of Judah (2 K. viii. 21, 23, 24; 1 Chr. iii. 11; 2 Chr. xxii. 5, 7; Mat. i. 8); = JEHORAM 2.—3. A Levite, ancestor of Shelomith in the time of David (1 Chr. xxvi. 25).—4. Son of Toi, king of Hamath (2 Sam. viii. 10); = HADORAM 2.—5. JOZARAD 4 (1 Esd. i. 9).

Jor'dan (fr. Heb. Yarden = the flowing, the river Ges., Fii., Rbn., &c.; the descender, Mr. Ffoulkes, P'tr., Stl.; Gr. Jordanis; L. Jordanis), now called by the Arabs ash-Sherfah (= the watering-place), sometimes with the addition of el-Kebir (= the great): a river that has never been navigable, flowing into a sea that has never known a port. It winds through scenery remarkable rather for sameness and tameness than for bold outline. Its course is not much above 200 miles from first to last—from the roots of Anti-Lebanon to the head of the Dead Sea. Such is the river of the "great plain" of PALESTINE—if not “the river of God” in the Book of Psalms, at least that of His chosen people throughout their history. The earliest allusion to Jordan is not so much to the river itself as to the well-watered plain or plains which it traversed (Gen. xiii. 10). There were fords over against Jericho, to which point the men of Jericho pursued the spies (Josh. ii. 7; compare Judg. iii. 28). Higher up, perhaps over against Succoth, some way above where the little river Jabbok (Zerka) enters the Jordan, were the fords or passages of BETHBARAH (probably the BETHBARA of the Gospel), where Gideon lay in wait for the Midianites (Judg. vii. 24), and where the men of Gilead slew the Ephraimites (xii. 6). These fords undoubtedly (so Mr. Ffoulkes) witnessed the first recorded passage of the Jordan in the O. T., viz. by Jacob (Gen. xxxii. 10). Jordan was crossed over against JERICHO by Joshua the son of Nun, at the head of the descendants of Jacob (Josh. iv. 12, 13). From their vicinity to Jerusalem the lower fords were much used; David probably passed over them in one instance to fight the Syrians (2 Sam. x. 17); and subsequently, when a fugitive himself, in his way to Mahanaim (xvii. 22). Thus there were two customary places, at which the Jordan was fordable, though there may have been more, particularly during the summer, which are not mentioned. And it must have been at one of these, if not at both, that baptism was afterward administered by St. John, and by the disciples of our Lord. Where our Lord was baptized is not stated expressly; but it was probably (so Mr. Ffoulkes) at the upper ford. These fords (see below) were rendered so much the more precious in those days from two circumstances: (1.) it does not appear that there were then any bridges thrown over, or boats regularly established on the Jordan (FERRY-BOAT); (2.) because (Josh. iii. 15) “Jordan overflowed all his banks all the time of harvest,” i. e. the channel or bed of the river became brimful, so that the level of the water and of the banks was then the same. The Jordan has two (in some places, three) series of banks, but only the lower are overflowed. The river keeps full and strong all through March into April, and the proper banks of the river are still full to overflowing in the time of harvest, which in the vale of the lower Jordan comes on about the middle of March (Thomson, ii. 454 f.). (PALESTINE.) Robinson (i. 540) seems to have good reason for saying that the ancient rise of the river has been greatly exaggerated. The last feature to be noticed in the Scriptural account of the Jordan is its frequent mention as a boundary: “over Jordan,” “this,” and “the other side,” or “BEYOND Jordan,” were expressions familiar to the Israelites. In one sense, indeed, i. e. in so far as it was the eastern boundary of the land of Canaan, it was the eastern boundary of the promised land (Num. xxiv. 12). Panion (CESAREA PHILIPPI), says Josephus, appears to be the source of the Jordan; whereas it has a secret passage hither under ground from Phiala (= “vial,” i. e. boat), as it is called, about 120 stadia distant from Cesarea, on the road to Trachonitis, and on the right-hand side of, and not far from, the road. That this is the true source of the Jordan was first discovered by Philip, tetrarch of Trachonitis. It is from this cave at all events that the Jordan commences its ostensible course above ground; traversing the marshes and fens of Semechonitis (Lake MEROM or Huleh), and then, after a course of 120 stadia, passing by the town Julius (BETHSAIDA), and intersecting the Lake of Genesareth (GENNESARET), winds its way through a considerable wilderness, till it finds its exit in the Lake Asphaltites (SEA, THE SALT) (Jos. B. J. iii. 10, § 7). While Josephus dilates upon its sources, Pausanias, who had visited the Jordan, dilates upon its extraordinary disappearance in the Dead Sea. Not one of the earlier or later travellers dwells upon the phenomenon that from the village of Hāsbeiya on the N. W. to the village of Shib'a on the N. E. of Bāniās, the entire slope of Anti-Lebanon is alive with bursting fountains and gushing streams, every one of which, great or small, finds its way sooner or later into the swamp between Bāniās and Lake Huleh, and eventually becomes part of the Jordan. Far be it from us to depreciate those time-honored parent springs—the noble fountain of Daphne under the Tell, or hill of DAN (Tell el-Kādy), which “gushes out all at once a beautiful river of delicious water” in the midst of verdure and welcome shade; still less, that magnificent “burst of water out of the low slope” in front of the picturesque cave of Bāniās, inscriptions in the niches of which still testify to the deity that was once worshipped there, and to the royal munificence that adorned his shrine. But what shall we say to “the bold perpendicular rock” near Hāsbeiya, “from beneath which,” we are told, “the river gushes copious, translucent, and cool, in two rectangular streams, one to the N. E., and the other to the N. W.?” Captain Newbold has detected a fourth source, which, according to the Arabs, is never dry, in the Wady el-Kid, which the captain appears to have followed to the springs called Esh-Shar, though we must add, that its sources, according to our impression (so Mr. Ffoulkes), lie considerably more to the N. It runs past the ruined walls and forts of Bāniās on the S. E. Again, Birket er-Ram, identified by Thomson, Robinson, Porter, &c., with the Lake Phiala of Josephus, lies to the S. E. of, and at some distance from, the cave of Bāniās. The direction of Shib'a—to the N. E. of Bāniās—is beyond doubt (so Mr. Ffoulkes) the true one. The actual description given by Captain Newbold of the Lake Merj el-Man, a circular lake “3 hours E. 10° N. from Bāniās,” leads to the supposition that it is the true Phiala. Once more, according to Thomson, “the Hāsbeiya, when it reaches the Lake Huleh, has been immensely enlarged by the waters from the great fountains of Bāniās, Tell el-Kādy, el-Mellāhah, Derakit, or Beld, and innumerable other springs.” The junction takes place one-third of a mile N. of Tell Sheikh Yūsuf. The Jordan enters Gennesaret about two miles below the ruins of the ancient city Julius, or the BETHSAIDA of Gaulanitis, which lay upon its eastern bank. At its mouth it is about 70 feet wide, a lazy, turbid stream, flowing between low alluvial banks. There are several bars not far from its mouth where it can be forded. . . . From the site of Bethsaida to Jisr Bendt Ya'kōb (= bridge of the daughters of Jacob) is about six miles. The Jordan here rushes along, a foaming torrent (much of course depending on the season when it is visited), through a narrow, winding ravine, shut in by high, precipitous banks. Above the bridge the current is less rapid and the banks are lower. The whole distance from the Lake el-Huleh to the Sea of Tiberias is about 11 miles, and the fall of the river is about 770 feet (Van de Velde, Porter [in Kitto]). The French expedition of Duc de Luynes, in 1864, enumerated three principal sources of the Jordan, viz. Wady Hasbāny, near Hāsbeiya, 1,847 feet above the Mediterranean level; Wady Bdnida, 1,257 feet, and Wady Tell el-Kady, 607 feet above the Mediterranean. They made the valley of the Jordan at the waters of Merom (el-Huleh) 469 feet above the Mediterranean; the Sea of Tiberias 1,089 feet lower, i. e. 620 feet below the Mediterranean; the Dead Sea 1,286 feet below the Mediterranean. The two principal features in the course of the Jordan are its descent and its windings. From its fountain-heads to the point where it is lost to nature, it rushes down one continuous inclined plane, only broken by a series of rapids or precipitous falls. Between the Lake of Tiberias and the Dead Sea Lieutenant Lynch passed down twenty-seven rapids; the depression of the Lake of Tiberias below the level of the Mediterranean he made 653.3 feet; and that of the Dead Sea 1,316.7 feet. Its sinuosity is not so remarkable in the upper part of its course. Lieutenant Lynch would regard the two phenomena in the light of cause and effect. "The great secret," he says, "of the depression between Lake Tiberias and the Dead Sea is solved by the tortuous course of the Jordan. In a space of 60 miles of latitude and 4 or 5 miles of longitude, the Jordan traverses at least 200 miles." The greatest width mentioned was 180 yards, the point where it enters the Dead Sea. Here it was only 3 feet deep. The only living tributaries to the Jordan noticed particularly below Gennesaret were the Yarmuk (Hieromax) and the Zerka (Jabbok). There are no bridges over Jordan to which an earlier date has been assigned than that of the Roman occupation. In the fords, we find a remarkable, yet perfectly independent concurrence between the narrative of Lieutenant Lynch

and what has been asserted previously respecting the fords or passages of the Bible. Yet still it is no slight coincidence that no more than three, or at most four regular fords should have been set down by the chroniclers of the American expedition. The two first occur on the same day within a few hours of each other, and are called respectively Wacabes and Sukwa. The next ford is the ford of Damieh, as it is called, opposite to the commencement of the Wady Zerka, some miles above the junction of that river with the Jordan. The ford el-Mushra'a over against Jericho was the last ford to put upon record, and it is too well known to need any lengthened notice. Here tradition has chosen to combine the passage of the Israelites under Joshua with the baptism of our Lord. Not a single city ever crowned the banks of the Jordan. Still Beth-shan and Jericho to the W., Gerasa, Pella, and Gadara to the E. of it, were important cities, and caused a good deal of traffic between the two opposite banks. The physical features of the Jordan, or of the Ghór, will be treated of more at large under the general head of PALESTINE. ARABAH.

Jo'seph [-zeph] (L. fr. Heb. Yōséph = whom may God increase, Ges.; increaser, viz. Jah is, Fū; see below). 1. The elder of the two sons of Jacob by Rachel. Gen. xxx. 23, 24 seems to indicate a double etymology of his name (from two Hebrew verbs daaph = to take away, and ydaaph = to add, or increase). There is nothing improbable in this, because of the relation of the taking away the reproach to the expectation of another son. Such double etymologies are probably more common in Hebrew names than is generally supposed (so Mr. R. S. Poole, the original author of this article). The date of Joseph's birth relatively to that of the coming of Jacob into Egypt is fixed by his becoming governor of Egypt at thirty years old (xli. 46), which agrees with his being "seventeen years old" (xxxvii. 2) about the time that his brethren sold him. He was therefore born about thirty-nine years before Jacob came into Egypt, and, according to the most probable chronology, B. C. about 1906 (so Mr. R. S. Poole; see CHRONOLOGY). After Joseph's birth he is first mentioned when a youth, seventeen years old. As the child of Rachel, and "son of his old age" (xxxvii. 3), and doubtless also for his excellence of character, he was beloved by his father above all his brethren. Probably at this time Rachel was already dead and Benjamin but an infant. Jacob had now two small pieces of land in Canaan, Abraham's burying-place at Hebron in the S., and the "parcel of a field where he (Jacob) had spread his tent" (xxxiii. 19), at Shechem in the N., the latter being probably, from its price, the smaller of the two. He seems then to have stayed at Hebron with the aged Isaac, while his sons kept his flocks. Joseph brought the evil report of his brethren to his father, and they hated him because his father loved him more than them, and had shown his preference by making him a dress, which appears to have been a long tunic with sleeves, worn by youths and maidens of the richer class. (DRESS II.) The hatred of Joseph's brethren was increased by his telling of a dream foreshowing that they would bow down to him, which was followed by another of the same import. They had gone to Shechem to feed the flock; and Joseph was sent thither from the vale of Hebron by his father to bring him word of their welfare and that of the flock. They were not at Shechem, but were gone to Dothan, which appears to have been not very far distant, pasturing their flock like the Arabs of the present day, wherever the wild country (xxxvii. 22) was uncultivated. On Joseph's approach, his brethren, except Reuben, resolved to kill him; but Reuben saved him, persuading them to cast him into a dry pit, to the intent that he might restore him to his father. Accordingly, when Joseph was come, they stripped him of his tunic and cast him into the pit, "and they sat down to eat bread: and they lifted up their eyes and looked, and, behold, a company of Ishmeelites came from Gilead with their camels." Judah suggested to his brethren to sell

Joseph to the Ishmeelites, appealing at once to their covetousness and, in proposing a less cruel course than that on which they were probably still resolved, to what remnant of brotherly feeling they may still have had. Accordingly they took Joseph out of the pit and sold him "for twenty shekels (A. V. 'pieces') of silver" (ver. 28). Reuben was absent, and on his return to the pit was greatly distressed at not finding Joseph. His brethren pretended to Jacob that Joseph had been killed by some wild beast, taking to him the tunic stained with a kid's blood, while even Reuben forebore to tell him the truth, all speaking constantly of the lost brother as though they knew not what had befallen him, and even as dead. "And Jacob rent his clothes, and put sackcloth upon his loins, and mourned for his son many days" (xxxvii. 34). The Midianites sold Joseph in Egypt to POTIPHAR, "an officer of Pharaoh, captain of the executioners ('GUARD,' A. V.), an Egyptian" (xxxix. 1, compare xxxvii. 36). Mr. Poole believes that, at the time that Joseph was sold into Egypt, the country was not united under the rule of a single native line, but governed by several dynasties, of which the Fifteenth Dynasty, of Shepherd Kings, was the predominant line, the rest being tributary to it. The absolute dominions of this dynasty lay in Lower Egypt, and it would therefore always be most connected with Palestine. (PHARAOH 2.) In Egypt, the second period of Joseph's life begins. As a child he had been a true son, and withstood the evil example of his brethren. He was now to serve a strange master in the hard state of slavery, and his virtue would be put to a severer proof than it had yet sustained. Joseph prospered in the house of the Egyptian, who, seeing that God blessed him, and pleased with his good service, "set him over his house, and all that he had he gave into his hand" (xxxix. 4, compare 5). He was placed over all his master's property with perfect trust, and "the Lord blessed the Egyptian's house for Joseph's sake" (verse 5). The sculptures and paintings of the ancient Egyptian tombs bring vividly before us the daily life and duties of Joseph. His master's wife, with the well-known profligacy of the Egyptian women, tempted him, and failing, charged him with the crime she would have made him commit. Potiphar, incensed against Joseph, cast him into prison. The punishment of adulterers was severe. The prison is described as "a place where the king's prisoners were bound" (xxxix. 20). Here the hardest time of Joseph's period of probation began. He was cast into prison on a false accusation, to remain there for at least two years, and perhaps for a much longer time. In the prison as in Potiphar's house, Joseph was found worthy of complete trust, and the keeper of the prison placed every thing under his control. After a while Pharaoh was incensed against two of his officers, "the chief of the cup-bearers" and the "chief of the bakers," and cast them into the prison where Joseph was. Here the chief of the executioners, doubtless a successor of Potiphar, charged Joseph to serve these prisoners. Each dreamed a prophetic dream, which Joseph interpreted, disclaiming human skill, and acknowledging that interpretations were of God. "After two years" Joseph's deliverance came. Pharaoh dreamed two prophetic dreams. "He stood by the river (the Nile). And, behold, coming up out of the river seven kine (or 'heifers'), beautiful in appearance, and fat-fleshed; and they fed in the marsh-grass. And behold seven other kine coming up after them out of the river, evil in appearance, and lean-fleshed" (xli. 1-3). These, afterward described still more strongly, ate up the first seven, and yet, as is said in the second account, when they had eaten them remained as lean as before (1-4, 17-21). Then Pharaoh had a second dream—"Behold, seven ears of corn coming up on one stalk, fat (or 'full,' verse 22) and good. And, behold, seven ears, thin and blasted with the east wind, sprouting forth after them" (verses 5, 6). These, also described more strongly in the second account, devoured the first seven ears (verses 5-7, 22-24). In the morning Pharaoh sent for the "scribes" and the "wise men," and they were unable to give him an interpretation. Then the chief of the cupbearers remembered Joseph, and told Pharaoh how a young Hebrew, "servant to the captain of the executioners," had interpreted his and his fellow-prisoner's dreams. "Then Pharaoh sent and called Joseph, and they made him hasten out of the prison; and he shaved himself, and changed his raiment, and came unto Pharaoh" (verse 14). The king then related his dreams, and Joseph, when he had disclaimed human wisdom, declared to him that they were sent of God to forewarn Pharaoh. There was essentially but one dream. Both kine and ears symbolized years. There were to be seven years of great plenty in Egypt, and after them seven years of consuming and "very heavy famine." The doubling of the dream denoted that the events it foreshadowed were certain and imminent. On the interpretation it may be remarked, that it seems evident that the kine represented the animal products, and the ears of corn the vegetable products, the most important object in each class representing the whole class. The perfectly Egyptian color of the whole narrative is very noticeable, and nowhere more so than in the particulars of the first dream. Having interpreted the dream, Joseph counselled Pharaoh to choose a wise man and set him over the country, in order that he should take the fifth part of the produce of the seven years of plenty against the years of famine. To this high post the king appointed Joseph. Thus, when he was thirty years of age, was he at last released from his state of suffering, and placed in a position of the greatest honor. The PHARAOH here mentioned was probably (so Mr. Poole) Assa, Manetho's Assis or Asses, whose reign we suppose to have about occupied the first half of the nineteenth century B. C. Pharaoh, seeing the wisdom of giving Joseph, whom he perceived to be under God's guidance, greater powers than he had advised should be given to the officer set over the country, made him not only governor of Egypt, but second only to the sovereign. (ZAPHNATH-PAANEAH.) He also "gave him to wife ASENATH, daughter of POTI-PHERAH, priest (or 'prince') of On" (verse 45). Joseph's first act was to go throughout all the land of Egypt (verse 46). During the seven plenteous years there was a very abundant produce, and he gathered the fifth part, as he had advised Pharaoh, and laid it up. Before the famine Asenath bare Joseph two sons (MANASSEH; EPHRAIM). When the seven good years had passed, the famine began (54-57). The expressions used do not require us to suppose that the famine extended beyond the countries around Egypt, such as Palestine, Syria, and Arabia, as well as some part of Africa. It must also be recollected that Egypt was anciently the granary of neighboring countries. Famines are not very unfrequent in the history of Egypt. (FAMINE.) After the famine had lasted for a time, apparently two years, Joseph gathered up all the money that was found in the land of Egypt, and in the land of Canaan, for the corn which they bought: and Joseph brought the money into Pharaoh's house (xlvii. 13, 14). When all the money of Egypt and Canaan was exhausted, barter became necessary. Joseph then obtained all the cattle of Egypt, and in the next year, all the land, except that of the priests, and apparently, as a consequence, the Egyptians themselves. He demanded, however, only a fifth part of the produce as Pharaoh's right. It has been attempted to trace this enactment of Joseph in the fragments of Egyptian history preserved by profane writers, but the result has not been satisfactory. The evidence of the narrative in Genesis seems favorable (so Mr. Poole) to the theory that Joseph ruled Egypt under a shepherd-king. There is a notice, in an ancient Egyptian inscription, of a famine which has been supposed to be that of Joseph. The inscription is in a tomb at Bene-Hasan, and records of Amence, a governor of a district of Upper Egypt, that when there were years of famine, his district was supplied with food. This was in the time of Sesertesen I., of the twelfth dynasty. It has been supposed that this must be Joseph's famine, but not only are the particulars of the record inapplicable to that instance, but the calamity it relates was never unusual in Egypt, as its ancient inscriptions and modern history equally testify. Joseph's policy toward the subjects of Pharaoh is important in reference to the forming an estimate of his character. It displays the resolution and breadth of view that mark his whole career. He perceived a great advantage to be gained, and he lost no part of it. Early in the famine, which prevailed equally in Canaan and Egypt, Jacob reproved his helpless sons and sent them to Egypt, where he knew there was corn to be bought. Benjamin alone he kept with him. Joseph was now governor, an Egyptian in habits and speech, for like all men of large mind he had suffered no scruples of prejudice to make him a stranger to the people he ruled. His brethren did not know him, grown from the boy they had sold into a man, and to their eyes an Egyptian, while they must have been scarcely changed. Joseph remembered his dreams, and behaved to them as a stranger, using, as we afterward learn, an interpreter, and spoke hard words to them, and accused them of being spies. In defending themselves they spoke of their household. The whole story of Joseph's treatment of his brethren, of his making himself known to them after he had sufficiently proved them (see BENJAMIN 1; DIVINATION 12; MAGIC, &c.), and of his sending for the whole family to come down into Egypt, is so graphically told in Gen. xlii.-xlv., and is so familiar that it is unnecessary here to repeat it. After the removal of his family into Egypt, Jacob and his house abode in the land of Goshen, Joseph still ruling the country. Here Jacob, when near his end, gave Joseph a portion above his brethren, doubtless including the "parcel of ground" at Shechem, his future burying-place (compare Jn. iv. 5). Then he blessed his sons, Joseph most earnestly of all, and died in Egypt. "And Joseph fell upon his face, and wept upon him, and kissed him" (Gen. l. 1). When he had caused him to be embalmed by "his servants the physicians" he carried him to Canaan, and laid him in the cave of Machpelah, the burying-place of his fathers. Then his brethren feared that, their father being dead, Joseph would punish them, and he strove to remove their fears. From his being able to make the journey into Canaan with "a very great company" (9), as well as from his living apart from his brethren and from their fear of him, Joseph seems to have been still governor of Egypt. We know no more than that he lived "a hundred and ten years" (22, 26), having been more than ninety in Egypt; that he "saw Ephraim's children of the third generation," and that "the children also of Machir, the son of Manasseh, were borne upon Joseph's knees" (23); and that dying he took an oath of his brethren that they should carry up his bones to the land of promise: thus showing in his latest action the faith (Heb. xi. 22) which had guided his whole life. Like his father he was embalmed, "and he was put in a coffin in Egypt" (Gen. i. 26). His trust Moses kept, and laid the bones of Joseph in his inheritance in Shechem, in the territory of Ephraim his offspring. Joseph's character is wholly composed of great materials. He was a man of faith and patience, of decision and resolution, uprightness, generosity, tenderness, and modesty. In the history of the chosen race, Joseph occupies a very high place as an instrument of Providence. Blest with many revelations, he is throughout a God-taught leader of his people. The tribes of EPHRAIM and MANASSEH are sometimes spoken of under the name of Joseph, which is even given to the whole Israelite nation.—2. Father of IGAL who represented the tribe of Issachar among the spies (Num. xiii. 7).—3. A lay Israelite of the family of Bani, compelled by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezr. x. 42); = JOSEPHUS.—4. Representative of the priestly family of Shebaniah, in the next generation after the Return from Captivity (Neh. xii. 14).—5. A Jewish officer defeated by Gorgias about 164 B. C. (1 Mc. v. 8, 56, 60).—6. In 2 Mc. viii. 22, x. 19, Joseph is named among the brethren of Judas Maccabeus apparently in place of John.—7. An ancestor of Judith (Jd. viii. 1).—8. One of the ancestors of Christ (Lk. iii. 30), son of Jonan.—9. Another ancestor of Christ, son of Judah (iii. 26).—10. Another, son of Matthias (iii. 24).—11. Son of Heli, and reputed father of Jesus Christ. (GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST; JAMES 3, &c.; JESUS CHRIST.) He was a just man, and of the house and lineage of David. The public registers also contained his name under the reckoning of the house of David (Jn. i. 45; Lk. iii. 23; Mat. i. 20; Lk. ii. 4). He lived at Nazareth in Galilee, and probably his family had been settled there for at least two preceding generations, possibly from the time of Matthat, the supposed common grandfather of Joseph and Mary, since Mary lived there too (i. 26, 27). He espoused Mary (MARY, THE VIRGIN), the daughter and heir of his uncle Jacob (so Lord A. C. Hervey), and before he took her home as his wife received the angelic communication recorded in Mat. i. 20. It must have been within a very short time of his taking her to his home, that the decree went forth from Augustus Cesar which obliged him to leave Nazareth with his wife and go to Bethlehem. (CYRENIUS; TAXING.) He was there with Mary and her first-born, when the shepherds came to see the babe in the manger, and he went with them to the Temple to present the infant according to the law, and there heard the prophetic words of Simeon, as he held Him in his arms. When the wise men from the East came to Bethlehem to worship Christ, Joseph was there; and he went down to Egypt with them by night, when warned by an angel of the danger which threatened them; and on the second message he returned with them to the land of Israel, intending to reside at Bethlehem, the city of David; but being afraid of Archelaus he took up his abode, as before his marriage, at Nazareth, where he carried on his trade as a carpenter. When Jesus was twelve years old Joseph and Mary took Him with them to keep the Passover at Jerusalem, and when they returned to Nazareth, he continued to act as a father to the child Jesus, and was reputed to be so indeed. But here our knowledge of Joseph ends. That he died before our Lord's crucifixion, is indeed tolerably certain (Mk. vi. 3?; Jn. xix. 27). But where, when, or how he died, we know not.

Joseph (see above) of Ar-i-ma-the'a (ARIMATHEA), a rich and pious Israelite who had the privilege of performing the last offices of duty and affection to the body of our Lord. He is distinguished from other persons of the same name by the addition of his birth-place Arimathea. Joseph is denominated (Mk. xv. 43) "an honorable counsellor," by which we are probably to understand that he was a member of the Great Council, or SANHEDRIM. He is further characterized as "a good man and a just" (Lk. xxiii. 50), one of those who, bearing in their hearts the words of their old prophets, were waiting for the kingdom of God (Mk. xv. 43; Lk. ii. 25, 38, xxiii. 51). We are expressly told that he did not "consent to the counsel and deed" of his colleagues in conspiring to bring about the death of Jesus; but he seems to have lacked the courage to protest against their judgment. At all events we know that he shrank, through fear of his countrymen, from professing himself openly a disciple of our Lord. The crucifixion seems to have wrought in him the same clear conviction that it wrought in the centurion who stood by the cross; for on the very evening of that dreadful day, when the triumph of the chief priests and rulers seemed complete, Joseph "went in boldly unto Pilate and craved the body of Jesus." Pilate consented. Joseph and Nicodemus then having enfolded the sacred body in the linen shroud which Joseph had bought, consigned it to a tomb hewn in a rock, a tomb where no human corpse had ever yet been laid. The tomb was in a garden belonging to Joseph, and close to the place of crucifixion. (JERUSALEM III., § 10.) There is a tradition that he was one of the seventy disciples. Another, whether authentic or not, deserves to be mentioned as generally current, namely, that Joseph being sent to Great Britain by the Apostle Philip, about the year 63, settled with his brother disciples at Glastonbury, England.

Joseph (see above), called Bar-sa-bas (BARSABAS), and surnamed JUSTUS; one of the two persons chosen by the assembled church (Acts i. 23) as worthy to fill the place in the Apostolic company from which Judas had fallen. He therefore had been a companion of the disciples all the time that they followed Jesus, from His baptism to His ascension. Eusebius states that he was one of the seventy disciples.

Jesh-be-ka'shah, or Jesh-bek'a-shah (fr. Heb. = seat in hardness, Ges.), son of Heman; head of the seventeenth course of musicians (1 Chr. xxv. 4, 24).

* Jo'sheb-bas'se-bet (fr. Heb.) (2 Sam. xxiii. 9, margin). EZNITE; JASHOBEAM.

Josh'u-a (fr. Heb. = Jehovah his help, Ges.; = JEHOSHUA, JEHOSHUAH, JESHUA, JESUS). 1. Son of Nun, of the tribe of Ephraim (1 Chr. vii. 27). His original name appears to have been HOSHEA or OSHUA. He is also called JEHOSHUA, JEHOSHUAH, JESHUA, and JESUS. The future captain of invading hosts grew up a slave in the brick-fields of Egypt. Born about the time when Moses fled into Midian, he was a man of nearly forty years when he saw the ten plagues, and shared in the hurried triumph of the Exodus. He is mentioned first in connection with the fight against Amalek at Rephidim, when he was chosen (Ex. xvii. 9) by Moses to lead the Israelites. When Moses ascended Mount Sinai to receive for the first time (compare Ex. xxiv. 13, and xxxiii. 11) the two Tables, Joshua, who is called his minister or servant, accompanied him part of the way, and was the first to accost him in his descent (xxxii. 17). Soon afterward he was one of the twelve chiefs sent (Num. xiii. 17) to explore the land of Canaan, and one of the two (xiv. 6) who gave an encouraging report of their journey. (CALEB 2.) The forty years of wandering were almost passed, and Joshua was one of the few survivors, when Moses, shortly before his death, was directed (xxvii. 18) to invest Joshua solemnly and publicly with definite authority in connection with Eleazar the priest, over the people. And after this was done, God Himself gave Joshua a charge by the mouth of the dying Lawgiver (Deut. xxxi. 14, 23). Under the direction of God again renewed (Josh. i. 1), Joshua, now in his eighty-fifth year (Jos. v. 1, § 29; CHRONOLOGY II.) assumed the command of the people at Shittim, sent spies into Jericho, crossed the Jordan, fortified a camp at Gilgal, circumcised the people, kept the passover, and was visited by the Captain of the Lord's Host. A miracle made the fall of Jericho more terrible to the Canaanites. In the first attack upon Ai the Israelites were repulsed: it fell at the second assault, and the invaders marched to the relief of Gibeon. In the great battle of Beth-horon the Amorites were signally routed, and the South country was open to the Israelites. Joshua returned to the camp at Gilgal, master of half of Palestine. In the North, at the waters of Merom, he defeated the Canaanites under Jabin king of Hazor; and pursued his success to the gates of Zidon and into the valley of Lebanon under Hermon. In six years six tribes with thirty-one "kings" were conquered; amongst others the Anakim—the old terror of Israel—are especially recorded as destroyed everywhere except in Philistia. Joshua, now stricken in years, proceeded in conjunction with Eleazar and the heads of the tribes to complete the division of the conquered land; and when all was allotted, TIMNATH-SERAH in Mount Ephraim was assigned by the people as Joshua's peculiar inheritance. The Tabernacle of the congregation was established at Shiloh, six cities of refuge were appointed, forty-eight cities assigned to the Levites, and the warriors of the Trans-jordanic tribes dismissed in peace to their homes. After an interval of rest, Joshua convoked an assembly from all Israel. He delivered two solemn addresses reminding them of the marvellous fulfilment of God's promises to their fathers, and warning them of the conditions on which their prosperity depended; and lastly, he caused them to renew their covenant with God, at Shechem, a place already famous in connection with Jacob (Gen. xxxv. 4), and Joseph (Josh. xxiv. 32). He died at the age of 110 years, and was buried in his own city, Timnath-serah. He was a devout warrior, blameless and fearless, who had been taught by serving as a youth how to command as a man; who earned by manly vigor a quiet, honored old age; who combined strength with gentleness, ever looking up for and obeying the Divine impulse with the simplicity of a child, while he wielded great power and directed it calmly, and without swerving, to the accomplishment of a high, unselfish purpose. Joshua is often considered a type of Christ (Heb. iv. 8). (JOSHUA, BOOK OF).—2. An inhabitant of Beth-shemesh, in whose land was the stone at which the milch-kine stopped, when they drew the ARK of God with the offerings of the Philistines from Ekron to Beth-shemesh (1 Sam. vi. 14, 18).—3. A governor of a city who gave his name to a gate of Jerusalem (2 K. xxiii. 8).—4. A HIGH-PRIEST, JESHUA 4 (Hag. i. 14, ii. 1; Zeph. iii. 1, &c.).

Josh'u-a (see above), Book of. 1. Authority. The claim of Joshua to a place in the CANON of the O. T. has never been disputed. (BIBLE; INSPIRATION; OLD TESTAMENT.) Its authority is confirmed by the references, in other books of Holy Scripture, to the events which are related in it (Ps. lxxviii. 53-55; Is. xxviii. 21; Hab. iii. 11-13; Acts vii. 45; Heb. iv. 8, xi. 30-32; Jas. ii. 26). The miracles which it relates, and particularly that of the prolongation of the day of the battle of Makkedah, have led some critics to entertain a suspicion of the credibility of the book as a history. (DAY; EARTH; MIRACLES.) The treatment of the Canaanites which is sanctioned in this book has been denounced for its severity by Eichhorn and earlier writers. But there is nothing in it inconsistent with the divine attribute of justice, or with God's ordinary way of governing the world. (IDOLATRY.) Some discrepancies are alleged by De Wette and Hauff to exist within the book itself, and have been described as material differences and contradictions. But they disappear when the words of the text are accurately stated and weighed, and they do not affect the general credibility of the book. Other discrepancies have been alleged by Dr. Davidson, with the view not of disparaging the credibility of the book, but of supporting the theory that it is a compilation from two distinct documents. These are not sufficient either to impair the authority of the book, or to prove that it was not substantially the composition of one author.—2. Scope and Contents. Joshua is a distinct whole in itself. The inspired writer records, for the information of the nation to which he belonged, the acts of Joshua so far as they possessed a national interest. Perhaps no part of the Holy Scripture is more injured than the first half of this book by being printed in chapters and verses. The first twelve chapters form a continuous narrative, which seems never to halt or flag. And the description is frequently so minute as to show the hand not merely of a contemporary, but of an eye-witness. Step by step we are led on through the solemn preparation, the arduous struggle, the crowning triumph. The second part of the book (Josh. xiii.-xxi.) has been aptly compared to the Domesday-book of the Norman conquerors of England. The documents of which it consists were doubtless the abstract of such reports as were supplied by the men whom Joshua sent out (xviii. 8) to describe the land. The book may be regarded as consisting of three parts: (a) the conquest of Canaan (i.-xii.); (b) the partition of Canaan (xiii.-xxii.); (c) Joshua's farewell (xxiii.-xxiv.). The events related in this book extend over a period of about twenty-five years, from B. C. 1451 to 1426. (CHRONOLOGY II.)—3. Author. Nothing is really known as to the authorship of the book. Joshua himself is generally named as the author by the Jewish writers and the Christian Fathers; and a great number of critics acquiesce more or less entirely in that belief. Others have conjectured Phinehas, Eleazar, Samuel, Jeremiah. Von Lengerke thinks it was written by some one in the time of Josiah; Davidson by some one in the time of Saul, or somewhat later; Masius, Le Clerc, Maurer, and others by some one who lived after the Babylonish Captivity. It has been supposed that the book as it now stands is a compilation from two earlier documents, one, the original, called Elohistic, the other supplementary, called Jehovistic. (GOD; PENTATEUCH.) The arguments, though insufficient to prove that Joshua was the author, yet seem to give a preponderance in favor of him when compared with any other person who has been named (so Mr. Bullock, original author of this article). The last verses (xxiv. 29-33) were obviously added by some later hand. The account of some other events may have been inserted in Joshua by a late transcriber. "The book may have been written during Joshua's lifetime, and cannot have been written long after" (Dr. W. L. Alexander, in Kitto; see Josh. vi. 25, &c.).—4. There is extant a Samaritan Book of Joshua in the Arabic language, written in the 13th century, first printed at Leyden in 1848.

Jo-el'ah (fr. Heb. = whom Jehovah heals, Ges.; in Apocrypha and N. T. JOSIAS). 1. Son of AMON and Jedidah, succeeded his father as king of Judah B. C. 641, in the eighth year of his age, and reigned thirty-one years. (ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF; JUDAH, KINGDOM OF.) His history is contained in 2 K. xxii.-xxiv. 30; 2 Chr. xxxiv., xxxv.; and the first twelve chapters of Jeremiah throw much light upon the general character of the Jews in his days. He began in the eighth year of his reign to seek the Lord; and in his twelfth year, and for six years afterward, in a personal progress throughout all the land of Judah and Israel, he destroyed everywhere high-places, groves, images, and all outward signs and relics of IDOLATRY. The Temple was restored under a special commission; and in the course of the repairs HILKIAH the priest found that book of the Law of the Lord which quickened so remarkably the ardent zeal of the king. The great day of Josiah's life was the day of the Passover in the eighteenth year of his reign. After this, his endeavors to abolish every trace of idolatry and superstition were still carried on. But the time drew near which had been indicated by HULDAH (2 K. xxii. 20). When PHARAOH-NECHO went from Egypt to Carchemish to carry on his war against Assyria (compare Hdt. ii. 159), Josiah, possibly in a spirit of loyalty to the Assyrian king to whom he may have been bound, opposed his march along the seacoast. Necho reluctantly paused and gave him battle in the valley of Esdraelon. Josiah was mortally wounded, and died before he could reach Jerusalem. He was buried with extraordinary honors. Huldah's prediction that he should be gathered to the grave in peace (2 Chr. xxxiv. 28) must be interpreted in accordance with the explanation in Jer. xxxiv. 5. His remains were buried in peace, and he did not see the evil which was soon to fall on Jerusalem and Judah. It was in Josiah's reign (so Mr. Bullock) that a nomadic horde of Scythians overran Asia (Hdt. i. 104-106). Ewald conjectures that the 59th Psalm was composed by King Josiah during a siege of Jerusalem by these Scythians. Beth-shan is said to derive its Greek name, Scythopolis, from these invaders.—2. The son of Zephaniah, at whose house the prophet Zechariah was commanded to assemble the chief men of the Captivity, to witness the solemn and symbolical crowning of Joshua the high-priest (Zech. vi. 9).

Jo-el'as (L. = JOSIAH). 1. JOSIAH, king of Judah (1 Esd. i. 1, 7, 18, 21-23, 25, 28, 20, 32-34; Eccles. xlix. 1, 4; Bar. i. 8; Mat. i. 10, 11).—2. JESHAIAS, son of Athaliah (1 Esd. viii. 33; compare Ezr. viii. 7).

Jo-el-b'ah (fr. Heb. = whom Jehovah lets dwell, Ges.), father of Jehu, a Simeonite chief (1 Chr. iv. 35).

Jo-el-ph'ah (fr. Heb. = whom may Jehovah increase, Ges. ? Jah is increaser, Fñ.; compare JOSAPHAT), father or ancestor of one who returned with Ezra (Ezr. viii. 10). A word is evidently omitted in the first part of the verse. The LXX. read, "of the sons of Bani, Shelomith, the son of Josiphiah."

* Jot (fr. the Heb. letter jod or yod, the smallest in the alphabet) = the smallest part (Mat. v. 18).

Jot'bah (fr. Heb. = goodness, pleasantness, Ges.), the native place of Meshullemeth, the queen of Manasseh (2 K. xxi. 19); supposed by Mr. Wilton (in Fairbairn) to be at the modern village el-Taiyibeh (ОРНАН 1?).

Jot'bath, or Jot'ba-thab (both fr. Heb. = JORBAH, Ges.) (Deut. x. 7; Num. xxxiii. 83), a desert station of the Israelites; identified with Wady el-'Adhibeh, N. W. of 'Akabah. WILDERNESS OF THE WANDERING.

Jo-tham (fr. Heb. = Jehovah is upright, Ges.). 1. The youngest son of Gideon (Judg. ix. 5), who escaped from the massacre of his brethren by their half-brother ABIMELECH. His parable of the reign of the bramble is the earliest example of the kind. Nothing is known of him afterward, except that he dwelt at Beer.—2. Son of King UZZIAH (or Azariah) and Jerushah. After administering the kingdom of Judah for some years during his father's leprosy, he succeeded to the throne B. C. 758, when he was twenty-five years old, and reigned sixteen years in Jerusalem. (ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF; JUDAH, KINGDOM OF.) He was contemporary with Pekah and with the prophet Isaiah. His history is contained in 2 K. xv. and 2 Chr. xxvii. He did right in the sight of the Lord, and his reign was prosperous, although the high-places were not removed.—3. A descendant of Judah; son of Jahdai (1 Chr. ii. 47).

Joz'a-bad (L. fr. Heb., contracted from JEROZABAD; also written JOSABAD). 1. A captain of Manasseh, who joined David before the battle of Gilboa (1 Chr. xii. 20).—2. A hero of Manasseh, like the preceding (ibid.).—3. A Levite in Hezekiah's reign, an overseer of offerings (2 Chr. xxxi. 13).—4. A chief Levite in Josiah's reign (xxxv. 9).—5. A Levite, son of Jeshua, in the days of Ezra; assistant in registering the number and weight of the sacred vessels, &c. (Ezr. viii. 33); probably = No. 7.—6. A priest of the sons of Fashur, who had married a foreign wife (x. 22).—7. A Levite among those who returned with Ezra and had married foreign wives (x. 23; 1 Esd. ix. 28); probably = Jozabad who assisted when the Law was read by Ezra (Neh. viii. 7), and Jozabad who presided over the outer work of the Temple (xi. 16), and No. 5.

Joz'a-char [-kar] (fr. Heb. = whom Jehovah remembers, Ges.), son of Shimeath the Ammonitess, and one of the murderers of Joash, king of Judah (2 K. xii. 21). 2 Chr. xxiv. 26 calls him ZABAD, which may be a clerical error for Jozachar.

Joz'a-dak (fr. Heb.), the contracted form of JEHOZADAK (Ezr. iii. 2, 8, v. 2, x. 18; Neh. xii. 26).

Ju'bal (fr. Heb. = music? Ges.; compare JUBILEE), a son of Lamech by Adah, and the inventor of the "harp and organ" (Gen. iv. 21), probably general terms for stringed and wind instruments.

Ju'blee (fr. Heb. yóbbel; see below), the Year of, the fiftieth year, i. e. the year after the succession of seven Sabbatical years, in which all the land which had been alienated returned to the families of those to whom it had been originally allotted, and all bondmen of Hebrew blood were liberated.—I. The relation in which it stood to the SABBATICAL YEAR and the general directions for its observance are given in Lev. xxv. 8-16 and 23-55. Its bearing on lands dedicated to Jehovah is stated in xxvii. 16-25. There is no mention of the Jubilee in Deuteronomy, and the only other reference to it in the Pentateuch is in Num. xxxvi. 4.—II. The year was inaugurated on the Day of Atonement with the blowing of trumpets throughout the land, and by a proclamation of universal liberty.—1. The soil was kept under the same condition of rest as had existed during the preceding Sabbatical year. There was to be neither ploughing, sowing, nor reaping; but the chance produce was to be left for the use of all comers.—2. Every Israelite returned to "his possession and to his family;" i. e. he recovered his right in the land originally allotted to the family of which he was a member, if he, or his ancestor, had parted with it. (a) A strict rule to prevent fraud and injustice in such transactions is laid down:—if a Hebrew, urged by poverty, had to dispose of a field, the price was determined according to the time of the sale in reference to the approach of the next Jubilee. (b) The possession of the field could, at any time, be recovered by the original proprietor, if his circumstances improved, or by his next of kin. (c) Houses in walled cities were not subject to the law of Jubilee. (d) Houses and buildings in villages, or in the country, being regarded as essentially connected with the cultivation of the land, were not excepted, but returned in the Jubilee with the land on which they stood. (e) The Levitical cities were not, in respect to this law, reckoned with walled towns. (f) If a man had sanctified a field of his patrimony unto the Lord, it could be redeemed at any time before the next year of Jubilee, on his paying one-fifth in addition to the worth of the crops, rated at a stated valuation (Lev. xxvii. 19). If not so redeemed, it became, at the Jubilee, devoted for ever. (g) If he who had purchased the usufruct of a field sanctified it, he could redeem it till the next Jubilee, i. e. as long as his claim lasted; but it then, as justice required, returned to the original proprietor (ver. 22-24).—3. All Israelites who had become bondmen, either to their countrymen, or to resident foreigners, were set free in the Jubilee (xxv. 40, 41), when it happened to occur before their seventh year of servitude, in which they became free by the operation of another law (Ex. xxi. 2). Such was the law of the year of Jubilee, as it is given in the Pentateuch.—III. Josephus (iii. 12, § 8) states that all debts were remitted in the year of Jubilee, while the Scripture speaks of the remission of debts only in connection with the Sabbatical year (Deut. xv. 1, 2). He also describes the terms on which the holder of a piece of land resigned it in the Jubilee to the original proprietor. Philo gives an account of the Jubilee agreeing with that in Leviticus, and says nothing of the remission of debts.—IV. There are several very difficult questions connected with the Jubilee, of which we now proceed to give a brief view:—1. Origin of the word Jubilee. The etymology of the Hebrew yóbbel, from which comes Jubilee, is much disputed. The Targum of Jonathan, the Talmud, Rashi, Kimchi, Fürst, &c., make it primarily = a ram, then by metonymy a ram's horn, and the sound produced by the horn. According to the LXX., Josephus, &c., it primarily = one who is at liberty, then abstractly freedom, liberty (Dr. Ginsburg, &c.). Gesenius, the Vulgate, &c., regard the word as onomatopoeic, = a cry of joy, joyful shout, then transferred to the sound or clangor of trumpets. It is now very generally ascribed to the root yábal (= to flow impetuously), and its meaning would seem to be a ushing, penetrating sound. The word yóbbel (A. V. "trumpet," margin "CORNET") is used in Ex. xix. 13.—2. Was the Jubilee every 49th or 50th year? If the plain words of Lev. xxv. 10 are to be followed, this question need not be asked. The statement that the Jubilee was the fiftieth year, after the succession of seven weeks of years, and that it was distinguished from, not identical with, the seventh Sabbatical year, is as evident as language can make it (so Mr. Clark). The simplest view, and the only one which accords with the sacred text, is, that the year which followed the seventh Sabbatical year was the Jubilee, which was intercalated between two series of Sabbatical years, so that the next year was the first of a new half century, and the seventh year after that was the first Sabbatical year of the other series.—3. Were debts remitted in the Jubilee? Not a word is said of this in the O. T., or in Philo. The affirmative rests entirely on the authority of Josephus. Maimonides says expressly that the remission of debts was a point of distinction between the Sabbatical year and the Jubilee.—V. Maimonides, and the Jewish writers in general, consider that the Jubilee was observed till the destruction of the first Temple. But there is no direct historical notice of its observance on any one occasion, either in the O. T., or in any other records. The only passages in the Prophets which can be regarded with much confidence, as referring to the Jubilee in any way, are Is. v. 7-10, lxi. 1, 2, and Ez. vii. 12, 13, xli. 16-18.—VI. The Jubilee is to be regarded as the outer circle of that great Sabbatical system which comprises within it the Sabbatical year, the Sabbatical month, and the Sabbath day. (FESTIVALS.) But the Jubilee is more immediately connected with the body politic; and it was only as a member of the state that each person concerned could participate in its provisions. It was not distinguished by any prescribed religious observance peculiar to itself, like the rites of the Sabbath day and of the Sabbatical month; or even by any thing like the reading of the Law in the Sabbatical year. But in the Hebrew state, polity and religion were never separated, nor was their essential connection ever dropped out of sight. As far as legislation could go, its provisions tended to restore that equality in outward circumstances which was instituted in the first settlement of the land by Joshua. But if we look upon it in its more special character, as a part of the divine law appointed for the chosen people, its practical bearing was to vindicate the right of each Israelite to his part in the covenant which Jehovah had made with his fathers respecting the land of promise. AGRICULTURE.

Ju'da (L. fr. JUDAS). 1. Son of Joseph in the GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST (Lk. iii. 30).—2. Son of Joanna, or (so Lord A. C. Hervey) HANANIAH 8 (Lk. iii. 26). Lord A. C. Hervey supposes him = ASUD in Mat. i. 13.—3. One of the Lord's brethren, enumerated in Mk. vi. 3 (see JAMES).—4. The patriarch JUDAH (Sus. 56; Lk. iii. 33; Heb. vii. 14; Rev. v. 5, vii. 5). In Mat. ii. 6 and 1 Mc. ii. 6, 18, Juda = the land of Judah's descendants. JUTTAR.

Ju-dz'a [-dee-] (L.) = JUDEA.

Ju'dah (fr. Heb. Yehûdâh = celebrated, lauded, praised, Ges.), also written JUDA or JUDAS. 1. Fourth son of Jacob and fourth of Leah, the last before the temporary cessation in the births of her children. His whole-brothers were Reuben, Simeon, and Levi, elder than himself—Issachar and Zebulun younger (see Gen. xxxv. 23). Of Judah's personal character more traits are preserved than of any other of the patriarchs, except Joseph. In the matter of the sale of Joseph, he and Reuben stand out in favorable contrast to the rest of the brothers. When a second visit to Egypt for corn had become inevitable, Judah, as the mouthpiece of the rest, heeded the remonstrance against the detention of Benjamin by Jacob, and finally undertook to be responsible for the safety of the lad (xliii. 3-10). And when, through Joseph's artifice, the brothers were brought back to the palace, he is again the leader and spokesman of the band. He makes that wonderful appeal which renders it impossible for Joseph any longer to conceal his secret (xlv. 14, 16-34). So too Judah is sent before Jacob to smooth the way for him in the land of Goshen (xvi. 23). This ascendancy over his brethren is reflected in the last words addressed to him by his father (xlix. 8-10). (SHILOH.) His sons were five. Of these, three were by his Canaanite wife, "the daughter of Shuah." They are all insignificant: two, ER and OXAN, died early; the third, SHELAH, does not come prominently forward, either in his person or his family. The other two, PHAREZ and ZERAH, were illegitimate sons by the widow of Er, the eldest of the former family. (TAMAR 1.) As is not unfrequently the case, the illegitimate sons surpassed the legitimate, and from Pharez, the elder, were descended the royal and other illustrious families of Judah. These sons were born to Judah while he was living in the same district of Palestine which, centuries after, was repossessed by his descendants. The three sons went with their father into Egypt at the final removal thither (xvi. 12; Ex. i. 2). When we again meet with the families of Judah they occupy a position among the tribes similar to that which their progenitor had taken amongst the patriarchs. The numbers of the tribe at the census at Sinai were 74,600 (Num. i. 26, 27), considerably in advance of any of the others, the largest of which—Dan—numbered 62,700. On the borders of the Promised Land they were 76,500

(xxvi. 22), Dan being still the nearest. The chief of the tribe at the former census was NAHSHOX; its representative among the spies was CALEB, the son of Jephunneh. During the march through the desert Judah's place was in the van of the host, on the east side of the Tabernacle, with his kinsmen Issachar and Zebulun (ii. 3-9, x. 14). During the conquest of the country the only incidents specially affecting the tribe of Judah are—(1.) the misdeed of Achan, who was of the great house of Zerah (Josh. vii. 1, 16-18); and (2.) the conquest of the mountain district of Hebron by Caleb, and of the strong city Debir, in the same locality, by his nephew (or brother) and son-in-law Othniel (xiv. 6-15, xv. 13-19). The boundaries and contents of the territory allotted to Judah are narrated at great length, and with greater minuteness than the others, in Josh. xv. 20-63. The N. boundary, for the most part coincident with the S. boundary of Benjamin, began at the mouth of the Jordan, entered the hills apparently at or about the present road from Jericho, ran W. to En-shemesh, probably the present 'Ain Haud, below Bethany, thence over the Mount of Olives to En-rogel, in the valley beneath Jerusalem; went along the ravine of Hinnom, under the precipices of the city, climbed the hill in a N. W. direction to the water of the Nephtoth (probably Lifta), and thence by Kirjath-jearim (probably Kurid el-'Enab), Beth-shemesh ('Ain Shema), Timnath, and Ekron to Jabneel on the sea-coast. On the E. the Dead Sea, and on the W. the Mediterranean formed the boundaries. The southern line is hard to determine, since it is denoted by places many of which have not been identified. It left the Dead Sea at its extreme southern end, and joined the Mediterranean at the Wady el-'Arikh. This territory, in average length about forty-five miles, and in average breadth about fifty, was from a very early date divided into four main regions.—(I.) The South—the undulating pasture country which intervened between the hills, the proper possession of the tribe, and the deserts which encompass the lower part of Palestine (Josh. xv. 21). The nearly forty names in the Heb. and A. V. of Josh. xv. 21-32, Wilton (The Negeb) and Rowlands (in Fairbairn under "S. Country") reduce to twenty-nine (the number given in ver. 32), by regarding compound names in several cases as erroneously divided into distinct names (see the articles on the names in this Dictionary).—(II.) The Lowland (xv. 38; A. V. "valley," "vale," "low country," "low plains," "plain"), or to give it its own proper and constant appellation, The Sheph'elah (SEPH'ELA), the broad belt or strip lying between the central highlands, "the mountain," and the Mediterranean Sea; the lower portion of that maritime plain, which extends through the whole of the sea-board of Palestine, from Sidon in the N. to Rhinocolura at the S. This tract was the garden and the granary of the tribe. From the edge of the sandy tract, which fringes the immediate shore right up to the very wall of the hills of Judah, stretches the immense plain of corn-fields.—(III.) The third region of the tribe—the Mountain, the "hill-country of Judah"—though not the richest, was at once the largest and most important of the four. Beginning a few miles below Hebron, where it attains its highest level, it stretches E. to the Dead Sea, and W. to the Lowland, and forms an elevated district or plateau, which, though thrown into considerable undulations, yet preserves a general level in both directions. The surface of this region, which is of limestone, is monotonous enough.—(IV.) The fourth district is the Wilderness (Midbar, Heb.; see DESERT 2), which here and here only appears to be synonymous with ARABAH, and to signify the sunken district immediately adjoining the Dead Sea. Nine cities of Judah were allotted to the priests. In the partition of the territory by Joshua and Eleazar (Josh. xix. 51), Judah had the first allotment (xv. 1). The most striking circumstance in the early history of the tribe is the determined manner in which it keeps aloof from the rest—neither offering its aid nor asking that of others. The same independent mode of action marks the foundation of the monarchy after the death of Saul. (DAVID.) Their conduct later, when brought into collision with Ephraim on the matter of the restoration of David, shows that the men of Judah had preserved their original character. The same independent temper will be found to characterize the tribe throughout its existence as a kingdom. (JUDAH, KINGDOM OF.)—2. A Levite ancestor of Kadmiel (Ezr. iii. 9); believed by Lord A. C. Hervey = HODAVIAH 3 and HODEVAH.—3. A Levite who was obliged by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezr. x. 28). Probably the same person is intended in Neh. xii. 8, 36.—4. A Benjamite, son of Senuah (xi. 9).—5. One who took part in the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (xii. 34).

Ju'dah (see above), Kingdom of. When the disruption of Solomon's kingdom took place at Shechem, only the tribe of JUDAH followed the house of David. But almost immediately afterward, when Rehoboam conceived the design of establishing his authority over Israel by force of arms, the tribe of Benjamin also is recorded as obeying his summons, and contributing its warriors to make up his army. JERUSALEM connected the frontiers of the two tribes by an indissoluble political head. Two Benjamite towns, Bethel and Jericho, were included in the northern kingdom. (ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF.) A part, if not all of the territory of Simeon (1 Sam. xxvii. 6; 1 K. xix. 3; compare Josh. xix. 1) and of Dan (2 Chr. xi. 10; compare Josh. xix. 41, 42), was recognized as belonging to Judah; and in the reigns of Abijah and Asa the southern kingdom was enlarged by some additions taken out of the territory of Ephraim (2 Chr. xiii. 19, xv. 8, xvii. 2). A singular gauge of the growth of the kingdom of Judah is supplied by the progressive augmentation of the ARMY under successive kings. Probably the population subject to each king was about four times the number of the fighting men in his dominions. (ABIJAH 1; CENSUS.) Unless Judah had some other means besides pasture and tillage of acquiring wealth—as by maritime commerce from the Red Sea ports, or (less probably) from Joppa, or by keeping up the old trade (1 K. x. 28) with Egypt—it seems difficult to account for that ability to accumulate wealth which supplied the Temple treasury with sufficient store to invite so frequently the hand of the spoiler. Egypt, Damascus, Samaria, Nineveh, and Babylon, had each in succession a share of the pillage. The treasury was emptied by Shishak (1 K. xiv. 26), again by Asa (xv. 18), by Jehoash of Judah (2 K. xii. 18), by Jehoash of Israel (xiv. 14), by Ahaz (xvi. 8), by Hezekiah (xviii. 15), and by Nebuchadnezzar (xxiv. 13). The kingdom of Judah possessed many advantages which secured for it a longer continuance than that of Israel. A frontier less exposed to powerful enemies, a soil less fertile, a population harder and more united, a fixed and venerated centre of administration and religion, an hereditary aristocracy in the sacerdotal caste, an army always subordinate, a succession of kings which no revolution interrupted, many of whom were wise and good; still more, the devotion of the people to the One True God (IDOLATRY); and the popular reverence for and obedience to the Divine law—to these and other secondary causes is to be attributed the fact that Judah survived her more populous and more powerful sister kingdom by 185 years, and lasted from B. C. 975 to B. C. 586. Judah acted on three different lines of policy: animosity against Israel; resistance to Damascus; deference, perhaps vassalage, to the Assyrian king. (a.) The first three kings of Judah seem to have cherished the hope of reestablishing their authority over the Ten Tribes; for sixty years there was war between them and the kings of Israel. The victory achieved by the daring Abijah brought to Judah a temporary accession of territory. Asa appears to have enlarged it still further. (b.) Hanani's remonstrance (2 Chr. xvi. 7) prepares us for the reversal by Jehoshaphat of the policy which Asa pursued toward Israel and Damascus. A close alliance sprang up with strange rapidity between Judah and Israel. (ALLIANCES.) Jehoshaphat, active and prosperous, repelled nomad invaders from the desert, curbed the aggressive spirit of his nearer neighbors, and made his influence felt even among the Philistines and Arabians. Amaziah, flushed with the recovery of Edom, provoked a war with his more powerful contemporary Jehoash, the conqueror of the Syrians; and Jerusalem was entered and plundered by the Israelites. Under Uziah and Jotham, Judah long enjoyed political and religious prosperity, till Ahaz became the tributary and vassal of Tiglath-pileser. (c.) Already in the fatal grasp of Assyria, Judah was yet spared for a chequered existence of almost another century and a half after the termination of the kingdom of Israel. The consummation of the ruin came upon them in the destruction of the TEMPLE by the hand of Nebuzaradan, amid the wailings of prophets, and the taunts of heathen tribes released at length from the yoke of David. CAPTIVITY; JERUSALEM; JEW.

Ju'das, the Latinized Greek form of JUDAH, occurring in the LXX. and N. T. 1. JUDAH 3 (1 Esd. ix. 28).—2. Third son of Mattathias, "called Macabeus;" the leader of the Jewish patriots (1 Mc. ii. 4, &c.). (MACCABEES).—3. Son of Calphi; a Jewish general under Jonathan (xi. 70).—4. A Jew occupying a conspicuous position at Jerusalem at the time of the mission to ARISTOBULUS and the Egyptian Jews (2 Mc. i. 10).—5. A son of Simon, and brother of John Hyrcanus (1 Mc. xvi. 2), murdered by Ptolemy the usurper, either at the same time (about B. C. 135) with his father (xvi. 15 ff.), or shortly afterward. (MACCABEES).—6. The patriarch JUDAH (Mat. i. 2, 3).—7. A man residing at Damascus, in "the street which is called Straight," in whose house Saul of Tarsus lodged after his miraculous conversion (Acts ix. 11). PAUL.

Ju'das (see above), surnamed Bar'sa-bas (BAR-SABAS), a leading member of the Apostolic church at Jerusalem (Acts xv. 22), endued with the gift of prophecy (ver. 32), chosen with Silas to accompany Paul and Barnabas as delegates to the church at Antioch, to make known the decree concerning the terms of admission of the Gentile converts (ver. 27). After employing their prophetic gifts for the confirmation of the Syrian Christians in the faith, Judas went back to Jerusalem. Nothing further is recorded of him.

Ju'das (see above) of Gal'i-lee (GALILEE), the leader of a popular revolt "in the days of the taxing" (i. e. the census, under the prefecture of Quirinus [CYRENIUS], A. D. 6, A. U. C. 759), referred to by Gamaliel in his speech before the Sanhedrim (Acts v. 37). According to Josephus (xviii. 1, § 1), Judas was a Gaulonite of the city of Gamala, probably taking his name of Galilean from his insurrection having had its rise in Galilee. His revolt had a theocratic character, the watchword of which was, "We have no Lord or Master but God." Judas himself perished, and his followers were dispersed. With his fellow-insurgent Sadoc, a Pharisee, Judas is represented by Josephus as the founder of a fourth sect, in addition to the Pharisees, Sadducees, and Essenes. The Gaulonites, as his followers were called, may be regarded as the doctrinal ancestors of the Zealots and Sicarii of later days. JERUSALEM.

Ju'das (see above) Is-car'i-ot (see below). He is sometimes called "the son of Simon" (Jn. vi. 71, xiii. 2, 26), but more commonly (the three Synoptic Gospels give no other name) Iscariot (Mat. x. 4; Mk. iii. 19; Lk. vi. 16, &c.). In the three lists of the Twelve there is added in each case the fact that he was the betrayer. The name Iscariot (L. Iscariotes; Gr. Iškariōtēs) has received many interpretations more or less conjectural. The most probable are—(1.) From KERIOTH (Josh. xv. 25), in the tribe of Judah. On this hypothesis his position among the Twelve, the rest of whom belonged to Galilee (Acts ii. 7), would be exceptional; and this has led to—(2.) From KARITHA in Galilee ("KARTAN," A. V., Josh. xxi. 32).—(3.) From L. scortea, a leathern apron, the name being applied to him as the bearer of the bag, and = Judas with the apron.—Of the life of Judas, before the appearance of his name in the lists of the apostles, we know absolutely nothing. What that appearance implies, however, is that he had previously declared himself a disciple. He was drawn, as the others were, by the preaching of the Baptist, or his own Messianic hopes, or the "gracious words" of the new Teacher, to leave his former life, and to obey the call of the Prophet of Nazareth. The choice was not made, we must remember, without a foreseeing of its issue (Jn. vi. 64). We can hardly expect to solve the question why such a man was chosen for such an office. The germs of the evil, in all likelihood, unfolded themselves gradually. The rules to which the Twelve were subject in their first journey (Mat. x. 9, 10) sheltered him from the temptation that would have been most dangerous to him. The new form of life, of which we find the first traces in Lk. viii. 3, brought that temptation with it. As soon as the Twelve were recognized as a body, travelling hither and thither with their Master, receiving money and other offerings, and redistributing what they received to the poor, it became necessary that some one should act as the steward and almoner of the small society, and this fell to Judas (Jn. xii. 6, xiii. 29), either, as having the gifts that qualified him for it, or, as we may conjecture, from his character, because he sought it, or, as some have imagined, in rotation from time to time. The Galilean or Judean peasant found himself intrusted with larger sums of money than before, and with this there came covetousness, unfaithfulness, embezzlement. It was impossible after this that he could feel at ease with One who asserted so clearly and sharply the laws of faithfulness, duty, unselfishness. The scene at Bethany (Jn. xii. 1-9; Mat.

xxvi. 6-18; Mk. xiv. 3-9) showed how deeply the canker had eaten into his soul. The warm outpouring of love calls forth no sympathy. He utters himself and suggests to others the complaint that it is a waste. Under the plea of caring for the poor he covers his own miserable theft. The narrative of Mat. xxvi., Mk. xiv. places this history in close connection with the fact of the betrayal. It leaves the motives of the betrayer to conjecture. The mere love of money may have been strong enough to make him clutch at the bribe offered him. It may have been that he felt that his Master saw through his hidden guilt, and that he hastened on a crisis to avoid the shame of open detection. Mingled with this there may have been some feeling of vindictiveness, a vague, confused desire to show that he had power to stop the career of the Teacher who had reproved him. There may have been the thought that, after all, the betrayal could do no harm, that his Master would prove His innocence, or by some supernatural manifestation effect his escape. Another motive has been suggested of an entirely different kind, altering altogether the character of the act. Not the love of money, nor revenge, nor fear, nor disappointment, but policy, a subtle plan to force on the hour of the triumph of the Messianic kingdom, the belief that for this service he would receive as high a place as Peter, or James, or John; this it was that made him the traitor. Ingenious as this hypothesis is, it fails for that very reason. Of the other motives that have been assigned we need not care to fix on any one, as that which singly led him on. During the days that intervened between the supper at Bethany and the Paschal or quasi-Paschal gathering, he appeared to have concealed his treachery. At the last Supper he is present, looking forward to the consummation of his guilt as drawing nearer every hour. Then come the sorrowful words which showed him that his design was known. "One of you shall betray me." He, too, must ask, "Is it I?" (Mat. xxvi. 25). He alone hears the answer. After this there comes on him that paroxysm and insanity of guilt as of one whose human soul was possessed by the Spirit of Evil—"Satan entered into him" (Jn. xiii. 27). He knows that garden in which his Master and his companions had so often rested after the weary work of the day. He comes, accompanied by a band of officers and servants (xviii. 3), with the kiss which was probably the usual salutation of the disciples. The words of Jesus, calm and gentle as they were, showed that this was what embittered the treachery, and made the suffering it inflicted more acute (Lk. xxii. 48). What followed in the confusion of that night the Gospels do not record. The fever of the crime passed away. There came back on him the recollection of the sinless righteousness of the Master he had wronged (Mat. xxvii. 3). He repented, and his guilt and all that had tempted him to it became hateful. He hurls the money, which the priests refuse to take, into the sanctuary where they were assembled. For him there is no longer sacrifice or propitiation. He is "the son of perdition" (Jn. xvii. 12). "He departed and went and hanged himself" (Mat. xxvii. 5). He went "unto his own place" (Acts i. 25). We have in Acts i. another account of the circumstances of his death, which it is not easy to harmonize with that given by Matthew. There it is apparently stated—(1.) That instead of throwing the money into the temple, he bought a field with it. (AKELDAMA.) (2.) That, instead of hanging himself, "falling headlong, he burst asunder in the midst, and all his bowels gushed out." (3.) That for this reason, and not because the priests had bought it with the price of blood, the field was called Aceldama. Yet the "field of blood" (Aceldama) was rightly named, in view of its being both bought with the price of Christ's blood and notoriously connected with the bloody death of Judas. (Compare the double reference of the name JOSEPH.) It is commonly supposed that the rope with which Judas hanged himself, broke, and he fell and burst his abdomen, and that the field bought by the priests was the one in which Judas thus died. Professor Plumptre supposes that the explanation is to be found in some unknown series of facts, of which we have but two fragmentary narratives.

Ju'das (see above) "the brother of James," A. V. (literally "Judas of James," or "James's Judas," "the brother" being printed in italics in the A. V. as supplied by the translators), one of the twelve apostles; a member, together with his namesake "Isca'riot," JAMES the son of Alphaeus, and Simon Zelotes, of the last of the three sections of the apostolic body. (APOSTLE; JESUS CHRIST.) The name Judas only, without any distinguishing mark, occurs in the lists of Luke vi. 16; Acts i. 13; and in Jn. xiv. 22 (where we find "Judas not Isca'riot" among the apostles): but the apostle has been generally identified with "LEBBEUS, whose surname was THADDEUS" (Mat. x. 3; Mk. iii. 18). Much difference of opinion has existed from the earliest times as to the right interpretation of the Gr. Ioudas Iakobou, translated in the A. V. "Judas the brother of James." The generally received opinion is that the A. V. is right in translating "Judas the brother of James" (so Winer, Alford, &c.). But Mr. Venables prefers to follow many eminent critical authorities, and render the words "Judas the son of James." The name of Judas only occurs once in the gospel narrative (Jn. xiv. 22). Nothing is certainly known of the later history of the apostle. Tradition connects him with the foundation of the church at Edessa.

Ju'das (see above) the Lord's brother. Among the brethren of our Lord mentioned by the people of Nazareth (Mat. xiii. 55; Mk. vi. 3) occurs a "Judas," who has been sometimes identified with the apostle of the same name. (JAMES.) It has been considered with more probability (so Mr. Venables) that he was the writer of the epistle which bears the name of "Jude the brother of JAMES." (JUDE, EPISTLE OF.) Eusebius relates (H. E. iii. 20, 32) of two grandsons of Jude that they were brought as descendants of the royal house of David before the Emperor Domitian, but on account of the hardness of their hands and their description of the spiritual nature of Christ's kingdom, were dismissed as not endangering the empire, and lived on, honored as the Lord's relatives, into Trajan's reign.

* Jude (= JUDAS), the author of the epistle of Jude (Jude 1). JUDE, EPISTLE OF; JUDAS THE BROTHER OF JAMES; JAMES.

Jude, Epistle of. I. Its Authorship. The writer of this epistle styles himself, verse 1, "JUDE the brother of James," and has been usually identified with the Apostle Judas Lebbeus or Thaddeus (Lk. vi. 16). But there are strong reasons for rendering the words "Judas the son of James" (see above, JUDAS, THE BROTHER OF JAMES); and inasmuch as the author appears (Jude 17) to distinguish himself from the apostles, Mr. Venables agrees with eminent critics in attributing the epistle to another author. The most probable conclusion (so Mr. Venables) is that the author was Jude, one of the brethren of Jesus, and brother of JAMES, not the apostle the son of Alphaeus, but the bishop of Jerusalem. But Jerome, Tertullian, Origen, Calmet, Calvin, Hammond, Lange, Tregelles, &c., agree in assigning it to the apostle. (JAMES:—II. Genuineness and Canonicity. Although the epistle of Jude is one of the so-called Antilegomena, and its canonicity was questioned in the earliest ages of the Church, there never was any doubt of its genuineness among those by whom it was known. The question was never whether it was the work of an impostor, but whether its author was of sufficient weight to warrant its admission into the Canon. This question was gradually decided in its favor. It is wanting in the Peshito, nor is there any trace of its use by the Asiatic churches up to the commencement of the fourth century; but it is quoted as apostolic by Ephrem Syrus. The earliest notice of the epistle is in the famous Muratorian Fragment (about A. D. 170). Clement of Alexandria is the first Father of the Church by whom it is recognized. Eusebius also informs us (H. E. vi. 14) that it was among the books of Canonical Scripture, of which explanations were given in the Hypothoses of Clement. Origen refers to it expressly as the work of the Lord's brother. Of the Latin Fathers, Tertullian once expressly cites this epistle as the work of an apostle, as does Jerome. The epistle is also quoted by Malchian, a presbyter of Antioch, and by Palladius, and is contained in the Laodicene (A. D. 363), Carthaginian (397), and so-called Apostolic Catalogues, as well as in those emanating from the churches of the East and West, with the exception of the Synopsis of Chrysostom, and those of Cassiodorus and Ebed Jesu. (BIBLE; INSPIRATION; NEW TESTAMENT.)—III. Time and Place of Writing. Here all is conjecture. The author being not absolutely certain, there are no external grounds for deciding the point; and the internal evidence is but small. Lardner places it between A. D. 64 and 66; Davidson before A. D. 70; Credner, A. D. 80; Calmet, Estius, Witius, and Neander, after the death of all the apostles but John, and perhaps after the fall of Jerusalem. There are no data from which to determine the place of writing.—IV. For what Readers designed. The readers are nowhere expressly defined. The address (verse 1) is applicable to Christians generally, and there is nothing in the body of the epistle to limit its reference.—V. Its Object and Contents. The object of the epistle is plainly enough announced, verse 3: the reason for this exhortation is given verse 4. The remainder of the epistle is almost entirely occupied by a minute depiction of the adversaries of the faith. The epistle closes by briefly reminding the readers of the oft-repeated prediction of the apostles—among whom the writer seems not to rank himself—that the faith would be assailed by such enemies as he has depicted (17–19), exhorting them to maintain their own steadfastness in the faith (20, 21), while they earnestly sought to rescue others from the corrupt example of those licentious livers (22, 23), and commending them to the power of God in language which forcibly recalls the closing benediction of Romans (verses 24, 25; compare Rom. xvi. 25–27). This epistle presents one peculiarity, which, as we learn from Jerome, caused its authority to be impugned in very early times—the supposed citation of apocryphal writings (verses 9, 14, 15). The former of these passages, referring to the contest of the archangel Michael and the devil "about the body of Moses," was supposed by Origen to be founded on a Jewish work called the "Assumption of Moses," but probably makes use of a Jewish tradition based on Deut. xxxiv. 6. As regards the supposed quotation from the Book of Enoch (Enoch, Book of), the question is not so clear whether St. Jude is making a citation from a work already in the hands of his readers, or is employing a traditional prophecy not at that time committed to writing.—VI. Relation between the Epistles of Jude and 2 Peter. It is familiar to all that the larger portion of this epistle (verses 3–16) is almost identical in language and subject with 2 Pet. ii. 1–19. This question is examined in the article PETER, SECOND EPISTLE OF.

Ju-de'a (L. Judea, fr. Gr. Ioudaia, properly a fem. adj. = Jewish, sc. land or country, so named from the tribe of Judah; compare Jew), a territorial division which succeeded to the overthrow of the ancient landmarks of the tribes of Israel and Judah in their respective captivities. The Greek word first occurs Dan. v. 13 (LXX.; A. V. "Jewry"), and the first mention of the "province of Judea" is in Ez. v. 8; it is alluded to in Noh. xi. 8 (Heb. and A. V. "Judah"), and was the result of the division of the Persian empire mentioned by Herodotus (iii. 89–97), under Darius (compare Esth. viii. 9; Dan. vi. 1). In the apocrypha the word "province" is dropped, and throughout the books of Esdras, Tobit, Judith, and Maccabees, the expressions are "the land of Judea," "Judea" (A. V. frequently "Jewry"), and throughout the N. T. "The Jews made preparations for the work (of rebuilding the walls under Nehemiah)—a name which they received forthwith on their return from Babylon, from the tribe of Judah, which, being the first to arrive in those parts, gave name both to the inhabitants and the territory" (Jos. xi. 5, § 7). In a wide and more improper sense, the term Judea sometimes = the whole country of the Canaanites, its ancient inhabitants (Jos. i. 6, § 2); and even in the gospels we seem to read of the coasts of Judea "beyond Jordan" (Mat. xix. 1; Mk. x. 1). With Ptolemy, moreover, and Dion Cassius, Judea is synonymous with Palestine-Syria. Judea was, in strict language, the name of the third district, W. of the Jordan, and S. of Samaria. Its northern boundary, according to Josephus, was a village called Anath; its southern another village named Jardas. Its general breadth was from the Jordan to Joppa. It was made a portion of the Roman province of Syria upon the deposition of Archelaus, the ethnarch of Judea, A. D. 6, and was governed by a procurator, subject to the governor of Syria. Judge. The administration of justice in all early Eastern nations, as amongst the Arabs of the desert to this day, rests with the patriarchal seniors (AGE, OLD; ELDER; PATRIARCH); the judges being the heads of tribes, or of chief houses in a tribe. Thus in Job xxix. 7–9 the patriarchal magnate is represented as going forth "to the gate" amidst the respectful silence of elders, princes, and nobles (compare xxxii. 9). During the oppression of Egypt the nascent people would necessarily have few questions at law to plead. When they emerged from this oppression into national existence, the want of a machinery of judicature began to press. The patriarchal seniors did not instantly assume the function, having probably been depressed by bondage till rendered unfit for it. Perhaps for these reasons Moses at first took the whole burden of judicature upon himself, then at the suggestion of Jethro (Ex. xviii. 14–24) instituted judges over numerically graduated sections of the people. These were chosen for their moral fitness, but from Deut. i. 15, 16, we may infer that they were taken from amongst those to whom primogeniture would have assigned it. The judge was reckoned a sacred person, and secured even from verbal injuries. Seeking a decision at law is called "inquiring of God" (Ex. xviii. 15). The term "gods" is actually applied to judges (Ex. xxi. 6, Heb.; compare Ps. lxxxii. 1, 6). But besides the sacred dignity thus given to the only royal function which, under the Theocracy, lay in human hands, it was made popular by being vested in those who led public feeling. The judges were disciplined in smaller matters, and, under Moses' own eye, for greater ones. When, however, the commandment, "judges and officers shalt thou make thee in all thy gates" (Deut. xvi. 18), came to be fulfilled in Canaan, there were the following sources from which those officials might be supplied:—(1.) the ex officio judges, or their successors, as chosen by Moses; (2.) any surplus left of patriarchal seniors when they were taken out (as has been shown from Deut. i. 15, 16) from that class; and (3.) the LEVITES. The Hebrews were sensitive as regards the administration of justice. (BRIDE) The fact that justice reposed on a popular basis of administration largely contributed to keep up that spirit of independence which is the ultimate check on all perversions of the tribunal. The popular aristocracy of heads of tribes, sections of tribes, or families, is found to fall into two main orders of varying nomenclature. The more common name for the higher order is "princes," and for the lower "elders" (Judg. viii. 14; Ex. ii. 14; Job xxix. 7–9; Ezr. x. 8). These orders were the popular element of judicature. On the other hand, the Levitical body was imbued with a keen sense of allegiance to God as the Author of Law, and to the Covenant as His embodiment of it, and soon gained whatever forensic experience and erudition those simple times could yield; hence they brought to the judicial task the legal acumen and sense of general principles which complemented the ruder lay element. To return to the first or popular branch, there is reason to think, from the general concurrence of phraseology amidst much diversity, that in every city these two ranks of "princes" and "elders" had their analogies. The Levites also were apportioned on the whole equally among the tribes; and if they preserved their limits, there were probably few parts of Palestine beyond a day's journey from a Levitical city. One great hold which the priesthood had, in their jurisdiction, upon men's ordinary life was the custody in the sanctuary of the standard weights and measures, to which, in cases of dispute, reference was doubtless made. Above all these, the HIGH-PRIEST, in the ante-regal period, was the resort in difficult cases (Deut. xvii. 12), as the chief jurist of the nation, who would in case of need be perhaps oracularly directed; yet we hear of none acting as judge save Eli. It is also a fact of some weight, negatively, that none of the special deliverers called Judges was of priestly lineage, or even became as much noted as Deborah, a woman. This seems to show that any central action of the high-priest on national unity was null, and of this supremacy, had it existed in force, the judicial prerogative was the main element. The "Judges" were fifteen in number: 1. OTHNIEL; 2. EHUD; 3. SHAMGAR; 4. DEB-

ORAH and BARAK; 5. GIDEON; 6. ABIMELECH; 7. TOLA; 8. JAIR; 9. JEPHTHAH; 10. IBZAN; 11. ELON; 12. ABDON; 13. SAMSON; 14. ELI; 15. SAMUEL. (CHRONOLOGY; JUDGES, BOOK OF.) This function of the priesthood being, it may be presumed, in abeyance during the period of the Judges, seems to have merged in the monarchy. (KING.) The kingdom of Saul suffered too severely from external foes to allow civil matters much prominence. In David's reign it was evidently the rule for the king to hear causes in person. The same class of cases which were reserved for Moses would probably fall to his lot; and the high-priest was of course ready to assist the monarch. This is further presumable from the fact that no officer analogous to a chief justice ever appears under the kings. Perhaps the arrangements, mentioned in 1 Chr. xxiii. 4, xxvi. 29, may have been made to meet the need of suitors. In Solomon's character, whose reign of peace would surely be fertile in civil questions, the "wisdom to judge" was the fitting first quality (1 K. iii. 9; compare Ps. lxxii. 1-4). As a judge Solomon shines "in all his glory" (1 K. iii. 46, &c.). It is likely that royalty in Israel was ultimately unfavorable to the local independence connected with the judicature of the "princes" and "elders" in the territory and cities of each tribe, and the Levites generally superseded the local elders in the administration of justice. But subsequently, when the Levites withdrew from the kingdom of the ten tribes, judicial elders probably again filled the gap. One more change is noticeable in the pre-Babylonian period. The "princes" constantly appear as a powerful political body, increasing in influence and privileges, and having a fixed centre of action at Jerusalem; till, in the reign of Zedekiah, they seem to exercise some of the duties of a privy council; and especially a collective jurisdiction (2 Chr. xxviii. 21; Jer. xvi. 10, 16). Still, although far changed from its broad and simple basis in the earlier period, the administration of justice had little resembling the set and rigid system of the SANHEDRIM of later times. (SYNAGOGUE.) This last change arose from the fact that the patriarchal seniority, degenerate and corrupted as it became before the Captivity, was by that event broken up, and a new basis of judicature had to be sought for. With regard to the forms of procedure, little more is known than may be gathered from the two examples, Ruth iv. 2, of a civil, and 1 K. xxi. 8-14, of a criminal character; to which, as a specimen of royal summary jurisdiction, may be added the well-known "judgment" of Solomon. There is no mention of any distinctive dress or badge as pertaining to the judicial officer. (CHAIN.) The use of the "white asses" (Judg. v. 10) (Ass), by those who "sit in judgment," was perhaps a convenient distinctive mark for them when journeying where they would not usually be personally known. In analogy with Eastern sovereigns God is represented in the Scripture as both "Judge and King," being preëminently "the Judge of all the earth" (Gen. xxi. 25), "the Judge of all" (Heb. xii. 23; compare Deut. xxxii. 36; 1 Sam. ii. 10; Ps. xcvi. 18; Rom. ii. 16, &c.). In the Divine arrangement Jesus Christ the Son of God is to be "the Judge of quick and dead" (Acts x. 42). Judges (Heb. shôphêtim), Book of. I. Title. As the history of the Judges (JUDGE) occupies by far the greater part of the narrative, and is at the same time the history of the people, the title of the whole book is derived from that portion.—II. Arrangement. The book at first sight may be divided into two parts—i.-xvi. and xvii.-xxi.—A. i.-xvi. The subdivisions are—(a) i.-ii. 5, which may be considered as a first introduction, giving a summary of the results of the war carried on against the Canaanites by the several tribes on the W. of Jordan after Joshua's death, and forming a continuation of Josh. xii. (b) ii. 6-iii. 6. This is a second introduction, standing in nearer relation to the following history. (c) iii. 7-xvi. The words, "and the children of Israel did evil in the sight of the Lord," which had been already used in ii. 11, are employed to introduce the history of the thirteen Judges comprised in this book. An account of six of these thirteen is given at greater or less length. The account of the remaining seven is very short, and merely attached to the longer narratives. We may observe in general on this portion of the book, that it is almost entirely a history of the wars of deliverance.—B. xvii.-xxi. This part has no formal connection with the preceding, and is often called an appendix. No mention of the Judges occurs in it. It contains allusions to "the house of God," the ark, and the high-priest. The period to which the narrative relates is simply marked by the expression, "when there was no king in Israel" (xix. 1; compare xviii. 1). It records (a) the conquest of Laish by a portion of the tribe of Dan, and the establishment there of the idolatrous worship of Jehovah already instituted by Micah in Mount Ephraim. (b) The almost total extinction of the tribe of Benjamin. The date is marked by the mention of Phinchas, the grandson of Aaron (xx. 28).—III. Design. There is a unity of plan in i.-xvi., the clew to which is stated in ii. 16-19. There can be little doubt of the design to enforce the view there expressed. But the words of that passage must not be pressed too closely. It is a general review of the collective history of Israel during the time of the Judges, the details of which, in their varying aspects, are given faithfully as the narrative proceeds. The existence of this design may lead us to suspect that we have not a complete history of the times, a fact which is clear from the book itself. We have only accounts of parts of the nation at any one time.—IV. Materials. The author must have found certain parts of his book in a definite shape: e. g. the words of the prophet (ii. 1-5), the song of Deborah (v.), Jotham's parable (ix. 7-20; see also xiv. 14, 18, xv. 7, 16). How far these and the rest of his materials came to him already written is a matter of doubt. Hävernick only recognizes the use of documents in the appendix. Other critics, however, trace them throughout. Bertheau says that the difference of the diction in the principal narratives, coupled with the fact that they are united in one plan, points to the incorporation of parts of previous histories.—V. Relation to other Books.—(A) to Joshua. Josh. xv.-xxi. must be compared with Judg. i. in order to understand fully how far the several tribes failed in expelling the people of Canaan. The book begins with a reference to Joshua's death, and ii. 6-9 resumes the narrative, suspended by i.-ii. 5, with the same words as are used in concluding the history of Joshua (Josh. xxiv. 28-31). In addition to this the following passages appear to be common to the two books: compare Judg. i. 10-15, 20, 21, 27, 29, with Josh. xv. 14-19, 18, 63, xvii. 12, xvi. 10. A reference to the conquest of Laish (Judg. xviii.) occurs in Josh. xix. 47.—(B) to the Books of Samuel and Kings. We find in i. 28, 30, 33, 35, a number of towns upon which, "when Israel was strong," a tribute of bond-service was levied: this is supposed by some to refer to the time of Solomon (1 K. ix. 18-22). The conduct of Saul toward the Kenites; (1 Sam. xv. 6), and that of David (xxx. 29), is explained by Judg. i. 16. A reference to the continuance of the Philistine wars is implied in xlii. 5. The allusion to Abimelech (2 Sam. xi. 21) is explained by ch. ix. Chapters xvii.-xxi. and the Book of Ruth are more independent, but they have a general reference to the subsequent history. The question now arises whether this book forms one link in an historical series, or whether it has a closer connection either with those that precede or follow it. Its form would lead to the conclusion that it was not an independent book originally (so Mr. Orger, original author of this article). The history ceases with Samson, excluding Eli and Samuel; and then two historical pieces are added, xvii.-xxi., and the Book of Ruth, independent of the general plan and of each other.—VI. Date. The only guide to the date of this book which we find in ii. 6-xvi. is the expression "unto this day," the last occurrence of which (xv. 19) implies some distance from the time of Samson. (PENTATEUCH, II. 4, a.) But i. 21, according to the most natural explanation, indicates a date, for this chapter at least, previous to the taking of Jebus by David (2 Sam. v. 6-9). Again, we should at first sight suppose i. 28, 30, 33, 35, to belong to the time of the Judges; but these passages are taken by most modern critics as pointing to the time of Solomon (compare 1 K. ix. 21). i.-xvi. may therefore have been originally, as Ewald thinks, the commencement of a larger work reaching down to above a century after Solomon. Again, the writer of the appendix lived when Shiloh was no longer a religious centre (xviii. 31); he was acquainted with the regal form of government (xvii. 6, xviii. 1). (MICAH 1.) Chapter xviii. 30 is thought by Hengstenberg, Hävernick, &c., to refer to the Philistine oppression (1 Sam. iv. ff.). But Mr. Orger supposes, with Le Clerc, Rosenmüller, &c., that the Assyrian captivity is intended, in which case the writer must have lived after 721 B. C., and the whole book must have taken its present shape after that date. And if we adopt Ewald's view, that Judges to 2 Kings form one book, the final arrangement of the whole must have been after the thirty-seventh year of Jehoiachin's captivity, or B. C. 562 (2 K. xxv. 27). The Jews, followed by Jahn, Paulus, &c., ascribe the composition of the book to Samuel. (BIBLE; CANON; INSPIRATION; OLD TESTAMENT.)—VII. Chronology. The time commonly assigned to the period contained in this book is 299 years. The dates which are given amount to 410 years when reckoned consecutively: and Acts xiii. 20 would show that this was the computation commonly adopted, as the 450 years seem to result from adding 40 years for Eli to the 410 of this book. But a difficulty is created by Judg. xi. 26, and in a still greater degree by 1 K. vi. 1, where the whole period from the Exodus to the building of the Temple is stated as 480 years (440, LXX.). On the whole, it seems safer to give up the attempt to ascertain the chronology exactly. The successive narratives give us the history of only parts of the country, and some of the occurrences may have been contemporary (x. 7). CHRONOLOGY.

cisions, commandments, and providential dispensations of God, the supreme Judge (Ex. xxi. 1; Ps. x. 5, xix. 9, xxxvi. 6, &c.), to the afflictions and calamities proceeding from Him (Ex. vi. 6; Is. xvi. 9, &c.). "The judgment to come" (Acts xiv. 25) refers to the judgment of the "last day" (Jn. xi. 24), or "great day" (Jude 6), or "day of judgment" (Mat. x. 5, xi. 22, 24, &c.), "in the which God will judge the world in righteousness by that man (JESUS CHRIST) whom He hath ordained" (Acts xvii. 31; comp. Jn. v. 22). The proceedings of this day are most fully given in Mat. xxv. 31-46; compare 2 Cor. v. 10, and Rev. xx. 12 ff. DAMNATION; DEATH; ETERNAL; HEAVEN; HELL; LIFE, &c.

Judgment-hall. The Gr. praitōrion = L. prætorium (PRETORIUM) is so translated five times in the A. V. of the N. T.; and in those five passages it denotes two different places. 1. In Jn. xviii. 28, 33, xxxix. 9, it is the residence which Pilate occupied when he visited Jerusalem. The site of Pilate's pretorium in Jerusalem has given rise to much dispute, some supposing it to be the palace of King Herod, others the tower of Antonia. (PRETORIUM.) 2. In Acts xxiii. 35 Herod's "judgment-hall" in Cesarea was doubtless a part of that magnificent range of buildings, the erection of which by King Herod is described in Jos. xv. 9, § 6.—The word "palace," or "Cesar's court," in the A. V. of Phil. i. 13, is a translation of the same word praitōrion = prætorium. It may here have denoted the quarter of that detachment of the Pretorian Guards which was in immediate attendance upon the emperor, and had barracks in Mount Palatine.

Ju'dith (L. fr. Heb. Yehūdikh, fem. of Yehūdi = JUDAH). 1. Daughter of Beeri the Hittite, and wife of Esau (Gen. xxvi. 34). (AHOLIBAMAH.)—2. The heroine of the apocryphal book of Judith (see below), who appears as an ideal type of piety (Jd. viii. 6), beauty (xi. 21), courage and chastity (xvi. 22 ff.). Her supposed descent from Simeon (ix. 2), and the manner in which she refers to his cruel deed (xxxiv. 25 ff.), mark the conception of the character, which evidently belongs to a period of stern and perilous conflict.

Ju'dith (see above), the Book of, like that of Tobit, belongs to the earliest specimens of historical fiction. The narrative of the reign of "Nebuchadnezzar king of Nineveh" (Jd. i. 1), of the campaign of Holofernes, and the deliverance of Bethulia, through the stratagem and courage of the Jewish heroine, contains too many and too serious difficulties, both historical and geographical, to allow of the supposition that it is either literally true, or even carefully moulded on truth (so Mr. Westcott). 2. The value of the book is not, however, lessened by its fictitious character. On the contrary, it becomes even more valuable as exhibiting an ideal type of heroism, which was outwardly embodied in the wars of independence. It cannot be wrong to refer its origin to the Maccabean period, which it reflects not only in its general spirit, but even in smaller traits. But while it seems certain that the book is to be referred to the second century B. C. (175-100 B. C.), the attempts which have been made to fix its date within narrower limits, either to the time of the war of Alexander Jannæus (105-4 B. C., Movers) or of Demetrius II. (129 B. C., Ewald), rest on very inaccurate data. It might seem more natural (as a mere conjecture) to refer it to an earlier time (about 170 B. C., when Antiochus Epiphanes made his first assault upon the Temple. 3. In accordance with the view which has been given of the character and date of the book, it is probable that the several parts may have a distinct symbolic meaning. 4. Two conflicting statements have been preserved as to the original language of the book. Origen speaks of it together with Tobit as "not existing in Hebrew even among the ΑΠΟΚΡΥΦΑ" in the Hebrew collection. Jerome, on the other hand, says that "among the Hebrews the Book of Judith . . . being written in the Chaldee language is reckoned among the histories." There can be little doubt that the book was written in Palestine in the national dialect (Syro-Chaldaic). 5. The text exists at present in two distinct recensions, the Greek (followed by the Syriac) and the Latin. The former evidently is the truer representative of the original, and it seems certain that the Latin was derived, in the main, from the Greek by a series of successive alterations. The Latin text contains many curious errors. At present it is impossible to determine the authentic text. 6. The existence of these various recensions of the book is a proof of its popularity and wide circulation, but the external evidence of its use is very scanty. The first reference to its contents occurs in Clemens Romanus, and it is quoted with marked respect by Origen, Hilary, and Lucifer. Jerome speaks of it as "reckoned among the Sacred Scriptures by the Synod of Nice." It has been wrongly inserted in the catalogue at the close of the Apostolic Canons. CANON.

Ju'el (fr. Gr.). 1. UEL (1 Esd. ix. 84).—2. JOEL 13 (ix. 35).

Ju'le'a [as an English word, usually pronounced jule'ya] (L. fem. of JULIUS), a Christian woman at Rome, probably the wife, or perhaps the sister of Philologus, in connection with whom she is saluted by St. Paul (Rom. xvi. 15).

Ju'le-us [as an English word, usually pronounced jule'yus] (L., a common Roman name; fr. Gr. = soft-haired, downy, Schl.), the centurion of "Augustus's band" (ARMY) to whose charge St. Paul was delivered when he was sent prisoner from Caesarea to Rome (Acts xxvii. 1, 3).

Ju'le-s [as an English word, usually pronounced june'ya] (L., probably a man's name, properly Junias, contracted from Junilius [= little Junius], or Junianus [= of or from Junius]; but regarded by Chrysostom, &c., as a woman's name), a Christian at Rome, mentioned by St. Paul with ANDRONICUS 3 (Rom. xvi. 7). Origen conjectures that he was possibly one of the seventy disciples.

Ju'ni-per (1 K. xix. 4, 5; Ps. cxx. 4; Job xxx. 4). The Heb. rothem, translated in A. V. "juniper," is beyond doubt a sort of broom, Genista monosperma, Genista Retam of Forskål, answering to the Arabic Relhem, which is also found in the desert of Sinai, in the neighborhood of the true juniper (Robinson, ii. 124). It is very abundant in the desert of Sinai, and affords shade and protection, both in heat and storm, to travellers. The roots are much valued by the Arabs for charcoal for the Cairo market. The Rothem is a leguminous plant, and bears a white flower. It is found also in Spain, Portugal, and Palestine. CEDAR.

Ju'pi-ter (L. = a father that helps, or father Zeus?), the supreme or chief god among the ancient Romans. Jupiter in the A. V. is the translation of the Gr. Zeus. Antiochus Epiphanes dedicated the Temple at Jerusalem to the service of Zeus ("Jupter" A. V.) Olympius (2 Mc. vi. 2), and at the same time the rival temple on Gerizim was devoted to Zeus Xenius (Jupiter hospitalis, Vulgate; "Jupiter the Defender of strangers," A. V.). The Olympian Zeus was the national god of the Hellenic race, as well as the supreme ruler of the heathen world, and as such formed the true opposite to JEHOVAH. The application of the second epithet, "the god of hospitality" (A. V. "Defender of strangers"), is more obscure. Jupiter or Zeus is mentioned in the N. T., on the occasion of St. Paul's visit to Lystra (Acts xiv. 12, 13), where the expression "Jupiter, which was before their city," means that his temple was outside the city; also in connection with DIANA of Ephesus (xix. 35).

Ju'shab-be'sed (fr. Heb. = loving-kindness is returned), son of Zerubbabel (1 Chr. iii. 20). HASADIAH.

* Jus-ti-fi-ca-tion (fr. L., literally = a making just or righteous; hence a treating or treatment of one as just), the A. V. translation of—1. Gr. dikaïōma (Rom. v. 16 only), elsewhere translated "righteousness" (ii. 26, v. 18, viii. 4; Rev. xix. 8), "judgment" (Rom. i. 32; Rev. xv. 4), "ordinance" (Lk. i. 6; Heb. ix. 1, 10).—2. Gr. dikaïōsis (Rom. iv. 25, v. 18 only). JUSTIFY.

* Jus-ti-fy (fr. L. = to make just or treat as just, see above), to, the A. V. translation of—1. Heb. tsaddak (Ex. xxiii. 7; Deut. xxv. 1; Job ix. 20; Ps. cxliii. 2, &c.), also translated "to be just" (Job iv. 17, ix. 2, xxxiii. 12), "to be righteous" (Gen. xxxviii. 26; Job ix. 15, &c.), "to do justice to" (2 Sam. xv. 4; Ps. lxxxii. 3), "to cleanse" (Dan. viii. 14), "to turn to righteousness" (xii. 2), "to clear" (Gen. xlv. 16).—2. Gr. dikaioō (Mat. xi. 19, xii. 37, &c.). This Greek verb occurs forty times in the N. T., and is translated "to justify," except in Rom. iii. 26 ("justifier," literally one justifying), vi. 7 ("is freed," literally has been justified), and Rev. xxii. 11 ("let him be righteous," literally let him be made righteous or justified; but critical editions here read let him do righteousness); in LXX. = No. 1. The Scriptures teach that God "justifieth the ungodly" (Rom. iv. 5) "freely by His grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus" (iii. 24), "FAITH"—not that which maketh "void the law, but that which establisheth the law" (31), "which worketh by love" (Gal. v. 6), "by which the heart is purified" (Acts xv. 9), a vital union with the Lord Jesus Christ sustained (Rom. xi. 20; Jn. xv. 5), and "the good fight" fought (1 Tim. vi. 12)—such faith being the condition of this justification by God (Rom. iii. 28), while "works" well-pleasing to God, but not self-righteous, are the outgrowth of this faith and the evidence of this justification (Jas. ii. 17-26). JAMES, GENERAL EPISTLE OF, &c.

Jus'tus (L. just). 1. A surname of JOSEPH CALLED BARSBABAS (Acts i. 23).—2. A Christian at Corinth, with whom St. Paul lodged (xviii. 7).—3. A surname of JESUS, friend of St. Paul (Col. iv. 11).

Jut'tah (fr. Heb. = extended, Ges.), a city in the mountain region of Judah, in the neighborhood of Maon and Carmel (Josh. xv. 55), allotted to the priests (xxi. 16). A village called Yutta was visited by Robinson, close to Ma'in and Kurmul, which doubtless represents the ancient town. Reland, Michaelis, Robinson, &c., suppose that Juttah = "a city of Juda" (Lk. i. 39), in which Zacharias, father of John the Baptist, resided; but this is not confirmed by positive evidence.

K

Kab'ze-el (fr. Heb. = God's gathering, Ges.), one of the "cities" of Judah, apparently the farthest S. (Josh. xv. 21); the native place of BENAIAH the son of Jehoiada (2 Sam. xxiii. 20; 1 Chr. xi. 22). After the Captivity it was reinhabited by the Jews, and appears as JEKABZEEL. Wilton (in Fairbairn) would place Kabzeel at 'Ain el-'Arūs, a fountain in the Wady el-Kuseib, at the base of the chalk cliffs (AKRABBIM?), near the S. end of the Dead Sea. Rowlands (in Fairbairn, under "South Country") supposes Kabzeel = what was afterward the celebrated Jewish fortress of Masada, now Sebbeh, on the W. side of the Dead Sea. See cut under SEA, THE SALT.

* Ka'des [-deez], the Greek form of KADESH (Jd. i. 9).

Ka'desh (Heb. sacred, Ges.), Ka'desh-bar-ne-a (sacred desert of wandering, Sim., Ges.). This place, the scene of Miriam's death, was the farthest point which the Israelites reached in their direct road to Canaan; it was also that whence the spies were sent, and where, on their return, the people broke out into murmuring, upon which their term of wandering began (Num. xiii. 8, 26, xiv. 29-33, xx. 1; Deut. ii. 14). Probably "Kadesh," though applied to signify a "city," had also a wider application to a region, in which Kadesh-meribah certainly, and Kadesh-barnea probably, indicates a precise spot. Thus Kadesh appears as a limit E. of the same tract which was limited W. by SHUR (Gen. xx. 1), the first portion of the wilderness on which the people emerged from the passage of the Red Sea. "Between Kadesh and BERED" is another indication of the site of Kadesh as an eastern limit (xvi. 14), for the point so fixed is "the fountain on the way to Shur" (ver. 7), and the range of limits is narrowed by selecting the western one not so far to the W., while the eastern one, Kadesh, is unchanged. Again, we have Kadesh as the point to which the foray of Chedorlaomer "returned." In Gen. xiv. 7 Kadesh is identified with EN-MISHPAT, the "fountain of judgment," and is connected with TAMAR or HAZAZON-TAMAR. Precisely thus stands Kadesh-barnea in Numbers and Joshua (compare Ez. xlvii. 19, xlviii. 28; Num. xxxiv. 4; Josh. xv. 3). For there is an identity about all the connections of the two, which, if not conclusive, will compel us to abandon all possible inquiries. This holds especially as regards PARAN and Tamar, and in respect of its being the eastern limit of a region, and also of being the first point of importance found by Chedorlaomer on passing round the southern extremity of the Dead Sea. (SEA, THE SALT.) In a strikingly similar manner we have the limits of a route, apparently a well-known one at the time, indicated by three points, Horeb (SINAI), Mount SEIR, Kadesh-barnea, in Deut. i. 2, the distance between the extremes being fixed at "eleven days' journey," or about 165 miles, allowing fifteen miles to an average day's journey. This is one element for determining the site of Kadesh, assuming of course the position of Horeb to be ascertained. The name of the place to which the spies returned is "Kadesh" simply, in Num. xiii. 26, and is there closely connected with the "wilderness of Paran;" yet the "wilderness of ZIN" stands in near conjunction, as the point whence the "search" of the spies commenced (ver. 21). Again, in Num. xxxii. 8, we find that it was from Kadesh-barnea that the mission of the spies commenced, and in the rehearsed narrative of the same event in Deut. i. 19, and ix. 23, the name is also Kadesh-barnea. Thus far there seems no reasonable doubt of the identity of this Kadesh with that of Genesis. Again, in Num. xx., we find the people encamped in Kadesh after reaching the wilderness of Zin. Jerome clearly knows of but one and the same Kadesh—"where Moses smote the rock," where "Miriam's monument," he says, "was still shown, and where Chedorlaomer smote the rulers of Amalek." The apparent ambiguity of the position (1.) in the wilderness of Paran, or in Paran; and (2.) in that of Zin, is no real increase to the difficulty. For whether these tracts were contiguous, and Kadesh on their common border, or ran into each other, and embraced a common territory, to which the name "Kadesh," in an extended sense, might be given, is comparatively unimportant. One site fixed on for Kadesh is the 'Ain es Sheydeh, about sixty miles S. of Beer-sheba, on the S. side of the "mountain of the Amorites," and therefore too near Horeb to fulfil the conditions of Deut. i. 2. Messrs. Rowlands and Williams argue strongly in favor of a site for Kadesh on the W. side of this whole mountain region, at 'Ain Kades or Kadeis ('Ain el-Kudeird, Rbn.), about forty-five miles S. S. W. from Beer-sheba. Prof. Tuck, Wilton, Winer, &c., accept this identification; Robinson (ii. 194 n., and in B. S. vi. 379) and Porter (in Kitto) dispute both identification and orthography. Mr. Hayman also considers this spot too far W. for the fixed point intended in Deut. i. 2 as Kadesh-barnea. The indications of locality strongly point to a site near where the mountain of the Amorites descends to the low region of the ARABAH and Dead Sea. The nearest approximation which can be given to a site for the city of Kadesh, may be probably attained by drawing a circle, from the pass Es-Sufah (Zephath?), at the radius of about a day's journey; its southwestern quadrant will intersect the "wilderness of Paran," or El-Tih, which is there overhung by the superimposed plateau of the mountain of the Amorites; while its southeastern one will cross what has been designated as the "wilderness of Zin." This seems to satisfy all the conditions of the passages of Genesis, Numbers, and Deuteronomy, which refer to it. The nearest site in harmony with this view, which has yet been suggested (Rbn. ii. 175), is undoubtedly the 'Ain el-'Weibeh, an important watering-place, on the western border of the 'Arabah, about fifty miles S. E. from Beer-sheba. To this, however, is opposed the remark of Stanley (96), that it does not afford among its "stony shelves of three or four feet high" any proper "cliff," such as is the word specially describing that "rock" (A. V.) from which the water gushed. Stanley (95) would find Kadesh in Petra (SELA); but this was in Edom, not on its uttermost border (compare Num. xx. 16). Raumer would place Kadesh at 'Ain Hasb, a pool of living water in the 'Arabah, about twenty miles S. of the Dead Sea. A writer in the Journal of Sacred Literature, April, 1860, would place Kadesh at Elusa (el-Kulalah; CHESIL?). WILDERNESS OF THE WANDERING.

Kad'mi-el (Heb. one before God, i. e. minister of God, Ges.), one of the Levites who with his family returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel; apparently a representative of the descendants of Hodaviah, elsewhere called Hodevah or Judah (Ezr. ii. 40; Neh. vii. 43). Kadmiel and his house are prominent in history on several occasions (Ezr. iii. 9; Neh. ix. 4, 5, x. 9, xii. 8, 24).

Kad'mon-ites (fr. Heb. sing. = the Eastern, Ges.), the, a people named in Gen. xv. 19 only; one of the nations who at that time occupied the land promised to the descendants of Abram. Bochart derives the Kadmonites from Cadmus, and further identifies them with the Hivites. More probably (so Mr. Grove, Lightfoot, Ritter, &c.) Kadmonites = the "children of the East." (ARABIA.) Thömsen (i. 242) says the Kadmonites are supposed to have resided about the head-waters of the Jordan under Hermon, and the name is still preserved among the Nusairiyeh N. of Tripoli, who have a tradition that their ancestors were expelled from Palestine by Joshua.

* Ka'la (fr. Heb. = CAIN) = the KENITE (Num. xxiv. 22, margin).

Ka'lal, or Ka'la-l (Heb. the swift messenger of Jehovah? Ges.), a priest in the days of Joiakim the son of Jeshua. He represented the family of Sallai (Neh. xii. 20).

Ka'nah (Heb. place of reeds, Ges.), one of the places on the boundary of Asher; apparently next to "great Zidon" (Josh. xix. 28 only); but identified by Robinson, Wilson, Porter, Van de Velde, &c., with the modern village Kāna, six miles E. S. E. from Tyre, and nearly twenty miles S. from Zidon. An 'Ain Kāna is marked in the map of Van de Velde, about eight miles S. E. of Saida (Zidon). This at least (so Mr. Grove) answers more nearly the requirements of the text.

Kanah (see above), the River, a stream falling into the Mediterranean, and forming the division between the territories of Ephraim on the S. and Manasseh on the N. (Josh. xvi. 8, xvii. 9). Robinson (iii. 136) identifies it "without doubt" with a wady, which, taking its rise in the central mountains of Ephraim, near 'Akrabeh, some seven miles S. E. of Nāblus, enters the sea just above Jaffa as Nahr el-'Aujeh; bearing during part of its course the name of Wady Kānah. The conjecture of Schwarz Mr. Grove regards as more plausible—that it is a wady which commences W. of and close to Nāblus, at 'Ain el-Khasab, and falls into the sea, about twelve miles N. of the former, as Nahr Falaik, and which bears also the name of Wady el-Khasab (the reedy stream). The Nahr el-Akhdar, a small stream which falls into the Mediterranean twelve or fourteen miles further N. and about two miles S. of ancient Cesarea, is also suggested as = Kanah (Kitto, &c.).

Ka-re'ah (Heb. bald-head, Ges.), father of Johanan and Jonathan, two of the captains who supported Gedaliah's authority and avenged his murder (Jer. xl. 8, 13, 15, 16, xli. 11, 13, 14, 16, xlii. 1, 8, xliii. 2, 4, 5); also called CAREAH.

Kar'ka-a (fr. Heb. = foundation, bottom, Ges.), one of the landmarks on the S. boundary of Judah (Josh. xv. 3). Its site is unknown. Wilton (in Fairbairn) suggests Wady el-Kureiyeh, about seventy-five miles S. S. W. of Beer-sheba.

Kar'ker (Heb. foundation, Ges.), the place in which Zebah and Zalmunna were again routed by Gideon (Judg. viii. 10). It must have been on the E. of the Jordan, beyond the district of the towns, in the open wastes inhabited by the nomad tribes. Mr. Grove and Porter (in Kitto) think it cannot have been so far to the S. as it is placed by Eusebius and Jerome, viz. one day's journey (about fifteen miles) N. of Petra. Wilton (in Fairbairn) would identify Karkor with el-Kerak between Busrak (ancient Bozrah?) and *Tell 'Ashtera*h (Ashtaroth), or with the whole of the rich plain en-Nukrah in the Haurān.

Kar'tah (Heb. city, Ges.), a town of Zebulun, allotted to the Merarite Levites (Josh. xxi. 34). Van de Velde (i. 289) supposes it at Tell Kur-thani on the bank of the Kishon, at the foot of Carmel.

Kar'tan (Heb. double city, Ges.), a city of Naphtali, allotted to the Gershonite Levites (Josh. xxi. 32); = KIRJATHAIM in 1 Chr. vi. 76.

Kat'tath (Heb. small, Ges.), one of the cities of Zebulun (Josh. xix. 15). Schwarz seeks to identify it with Kāna el-Jelil—most probably the CANA OF GALILEE of the N. T. Gesenius and Rosenmüller would make Kattah = KITRON.

Ke'dar (Heb. dark-skinned, Ges.), the second in order of the sons of ISHMAEL (Gen. xxv. 13; 1 Chr. i. 29), and the name of a great tribe of the Arabs, settled on the N. W. of the peninsula and the confines of Palestine. This tribe seems to have been, with Tema, the chief representative of Ishmael's sons in the western portion of the land they originally peopled. The "glory of Kedar" is recorded by Isaiah (xxi. 13–17) in the burden upon ARABIA; and its importance may also be inferred from the "princes of Kedar," mentioned by Ezekiel (xxvii. 21), as well as the pastoral character of the tribe. In Cant. i. 5 the "black tents of Kedar" are forcibly mentioned. In Is. lx. 7 we find "the flocks of Kedar" (compare Jer. xlix. 28, 29). They appear also to have been, like the wandering tribes of the present day, "archers" and "mighty men" (Is. xxi. 17; compare Ps. cxx. 5). That they also settled in villages or towns, we find from Isaiah (xlii. 11). The tribe seems to have been one of the most conspicuous of all the Ishmaelite tribes, and hence the Rabbins call the Arabians universally by this name. As a link between Bible history and Mohammedan traditions, the tribe of Kedar is probably found in the people called the Cedrei by Pliny, on the confines of Arabia Petræa to the S.

Ked'e-mah (Heb. eastward), the youngest of the sons of ISHMAEL (Gen. xxv. 15; 1 Chr. i. 31).

Ked'e-moth (Heb. antiquities, Ges.), a city in the district E. of the Dead Sea, allotted to Reuben (Josh. xiii. 18); given to the Merarite Levites (xxi. 37; 1 Chr. vi. 79). It possibly conferred its name on the "wilderness," or uncultivated pasture-land, "of Kedemoth" (Num. xxi. 23; Deut. ii. 26, &c.).

Ke'desh (Heb. sanctuary, Ges.). 1. A city in the extreme S. of Judah (Josh. xv. 23); = KADESH, KADESH-BARNEA?—2. A city of Issachar, allotted to the Gershonite Levites (1 Chr. vi. 72); = KISHON (Josh. xxi. 28); supposed by Mr. Grove to be the Kedesh mentioned among the cities whose kings were slain by Joshua (Josh. xii. 22), in company with Megiddo and Jokneam of Carmel.—3. "Kedesh," also "Kedesh in Galilee," and once (Judg. iv. 6) "Kedesh-naphtali"; one of the fortified cities of Naphtali, named between Hazor and Edrei (Josh. xix. 37); appointed as a city of refuge, and allotted with its "suburbs" to the Gershonite Levites (xx. 7, xxi. 32; 1 Chr. vi. 76). It was the residence of Barak (Judg. iv. 6), and there he and Deborah assembled the tribes of Zebulun and Naphtali before the conflict (9, 10), being probably, as its name implies, a holy place of great antiquity. It was taken by Tiglath-pileser in the reign of Pekah (2 K. xv. 29). Its next appearance is as the scene of a battle between Jonathan Maccabeus and the forces of Demetrius (1 Mc. xi. 68, 73, A. V. CADSES).

After this time it is spoken of by Josephus as in the possession of the Tyrians—"a strong inland village," well fortified. Robinson has with great probability (so Mr. Grove, Thomson, Wilson, Van de Velde, Porter, &c.) identified the spot at Kades or Kedes, a village on a rather high ridge, ten English miles N. of Safed, four N. W. of the upper part of the Sea of Merom, and twelve or thirteen S. of Bānids. Its site is a splendid one, well watered and surrounded by fertile plains, but extremely unhealthy. There are numerous sarcophagi and other ancient remains.

* Ke'dron. KIDRON.

Ke-he'l'a-thah (Heb. convocation, Ges.), a desert encampment of the Israelites (Num. xxxiii. 22). WILDERNESS OF THE WANDERING.

Ke'l'ah [kee-] (Heb., probably = fortress, castle, Ges.), a city of the lowland district of Judah (Josh. xv. 44). Its main interest consists in its connection with David. He rescued it from an attack of the Philistines, who had fallen upon the town at the beginning of the harvest. It was then a fortified place, with walls, gates, and bars (1 Sam. xxiii. 7). During this time the massacre of Nob was perpetrated, and Keilah became the repository of the sacred Ephod, which Abiathar the priest, the sole survivor, had carried off with him (6). The inhabitants soon plotted David's betrayal to Saul, then on his road to besiege the place. Of this intention David was warned by Divine intimation. He therefore left (7-13). The rulers of the district (A. V. "PART") assisted Nehemiah in the repair of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 17, 18). Mr. Grove places Keilah at Kila, a site with ruins, on the lower road from Beit Jibrin to Hebron, about eight miles from Beit Jibrin (Eleutheropolis). Wilton (in Fairbairn) identifies Keilah with el-Khuweilifeh, the ruins of a stronghold on two hills about fifteen miles S. W. from Hebron, and as far S. of Beit Jibrin.

Ke'l'ah (see above), the Gar'mite (GARMITE), apparently a descendant of the great Caleb (1 Chr. iv. 19). There is no apparent connection with the town KEILAH.

Ke-la'ah [-la'yah] (Heb. assembly of Jehovah, Sim.) = KELTA (Ezr. x. 23).

Ke'l'ita (Heb. dwarf, Ges.; assembly, congregation, Sim.), one of the Levites who returned with Ezra, and had married a foreign wife (Ezr. x. 23). He assisted in expounding the law (Neh. viii. 7), and signed the covenant with Nehemiah (x. 10); = KE-LAIAH.

Ke'mu-el (Heb. assembly of God? Ges.). 1. Son of Nahor by Milcah, and father of Aram (Gen. xxii. 21).—2. Son of Shiphthan, and prince of Ephraim; one of the twelve men appointed by Moses to divide the land of Canaan (Num. xxxiv. 24).—3. A Levite, father of Hashabiah, prince of the tribe in David's reign (1 Chr. xxvii. 17).

Ke'nan (fr. Heb.) = CAINAN the son of Enos (1 Chr. i. 2; Gen. v. 9, margin).

Ke'nath (Heb. possession, Ges.), one of the cities on the E. of Jordan, with its "daughter-towns" (A. V. "villages") taken possession of by NOBAH, who then called it by his own name (Num. xxxii. 42; Judg. viii. 11; 1 Chr. ii. 23). Pliny makes it one of the cities of the Decapolis. Its Arab inhabitants defeated the troops of Herod the Great. It had a bishop in the 5th century, A. C. Its site has been recovered with tolerable certainty at Ke-nandh, a ruined town at the southern extremity of the Lejah, about twenty miles N. of Busrak. (BOZRAN

2.) Its magnificent ruins of temples, palaces, theatres, churches, massive private houses, &c., cover a space one mile long by half a mile wide. JAIR.

Ke'naz (Heb. a hunt, Ges.). 1. Son of Eliphaz, the son of Esau; one of the dukes of Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 15, 42; 1 Chr. i. 36, 53).—2. Father or ancestor of OTHNIEL (Josh. xv. 17; Judg. i. 13, iii. 9, 11; 1 Chr. iv. 18). Ewald, Stanley, Lord A. C. Hervey, &c., make this Kenaz = No. 1. (KENEZITE.)—3. A grandson of Caleb, according to 1 Chr. iv. 15. Another name has possibly fallen out before Kenaz. UKNAZ.

Ke'nez-ite (fr. Heb. Kenizzi) = descendant of KENAZ 2, Ges. (Num. xxxii. 12; Josh. xiv. 6, 14). CALEB 2; KENIZZITES; OTHNIEL.

Ke'nite (sing., fr. Heb., probably = smith, Ges.), the, and Ke'nites (pl.), the, a tribe or nation whose history is strangely interwoven with that of the chosen people. The first mention of them is in company with the Kenizzites and Kadmonites (Gen. xv. 19). Their origin is hidden from us. But we may fairly infer that they were a branch of the larger nation of MIDIAN—from the fact that Jethro, who in Exodus (see ii. 15, 16, iv. 19, &c.) is represented as dwelling in the land of Midian, and as priest or prince of that nation, is in Judges (i. 16, iv. 11) as distinctly said to have been a Kenite. The important services rendered by the sheikh of the Kenites to Moses, during a time of great pressure and difficulty, were rewarded by the latter with a promise of firm friendship between the two peoples. The connection then commenced lasted as firmly as a connection could last between a settled people like Israel and one whose tendencies were so ineradicably nomadic as the Kenites. They seem to have accompanied the Hebrews during their wanderings (Num. xxiv. 21, 22; Judg. i. 16; compare 2 Chr. xxviii. 15). But the wanderings of Israel over, they forsook the neighborhood of the towns, and betook themselves to freer air—to "the wilderness of Judah, which is to the S. of Arad" (Judg. i. 16; 1 Sam. xv. 6, xxvii. 10, see xxx. 29). But one of the sheikhs of the tribe, HEBER by name, had wandered N. instead of S. (Judg. iv. 11). (JAEL.) The most remarkable development of this people is to be found in the sect or family of the RECHABITES. HERATH; JEHONADAB.

* Ken'iz-zites (fr. Heb. sing. Kenizzi = hunter, Ges.; compare KENEZITE), a Canaanitish tribe, of which (so Gesenius) nothing further is known (Gen. xv. 19).

Ke'ren-hap'puch [-puk] (Heb. horn of antimony; the paint-horn, Ges.), the youngest of the daughters of Job, born to him during the period of his reviving prosperity (Job xlii. 14).

* Ke'richies, the A. V. translation of Hebrew plural mispe'dhōth or mispe'dhōth (Ex. xiii. 18, 21). Kimchi, Schroeder, Hävernick, Dr. W. L. Alexander (in Kitto), &c., suppose the Hebrew = long loose robes in which females might wrap the whole person from head to foot. Rosenmüller, Gesenius, &c., translate cushions, quilts, mattresses. DRESS.

Ke'ri-eth (Heb. kēriyōth = cities, Ges.). 1. A name which occurs among the towns in the southern district of Judah (Josh. xv. 25). According to the A. V. ("Kerioth, and Hezron") it denotes a distinct place from the name which follows it; but this separation is not in accordance with the nomenclature of the Hebrew text, and is now generally abandoned, and the name taken as "Kerioth-Hezron, which is Hazor." Robinson and Van de Velde propose to identify it with Kurye'ain (the two cities), a ruined site about ten miles S. from Hebron, and three from Ma'in (Maon). Wilton (in Fairbairn) reads "Kerioth-Hezron which is Hazor-Amam," and makes the whole but one city at the modern Kurye'ain; Rowlands (in Fairbairn under "S. Country") places the whole at Kasr es-Serr, an ancient site three or four miles S. S. E. of Tell 'Arad (Arad). (JUDAS ISCARIOT.)—2. A city of Moab (Jer. xlviii. 24). By Porter it is unhesitatingly identified with Kureiyeh, a ruined town about three miles in circuit, and six miles E. of Busrāh (BOZRAH 2; SALCAH) in the southern part of the Haurān. Mr. Grove would identify Kerioth with Kureiyat, at the W. foot of Jebel 'Altāris, and but a short distance from Dibon, Beth-meon, or Heshbon. Wilton (in Fairbairn), after Mr. C. Graham, identifies Kerioth with Kiriath, one of a series of ancient cities with gigantic edifices, situated N. of Amman (RABBAH 1) and S. W. of Busrāh. Kerioth, in verse 41, would appear = the cities of Moab. KIRIOTH; TEKOA.

Ke'ros (Chal. a weaver's comb, Ges.), one of the Nethinim, whose descendants returned with Zerubabel (Ezr. ii. 44; Neh. vii. 47).

Ke'tile (Heb. dad), a vessel for culinary or sacrificial purposes (1 Sam. ii. 14). The Hebrew word is also rendered "BASKET" in Jer. xxiv. 2, "CALDRON" in 2 Chr. xxxv. 13, and "POT" in Job. xli. 20.

Ke-turah (Heb. incense, Ges.), the wife whom ABRAHAM "added and took" (A. V. "again took") besides, or after the death of, Sarah (Gen. xxv. 1; 1 Chr. i. 32). Gesenius and others adopt the theory that Abraham took Keturah after Sarah's death; but probability seems against it (compare Gen. xvii. 17, xviii. 11; Rom. iv. 19; and Heb. xi. 12), and we incline to the belief (so Mr. E. S. Poole) that Gen. xxv., at least as far as verse 10, is placed out of its chronological sequence, in order not to break the main narrative; and that Abraham took Keturah during Sarah's lifetime. That she was, strictly speaking, his wife is also very uncertain. In 1 Chr. i. 32, she is called a "concubine" (compare Gen. xxv. 5, 6). (MARRIAGE.) The sons of Keturah were "ZIMRAN, and JOKSHAN, and MEDAN, and MIDYAN, and ISHBAK, and SHUAH" (ver. 2). Keturah herself is by Arab writers mentioned very rarely and vaguely, and evidently only in quoting from a rabbinical writer. M. Caussin de Perceval (Essai, i. 179) has endeavored to identify her with the name of a tribe of the Amalekites called Katoorā, but his arguments are not of any weight.

Key (Heb. maphtēah, or maphtēach; Gr. kleis). The key of a native Oriental lock is a piece of wood, from seven inches to two feet in length, fitted with wires or short nails, which, being inserted laterally into the hollow bolt which serves as a lock, raises other pins within the staple so as to allow the bolt to be drawn back. But it is not difficult to open a lock of this kind even without a key, viz. with the finger dipped in paste or other adhesive substance. The passage Cant. v. 4, 5, is thus probably explained. The key is a symbol of authority (Is. xxii. 22, &c.).

Ke-zā'a (fr. Heb. = cassia, Ges.), the second of the daughters of Job, born to him after his recovery (Job xlii. 14).

Ke'ziz (Heb. cut off, Sim., Ges.), the Valley of, (Heb. 'emek), one of the "cities" of Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 21) and the eastern border of the tribe; probably in the Jordan valley near Jericho.

Kib'roth-hai-ta'a-vah (the graves of longing, Ges.), a station in the wilderness where the Israelites abode a whole month, during which they went on eating quails, and perhaps suffering from the plague which followed (Num. xi. 34; margin "the graves of lust;" compare xxxiii. 17). From there being no change of spot mentioned between it and Taberah in xi. 3, it is probably, like the latter, about three days' journey from Sinai (x. 33), and near the sea (xi. 22, 31). If Hudherā be HAZEROTH, then "the graves of lust" may be perhaps within a day's journey thence in the direction of Sinai. WILDERNESS OF THE WANDERING.

Kib'za-lm (fr. Heb. = two heaps), a city of Mount Ephraim, given to the Kohathite Levites (Josh. xxi. 22). Wilton (in Fairbairn) would place Kibzaim in a marshy tract called Khassab, on the coast half-way between Jaffa and Cesarea. In 1 Chr. vi. 68, JOKMEAM is substituted for Kibzaim.

Kid = a young GOAT. MILK.

Kid'ron (Heb. the turbid, Ges.), a torrent or valley (BROOK 4, 5) close to JERUSALEM; in N. T. CEDRON. It lay between the city and the Mount of Olives (OLIVES, MOUNT OF), and was crossed by David in his flight (2 Sam. xv. 23, compare 30), and by our Lord on His way to Gethsemane (Jn. xviii. 1; compare Mk. xiv. 26; Lk. xxii. 39). Its connection with these two occurrences is alone sufficient to leave no doubt that the Kidron valley is the deep ravine on the E. of Jerusalem, now commonly known as the "Valley of Jehoshaphat." (JEHOSHAPHAT, VALLEY OF.) But it would seem as if the name were formerly applied also to the ravines surrounding other portions of Jerusalem—the S. or the W.; since Solomon's prohibition to Shimei to "pass over the torrent Kidron" (1 K. ii. 37) is said to have been broken by the latter when he went in the direction of Gath to seek his fugitive servants (41, 42). But there is no other evidence of the name Kidron having been applied to the southern or western ravines of the city. The distinguishing peculiarity of the Kidron valley—that in respect to which it is most frequently mentioned in the O. T.—is the impurity which appears to have been ascribed to it. Here Asa demolished and burnt the obscene idol of his mother (xv. 13; 2 Chr. xv. 16). It became the regular receptacle for the impurities and abominations of the idol-worship, when removed from the Temple and destroyed by the adherents of Jehovah (2 Chr. xxix. 16, xxx. 14; 2 K. xxiii. 4, 6, 12). In the time of Josiah it was the common cemetery of the city (2 K. xxiii. 6; compare Jer. xxvi. 93, "graves of the common people"). How long the valley continued to be used for a burying-place it is very hard to ascertain. To the date of the monuments at the foot of Olivet we have at present no clew; but even if they are of pre-Christian times there is no proof that they are tombs. At present it is the favorite resting-place of Moslems and Jews, the former on the W., the latter on the E. of the valley. The following description of the Kidron valley in its modern state is abridged from Robinson (i. 269 ff.):—"From the head of the valley (a half hour from the N. gate of the city, and a few steps from the Tombs of the Judges), the dome of the Holy Sepulchre bears S. by E.

The tract around this spot is very rocky. The region is full of excavated tombs; and these continue with more or less frequency on both sides of the valley, all the way down to Jerusalem. The valley runs for fifteen minutes directly toward the city; it is here shallow and broad, and in some parts tilled, though very stony. It now turns nearly E. almost at a right angle, and passes to the northward of the Tombs of the Kings. Here it is about 200 rods distant from the city; and the tract between is tolerably level ground, planted with olive-trees. The Nabulus road crosses it in this part. The valley is still shallow, and runs in the same direction for about ten minutes. It then bends again to the S., and, following this general course, passes between the city and the Mount of Olives. Before reaching the city, and also opposite its northern part, the valley spreads out into a basin of some breadth, which is tilled, and contains plantations of olives and other fruit-trees. Its sides are still full of excavated tombs. As the valley descends, the steep side upon the right becomes more and more elevated above it; until, at the gate of St. Stephen, the height of this brow is about 100 feet. Here a path winds down from the gate on a course S. E. by E., and crosses the water-bed of the valley by a bridge; beyond which are the church with the Tomb of the Virgin, GETHESEMANE, and other plantations of olive-trees. The breadth of the proper bottom of the valley at this spot is 435 feet. Further N. it is somewhat broader. Below the bridge the valley contracts gradually, and sinks more rapidly. The first continuous traces of a water-course or torrent-bed commence at the bridge, though they likewise occur at intervals higher up. At the distance of 1,000 feet from the bridge on a course S. 10° W. the bottom of the valley has become merely a deep gully, the narrow bed of a torrent, from which the hills rise directly on each side. Here another bridge is thrown across it on an arch; and just by on the left are the alleged tombs of Jehoshaphat, Absalom, &c., also the Jewish cemetery. The valley now continues of the same character, and follows the same course (S. 10° W.) for 550 feet further; where it makes a sharp turn for a moment toward the right. This portion is the narrowest of all, a mere ravine between high mountains. The S. E. corner of the area of the mosque overhangs this part. Below the short turn above mentioned, a line of 1,025 feet on a course S. W. brings us to the Fountain of the Virgin, lying deep under the western hill. The valley has now opened a little; but its bottom is still occupied only by the bed of the torrent. From here a course S. 20° W. carried us along the village of SILLOAM (Kefr Selwan) on the eastern side, and at 1,170 feet we were opposite the mouth of the Tyropœon and the pool of Siloam, which lies 255 feet within it. Further down, the valley opens more, and is tilled. A line of 685 feet on the same course (S. 20° W.) brought us to a rocky point of the eastern hill, here called the Mount of Offence, over against the entrance of the Valley of HINXOM. Thence to the well of Job or Nehemiah is 275 feet due south. (EN-ROGEL.) Below the well of Nehemiah the Valley of Jehoshaphat continues to run S. S. W. between the Mount of Offence and the Hill of Evil Counsel, so called. At about 1,500 feet, or 500 yards below the well, the valley bends off S. 75° E. for half a mile or more, and then turns again more to the S., and pursues its way to the Dead Sea. The width of the main valley below the well, as far as to the turn, varies from 50 to 100 yards; it is full of olive and fig trees, and is in most parts ploughed and sown with grain. Further down it takes the name among the Arabs of W. er-Rûhûb

(Monks' Valley), from the convent of St. Saba situated on it; and still nearer to the Dead Sea it is also called W. en-Nâr (Fire Valley). The channel of the Valley of Jehoshaphat, the Brook Kidron of the Scriptures, is nothing more than the dry bed of a wintry torrent, bearing marks of being occasionally swept over by a large volume of water. No stream flows here except during the heavy rains of winter."—One point is unnoticed in Dr. Robinson's description, sufficiently curious and well-attested to merit further careful investigation—the possibility that the Kidron flows below the present surface of the ground. Dr. Barclay mentions "a fountain that bursts forth during the winter in a valley entering the Kidron from the N., and flows several hundred yards before it sinks;" and again he testifies that at a point in the valley about two miles below the city the murmurings of a stream deep below the ground may be distinctly heard, which stream, on excavation, he actually discovered. His inference is that between the two points the brook is flowing in a subterraneous channel, as is "not at all unfrequent in Palestine."

* Kila. KINDRED.

Kinah (Heb. a song of mourning, lamentation, Ges.), a city of Judah, on the extreme S. boundary, next to Edom (Josh. xv. 22). Instead of "Jagur and Kinah," Wilton would read "Hazar-Kinah" (Kenite settlement), and place it at el-Hudhairah, a ruined site near Tell 'Arâd (ARAD = EDER?). Rowlands (in Fbn. under "S. Country") supposes Kinah was at Kurnub. TAMAR.

Kin'dred. I. Of the special names denoting relation by consanguinity, the principal will be found explained under their proper heads, FATHER, BROTHER, &c. It will be there seen that the words which denote near relation in the direct line are used also for the other superior or inferior degrees in that line, as grandfather, grandson, &c.—II. The words which express collateral consanguinity are—1. uncle; 2. aunt; 3. nephew; 4. niece (not in A. V.); 5. cousin.—III. The terms of affinity are—1. (a) father-in-law, (b) mother-in-law; 2. (a) son-in-law, (b) daughter-in-law; 3. (a) brother-in-law, (b) sister-in-law. The domestic and economical questions arising out of kindred may be classed under MARRIAGE, INHERITANCE, and BLOOD-REVENGE.

Kine, the old plural of COW. BULL; BUTTER; HEIFER; MILK; OX.

King (Heb. and Chal. melech; Gr. basileus) in the Scriptures denotes not only the chief ruler of a nation (Deut. xvii. 14, 15, &c.), or empire (Ezr. iv. 3, 5, 7, &c.), but also the chief of a small city or district (Josh. xii. 7-24; Judg. i. 7, &c.). The title was also given to the dependent or tributary chief who exercised sovereignty over his own nation, &c. (1 K. iv. 24, xx. 1; Ezr. vii. 12; Mat. ii. 1, &c.). It is applied to God as the sovereign of the universe (Ps. v. 2; 1 Tim. i. 17, &c.), and the special ruler of Israel (1 Sam. xii. 12), and to the MESSIAH or Lord Jesus Christ (Ps. ii. 6; Zech. ix. 9; Mat. xxi. 5, &c.). Moses is styled "king in Jeshurun" (Deut. xxxiii. 5), but for several centuries there was no king of Israel, though Abimelech was three years king of Shechem. JEHOVAH Himself exercised kingly authority, and subordinate to Him was the JUDGE. But in process of time the Israelites desired an earthly king, and SAUL was invested with the title, which continued to be the name of the supreme ruler of the Hebrews during a period of about 500 years to the destruction of Jerusalem, B. C. 586. (ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF; JUDAH, KINGDOM OF.) The immediate occasion of a substitution of a regal form of government for that of the Judges seems to have been the siege of Jabesh-gilead by Nahash, king of the Ammonites (1 Sam. xi. 1, xii. 12), and the refusal to allow the inhabitants of that city to capitulate, except on humiliating and cruel conditions (xi. 2, 4-6). The conviction seems to have forced itself on the Israelites that they could not resist their formidable neighbor unless they placed themselves under the sway of a king, like surrounding nations. Concurrently with this conviction, disgust had been excited by the corrupt administration of justice under the sons of Samuel, and a radical change was desired by them in this respect also (viii. 3-5). Accordingly the original idea of a Hebrew king was twofold: first, that he should lead the people to battle in time of war; and secondly, that he should execute judgment and justice to them in war and in peace (viii. 20). In both respects the desired end was attained. To form a correct idea of a Hebrew king, we must abstract ourselves from the notions of modern Europe, and realize the position of Oriental sovereigns. The following passage of Sir John Malcolm respecting the Shahs of Persia may, with some slight modifications, be regarded as fairly applicable to the Hebrew monarchy under David and Solomon:—"The monarch of Persia has been pronounced to be one of the most absolute in the world. His word has ever been deemed a law: and he has probably never had any further restraint upon the free exercise of his vast authority than has arisen from his regard for religion, his respect for established usages, his desire of reputation, and his fear of exciting an opposition that might be dangerous to his power, or to his life" (Malcolm's Persia, vol. ii. 303). Besides being commander-in-chief of the army, supreme judge, and absolute master, as it were, of the lives of his subjects, the king exercised the power of imposing taxes on them, and of exacting from them personal service and labor. And the degree to which the exaction of personal labor might be carried on a special occasion is illustrated by King Solomon's requirements for building the Temple. In addition to these earthly powers, the king of Israel had a more awful claim to respect and obedience. He was the vicegerent of Jehovah (1 Sam. x. 1, xvi. 13), and as it were His son, if just and holy (2 Sam. vii. 14; Ps. lxxxix. 26, 27, ii. 6, 7).

He had been set apart as a consecrated ruler. Upon his head had been poured the holy anointing oil, composed of olive-oil, myrrh, cinnamon, sweet calamus, and cassia, which had hitherto been reserved exclusively for the priests of Jehovah, especially the high-priest, or had been solely used to anoint the Tabernacle of the Congregation, the Ark of the Testimony, and the vessels of the Tabernacle (Ex. xxx, 23-33, xl. 9; Lev. xxi. 10; 1 K. i. 39). (ANOINTING.) He had become, in fact, emphatically "the Lord's Anointed." A ruler in whom so much authority, human and divine, was embodied, was naturally distinguished by outward honors and luxuries. He had a court of Oriental magnificence. When the power of the kingdom was at its height, he sat on a throne of ivory, covered with pure gold, at the feet of which were two figures of lions. The king was dressed in royal robes (xxii. 10; 2 Chr. xviii. 9); his insignia were, a crown or diadem of pure gold, or perhaps radiant with precious gems (2 Sam. i. 10, xii. 30; 2 K. xi. 12; Ps. xxi. 3), and a royal sceptre. Those who approached him did him obeisance, bowing down and touching the ground with their foreheads (1 Sam. xxiv. 8; 2 Sam. xix. 24); and this was done even by a king's wife, the mother of Solomon (1 K. i. 16). (ADONATION.) His officers and subjects called themselves his servants or slaves, though they do not seem habitually to have given way to such extravagant salutations in the Chaldean and Persian courts (1 Sam. xvii. 32, 34, 36, xx. 8; 2 Sam. vi. 20; Dan. ii. 4). As in the East to this day, a kiss was a sign of respect and homage (1 Sam. x. 1, perhaps Ps. ii. 12). He lived in a splendid palace, with porches and columns (1 K. vii. 2-7). All his drinking-vessels were of gold (x. 21). He had a large harem, which in the time of Solomon must have been the source of enormous expense. As is invariably the case in the great Eastern monarchies at present, his harem was guarded by eunuchs; translated "officers" in the A. V. for the most part (1 Sam. viii. 15; 2 K. xxiv. 12, 15; 1 K. xxii. 9; 2 K. viii. 6, ix. 32, xx. 18, xxxiii. 11; Jer. xxxviii. 7). (EUNUCH.) The law of succession to the throne is somewhat obscure, but it seems most probable (so Mr. Twissleton) that the king during his lifetime named his successor. This was the case with David (1 K. i. 30, ii. 22; but compare 1 Chr. xxii. 9, 10, xxviii. 5); and with Rehoboam (2 Chr. xi. 21, 22). At the same time, if no partiality for a favorite wife or son intervened, there would always be a natural bias of affection in favor of the eldest son. The following is a list of some of the officers of the king:—1. The Recorder or Chronicler, who was perhaps analogous to the Historiographer whom Sir John Malcolm mentions as an officer of the Persian court, whose duty it is to write the annals of the king's reign. 2. The Scribe or Secretary (2 Sam. viii. 17, xx. 25; 2 K. xii. 10, xix. 2, xxii. 8). 3. The officer who was "over the house" (Is. xxiii. 15, xxxvi. 3). His duties would be those of chief steward of the household, and would embrace all the internal economical arrangements of the palace. 4. The king's friend (1 K. iv. 5), called likewise the king's companion. 5. The keeper of the vestry or wardrobe (2 K. x. 22). 6. The captain of the body-guard (2 Sam. xx. 23). 7. Distinct officers over the king's treasures, his storehouses, laborers, vineyards, olive-trees, and sycamore-trees, herds, camels, and flocks (1 Chr. xxvii. 25-31). 8. The officer over all the host or army of Israel, the commander-in-chief of the army (2 Sam. xx. 23; 1 Chr. xxvii. 34; 2 Sam. xi. 1). 9.

The royal counsellors (1 Chr. xxvii. 32; Is. iii. 3, xix. 11, 13). The following is a statement of the sources of the royal revenues:—1. The royal demesnes, corn-fields, vineyards, and olive-gardens. 2. The produce of the royal flocks (1 Sam. xxi. 7; 2 Sam. xiii. 23; 2 Chr. xxvi. 10; 1 Chr. xxvii. 25). 3. A nominal tenth of the produce of corn-land and vineyards and of sheep (1 Sam. viii. 15, 17). 4. A tribute from merchants who passed through the Hebrew territory (1 K. x. 14). 5. Presents made by his subjects (1 Sam. x. 27, xvi. 20; 1 K. x. 25; Ps. lxxii. 10). 6. In the time of Solomon, the king had trading-vessels of his own at sea (1 K. x. 22). Probably Solomon and some other kings may have derived some revenue from commercial ventures (1 K. ix. 28). 7. The spoils of war taken from conquered nations and the tribute paid by them (2 Sam. viii. 2, 7, 8, 10; 1 K. iv. 21; 2 Chr. xxvii. 5). 8. Lastly, an undefined power of exacting compulsory labor, to which reference has been already made (1 Sam. viii. 12, 13, 16). In Deut. xvii. 14-20 are some directions as to what a Hebrew king was to do and not to do; and in Rom. xiii. 1-7 and 1 Pet. ii. 13-17 are the general principles of loyal obedience. Jerusalem is styled "the city of the great King" (Ps. xlviii. 2; Mat. v. 35), i. e. of Jehovah. Christians are to be figuratively "kings and priests unto God" (Rev. i. 6; compare 1 Pet. ii. 9; Mat. xxv. 34). KINGDOM; NINEVEH.

* Kingdom = the authority, dominion, or realm of a KING. The phrases "kingdom of God" (Mat. vi. 33, &c.), "kingdom of Christ" (Eph. v. 5; Rev. i. 9, &c.), "kingdom of HEAVEN" (Mat. iii. 2, &c.), = (so Robinson, N. T. Lec.) the divine spiritual kingdom, the glorious reign of the MESSIAH (compare Ps. ii., cx.; Dan. ii. 44, vii. 14, 27, ix. 25 ff., &c.), or the Christian dispensation, comprising those who receive Jesus as the Messiah, and who, united by His spirit under Him as their head, rejoice in the truth, and live a holy life in love and in communion with Him. This spiritual kingdom has both an internal and external form. As internal, it already exists and rules in the hearts of all Christians, and is therefore present. As external, it is either embodied in the visible Church of Christ on earth, and in so far is present and progressive; or it is to be perfected in the coming of the Messiah to judgment and His subsequent spiritual reign in bliss and glory, in which view it is future. But these different aspects are not always distinguished; the expression often embracing both the internal and external sense, and referring both to its commencement in this world and its completion in the world to come. The "kingdom of heaven," &c. = (so Lange on Mat. iii. 2) "the kingdom of God's Spirit, in which the will of man is made conformable to the will of God—a kingdom which comes from heaven, is heaven on earth, and ends in heaven." The Jews were children of the typical kingdom, or of the theocracy (Mat. viii. 12), and might cherish the expectation of becoming children of the real kingdom—that of heaven (Rom. ix. 4 f., xi. 16 ff.) (Lange on Mat. viii. 12). "The children of the kingdom" in Mat. xiii. 38 are real Christians, the true citizens and heirs of the kingdom of heaven (compare Mat. xxv. 34; Rom. viii. 16, 17; 1 Pet. i. 3 ff.). CITIZEN.

* King's Dale, the (Heb. 'emek hammelech), a vale (VALLEY 1), or long low plain (so Gesenius), the position of which is uncertain (Gen. xiv. 17; 2 Sam. xviii. 18). Porter (in Kitto) supposes it = the plain of Rephaim, S. W. of Jerusalem; others make it = the valley of Jehoshaphat or Kidron, &c.

Josephus (vii. 10, § 3) says it was two furlongs from Jerusalem. ABSALOM; SHAFEH, VALLEY OF.

Kings, First and Second Books of, originally only one book in the Hebrew CANON, and first edited in Hebrew as two by Bomberg, after the model of the LXX. and the Vulgate. They are called by the LXX, Origen, &c., third and fourth of the Kingdoms (the Books of Samuel being the first and second), but by the Latins, with few exceptions, third and fourth Book of Kings. The division into two books, being purely artificial, and as it were mechanical, may be overlooked in speaking of them; and it must also be remembered that the division between the Books of Kings and Samuel is equally artificial, and that in point of fact the historical books commencing with Judges and ending with 2 Kings present the appearance of one work (so Lord A. C. Hervey, after Ewald). But to confine ourselves to the Books of Kings. We shall consider—I. Their historical and chronological range—II. Their peculiarities of diction, and other features in their literary aspect—III. Their authorship, and the sources of the author's information—IV. Their relation to the Books of Chronicles—V. Their place in the canon, and the references to them in the N. T.—I. The Books of Kings range from David's death and Solomon's accession to the throne of Israel, commonly reckoned as B. C. 1013, but according to Lepsius B. C. 993, to the destruction of the kingdom of Judah and the desolation of Jerusalem, and the burning of the Temple, according to the same reckoning B. C. 588 (B. C. 586, Lepsius)—a period of 427 (or 407) years: with a supplemental notice of an event that occurred after an interval of twenty-six years, viz. the liberation of Jehoiachin from his prison at Babylon, and a still further extension to Jehoiachin's death, probably not long after his liberation. The history therefore comprehends the whole time of the Israelitish monarchy, exclusive of the reigns of Saul and David. (ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF; JUDAH, KINGDOM OF; SOLOMON.) As regards the affairs of foreign nations, and the relation of Israel to them, the historical notices in these books, though in the earlier times scanty, are most valuable, and in striking accordance with the latest additions to our knowledge of contemporary profane history. The names of Omri, Jehu, Menahem, Hoshea, Hezekiah, &c., are believed to have been deciphered in the cuneiform inscriptions, which also contain pretty full accounts of the campaigns of Tiglath-pileser, Sargon, Sennacherib, and Esar-haddon: Shalmaneser's name has not yet been discovered, though two inscriptions in the British Museum are thought to refer to his reign. Another most important aid to a right understanding of the history in these books, and to the filling up of its outline, is to be found in the prophets, especially in Isaiah and Jeremiah. Lord A. C. Hervey maintains, however, that the chronological details expressly given in the books of Kings are frequently entirely contradictory. The date of the foundation of Solomon's Temple (1 K. vi. 1) he considers erroneous, as being irreconcilable with any view of the chronology of the times of the Judges, or with St. Paul's calculation (Acts xiii. 20). Of those chronologers who regard the number "480" in 1 K. vi. 1 as erroneous, most favor a longer period, Flavivir reckoning it 540 years, Jackson 579, Hales 621, Poole (CHRONOLOGY) 638, Seyffarth 880, and Pezron 962. Bunsen shortens it to 316 years. The LXX. has 440. Josephus has several different numbers, 592, 612, &c. On the other hand, Davidson (The Text of the O. T. Considered, pp. 343-4, &c.) agrees with Usher, Thénius, and Keil in regarding the number "480" in 1 K. vi. 1 as correct, and assuming the contemporaneity of some of the Judges usually reckoned successive. Davidson says: "Sufficient data are wanting toward a complete settlement of the chronology. Nothing but general views can be attained" (p. 651). "No computation which we have looked upon is on the whole more likely than the Hebrew one" (p. 344). In regard to the 450 years assigned to the Judges in Acts xiii. 20 A. V., Professor Hackett (Commentary on Acts, l. c.) says: "It is evident that Paul has followed here a mode of reckoning which was current at that time, and which, being a well-known received chronology, whether correct or incorrect in itself considered, was entirely correct for his object, which was not to settle a question about dates, but to recall to the minds of those whom he addressed a particular portion of Jewish history." But Lachmann, in his critical edition of the Greek Testament, gives, in Acts l. c. a different text, founded on three of the oldest and best MSS., viz. the Alexandrine, Vatican, and St. Ephrem the Syrian, and agreeing with the recently-discovered Sinaitic MS., and with the Vulgate, which removes the appearance of discrepancy. His reading, approved by Davidson (p. 551) is—"And when he had destroyed seven nations in the land of Canaan, he divided their land to them by lots, about the space of 450 years; and after this, gave them judges until Samuel the prophet." When we sum up the years of all the reigns of the kings of Israel as given in the Books of Kings, and then all the years of the reigns of the kings of Judah from the first of Rehoboam to the sixth of Hezekiah, we find an excess of nineteen or twenty years in Judah; the reigns of the latter amounting to 261 years, while the former make up only 242. But the parallel histories of Israel and Judah touch in four or five points where the synchronisms are precisely marked. These points are (1.) at the simultaneous accessions of Jeroboam and Rehoboam; (2.) at the simultaneous deaths of Jehoram and Ahaziah, or, which is the same thing, the simultaneous accessions of Jehu and Athaliah; (3.) at the fifteenth year of Amaziah, which was the first of Jeroboam II. (2 K. xiv. 17); (4.) in the reign of Ahaz, which was contemporary with some part of Pekah's, viz. according to the text of 2 K. xvi. 1, the first three years of Ahaz with the last three of Pekah; and (5.) at the sixth of Hezekiah, which was the ninth of Hoshea. For the reconciliation of the apparent chronological discrepancies in the Books of Kings, and between these and Chronicles, &c., see ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF; the articles on the various kings; and CHRONOLOGY.—II. The peculiarities of diction in the Books of Kings and other features in their literary history, may be briefly disposed of. On the whole, the peculiarities of diction in these books do not indicate a time after the Captivity, or toward the close of it, but on the contrary point pretty distinctly to the age of Jeremiah. The general character of the language is, most distinctly, that of the time before the Babylonish Captivity. But it is worth consideration whether some traces of dialectic varieties in Judah and Israel, and of an earlier admixture of Syriacisms in the language of Israel, may not be discovered in those portions of these books which refer to the kingdom of Israel. Lord A. C. Hervey regards the text as being far from perfect.

Besides the errors in numerals, some of which are probably to be traced to this source, such passages as 1 K. xv. 6, v. 10, compared with v. 2; 2 K. xv. 30, viii. 16, xvii. 34, Lord A. C. Hervey considers manifest corruptions of transcribers. In connection with these literary peculiarities may be mentioned also some remarkable variations in the version of the LXX. These consist of transpositions, omissions, and some considerable additions. The most important transpositions are—the history of Shimci's death (1 K. ii. 36–46), which in the LXX. (Vatican) comes after iii. 1, and divers scraps from chapters iv., v., and ix., accompanied by one or two remarks of the translators: 1 K. iv. 20–25, 2–6, 26, 21, 1, are strung together and precede iii. 2–28, but are many of them repeated again in their proper places: iii. 1, ix. 16, 17, are strung together, and placed between iv. 34 and v. 1: vii. 1–12 is placed after vii. 51: viii. 12, 13, is placed after 53: ix. 15–22 is placed after x. 22: xi. 43–xii. 3 is much transposed and confused in LXX. xi. 43, 44, xii. 1–3: xiv. 1–21 is placed in the midst of the long addition to chapter xii., mentioned below: xxii. 42–50 is placed after xvi. 28: chapters xx. and xxi. are transposed: 2 K. iii. 1–8 is placed after 2 K. i. 18. The omissions are few. 1 K. vi. 11–14 is entirely omitted; and 37, 38, only slightly alluded to at the opening of chapter iii.: 1 K. xv. 6 is omitted; and so are the dates of Asa's reign in xvi. 8 and 15; and there are a few verbal omissions of no consequence. The chief interest lies in the additions, of which the principal are the following. The supposed mention of a fountain as among Solomon's works in the Temple in the passage after 1 K. ii. 35; of a paved causeway on Lebanon, iii. 46; of Solomon pointing to the sun at the dedication of the Temple, before he uttered the prayer "The Lord said he would dwell in the thick darkness," &c., viii. 12, 13 (after 53, LXX.); the information that "Joram his brother" perished with Tibni, xvi. 22; an additional date "in the twenty-fourth year of Jeroboam," xv. 8; numerous verbal additions, as xi. 29, xvii. 1, &c.; and lastly, the long passage concerning Jeroboam the son of Nebat, inserted between xii. 24 and 25. The mention of Tibni's brother Joram is the addition which has most the semblance of an historical fact, or makes the existence of any other source of history probable. See, too, 1 K. xx. 19, and 2 K. xv. 25. It appears evident that the long passage about Jeroboam is only an apocryphal version made up of the existing materials in the Hebrew Scriptures, after the manner of 1 Esd., Bel and the Dragon, the apocryphal Esther, and the Targums. Another feature in the literary condition of our books must just be noticed, viz. that the compiler, in arranging his materials, and adopting the very words of the documents used by him, has not always been careful to avoid the appearance of contradiction.—III. The Jewish tradition which ascribes the authorship of these books to JEREMIAH is borne out by the strongest internal evidence, in addition to that of the language (so Lord A. C. Hervey, Grotius, Carpzer, Hävernicks, &c.). The last chapter, especially as compared with the last chapter of the Chronicles, bears distinct traces of having been written by one who did not go into captivity, but remained in Judea, after the destruction of the Temple. This suits Jeremiah. The events singled out for mention in the concise narrative are precisely those of which he had personal knowledge, and in which he took special interest. The writer in Kings has nothing more to tell us concerning the Jews or Chaldees in the land of Judah, which exactly agrees with the hypothesis that he is Jeremiah, who, we know, was carried down to Egypt with the fugitives. In fact, the date of the writing and the position of the writer seem as clearly marked by the termination of the narrative at xv. 26, as in the case of the Acts of the Apostles. The annexation of this chapter to the writings of Jeremiah so as to form Jer. lii. (with the additional clause contained 28–30) is an evidence of a very ancient, if not a contemporary belief, that Jeremiah was the author of it. Going back to chapter xxiv., we find in verse 14 an enumeration of the captives taken with Jehoiachin identical with that in Jer. xxiv. 1; in verse 18, a reference to the vessels of the Temple precisely similar to that in Jer. xxvii. 18–20, xxviii. 3, 6. Brief as the narrative is, it brings out all the chief points in the political events of the time which we know were much in Jeremiah's mind; and yet, which is exceedingly remarkable, Jeremiah is never once named (as he is in 2 Chr. xxxvi. 12, 21), although the manner of the writer is frequently to connect the sufferings of Judah with their sins and their neglect of the Word of God (2 K. xvii. 13 ff., xxiv. 2, 3, &c.). And this leads to another striking coincidence between that portion of the history which belongs to Jeremiah's times and the writings of Jeremiah himself. De Wette speaks of the superficial character of the history of Jeremiah's times as hostile to the theory of Jeremiah's authorship. Now, considering the nature of these annals, and their conciseness, this criticism seems very unfounded as regards the reigns of Josiah, Jehoahaz, Jehoiachin, and Zedekiah. It must, however, be acknowledged that as regards Jehoiakim's reign, and especially the latter part of it, and the way in which he came by his death, the narrative is much more meagre than one would have expected from a contemporary writer, living on the spot. But exactly the same paucity of information is found in those otherwise copious notices of contemporary events with which Jeremiah's prophecies are interspersed. When it is borne in mind that the writer of 2 K. was a contemporary writer, and, if not Jeremiah, must have had independent means of information, this coincidence will have great weight. Going back to the reign of Josiah, in chapters xxiii. and xxii., the connection of the destruction of Jerusalem with Manasseh's transgressions, and the comparison of it to the destruction of Samaria, verses 26, 27, lead us back to xxi. 10–18, and that passage leads us to Jer. vii. 15. xv. 4, xix. 3, 4, &c. The particular account of Josiah's passover, and his other good works, the reference in verses 24, 25, to the law of Moses, and the finding of the book by HILKIAH the priest, with the fuller account of that discovery in chapter xxii., exactly suit Jeremiah, who began his prophetic office in the thirteenth of Josiah; whose eleventh chapter refers repeatedly to the book thus found; who showed his attachment to Josiah by writing a lamentation on his death (2 Chr. xxxv. 25), and whose writings show how much he made use of the book of the Law. With Josiah's reign necessarily cease all strongly-marked characters of Jeremiah's authorship. For though the general unity and continuity of plan lead us to assign the whole history in a certain sense to one author, and enable us to carry to the account of the whole book the proofs derived from the closing chapters, yet it must be borne in mind that the authorship of those parts of the history of which Jeremiah was not an eye-witness, i. e. of all before the reign of Josiah, would have consisted merely in selecting, arranging, inserting the connecting phrases, and, when necessary, slightly modernizing the old histories which had been drawn up by contemporary prophets through the whole period of time. See e. g. 1 K. xiii. 32. For, as regards the sources of information, it may truly be said that we have the narrative of contemporary writers throughout. It has already been observed (CHRONICLES) that there was a regular series of state-annals both for the kingdom of Judah and for that of Israel, which embraced the whole time comprehended in the Books of Kings, or at least to the end of the reign of Jehoiakim (2 K. xxiv. 5). These annals are constantly cited by name as "the Book of the Acts of Solomon" (1 K. xi. 41); and, after Solomon, "the Book of the Chronicles of the Kings of Judah, or, Israel" (xiv. 29, xv. 7, xvi. 5, 14, 20; 2 K. x. 34, xxiv. 5, &c.), and it is manifest that the author of Kings had them both before him, while he drew up his history, in which the reigns of the two kingdoms are harmonized, and these annals constantly appealed to. But in addition to these national annals, there were also extant, at the time that the Books of Kings were compiled, separate works of the several prophets who had lived in Judah and Israel. Thus the acts of Uzziah, written by Isaiah, were very likely identical with the history of his reign in the national chronicles; and part of the history of Hezekiah we know is identical in the Chronicles and in the prophet. The chapter in Jeremiah relating to the destruction of the Temple (lii.) is identical with the account in 2 K. xxiv., xxv. In later times we have supposed that a chapter in the prophecies of Daniel was used for the national chronicles, and appears as Ezr. i. These other works, then, as far as the memory of them has been preserved to us, were as follows: For the time of David, the book of Samuel the seer, the book of Nathan the prophet, and the book of Gad the seer (2 Sam. xxi.-xxiv. with 1 K. i. being probably extracted from Nathan's book), which seem to have been collected—at least that portion of them relating to David—into one work called "the Acts of David the King" (1 Chr. xxix. 29). For the time of Solomon, "the Book of the Acts of Solomon" (1 K. xi. 41), consisting probably of parts of the "Book of Nathan the prophet, the prophecy of Ahijah the Shilonite, and the visions of Iddo the seer" (2 Chr. ix. 29). For the time of Rehoboam, "the words of Shemaiah the prophet, and of Iddo the seer concerning genealogies" (xii. 15). For the time of Abijah, "the story of the prophet Iddo" (xiii. 22). For the time of Jehoshaphat, "the words of Jehu the son of Hanani" (xx. 34). For the time of Uzziah, "the writings of Isaiah the prophet" (xxvi. 22). For the time of Hezekiah, "the vision of Isaiah the prophet, the son of Amoz" (xxxii. 32). For the time of Manasseh, a book called "the sayings of the seers." For the time of Jeroboam II., a prophecy of "Jonah, the son of Amittai, the prophet, of Gath-hepher," is cited (2 K. xiv. 25); and it seems likely that there were books containing special histories of the acts of Elijah and Elisha, seeing that the times of these prophets are described with such copiousness. Of the latter Gehazi might well have been the author, to judge from 2 K. viii. 4, 5, as Elisha himself might have been of the former. Possibly, too, the prophecies of Azariah the son of Oded, in Asa's reign (2 Chr. xv. 1), and of Hanani (xvi. 7), and Micaiah the son of Imlah in Ahab's reign; and Eli-ezer the son of Dodavah, in Jehoshaphat's; and Zechariah the son of Jehoiada, in Jehoash's; and Oded, in Pekah's; and Zechariah, in Uzziah's reign; of the prophetess Huldah, in Josiah's, and others, may have been preserved in writing, some or all of them. With regard to the work so often cited in the Chronicles as "the Book of the Kings of Israel and Judah" (1 Chr. ix. 1; 2 Chr. xvi. 11, xxvii. 7, xxviii. 26, xxxii. 32, xxxv. 27, xxxvi. 8), it has been thought by some that it was a separate collection containing the joint histories of the two kingdoms; by others that it is our Books of Kings which answer to this description; but by Eichhorn, that it is the same as the Chronicles of the Kings of Judah so constantly cited in the Books of Kings; and this last opinion seems the best founded.—IV. As regards the relation of the Books of Kings to those of Chronicles, it is manifest, and is universally admitted, that the former is by far the older work. The language, which is quite free from the Persicisms of the Chronicles and their late orthography, and is not at all more Aramaic than the language of Jeremiah, clearly points out its relative superiority in regard to age. Its subject also, embracing the kingdom of Israel as well as Judah, is another indication of its composition before the kingdom of Israel was forgotten, and before the Jewish enmity to Samaria, which is apparent in such passages as 2 Chr. xx. 37, xxv., and in those chapters of Ezra (i.-vi.) which Lord A. C. Hervey regards as belonging to Chronicles, was brought to maturity. While the Books of Chronicles, therefore, were written especially for the Jews after their return from Babylon, the Book of Kings was written for the whole of Israel, before their common national existence was hopelessly quenched. Another comparison of considerable interest between the two histories may be drawn in respect to the main design, that design having a marked relation both to the individual station of the supposed writers, and the peculiar circumstances of their country at the times of their writing. Jeremiah was himself a prophet. He lived while the prophetic office was in full vigor, in his own person, in Ezekiel, and Daniel, and many others, both true and false. Accordingly, we find in the Books of Kings great prominence given to the prophetic office. Ezra, on the contrary, was only a priest. In his days the prophetic office had wholly fallen into abeyance. That evidence of the Jews being the people of God, which consisted in the presence of prophets among them, was no more. But to the men of his generation, the distinctive mark of the continuance of God's favor to their race was the rebuilding of the Temple at Jerusalem, the restoration of the daily sacrifice and the Levitical worship, and the wonderful and providential renewal of the Mosaic institutions. Moreover, upon the principle that the sacred writers were influenced by natural feelings in their selection of their materials, it seems most appropriate that while the prophetic writer in Kings deals very fully with the kingdom of Israel, in which the prophets were much more illustrious than in Judah, the Levitical writer, on the contrary, should concentrate all his thoughts round Jerusalem, where alone the Levitical caste had all its powers and functions, and should dwell upon all the instances preserved in existing monuments of the deeds and even the minutest ministrations of the priests and Levites, as well as of their faithfulness and sufferings in the cause of truth. The writer of Chronicles, having the Books of Kings before him, and to a great extent making those books the basis of his own, but also having his own personal views, predilections, and motives in writing, writing for a different age, and for people under very different circumstances; and, moreover, having before him the original authorities from which the Books of Kings were compiled, as well as some others, naturally rearranged the older narrative as suited his purpose, and his tastes; gave in full passages which the other had abridged, inserted what had been wholly omitted, omitted some things which the other had inserted, including every thing relating to the kingdom of Israel, and showed the color of his own mind, not only in the nature of the passages which he selected from the ancient documents, but in the reflections which he frequently adds upon the events which he relates, and possibly also in the turn given to some of the speeches which he records. But to say, as has been said or insinuated, that a different view of supernatural agency and Divine interposition, or of the Mosaic institutions and the Levitical worship, is given in the two books, or that a less historical character belongs to one than to the other, is to say what has not the least foundation in fact. Supernatural agency, as in the cloud which filled the Temple of Solomon (1 K. viii. 10, 11); the appearance of the Lord to Solomon (iii. 5, 11, ix. 2 ff.); the withering of Jeroboam's hand (xiii. 3-6); the fire from heaven which consumed Elijah's sacrifice (xviii. 33), and numerous other incidents in the lives of Elijah and Elisha; the smiting of Sennacherib's army (2 K. xix. 35); the going back of the shadow on the dial of Ahaz (xx. 11), and in the very frequent prophecies uttered and fulfilled, is really more often adduced in these books than in the Chronicles. The selection, therefore, of one or two instances of miraculous agency which happen to be mentioned in Chronicles, and not in Kings, as indications of the superstitious, credulous disposition of the Jews after the Captivity, can have no effect but to mislead. The same may be said of a selection of passages in Chronicles in which the mention of Jewish idolatry is omitted. It conveys a false inference, because the truth is that the Chronicler does expose the idolatry of Judah as severely as the author of Kings, and traces the destruction of Judah to such idolatry quite as clearly and forcibly (2 Chr. xxxvi. 14 ff.). The author of Kings again is quite as explicit in his references to the law of Moses, and has many allusions to the Levitical ritual, though he does not dwell so copiously upon the details. See e. g. 1 K. ii. 3, iii. 14, viii. 2, 4, 9, 53, 58, ix. 9, 20, x. 12, xi. 2, xii. 31, 32; 2 K. xi. 5-7, 12, xii. 5, 11, 13, 16, xiv. 6, xvi. 13, 15, xvii. 7-12, 18-15, 34-39, xviii. 4, 6, xxii. 4, 5, 8 ff., xxiii. 21, &c., besides the constant references to the Temple, and to the illegality of high-place worship. So that remarks on the Levitical tone of Chronicles, when made for the purpose of supporting the notion that the law of Moses was a late invention, and that the Levitical worship was of post-Babylonian growth, are made in the teeth of the testimony of the Books of Kings, as well as those of Joshua, Judges, and Samuel. The opinion that these books were compiled "toward the end of the Babylonian exile" (De Wette, Parker's translation) is doubtless also adopted to weaken as much as possible the force of this testimony (so Lord A. C. Hervey).—V. The last point for our consideration is the place of these books in the Canon, and the references to them in the N. T. Their canonical authority having never been disputed, it is needless to bring forward the testimonies to their authenticity which may be found in Josephus, Eusebius, Jerome, Augustine, &c. They are reckoned among the Prophets, in the threefold division of the Holy Scriptures; a position in accordance with the supposition that they were compiled by Jeremiah, and contain the narratives of the different prophets in succession. They are frequently cited by our Lord and by the apostles. Thus the allusions to Solomon's glory (Mat. vi. 29); to the queen of Sheba's visit to Solomon to hear his wisdom (xii. 42); to the Temple (Acts vii. 47, 48); to the great drought in the days of Elijah, and the widow of Sarepta (Lk. iv. 25, 26); to the cleansing of Naaman the Syrian (ver. 27); to the charge of Elisha to Gehazi (2 K. iv. 29, compared with Lk. x. 4); to the dress of Elijah (Mk. i. 6, compared with 2 K. i. 8); to the complaint of Elijah, and God's answer to him (Rom. xi. 3, 4); and to the raising of the Shunammite's son from the dead (Heb. xi. 35); to the giving and withholding the rain in answer to Elijah's prayer (Jas. v. 17, 18; Rev. xi. 6); to Jezebel (ii. 20); are all derived from the Books of Kings, and, with the statement of Elijah's presence at the Transfiguration, are a striking testimony to their value for the purpose of religious teaching, and to their authenticity as a portion of the Word of God. KIR (Heb. a wall, walled place or fortress, Ges.) is mentioned by Amos (ix. 7) as the land from which the Syrians (Arameans) were once "brought up;" i. e. apparently, as the country where they had dwelt before migrating to the region N. of Palestine. It was also the land to which the captive Syrians of Damascus were removed by Tiglath-pileser on his conquest of that city (2 K. xvi. 9; compare Am. i. 5). Isaiah joins it with Elam in a passage where Jerusalem is threatened with an attack from a foreign army (xxii. 6). The common opinion among recent commentators has been that a tract on the river Kur or Cyrus is intended (Georgia in Asiatic Russia [Rosenmüller, Michaelis, Gesenius]). Keil prefers, with Vitringer, a city in Media, the Kariné of Ptolemy, the present Kerend. Rawlinson asks, May not Kir be a variant for Kish or Kush (Cush), and represent the eastern Ethiopia, the Cissia of Herodotus? See also KIR of MOAB.

KIR-har'a-seth (Heb.) (2 K. iii. 25), }
KIR-ha'resh (fr. Heb.) (Is. xvi. 11), } = KIR-HE-
KIR-har'e-seth (Heb.) (Is. xvi. 7), } RES.

KIR-he'res (Heb. brick fortresses, Ges.) (Jer. xlviii. 31, 36). This name and the three preceding, all slight variations of it, are all applied to one place, probably KIR of MOAB.

KIR-I-a-tha'im (Heb. double city), one of the towns of Moab which were the "glory of the country;" named in the denunciations of Jeremiah (xlviii. 1, 23) and Ezekiel (xxv. 9); = KIRJATHAIM 1.

KIR-I-a-thi-a'r-i-us (fr. Gr.) = KIRJATH-JEARIM, and KIRJATH-ARIM (1 Esd. v. 19).

KIR-I-oth (fr. Heb. = KERIOTH), a place in Moab, the palaces of which were threatened with destruction by fire (Am. ii. 2); unless indeed the word means simply the cities. KERIOTH 2.

KIRjath (fr. Heb. = city), the last of the cities enumerated as belonging to Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 28). It is named with Gibeath, but without any copulative—"Gibeath, Kirjath." Whether there is any connection between these two names or not, probably Kirjath = KIRJATH-JEARIM.

KIR-Ja-tha'im (fr. Heb. = KIRIATHAIM). 1. A city E. of the Jordan, one of the places taken possession of, and rebuilt, and newly named by the Reubenites (Num. xxxii. 37, see 38; Josh. xiii. 19); possibly the same place as that which gave its name to the ancient SHAVEN-KIRIATHAIM. It existed in the time of Jeremiah (xlvi. 1, 23) and Ezekiel (xxv. 9)—in these three passages the A. V. gives the name KIRIATHAIM. Eusebius describes it as a village entirely of Christians, ten miles W. of Medeba, "close to the Baris." Burckhardt (p. 367, July 13) when at Medeba (Medeba) was told by his guide of a place, el-Teyn, about half an hour (one and a half miles English, or barely two miles Roman) therefrom, which he suggests was = Kirjathaim. Porter pronounces confidently for Kureiyat, under the southern side of Jebel 'Attârûs, and about eleven miles S. W. of the ruins of Medeba, as = Kirjathaim. Wilton (in Fairbairn) follows Mr. C. Graham in identifying Kirjathaim with Kiriatain, one of a series of ancient cities N. of 'Amman (Rabbah) and S. W. of Busrâh (Bozrah?). (KERIOTH 2; KIRJATH-HUZOTH).—2. A town in Naphtali, given to the Gershonite Levites (1 Chr. vi. 76); = KARTAN in Josh. xix.

Kir'jath-ar'ba (fr. Heb. = city of ARBA, Ges.), an early name of HEBRON (Josh. xiv. 15; Judg. i. 10). The identity of Kirjath-arba with Hebron is constantly asserted (Gen. xxiii. 2, xxxv. 27; Josh. xiv. 15, xv. 13, 54, xx. 7, xxi. 11).

Kir'jath-a'rim (fr. Heb.), an abbreviated form of KIRJATH-JEARIM (Ezr. ii. 25 only).

Kir'jath-ba'al (fr. Heb. = city of BAAL, Ges.), an alternative name of KIRJATH-JEARIM (Josh. xv. 60, xviii. 14) = BAALAH, and BAAL-OF-JUDAH.

Kir'jath-hn'zoth (fr. Heb. = city of streets, Ges.), a place to which Balak accompanied Balaam immediately after his arrival in Moab (Num. xxii. 39 only). It appears to have lain between the ARNON (Wady Môjeh) and BAMOTH-BAAL (compare ver. 36 and 41), probably N. of the former. Knobel (and so Porter, in Handbook for Syria and Palestine) identifies it with Kureiyat, on the S. W. slope of Jebel 'Attârûs. KIRJATHAIM 1.

Kir'jath-je'a-rim (fr. Heb. = city of forests), a city which played a not unimportant part in the history of the Hebrews. We first encounter it as one of the four cities of the Gibeonites (Josh. ix. 17); next as one of the landmarks of the northern boundary of Judah (xv. 9) and as the point at which the western and southern boundaries of Benjamin coincided (xviii. 14, 15); and in the last two passages we find that it bore another, perhaps earlier, name—that of the great Canaanite deity Baal, viz. BAALAH and KIRJATH-BAAL. It is reckoned among the towns of Judah (xv. 60; Judg. xviii. 12). (KIRJATH.) It is included in the genealogies of Judah (1 Chr. ii. 50, 52) as founded by, or descended from, SNOBAL, the son of Caleb, son of Hur. "Behind Kirjath-jearim" the band of Danites pitched their camp before their expedition to Mount Ephraim and Laish, leaving their name attached to the spot long afterward (Judg. xviii. 12). (MAHANAH-DAN.) Hitherto, beyond the early sanctity implied in its bearing the name of BAAL, there is nothing remarkable in Kirjath-jearim. It was no doubt this reputation for sanctity which made the people of Beth-shemesh appeal to its inhabitants to relieve them of the Ark of Jehovah, which was bringing such calamities on their untutored inexperience (1 Sam. vi. 20, 21). In this high place the ark remained for twenty years (vii. 2). At the close of that time Kirjath-jearim lost its sacred treasure, on its removal by David to the house of Obed-edom the Gittite (1 Chr. xiii. 5, 6; 2 Chr. i. 4; 2 Sam. vi. 2, &c.). It is very remarkable and suggestive that in the account of this transaction the ancient and heathen name Baal is retained. Its people returned from captivity (Neh. vii. 29). (KIRJATH-ARIM.) A prophet URIAH 4, a native of the place, was murdered by Jehoiakim

(Jer. xxvi. 20, &c.). Eusebius and Jerome describe it as a village at the ninth mile between Jerusalem and Diospolis (Lydda). Robinson (ii. 11) discovered that these requirements are exactly fulfilled in the modern village of Kuryet el-'Enab—now usually known as Abû Gosh, from the robber-chief whose headquarters it was—at the eastern end of the Wady 'Aly, on the road from Jaffa to Jerusalem.

Kir'jath-san'nah (fr. Heb. = palm-city, Ges.), another, and probably an earlier, appellation for DEBIR (Josh. xv. 49 only). KIRJATH-SEPHER.

Kir'jath-se'pher (fr. Heb. = book-town, Ges.; city of doctrine, Boeh., Keil), the early name of DEBIR, also called KIRJATH-SANNAH (Josh. xv. 15, 16; Judg. i. 11, 12).

Kir (Heb. fortress, Ges.) of Mo'ab, one of the two chief strongholds of Moab, the other being AR OF

MOAB. The name occurs only in Is. xv. 1, though the place probably = KIR-HERES, KIR-HARASETH, &c. The clew to its identification is given us by the Targum on Isaiah and Jeremiah, which for the above names has C'raeca, C'rac, almost identical with the name Kerak, by which the site of an important city in a high and very strong position at the S. E. of the Dead Sea is known at this day. When Joram, king of Israel, invaded Moab, Kir was the only city left standing in the country; and here took place the cruel sacrifice recorded in 2 Kings iii. 27. In A. D. 1131, a castle was built there which became an important station for the Crusaders. The Crusaders, in error, believed it to be Petra (SELA), and this error is perpetrated in the Greek Church to the present day. Kerak lies about six miles S. of the modern Rabba (AR), and some ten miles from the Dead Sea, upon the plateau of highlands which forms this part of the country, not far from the western edge of the plateau. Its situation is truly remarkable. It is built upon the top of a steep hill, surrounded on all sides by a deep and narrow valley, which again is completely enclosed by mountains rising higher than the town, and overlooking it on all sides. The elevation of the town can hardly be less than 3,000 feet above the sea. Its population is about 3,000, one-third being Greek Christians. Their strong position, numbers, and valor, make them the rulers of a large, and almost independent district (Porter, in Kitto).

Kish (Heb. a bow? Ges.; see ARMS, I. 3). 1. Father of King SAUL 2; a Benjamite of the family of Matri (1 Sam. x. 21); descended from Becher (1 Chr. vii. 8, compared with 1 Sam. ix. 1); in N. T. Cis.—2. Son of Jehiel, and uncle to the preceding (1 Chr. viii. 30, ix. 36).—3. A Benjamite, great-grandfather of Mordecai (Esth. ii. 5).—4. A Merarite Levite, of the house of Mahli; = KISHI and KUSHATAH. His sons married the daughters of his brother Eleazar (1 Chr. xxiii. 21, 22, xxiv. 28, 29), apparently about the time of King Saul, or early in David's reign, since Jeduthun the singer was son of Kish (vi. 44, A. V., compared with 2 Chr. xxix. 12). In the last cited place, "Kish the son of Abdi," in the reign of Hezekiah, must denote (so Lord A. C. Hervey) the Levitical house or division, under its chief, rather than an individual.

Kish'i (Heb. = KUSHIAH, Ges.), a Merarite, and father or ancestor of Ethan the minstrel (1 Chr. vi. 44); = KISH 4.

Kish'i-on (Heb. hardness, Ges.), one of the towns on the boundary of Issachar (Josh. xix. 20), allotted to the Gershonite Levites (xxi. 28; A. V. KISHON); = KEDESH 2. No trace of the situation of Kishion exists.

Ki'shon (fr. Heb.) = KISHION (Josh. xxi. 28).

Ki'shon (Heb. curved, winding, Ges.), the Riv'er, a torrent or winter stream of central Palestine, the scene of two of the grandest achievements of Israelite history—the defeat of SISERA (BARAK; HAROSHETH; MEGIDDO), and the destruction of the prophets of Baal by ELIJAH (CARMEL) (Judg. iv. 7, 13, v. 21; 1 K. xviii. 40; Ps. lxxxiii. 9, A. V. "Ki-son"). The Nahr Mukatta, the modern representative of the Kishon, is the drain by which the waters of the plain of ESRAELON, and of the mountains which enclose that plain, viz. Carmel and the Samaria range on the S., the mountains of Galilee on the N., and Gilboa, "Little Hermon" (so called), and Tabor on the E., find their way to the Mediterranean. Its course is in a direction nearly due N. W. It has two principal feeders: the first from Deb'arieh (Daberath), on Mount Tabor, the N. E. angle of the plain; the second from Jelbón (Gilboa) and Jentn (En-gannim) on the S. E. It is also fed by the copious spring of Lejjún. During the winter and spring, and after sudden storms of rain, the upper part of the Kishon flows with a very strong torrent. At the same seasons the ground about Lejjún (Megiddo) where the principal encounter with Sisera probably took place, becomes a morass, impassable for even single travellers. But like most of the so-called "rivers" of Palestine, the perennial stream forms but a small part of the Kishon. During the greater part of the year its upper portion is dry, and the stream confined to a few miles next the sea. The sources of this perennial portion proceed from the roots of Carmel—the "vast fountains called Sa'adiyeh, about three miles E. of Chaifa or Haifa," and those, apparently still more copious, described by Shaw, as bursting forth from beneath the eastern brow of Carmel, and discharging of themselves "a river half as big as the Isis." It enters the sea at the lower part of the Bay of 'Akka (Acco), about two miles E. of Chaifa "in a deep tortuous bed between banks of loamy soil some fifteen feet high, and fifteen to twenty yards apart. The bottom is soft mud, which makes the ford difficult at all seasons" (Porter, Handbook, 383-4).

Ki'son (Gr. fr. Heb.) = KISHON (Ps. lxxxiii. 9 only).

Kiss (Heb. verb nishak and noun neshikah; Gr. verbs phileo and kataphileo, and noun philema). Kissing the lips by way of affectionate salutation was customary among near relatives of both sexes, both in Patriarchal and in later times (Gen. xxix. 11; Cant. viii. 1). Between individuals of the same sex, and in a limited degree between those of different sexes, the kiss on the cheek as a mark of respect or an act of salutation has at all times been customary in the East. In the Christian Church the kiss of charity was practised not only as a friendly salutation, but as an act symbolical of love and Christian brotherhood (Rom. xvi. 16; 1 Cor. xvi. 20; 2 Cor. xiii. 12; 1 Th. v. 26; 1 Pet. v. 14). It was embodied in the earlier Christian offices, and has been continued in some of those now in use. Among the Arabs the women and children kiss the beards of their husbands and fathers. The superior returns the salute by a kiss on the forehead. In Egypt an inferior kisses the hand of a superior, generally on the back, but sometimes, as a special favor, on the palm also. To testify abject submission, and in asking favors, the feet are often kissed instead of the hand. (ADORATION.) The written decrees of a sovereign are kissed in token of respect; even the ground is sometimes kissed by Orientals in the fulness of their submission (Gen. xli. 40; 1 Sam. xxiv. 8; Ps. lxxix. 9, &c.). Kissing is spoken of in Scripture as a mark of respect or adoration to idols (1 K. xix. 18; Hos. xiii. 2).

Kite. The Hebrew ayydh thus rendered occurs in three passages (Lev. xi. 14; Deut. xiv. 13; Job xxviii. 7); in the two former it is translated "kite" in the A. V., in the latter "vulture." It is enumerated among the twenty names of birds mentioned in Deut. xiv. (birds of prey belonging for the most part to the order of Raptore) which were considered unclean by the Mosaic Law, and forbidden to be used as food by the Israelites. The allusion in Job alone affords a clew to its identification. The deep mines in the recesses of the mountains from which the labor of man extracts the treasures of the earth are there described (so Mr. Wright) as "a track which the bird of prey hath not known, nor hath the eye of the ayydh looked upon it." Among all birds of prey, which are proverbially clear-sighted, the ayydh is thus distinguished as possessed of peculiar keenness of vision, and by this attribute alone is it marked. Translators have been singularly at variance with regard to this bird. Robertson (Clavis Pentateuchi) derives ayydh from an obsolete root, which he connects with an Arabic word, the primary meaning of which, according to Schultens, is to turn. If this derivation be the true one, "kite" may be the correct rendering. The habit which birds of this genus have of "sailing in circles, with the rudder-like tail by its inclination governing the curve," as Yarrell says, accords with the Arabic derivation. In ornithological language "kite" = "glede" (Milvus vulgaris); but the A. V. translators considered the terms distinct. Bochart identifies the ayydh with the merlin (Falco Esalon, Linn.), the smallest of the British hawks. But the grounds for identifying it with any individual species are too slight to enable us to regard with confidence any conclusions based upon them; and from the expression which follows in Leviticus and Deuteronomy, "after its kind," it is evident that the term is generic.

Kith'lish (fr. Heb., probably = a man's wall, Ges.; separation, Fii.), a city of Judah, in the lowland (Josh. xv. 40); identified by Wilton (in Fairbairn) with el-Filas, a ruined site a few miles S. from 'Ajlun (Eglon).

Kit'ron (Heb. knotty, Ges.), one of the towns from which Zebulun did not expel the Canaanites (Judg. i. 30); = KATTATH? In the Talmud it is identified with "Zippori," i. e. Sepphoris, now Sef-furih (so Mr. Grove, after Schwartz).

Kit'tim (fr. Heb.) = CHITTIM (Gen. x. 4; 1 Chr. i. 7).

Knecding-troughs. BREAD.

Knife, the A. V. translation of four Hebrew words, viz. herab or chereb (Josh. v. 2, 8), usually translated "sword" (ARMS, I. 1); ma'aceleth = a knife, as an instrument for eating, Ges. (Gen. xxii. 6, 10; Judg. xix. 29; Prov. xxx. 14); plural mahā-laphim or machā-lāphim = slaughter-knives, Ges. (Ezr. i. 9 only); sacetin (Prov. xxiii. 2 only). 1. The knives of the Egyptians, and of other nations in early times, were probably only of hard stone, and the use of the flint or stone knife was sometimes retained for sacred purposes after the introduction of iron and steel. Herodotus (ii. 86) mentions knives both of iron and of stone in different stages of the same process of embalming. The same may perhaps be said to some extent of the Hebrews. 2. In their meals the Jews, like other Orientals, made little use of knives, but they were required for slaughtering animals either for food or sacrifice, as well as cutting up the carcass (Lev. vii. 33, 34, viii. 15, 20, 25, ix. 13; Num. xviii. 18; 1 Sam. ix. 24, &c.). 3. Smaller knives were in use for paring fruit (Josephus) and for sharpening pens (Jer. xxxvi. 28). 4. The RAZOR was often used for Nazaritic purposes, for which a special chamber was reserved in the Temple (Num. vi. 5, 9, 19; Ezr. v. 1, &c.). 5. The pruning-hooks of Is. xviii. 5 were probably curved knives. 6. The lancets of the priests of Baal were doubtless pointed knives (1 K. xviii. 28). AXE.

Knop, the A. V. translation of two Hebrew terms, of which Mr. Grove thinks that all we can say with certainty is that they refer to some architectural or ornamental object, and have nothing in common. 1. Heb. caphtōr (= crown, chaplet, circlet, Ges.; an ornamental crown, Fii.) occurs in the description of the candlestick of the sacred tent in Ex. xxv. 31-36, and xxxvii. 17-22. Here the knop and the flower seem intended to imitate the produce of an almond-tree. In another part of the work they appear to form a boss, from which the branches are to spring out from the main stem. (LINTEL 2.) 2. Heb. pl. pekd'im (= wild cucumbers, Ges., Fii.), found only in 1 K. vi. 18 and vii. 24, no doubt signified some globular thing resembling a small gourd, or an egg, though as to the character of the ornament we are quite in the dark. The following woodcut of a portion of a richly ornamented door-step or slab from Kouyunjik (NINEVEH) probably represents something approximating to the "knop and the flower" of Solomon's Temple.

Border of a Slab from Kouyunjik.—(Fergusson's Architecture.)

Ko'a (Heb.), in Ez. xxiii. 23 only, perhaps = a place otherwise unknown, which we must suppose to have been a city or district of Babylonia. Or it may be a common noun = prince or nobleman, as the Vulgate takes it, with Gesenius, and some of the Jewish interpreters.

Ko'hath (Heb. assembly), second of Levi's three sons, from whom the three principal divisions of the LEVITES derived their origin and their name (Gen. xlv. 11; Ez. vi. 16, 18; Num. iii. 17 ff.; 2 Chr. xxxiv. 12, &c.). Kohath was the father of Amram, and he of MOSES and AARON. From him, therefore, were descended all the priests (PRIEST); and hence those of the Kohathites who were not priests were of the highest rank of the LEVITES, though not the sons of Levi's first-born. In the journeyings of the Tabernacle the sons of Kohath had charge of the most holy portion of the vessels (Num. iv.). These were all previously covered by the priests, the sons of Aaron. It appears from Ex. vi. 18-22, compared with 1 Chr. xxiii. 12, xxvi. 23-32, and Num. iii. 27, that there were four families of sons of Kohath—AMRAMITES, IZHARITES, HEBRONITES, and UZZIELITES. The verses already cited from 1 Chr. xxvi.; Num. iii. 19, 27; 1 Chr. xxiii. 12, disclose the wealth and prominence of the Kohathites, and the important offices filled by them as keepers of the dedicated treasures, as judges, officers, and rulers, both secular and sacred. In 2 Chr. xx. 19, they appear as singers, with the Korhites. KORAH, SAMUEL, HEMAN, &c., were Kohathites. The number of the sons of Kohath between the ages of thirty and fifty, at the first census in the wilderness, was 2,750, and the whole number of males from a month old was 8,600 (Num. iii. 28, iv. 36). Their place in marching and encampment was S. of the Tabernacle (iii. 29), which was also the situation of the Reubenites. The inheritance of those sons of Kohath who were not priests lay in the half-tribe of Manasseh, in Ephraim (1 Chr. vi. 61-70), and in Dan (Josh. xxi. 5, 20-26). Of the personal history of Kohath we know nothing, except that he came down to Egypt with Levi and Jacob (Gen. xlv. 11), that his sister was Jochebed (Ex. vi. 20), and that he lived to the age of 133 years (vi. 18).

* Ko'hath-ites = descendants of KOHATH (Num. iii. 27, 30, iv. 18, 34, 37), &c.

Ko-la'ah [-la'yah], or Ko-la'-ah (Heb. voice of Jehovah, Ges.). 1. A Benjamite whose descendants settled in Jerusalem after the Captivity (Neh. xi. 7).—2. Father of Ahab the false prophet, who was burnt by the king of Babylon (Jer. xxix. 21).

* Koph (Heb. koph, occiput, back of the head, Ges.), the nineteenth letter of the Hebrew alphabet Ps. cxix.). WRITING.

Ko'rah (Heb. baldness). 1. Third son of Esau by Aholibamah (Gen. xxxvi. 5, 14, 18; 1 Chr. i. 35). He was born in Canaan before Esau migrated to Mount Seir (Gen. xxxvi. 5-9), and was one of the "dukes" of Edom.—2. Another Edomitish duke, sprung from Eliphaz, Esau's son by Adah (xxxvi. 16).—3. One of the "sons of Hebron" in 1 Chr. ii. 43.—4. Son of Izhar, the son of Kohath, the son of Levi. He was leader of the famous rebellion against his cousins Moses and Aaron in the wilderness, for which he was destroyed with his followers by an earthquake and flames of fire (Num. xvi. xxvi. 9-11). The particular grievance which rankled in the mind of Korah and his company was their exclusion from the office of the priesthood, and their being confined—those among them who were Levites—to the inferior service of the Tabernacle. The appointment of Elizaphan to be chief of the Kohathites (Num. iii. 30) may have further inflamed his jealousy. Korah's position as leader in this rebellion was evidently the result of his personal character, which was that of a bold, haughty, and ambitious man. From some cause which does not clearly appear, the children of Korah were not involved in the destruction of their father (xxvi. 11). (KORAHITE.) Perhaps the fissure of the ground which swallowed up the tents of Dathan and Abiram did not extend beyond those of the Reubenites. From verse 27 it seems clear that Korah himself was not with Dathan and Abiram at the moment. He himself was doubtless with the 250 men who bare censers nearer the Tabernacle (ver. 19), and perished with them by the "fire from Jehovah" which accompanied the earthquake. In Jude 11 Korah (A. V. "Core") is coupled with Cain and Balaam.

Ko'rah-ite (1 Chr. ix. 19, 31), Ker'hite, or Ko'rath-ite (all fr. Heb. = descendant of Korah), denotes one of the Kohathites who were descended from KORAH 4, and are frequently styled by the synonymous phrase Sons of Korah. The offices filled by the sons of Korah, as far as we are informed, are the following: They were an important branch of the singers in the Kohathite division, Heman himself being a Korahite (1 Chr. vi. 33), and the Korahites being among those who, in Jehoshaphat's reign, "stood up to praise the Lord God of Israel with a loud voice on high" (2 Chr. xx. 19). Hence we find eleven PSALMS (or twelve, if Ps. xliii. is included under the same title as Ps. xlii.) dedicated or assigned to the sons of Korah, viz. Ps. xlii., xlv.-xlix., lxxxiv., lxxxv., lxxxvii., lxxxviii. Others, again, of the sons of Korah were "porters," i. e. doorkeepers, in the Temple, an office of considerable dignity. KOHATH; LEVITES.

Ko're (Heb. partridge, Ges.). 1. A Korahite, ancestor of Shallum and Meshelemiah, chief porters in the reign of David (1 Chr. ix. 19, xxvi. 1).—2. Son of Imnah; a Levite porter and overseer of offerings in Hezekiah's reign (2 Chr. xxxi. 14).—3. In the A. V. of 1 Chr. xxvi. 19, "the sons of Kore" (= Greek for KORAH 4 in LXX.) should properly be "the sons of the KORAHITE."

L

La'a-dah (Heb. order, Ges.), son of Shelah, and grandson of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 21).

La'a-dan (Heb. put in order, Ges.). 1. An Ephraimite, ancestor of Joshua the son of Nun (1 Chr. vii. 26).—2. Son of Gershom; = LIBNI (xxiii. 7-9, xxvi. 21).

La'ban (Heb. white, Ges.), son of BETHUEL, brother of REBEKAH and father of LEAH and RACHEL. The elder branch of Terah's family remained at Haran when ABRAHAM removed to the land of Canaan, and there we first meet with Laban, as taking the leading part in the betrothal of his sister Rebekah to her cousin ISAAC (Gen. xxiv. 10, 29-60, xxvii. 43, xxix. 4). Laban next appears in the sacred narrative as the host of his nephew JACOB at Haran (xxix. 13, 14). The subsequent transactions by which he secured the valuable services of his nephew for fourteen years in return for his two daughters, and for six years as the price of his cattle, together with the disgraceful artifice by which he palmed off his elder and less attractive daughter on the unsuspecting Jacob, are familiar to all (xxix., xxx.). Laban was absent shearing his sheep, when Jacob, having gathered together all his possessions, started with his wives and children for his native land; and it was not till the third day that he heard of their stealthy departure. In hot haste he sets off in pursuit. Jacob and his family had crossed the Euphrates, and were already some days' march in advance of their pursuers; but so large a caravan, encumbered with women and children, and cattle, would travel but slowly (compare xxxiii. 13), and Laban and his kinsmen came up with the retreating party on the E. side of the Jordan, among the mountains of Gilead. After some sharp mutual recrimination, and an unsuccessful search for the teraphim, which Rachel, with the cunning which characterized the whole family, knew well how to hide, a covenant of peace was entered into between the two parties, and a cairn raised about a pillar-stone set up by Jacob, both as a memorial of the covenant, and a boundary which the contracting parties pledged themselves not to pass with hostile intentions. After this, "Laban rose up and kissed his sons and his daughters, and blessed them, and departed, and returned to his place;" and he thenceforward disappears from the Biblical narrative. The leading principle of Laban's conduct was evidently self-interest, and he was little scrupulous as to the means whereby his ends were secured.

* La'ber. AGRICULTURE; BREAD; COOKING; HANDICRAFT; SERVANT; SHEPHERD; SLAVE; WAGES; WOMEN, &c.

* Lace, the A. V. translation of Heb. padhil = a thread, line, cord, Ges., Fii. (Ex. xxviii. 28, 37, xxxix. 21, 31), also translated "thread" (Judg. xvi. 9), "line" (Ez. xl. 3), "bracelet" (Gen. xxxviii. 18, 23), &c.

Lac-e-de-mo'ni-ans [las-] (fr. Gr. Lakedaimonioi; L. Lacedæmonæ) = the inhabitants of SPARTA or Lacedemon, with whom the Jews claimed kindred (1 Mc. xii. 2, 5, 6, 20, 21, xiv. 20, 23, xv. 23; 2 Mc. v. 9).

La'chish [-kish] (Heb. either the smitten, captured, or the invincible, i. e. impregnable, Ges.; hill, height, Fii.), a city of the Amorites, the king of which joined with four others, at the invitation of Adonizedek, king of Jerusalem, to chastise the Gibeonites for their league with Israel (Josh. x. 3, 5, xii. 11). They were routed by Joshua at Beth-horon, and the king of Lachish fell a victim with the others under the trees at Makkedah (x. 26). The destruction of the town seems to have shortly followed the death of the king: it was attacked in its turn, immediately after the fall of Libnah, and, notwithstanding an effort to relieve it by Horam, king of Gezer, was taken, and every soul put to the sword (ver. 31-33). In the special statement that the attack lasted two days, in contradistinction to the other cities which were taken in one (see ver. 35), we gain our first glimpse of that strength of position for which Lachish was afterward remarkable. It should not be overlooked that, though included in the lowland district (Josh. xv. 39), Lachish was a town of the Amorites (x. 6), who appear to have been essentially mountaineers. Its proximity to Libnah is implied many centuries later (2 K. xix. 8). Lachish was one of the cities fortified and garrisoned by Rehoboam after the revolt of the northern kingdom (2 Chr. xi. 9). It was chosen as a refuge by Amaziah from the conspirators who threatened him in Jerusalem, and to whom he at last fell a victim at Lachish (2 K. xiv. 18; 2 Chr. xxv. 27). Later still, in the reign of Hezekiah, it was one of the cities taken by Sennacherib when on his way from Phenicia to Egypt (Rawlinson, Herodotus). This siege is considered by Layard and Hincks to be depicted on the slabs found by the former in one of the chambers of the palace at Kou-yunjik. Another slab seems to show the ground-plan of the same city after its occupation by the conquerors—the Assyrian tents pitched within the walls, and the foreign worship going on. But though the Assyrian records thus appear to assert the capture of Lachish, no statement is to be found either in the Bible or Josephus that it was taken (2 K. xviii. 17, xix. 8; 2 Chr. xxxii. 1, 9; Jer. xxxiv. 7). After the Captivity, Lachish, with its surrounding "fields," was reoccupied by the Jews (Neh. xi. 30). By Eusebius and Jerome, Lachish is mentioned as "seven miles from Eleutheropolis, toward Daroma," i. e. toward the S. No trace of the name has been found in any position corresponding to this (so Mr. Grove). A site called Um Lâkîs, situated on a low, round swell or knoll, and displaying a few columns and other remains of ancient buildings, is found between Gaza and Beit Jibrin, eleven miles (fourteen Roman miles) about W. S. W. from the latter, but its remains are not those of a fortified city able to brave an Assyrian army (Robinson, ii. 47). Porter (in Kitto), Professor Douglas (in Fairbairn), Van de Velde, &c., regard Um Lâkîs as the site of Lachish.

La-en-nus (fr. Gr.), one of the sons of Addi, who returned with Ezra, and had married a foreign wife (1 Esd. ix. 31); = CHELAL?

La'dan (1 Esd. v. 37). DELAIAH 2.

Ladder (Gr. klīnaz = a ladder or staircase) of Tyrus (L. = TYRE), the, one of the extremities (the northern) of the district over which Simon Maccabeus was made captain by Antiochus VI. Theos (1 Mc. xi. 59). The Ladder of Tyre, or of the Tyrians, was the local name for a high mountain, the highest in that neighborhood, one hundred stadia N. of Ptolemais, the modern 'Akka or Acre. (Асено.) The position of the Rû en-Nakhûrah agrees very nearly with this, as it lies ten miles from 'Akka, and is characterized by travellers from Parchi downward as very high and steep. A road was anciently carried by a series of zigzags and staircases over the summit to connect the plain of Ptolemais with Tyre (Porter, in Kitto).

La'el (Heb. of God, sc. created, Ges.), father of Eliasaph, prince of the Gershonites (Num. iii. 24).

La'had (Heb. oppression, Ges.), son of Jahath, descended from Judah (1 Chr. iv. 2).

La-hal'-rel (Heb. of life of vision, Ges.; see BEEZ-LAHAI-ROI), the Well, in the A. V. of Gen. xxiv. 62, and xxv. 11, the name of the famous well of ILGAR's relief, in the oasis of verdure round which ISAAC afterward resided.

Lah'mam (Heb. place of fight, Fii.), a town in the lowland district of Judah (Josh. xv. 40); identified by Wilton (in Fairbairn) with el-Hâmâm, a site about six miles S. E. of 'Ajlân (Eglon).

Lah'mi (Heb. = Belsh-ehemite, Fii.), brother of Goliath the Gittite; slain by ELHANAN the son of Jair, or Jaor (1 Chr. xx. 5).

La'ish (Heb. lion, Ges.). 1. The city taken by the Danites, and under its new name of DAN 2 famous as the northern limit of the nation, and as the depository first of the graven image of Micah (Judg. xviii. 7, 14, 27, 29), and subsequently of one of the calves of Jeroboam.—2. In the A. V. Laish (Heb. Lay'shâh) is again mentioned in the graphic account of Sennacherib's march on Jerusalem (Is. x. 30); but (so Mr. Grove, Gesenius, Fürst, Robinson, &c.) it seems more consonant with the tenor of the whole passage to take it as the name of a small village Laish or Laishah, lying near Gallim and Anathoth. Wilton (in Fairbairn) identifies this Laish with el-'Adwîveh, a village about half-way between 'Anâth (Anathoth) and Jerusalem. In 1 Mc. ix. 5 a village named Alasa (A. V. "ELEASA") is mentioned as the scene of the battle in which Judas was killed. In the Vulgate it is Laiza. The two names may possibly indicate one and the same place, and that the Laishah of Isaiah (so Mr. Grove). ADASA.

La'ish (see above), father of Phaltiel, to whom Saul had given Michal, David's wife (1 Sam. xxv. 44; 2 Sam. iii. 15).

Lakes. GENNESARET; MEROM; PALESTINE; SEA, THE SALT.

La'kum (Heb. Lakkûm, properly = way-stopper, i. e. a fortified place, Ges.), one of the places on the boundary of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 33).

Lamb = a young SHEEP; the A. V. translation of—1. Chal. inmar = Heb. cebes. See below, No. 3 (Ez. vi. 9, 17, vii. 17).—2. Heb. lâleh (1 Sam. vii. 9; Is. lxxv. 25), a young sucking lamb; originally the young of any animal.—3. Heb. cebes, ceseb, and the feminines cibâh, or cabsûh, and cibâh, respectively denote a male and female lamb from the first to the third year. The former perhaps more nearly coincide with the English provincial term hog or hogget = a young ram before he is shorn. Young rams of this age formed an important part of almost every sacrifice.—4. Heb. car, a fat ram, or more probably wether, as the word is generally employed in opposition to ayil = a "ram" (Deut. xxxii. 14; 2 K. iii. 4; Is. xxxiv. 6). The Tyrians obtained their supply from Arabia and Kedar (Ez. xxvii. 21), and the pastures of Bashan were famous as grazing-grounds (xxxix. 18).—5. Heb. lâdn, rendered "lamb" (margin "kid") in Ex. xii. 21, is properly a collective term denoting a "flock" of small cattle, sheep, and goats, in distinction from herds of the larger animals (Eccl. ii. 7; Ez. xlv. 15). In opposition to this collective term.—6. Heb. seh denotes the individuals of a flock, whether sheep or goats (Gen. xxii. 7, 8; Ex. xii. 3, xxii. 1, &c.).—7. Gr. amnos, used in N. T. only figuratively of Christ as a lamb for sacrifices four times (Jn. i. 29, 36; Acts viii. 32; 1 Pet. i. 19); in LXX. = No. 3, 4, &c.—8. Gr. arén? pl. arnes (Lk. x. 3 only); in LXX. = No. 3.—9. Gr. arnion (a diminutive of No. 8), used in N. T. only figuratively of Christians (Jn. xxi. 15) and of Christ (Rev. v. 6, 8, 12, 13, and twenty-five other times in Rev.); in LXX. = No. 3.—On the Paschal Lamb, see PASSOVER.

La'mech [-mek] (L. fr. Heb. Lamech = powerful, Ges. ?; overthrower of enemies, wild man, Fü.), the name of two persons in antediluvian history. I. The fifth lineal descendant from Cain (Gen. iv. 18–24). He is the only one except Enoch, of the posterity of Cain, whose history is related with some detail. He is the first polygamist on record. His two wives, Adah and Zillah, and his daughter Naamah, are, with Eve, the only antediluvian women whose names are mentioned by Moses. His three sons—JABAL, JUBAL, and TUBAL-CAIN—are celebrated in Scripture as authors of useful inventions. Josephus relates that the number of his sons was seventy-seven, and Jerome records the same tradition, adding that they were all cut off by the Deluge, and that this was the seventy-seven-fold vengeance which Lamech imprecated. The remarkable poem which Lamech uttered has not yet been explained quite satisfactorily. It is the only extant specimen of antediluvian poetry; it came down, perhaps as a popular song, to the generation for whom Moses wrote, and he inserts it in its proper place in his history. It may be rendered (so Mr. Bullock):—

Adah and Zillah! hear my voice,
Ye wives of Lamech! give ear unto my speech;
For a man had I slain for smiting me,
And a youth for wounding me:

Surely sevenfold shall Cain be avenged.
But Lamech seventy-and-seven.

Jerome relates, as a tradition of his predecessors and of the Jews, that Cain was accidentally slain by Lamech in the seventh generation from Adam. Luther considers the occasion of the poem to be the deliberate murder of Cain by Lamech. Herder regards it as Lamech's song of exultation on the invention of the sword by his son Tubal-cain, in the possession of which he foresaw a great advantage to himself and his family over any enemies. This interpretation appears, on the whole, to be the best.—2. Father of Noah (Gen. v. 29).

* La'med (Heb. lâmed = ox-goad, Ges.), the twelfth letter of the Hebrew alphabet (Ps. cxix.). WRITING.

Lam-en-ta-tions of Jer-e-mi'ah, the. The Hebrew title of this Book (Ûyechâh = A. V. "How") is taken, like those of the five Books of Moses, from the Hebrew word with which it opens, and which appears to have been almost a received formula for the commencement of a song of wailing (compare 2 Sam. i. 19–27). The poems included in this collection appear in the Hebrew CANON with no name attached to them, and there is no direct external evidence that they were written by the prophet JEREMIAH earlier than the date given in the prefatory verse which appears in the LXX. This represents, however, the established belief of the Jews after the completion of the canon. The poems belong unmistakably to the last days of the kingdom, or the commencement of the exile. They are written by one who speaks, with the vividness and intensity of an eye-witness, of the misery which he bewails. It might almost be enough to ask (so Prof. Plumptre, the original author of this article), who else then living could have written with that union of strong passionate feeling and entire submission to Jehovah which characterizes both the Lamentations and the Prophecy of Jeremiah? The evidences of identity are, however, stronger and more minute from characteristic words, expressions, &c. Assuming this as sufficiently established, there come the questions—I. When, and on what occasion did Jeremiah write it? II. In what relation did it stand to his other writings? III. What light does it throw on his personal history, or on that of the time in which he lived? I. The earliest statement on this point is that of Josephus (x. 5, § 1). He finds among the books extant in his own time the lamentations on the death of Josiah, which are mentioned in 2 Chr. xxxv. 25. As there are no traces of any other poem of this kind in the later Jewish literature, it has been inferred, naturally enough, that he speaks of this (Jerome, Usher, Dathe, Michaelis, Calovius, De Wette). It does not appear, however, to rest on any better grounds than a hasty conjecture. And against it we have to set (1.) the tradition on the other side embodied in the preface of the LXX., (2.) the contents of the book itself. We look in vain for a single word distinctive of a funeral dirge over a devout and zealous reformer like Josiah, while we find, step by step, the closest possible likeness between the pictures of misery in the Lamentations and the events of the closing years of the reign of Zedekiah (compare Lam. ii. 11, 12, 20, iv. 4, 9, with 2 K. xxv. 3, &c.). Unless we adopt the strained hypothesis that the whole poem is prophetic in the sense of being predictive, the writer seeing the future as if it were actually present, or the still wilder conjecture of Rashi, that this was the roll which Jehoiachin destroyed, and which was rewritten by Baruch or Jeremiah, we are compelled to come to the conclusion that the coincidence is not accidental, and to adopt the later, not the earlier, of the dates. At what period after the capture of the city the prophet gave this utterance to his sorrow we can only conjecture, and the materials for doing so with any probability are but scanty. He may have written it immediately after the attack was over, or when he was with Gedaliah at Mizpeh, or when he was with his countrymen at Tahpanhes. II. It is well, however, to be reminded by these conjectures that we have before us, not a book in five chapters, but five separate poems, each complete in itself, each having a distinct subject, yet brought at the same time under a plan which includes them all. It is clear, before entering on any other characteristics, that we find, in full predominance, that strong personal emotion which mingled itself, in greater or less measure, with the whole prophetic work of Jeremiah. Other differences between the two books that bear the prophet's name grew out of this. Here there is more attention to form, more elaboration. The rhythm is more uniform than in the prophecies. A complicated alphabetic structure pervades nearly the whole book. (1.) Chapters i., ii., and iv. contain twenty-two verses each, arranged in alphabetic order, each verse falling into three nearly-balanced clauses; ii. 19 forms an exception as having a fourth clause. (2.) Chapter iii. contains three short verses under each letter of the alphabet, the initial letter being three times repeated. (3.) Chapter v. contains the same number of verses as chapters i., ii., iv., but without the alphabetic order. (PORRY, HEBREW; WRITING.) III. The power of entering into the spirit and meaning of these poems depends on two distinct conditions. We must seek to see, as with our own eyes, the desolation, misery, confusion, which came before those of the prophet. We must endeavor also to feel as he felt when he looked on them. And the last is the more difficult of the two. Jeremiah was not merely a patriot-poet, weeping over the ruin of his country. He was a prophet who had seen all this coming, and had foretold it as inevitable. He had urged submission to the Chaldeans as the only mode of diminishing the terrors of that "day of the Lord." And now the Chaldeans were come, irritated by the perfidy and rebellion of the king and princes of Judah; and the actual horrors that he saw, surpassed, though he had predicted them, all that he had been able to imagine. All feeling of exultation in which, as a mere prophet of evil, he might have indulged at the fulfillment of his forebodings, was swallowed up in deep, overwhelming sorrow. Yet sorrow, not less than other emotions, works on men according to their characters, and a man with Jeremiah's gift of utterance could not sit down in the mere silence and stupor of a hopeless grief. He was compelled to give expression to that which was devouring his heart and the heart of his people. The act itself was a relief to him. It led him on (as will be seen hereafter) to a calmer and serenest state. It revived the faith and hope which had been nearly crushed out.—An examination of the five poems will enable us to judge how far each stands by itself, how far they are connected as parts forming a whole. (i.) The opening verse strikes the key-note of the whole poem. That which haunts the prophet's mind is the solitude in which he finds himself.

She that was "princess among the nations" sits, "solitary," "as a widow." After the manner so characteristic of Hebrew poetry, the personality of the writer now recedes and now advances, and blends by hardly perceptible transitions with that of the city which he personifies, and with which he, as it were, identifies himself. Mingling with this outburst of sorrow there are two thoughts characteristic both of the man and the time. The calamities which the nation suffers are the consequences of its sins. There must be the confession of those sins. There is also, at any rate, this gleam of consolation, that Judah is not alone in her sufferings. Those who have exulted in her destruction shall drink of the same cup. (ii.) As the solitude of the city was the subject of the first lamentation, so the destruction that had laid it waste is that which is most conspicuous in the second. Added to all this, there was the remembrance of that which had been all along the great trial of Jeremiah's life, against which he had to wage continual war. The prophets of Jerusalem had seen vain and foolish things, false burdens, and causes of banishment (14). A righteous judgment had fallen on them. The prophets found no vision of Jehovah (9). The king and the princes who had listened to them were captive among the Gentiles. (iii.) The difference already noticed in the structure of this poem indicates a corresponding difference in its substance. In the two preceding poems, Jeremiah had spoken of the misery and destruction of Jerusalem. In the third he speaks chiefly, though not exclusively, of his own. But here, as in the prophecies, we find a Gospel for the weary and heavy-laden, a trust, not to be shaken, in the mercy and righteousness of Jehovah. (iv.) It might seem, at first, as if the fourth poem did but reproduce the pictures and the thoughts of the first and second. There come before us, once again, the famine, the misery, the desolation, that had fallen on the holy city, making all faces gather blackness. One new element in the picture is found in the contrast between the past glory of the consecrated families of the kingly and priestly stocks ("Nazirites" in A. V.) and their later misery and shame. Some changes there are, however, not without interest in their relation to the poet's own life and to the history of his time. All the facts gain a new significance by being seen in the light of the personal experience of the third poem. (v.) One great difference in the fifth and last section of the poem has been already pointed out. It obviously indicates either a deliberate abandonment of the alphabetic structure, or the unfinished character of the concluding elegy. There are signs also of a later date than that of the preceding poems. Though the horrors of the famine are ineffaceable, yet that which he has before him is rather the continued protracted suffering of the rule of the Chaldeans. There are perhaps few portions of the O. T. which appear to have done the work they were meant to do more effectually than this. It has supplied thousands with the fullest utterance for their sorrows in the critical periods of national or individual suffering. We may well believe that it soothed the weary years of the Babylonian exile. On the ninth day of the month of Ab (July), the Lamentations of Jeremiah were read, year by year, with fasting and weeping, to commemorate the misery out of which the people had been delivered. It has come to be connected with the thoughts of a later devastation, and its words enter, sometimes at least, into the prayers of the pilgrim Jews who meet at the "place of wailing" to mourn over the departed glory of JERUSALEM. It enters largely into the order of the Latin Church for the services of Passion-week.—A few facts connected with the external history of the Book remain to be stated. The position which it has occupied in the Canon of the O. T. has varied from time to time. In the received Hebrew arrangement it is placed among the Hagiographa, between Ruth and Ecclesiastes. In the Bomberg Bible of 1521, it stands among the five Megilloth after the Books of Moses. The LXX. group the writings connected with the name of Jeremiah together, but the Book of Baruch comes between the prophecy and the Lamentation. On the hypothesis of some writers that Jer. lii. was originally the introduction to the poem, it would follow that the arrangement of the Vulgate and the A. V. corresponds more closely than any other to that which we must look on as the original one. BIBLE; INSPIRATION; OLD TESTAMENT.

The lamps were lighted every evening, and cleansed every morning (Ex. xxx. 7, 8).—2. (Heb. lappid.) use of lamps fed with oil in marriage processions is alluded to in the parable of the ten virgins (Mat. xxv. 1). Probably (so Kitto) animal fat was also used in lamps by the Hebrews, as it is often now in some parts of western Asia. Cotton wicks are now used throughout Asia; but probably the Hebrews like the Egyptians employed the outer and coarser fibre of flax, or linen yarn. A modern Egyptian lamp consists of a small glass vessel with a tube at the bottom containing a cotton-wick twisted round a piece of straw. This lamp appears in the cut, both separately, and with the usual receptacle of wood, which protects the flame from the wind. La-od-i-ee'a [-see'ah] (fr. Gr., see below), a town of some consequence in the Roman province of ASIA; situated in the valley of the river Meander, on a small river called the Lycus, with COLOSSE and ΠΙΕΡΑΠΟΛΙΣ a few miles distant to the W. Built, or rather rebuilt, by one of the Seleucid monarchs, and named in honor of his wife, Laodicea became under the Roman government a place of some importance. Its trade was considerable; it lay on the line of a great road; and it was the seat of a court of justice. From Rev. iii. 17, we gather it was a place of great wealth. The damage caused by an earthquake in the reign of Tiberius was promptly repaired by the energy of the inhabitants. Soon after this occurrence Christianity was introduced into Laodicea, not, however, as it would seem, through the direct agency of St. Paul. We have good reason for believing that when, in writing from Rome to the Christians of Colosse, he sent a greeting to those of Laodicea, he had not personally visited either place. But the preaching of the Gospel at Ephesus (Acts xviii. 19-xix. 41) must inevitably have resulted in the formation of churches in the neighboring cities, especially where Jews were settled: and there were Jews in Laodicea. The Church of the Laodiceans is pointedly rebuked and threatened with divine judgments for its lukewarmness (Rev. ii. 14 ff.). In subsequent times

Laodicea became a Christian city of eminence, the see of a bishop, and a meeting-place of councils. The Mohammedan invaders destroyed it; and it is now a scene of utter desolation: but the extensive ruins at the village of Eski Hissar justify all that we read of Laodicea in Greek and Roman writers. One Biblical subject of interest is connected with Laodicea. From Col. iv. 16 it appears that St. Paul wrote a letter to this place when he wrote the letter to Colosse. The question arises whether we can give any account of this Laodicean epistle. Wieseler's theory is that the Epistle to Philemon is meant. Another view, maintained by Paley, Conybeare & Howson, &c., is that the Epistle to the Ephesians is intended. Usher's view is that this last epistle was a circular letter sent to Laodicea among other places. The apocryphal Epistle to the Laodiceans is a late and clumsy forgery. The subscription at the end of 1 Timothy "written from Laodicea" is of no authority.

La-od-i-ce'ans = the inhabitants of LAODICEA (Col. iv. 16; Rev. iii. 14).

Lap'i-doth (L. fr. Heb. = torches), the husband of Deborah the prophetess (Judg. iv. 4 only).

Lap'wing (Heb. duciphath) occurs only in Lev. xi. 19, and Deut. xiv. 18, amongst those birds which were forbidden by the law of Moses to be eaten by the Israelites. Commentators generally agree with the LXX. and Vulgate that the Hoopoe is the bird intended. According to Bochart, these four different interpretations have been assigned to duciphath:—1. The Sadducees supposed the bird intended to be the common hen, which they therefore refused to eat. 2. Another interpretation understands the cock of the woods (Tetrao Urogallus). 3. Other interpreters think the allagen (?) is meant. 4. The last interpretation is the Hoopoe. Many, and curious in some instances, are the derivations proposed for the Hebrew word, but the most probable one is the mountain-cock. It must, however, be remarked that the observations of the habits of the hoopoe recorded by modern zoologists do not appear to warrant the assertion that it is so pre-eminently a mountain-bird as has been implied above. Marshy ground, ploughed land, wooded districts, such as are near to water, are more especially its favorite haunts. The hoopoe was accounted an unclean bird by the Mosaic law, nor is it now eaten except occasionally in those countries where it is abundantly found—Egypt, France, Spain, &c. &c. It seems to have been always regarded, both by Arabians and Greeks, with superstitious reverence. It is nearly as large as a pigeon. Its crest is very elegant, the long feathers forming it are each of them tipped with black.

La-se'a (fr. Gr. Lasaia; also written La-se'a)

[-see'ab]) (Acts xxvii. 8). A few years ago it would have been impossible to give any information regarding this Cretan city, except indeed that it probably = the "Lisia" mentioned in the Pewinger Table as sixteen miles E. of GORTYNA. But in January, 1856, a yachting party made inquiries at FAIR HAVENS, and were told that the name Lasea was still given to some ruins a few miles E. A short search sufficed to discover these ruins, and independent testimony confirmed the name.

La'sha (fr. Heb. = chink, fissure, Ges.), a place noticed in Gen. x. 19 only, as marking the limit of the country of the Canaanites. It lay apparently somewhere in the S. E. of Palestine, though Wilton (in Fbn.), &c., identify it with LAISH 1 = DAN 2. Jerome and other writers identify it with Callirhoë, a spot famous for hot springs, near the eastern shore of the Dead Sea in the deep, narrow chasm of Wady Zerka Ma'in. The baths here were once celebrated for their medicinal properties, and were visited by Herod during his last illness.

La-shar'on [-shair'on, compare SHARON] (fr. Heb. = on the plain or at Sharon?), one of the Canaanite towns whose kings were killed by Joshua (Josh. xii. 18). The Vulgate, Gesenius, &c., make Lasharon = SHARON. Wilton (in Fbn.) would identify it with Sārūneh, a place S. W. from Tiberias.

Las'the-nas [-neez] (Gr. strength of a stone, Walton's Polyglott), an officer who stood high in the favor of Demetrius II. Nicator, described as "cousin" (1 Mc. xi. 31) and "father" (ver. 32) of the king. Both words may be taken as titles of high nobility. It appears from Josephus (xiii. 4, § 3) that he was a Cretan, to whom Demetrius was indebted for a large body of mercenaries (comp. 1 Mc. x. 67).

Lateh'et, the thong or fastening by which the SANDAL was attached to the foot. In the proverbial expression in Gen. xiv. 23, it = something trivial or worthless. Another semi-proverbial expression in Lk. iii. 16 points to the fact that the office of bearing and unfastening the shoes of great personages fell to the meanest slaves.

Lat'in (fr. L.), the language spoken by the Romans, is mentioned only in Jn. xix. 20, and Lk. xxiii. 38. (ROMAN EMPIRE; ROME; TONGUES, CONFUSION OF.).—Latin Versions of the Bible; see VERSIONS, ANCIENT LATIN.

Lat'tee, the A. V. translation of three Hebrew words. 1. Eshnab (= a latticed window, through which the cool breezes enter the house, Ges.), which occurs but twice, Judg. v. 28, and Prov. vii. 6, and in the latter passage is translated "casement" in the A. V. In both instances it stands in parallelism with "window."—2. Huraccim or characcim (Cant. ii. 9), apparently = No. 1, though a word of later date.—3. Sebachah simply = a network placed before a window or balcony. Perhaps the network through which Ahaziah fell and received his mortal injury was on the parapet of his palace (2 K. i. 2).

* Laugh [lahf], to, the A. V. translation of—1. Heb. 'd'ag, twice (Job ix. 23; Ps. lxxx. 6, Heb. 7); usually translated "laugh to scorn" (2 K. xix. 21; Neh. ii. 19, &c.), or "mock" (Job xi. 3; Prov. i. 26, xxx. 17, &c.), once to "have in derision" (Ps. ii. 4).—2. Heb. tsahak or tsachak (Gen. xvii. 17, xviii. 12, 13, 15, xxi. 6), elsewhere translated "to mock" (xix. 14, xxi. 9, xxxix. 14, 17), "to play" (Ex. xxxii. 6), "made them sport" (Judg. xvi. 25), "sporting" (Gen. xxvi. 8). A kindred word is translated "laugh" (xxi. 6), and "laughed to scorn" (Ez. xxiii. 32).—3. Heb. sahak or sachak, the common word for "laugh" (Ps. ii. 4; Eccl. iii. 4, &c.), also translated "to play" (2 Sam. ii. 14, vi. 5, 21; Zech. viii. 5, &c.), "make sport" (Judg. xvi. 25, 27), "rejoice" (Prov. viii. 30, 31, xxxi. 25), "mock", (Lam. i. 7, &c.), "scorn" (Job xxxix. 7, 18), "deride" (Hab. i. 10), &c. The noun sichok or sichok is translated "laughter" (Ps. cxvi. 2; Eccl. vii. 3, 6, &c.), "sport" (Prov. x. 23), "derision" (Jer. xx. 7, &c.).—4. Gr. gelao (Lk. vi. 21, 25 only); in LXX. = No. 2. The noun gelos occurs in N. T. in Jas. iv. 9 only, and is translated "laughter." The compound verb katagelao (= to laugh at in scorn, to deride, Rbn., N. T. Lex.) is translated "laugh to scorn" (Mat. ix. 24; Mk. v. 40; Lk. viii. 53).

* Laugh'ter. LAUGH.

La'ver (fr. L.; Heb. citydr). 1. In the TABERNACLE, a vessel of brass containing water for the priests to wash their hands and feet before offering sacrifice. It stood in the court between the altar and the door of the Tabernacle, and, according to Jewish tradition, a little to the S. (Ex. xxx. 19, 21; Reland, Ant. Heb. pt. i. ch. iv. 9). It rested on a basis, i. e. a foot, though by some explained to be a cover of copper or brass, which, as well as the laver itself, was made from the mirrors of the women who assembled at the door of the Tabernacle-court (Ex. xxxviii. 8). The form of the laver is not specified, but may be assumed to have been circular. Like the other vessels belonging to the Tabernacle, it was, together with its "foot," consecrated with oil (Lev. viii. 10, 11). As no mention is made of any vessel for washing the flesh of the sacrificial victims, it is possible that the laver may have been used for this purpose also (Reland, Ant. Heb. i. iv. 9). 2. In Solomon's TEMPLE, besides the great molten sea (SEA, MOLTEN), there were ten lavers of brass, raised on bases (1 K. vii. 27, 39), five on the N. and S. sides respectively of the court of the priests. Each laver contained forty of the measures called

"bath." They were used for washing the animals to be offered in burnt-offerings (2 Chr. iv. 6). The dimensions of the bases with the lavers, as given in the Hebrew text, are 4 cubits in length and breadth, and 3 in height. The LXX. gives  $4 \times 4 \times 6$  in height. Josephus makes them 5 in length, 4 in width, and 6 in height (1 K. vii. 28; Thenius; Josephus viii. 3, § 3). There were to each four wheels of  $1\frac{1}{2}$  cubits in diameter, with spokes, &c., all cast in one piece. The principal parts requiring explanation may be thus enumerated:—(a) "Borders," probably panels. Gesenius supposes these to have been ornaments like square shields with engraved work. (b) "Ledges," joints in corners of bases or fillets covering joints. (c) "Additions," probably festoons; Lightfoot translates borders descending obliquely. (d) "Plates," probably axles, cast in the same piece as the wheels. (e) "Undersettors," either the naves of the wheels, or a sort of handles for moving the whole machine (so Mr. Phillott); Lightfoot translates columns supporting the laver; Gesenius shoulders of an axle. (f) "Naves." (g) "Spokes." (h) "Felloes." (i) "Chapiter," perhaps the rim of the circular opening ("mouth," ver. 31) in the convex top (so Mr. Phillott); Gesenius translates capitulum, chapiter of a column. (k) A "round compass," perhaps the convex roof of the base. To these parts Josephus (viii. 3, § 6) adds chains, probably = the festoons above mentioned.

Law (Heb. tôrâh; Gr. nomos). The word is properly used, in Scripture as elsewhere, to express a definite commandment laid down by any recognized authority. The commandment may be general, or (as in Lev. vi. 9, 14, &c., "the law of the burnt-offering," &c.), particular in its bearing; the authority either human or divine. But when the word is used with the article, and without any words of limitation, it refers to the expressed will of God, and, in nine cases out of ten, to the Mosaic Law (Law or Moses), or to the PENTATEUCH, of which it forms the chief portion. The Hebrew word tôrâh (so Mr. Barry) lays more stress on its moral authority, as teaching the truth, and guiding in the right way; the Greek nomos, on its constraining power, as imposed and enforced by a recognized authority. The sense of the word, however, extends its scope, and assumes a more abstract character in the writings of St. Paul. Nomos, when used by him with the article ("the Law") still refers in general to the Law of Moses; but when used without the article, so as to embrace any manifestation of "law," it includes all powers which act on the will of man by compulsion, or by the pressure of external motives, whether their commands be or be not expressed in definite forms. The occasional use of the word "law" (as in Rom. iii. 27, "law of faith;" &c.), to denote an internal principle of action, does not really militate against the general rule. It should also be noticed that the title "the Law" is occasionally used loosely to refer to the whole of the O. T. (as in Jn. x. 34, referring to Ps. lxxxii. 6; in Jn. xv. 25, referring to Ps. xxxv. 19; and in 1 Cor. xiv. 21, referring to Is. xxviii. 11, 12).

Law (see above) of Moses (see Moses). It will be the object of this article (originally by Mr. Barry) to give a brief analysis of the substance of the Law, to point out its main principles, and to explain the position which it occupies in the progress of Divine Revelation. In order to do this the more clearly, it seems best to speak of the Law, I., in relation to the past; II., in its own intrinsic character; and, III., in its relation to the future. I. (a.) In reference to the past, it is all-important, for the proper understanding of the Law, to remember its entire dependence on the Abrahamic Covenant, and its adaptation thereto (see Gal. iii. 17-24). That covenant had a twofold character. It contained the "spiritual promise" of the Messiah, which was given to the Jews as representatives of the whole human race. But it contained also the temporal promises subsidiary to the former. These promises were special, given distinctively to the Jews as a nation. It follows that there would be in the Law a corresponding duality of nature. There would be in it much peculiar to the Jews, local, special, and transitory; but the fundamental principles must be universal. (b.) The nature of this relation of the Law to the promise is clearly pointed out. The belief in God as the Redeemer of man, and the hope of His manifestation as such in the person of the Messiah, involved the belief that the Spiritual Power must be superior to all carnal obstructions, and that there was in man a spiritual element which could rule his life by communion with a Spirit from above. But it involved also the idea of an antagonistic Power of Evil, from which man was to be redeemed, existing in each individual, and existing also in the world at large. The promise was the witness of the one truth; the Law was the declaration of the other. (c.) Nor is it less essential to remark the period of the history at which it was given. It marked and determined the transition of Israel from the condition of a tribe to that of a nation, and its definite assumption of a distinct position and office in the history of the world. (d.) Yet, though new in its general conception, it was probably not wholly new in its materials. There must necessarily have been, before the Law, commandments and revelations of a fragmentary character, under which Israel had hitherto grown up. (ADULTERY; CLEAN AND UNCLEAN; MARRIAGE; MURDER; SABBATH; SACRIFICE, &c.) It is the peculiar mark of legislative genius to mould by fundamental principles, and animate by a higher inspiration, materials previously existing in a cruder state. So far, therefore, as they were consistent with the objects of the Jewish law, the customs of Palestine and the laws of Egypt would doubtless be traceable in the Mosaic system. (e.) In close connection with, and almost in consequence of this reference to antiquity, we find an accommodation of the Law to the temper and circumstances of the Israelites, to which our Lord refers in the case of divorce (Mat. xix. 7, 8) as necessarily interfering with its absolute perfection. In many cases it rather should be said to guide and modify existing usages than actually to sanction them; and the ignorance of their existence may lead to a conception of its ordinances not only erroneous, but actually the reverse of the truth. (BLOOD, AVENGER OF; ELDER; JUDGE; PATRIARCH; PUNISHMENTS.) Nor is it less noticeable that the degree of prominence given to each part of the Mosaic system has a similar reference to the period at which the nation had arrived. The ceremonial portion is marked out distinctly and with elaboration; the moral and criminal law is clearly and sternly decisive; even the civil law, so far as it relates to individuals, is systematic; because all these were called for by the past growth of the nation, and needed in order to settle and develop its resources. But the political and constitutional law is comparatively imperfect; a few leading principles are laid down, to be developed hereafter; but the law is directed rather to sanction the various powers of the state, than to define and balance their operations. (f.) In close connection with this subject we observe also the gradual process by which the Law was revealed to the Israelites. In Ex. xx.-xxiii., in direct connection with the revelation from Mount Sinai, that which may be called the rough outline of the Mosaic Law is given by God, solemnly recorded by Moses, and accepted by the people. In Ex. xxv.-xxxi. there is a similar outline of the Mosaic ceremonial. On the basis of these it may be conceived that the fabric of the Mosaic system gradually grew up under the requirements of the time. The first revelation of the Law in any thing like a perfect form is found in DEUTERONOMY. Yet even then the revelation was not final; it was the duty of the prophets to amend and explain in special points (Ez. xviii.), and to bring out more clearly its great principles. (PROPHET.—II. In giving an analysis of the substance of the Law, it will probably be better to treat it, as any other system of laws is usually treated, by dividing it into—(I.) Laws Civil; (II.) Laws Criminal; (III.) Laws Judicial and Constitutional; (IV.) Laws Ecclesiastical and Ceremonial

(I.) LAWS CIVIL.

(a) Of Persons.

(a) FATHER and SON. The power of a Father to be held sacred; cursing, or smiting (Ex. xxi. 15, 17; Lev. xx. 9), or stubborn and wilful disobedience, to be considered capital crimes. But uncontrolled power of life and death was apparently refused to the father, and vested only in the congregation (Deut. xxi. 18-21). (CHILD: PUNISHMENTS.) Right of the first-born to a double portion of the inheritance not to be set aside by partiality (xxi. 15-17). INHERITANCE by daughters to be allowed in default of sons, provided (Num. xxvii. 6-8, compare xxxvi.) that heiresses married in their own tribe. Daughters unmarried to be entirely dependent on their father (xxx. 3-5).

(b) Husband and Wife. The power of a Husband to be so great that a wife could never be sui juris (i. e. of her own right, i. e. legally independent), or enter independently into any engagement, even before God (Num. xxx. 6-15). A widow or divorced wife became independent, and did not again fall under her father's power (verse 9). Divorce (for uncleanness) allowed, but to be formal and irrevocable (Deut. xxiv. 1-4). Marriage within certain degrees forbidden (Lev. xviii., &c.). A Slave Wife, whether bought or captive, not to be actual property, nor to be sold; if ill-treated, to be ipso facto (i. e. by that very fact) free (Ex. xxi. 7, 9; Deut. xxi. 10-14). Slander against a wife's virginity, to be punished by fine, and by deprivation of power of divorce; on the other hand, ante-conjugal uncleanness in her to be punished by death (xxii. 19-21). The raising up of seed (Levirate law) a formal right to be claimed by the widow, under pain of infamy, with a view to preservation of families (xxv. 5-10). MARRIAGE: WOMEN.

(c) Master and SLAVE. Power of Master so far limited, that death under actual chastisement was punishable (Ex. xxi. 20); and maiming was to give liberty ipso facto (28, 27). The Hebrew slave to be freed at the SABBATICAL YEAR,<sup>1</sup> and provided with necessaries (his wife and children to go with only if he came to his master with him), unless by his own formal act he consented to be a perpetual slave (xxi. 1-6; Deut. xv. 12-18). In any case, it would seem, to be freed at the JUBILEE (Lev. xxv. 10), with his children. If sold to a resident alien, to be always redeemable, at a price proportional to the distance of the jubilee (47-54). Foreign slaves to be held and inherited as property forever (45, 46); and fugitive slaves from foreign nations not to be given up (Deut. xxiii. 15).

(d) Strangers. (STRANGER.) They seem never to have been sui juris (i. e. legally independent), or able to protect themselves, and accordingly protection and kindness toward them are enjoined as a sacred duty (Ex. xxii. 21; Lev. xix. 33, 34).

(b) Law of Things.

(a) Laws of Land (and Property). (1.) All land to be the property of God alone, and its holders to be deemed His tenants (Lev. xlv. 23). (AGRICULTURE.)—(2.) All sold Land therefore to return to its original owners at the JUBILEE, and the price of sale to be calculated accordingly; and redemption on equitable terms to be allowed at all times (25-27). A House sold to be redeemable within a year; and, if not redeemed, to pass away altogether (29, 30). But the Houses of the Levites, or those in unwalled villages, to be redeemable at all times. In the same way as land; and the Levitical suburbs to be inalienable (31-34).—(3.) Land or Houses sanctified, or tithes, or unclean firstlings to be capable of being redeemed, at sixth-fifths of the value (calculated by the priest according to the distance from the jubilee-year); if devoted by the owner and unredeemed, to be hallowed at the jubilee forever, and given to the priests; if only by a possessor, to return to the owner at the jubilee (xxvii. 14-34).—(4.) INHERITANCE descended to—

(2.) Daughters.<sup>2</sup>

(3.) Brothers.

(4.) Uncles on the Father's side.

(5.) Next Kinsmen, generally.

(b) Laws of Debt. (1.) All Debts (to an Israelite) to be released at the 7th (sabbatical) year; a blessing promised to obedience, and a curse on a refusal to lend (Deut. xv. 1-11).—(2.) Usury (from Israelites) not to be taken (Ex. xxii. 25-27; Deut. xxiii. 19, 20).—(3.) Pledges not to be insolently or ruinously exacted (xxiv. 6, 10-13, 17, 18). DEPOSIT; LOAN; SABBATICAL YEAR.

(c) Taxation. (1.) Census-money, a poll-tax (of a half-shekel), to be paid for the service of the Tabernacle (Ex. xxx. 12-16). All spoil in war to be halved; of the combatant's half, one-fifth-hundredth, of the people's, one-fiftieth, to be paid for a "heave-offering" to Jehovah. CENSUS; TAXING.—(2.) Tithes. (a) Tithes of all produce to be given for maintenance of the Levites (Num. xviii. 20-24). Of this one-tenth to be paid as a heave-offering for the maintenance of the priests (24-32). (b) Second TITHE to be bestowed in religious feasting and charity, either at the Holy Place, or every third year at home (5) (Deut. xiv. 22-28). (c) First-Fruits of corn, wine, and oil (at least one-sixtieth, generally one-fortieth, for the priests) to be offered at Jerusalem, with a solemn declaration of dependence on God the king of Israel (xxvi. 1-15; Num. xviii. 12, 13). Firstlings of clean beasts: the redemption-money (five shekels) of man, and (one-half shekel, or one eikel) of unclean beasts, to be given to the priests after sacrifice (15-18).—(3.) Poor Laws. (POOR.) (a) Gleanings (in field or vineyard) to be a legal right of the poor (Lev. xix. 9, 10; Deut. xxiv. 19-22). (b) Slight Trespass (eating on the spot) to be allowed as legal (xxiii. 24, 25). (c) Second TITHE (see 2 b) to be given in charity. (d) WAGES to be paid day by day (Deut. xxiv. 15).—(4.) Maintenance of Priests (Num. xviii. 8-32) (PRIEST). (a) Tenth of Levites' TITHE (see 2 a). (b) The heart and wave-offerings (the breast and right shoulder of all peace-offerings). (c) The meat and sin-offerings, to be eaten solemnly, and only in the Holy Place. (d) First-Fruits and redemption-money (see 2 b). (e) Price of all devoted things, unless specially given for a sacred service. A man's service, or that of his household, to be redeemed at fifty shekels for man, thirty for woman, twenty for boy, and ten for girl.

(II.) LAWS CRIMINAL.

(A) Offences against God (of the nature of treason).

1st Command. Acknowledgment of false gods (Ex. xxii. 20), as e. g. Molech (Lev. xx. 1-5), and generally all IDOLATRY (Deut. xxi. xlvii. 2-5).

2d Command. Witchcraft and false prophecy (Ex. xxii. 18; Deut. xviii. 9-22; Lev. xxi. 33). DIVINATION; MAGIC.

3d Command. BLASPHEMY (Lev. xxiv. 15, 16).

4th Command. Sabbath-breaking (Num. xv. 32-36). SABBATH.

(B) Offences against Man.

5th Command. Disobedience to or cursing or smiting of parents (Ex. xxi. 15, 17; Lev. xx. 9; Deut. xxi. 18-21), to be punished by death by stoning, publicly adjudged and inflicted; so also of disobedience to the priests (as Judges) or Supreme Judge. Compare 1 K. xxi. 10-14 (Naboth); 2 Chr. xxiv. 21 (Zechariah). FATHER; PATRIARCH.

6th Command. (1.) MURDER, to be punished by death without sanctuary or reprieve, or satisfaction (Ex. xxi. 12, 14; Deut. xix. 11-13). Death of a slave, actually under the rod, to be punished (Ex. xxi. 20, 21).—(2.) Death by negligence, to be punished by death (28-30).—(3.) Accidental Homicide: the avenger of blood to be escaped by flight to the cities of refuge (CITY OF REFUGE) till the death of the high-priest (Num. xxxv. 9-28; Deut. iv. 41-

43. xix. 4-10).—(4.) Uncertain Murder, to be expiated by formal disavowal and sacrifice by the elders of the nearest city (xxi. 1-9).—(5.) Assault to be punished by the law of retaliation or damages (Ex. xxi. 18, 19, 22-25; Lev. xxiv. 18, 20).

7th Command. (1.) ADULTERY to be punished by death of both offenders; the rape of a married or betrothed woman, by death of the offender (Deut. xxii. 18-27).—(2.) Rape or Seduction of an unbetrothed virgin, to be compensated by marriage, with dowry (fifty shekels), and without power of divorce; or, if she be refused, by payment of full dowry (Ex. xxii. 16, 17; Deut. xxii. 28, 29).—(3.) Unlawful Marriages (incestuous, &c.), to be punished, some by death, some by childlessness (Lev. xx.).

8th Command. 1. Theft to be punished by fourfold or double restitution; a nocturnal robber might be slain as an outlaw (Ex. xxii. 1-4).—(2.) Trespass and injury of things lent to be compensated (3-15).—(3.) Perversion of Justice (by bribes, threats, &c.), and especially oppression of strangers, strictly forbidden (xxii. 9, &c.).—(4.) Kidnaping to be punished by death (Deut. xxiv. 7). JUDGE; PUNISHMENTS; ROBBERY.

9th Command. False Witness; to be punished by the law of retaliation (Ex. xxiii. 1-3; Deut. xix. 16-21). Slander of a wife's chastity, by fine and loss of power of divorce (Deut. xxii. 18, 19). OATH; WITNESS.

A fuller consideration of the tables of the TEN COMMANDMENTS is given elsewhere.

(III.) LAWS JUDICIAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL

(A) Jurisdiction.

(a) Local Judges (JUDGE) (generally Levites, as more skilled in the Law) appointed, for ordinary matters, probably by the people with approbation of the supreme authority (as of Moses in the wilderness) (Ex. xviii. 25; Deut. i. 13-18), through all the land (xvi. 18). (b) APPEAL to the Priests (at the holy place), or to the judge; their sentence final, and to be accepted under pain of death. See Deut. xxi. 8-13 (compare appeal to Moses, Ex. xviii. 26). (c) Two witnesses (at least) required in capital matters (Num. xxxv. 30; Deut. xvi. 6, 7). (d) Punishment (except by special command), to be personal, and not to extend to the family (xxiv. 16). Stripes allowed and limited (xxv. 1-3), so as to avoid outrage on the human frame. PUNISHMENTS.

All this would be to a great extent set aside—1st. By the summary jurisdiction of the king (see 1 Sam. xxii. 11-19 [Saul]; 2 Sam. xii. 1-5, xiv. 4-11; 1 K. iii. 16-28), which extended even to the deposition of the high-priest (1 Sam. xxii. 17, 18; 1 K. ii. 26, 27). The practical difficulty of its being carried out is seen in 2 Sam. xv. 2-6, and would lead of course to a certain delegation of his power. 2d. By the appointment of the Seventy Elders (Num. xi. 24-31) with a solemn religious sanction. In later times there was a local Sanhedrim of twenty-three in each city, and two such in Jerusalem, as well as the Great SANHEDRIM, consisting of seventy members, besides the president, who was to be the high-priest if duly qualified, and controlling even the king and high-priest. The members were priests, scribes (Levites), and elders (of other tribes). A court of exactly this nature is noticed, as appointed to supreme power by Jehoshaphat. (See 2 Chr. xix. 8-11.)

(b) Royal Power.

The King's power limited by the law, as written and formally accepted by the king; and directly forbidden to be despotic (Deut. xvii. 14-20; compare 1 Sam. x. 25). Yet he had power of taxation (to one-tenth), and of compulsory service (viii. 10-18), the declaration of war (xi.), &c. There are distinct traces of a "mutual contract" (2 Sam. v. 3; a "league," 2 K. xi. 17); the remonstrance with Rehoboam being clearly not extraordinary (1 K. xii. 1-6).

The Princes of the CONGREGATION. The heads of the tribes (see Josh. xi. 15) seem to have had authority under Joshua to act for the people (compare 1 Chr. xxvii. 16-22); and in the later times "the princes of Judah" seem to have had power to control both the king and the priests (Jer. xxvi. 10-21, xxxviii. 4, 5, &c.). ELDER.

(c) Royal Revenue.

(1.) Tenth of produce.—(2.) Domain land (1 Chr. xxvii. 26-29). Note consecration of criminal's land (1 K. xxi. 15).—(3.) Boat service (v. 17, 18), chiefly on foreigners (ix. 20-22; 2 Chr. ii. 16, 17).—(4.) Flocks and herds (1 Chr. xxvii. 29-31).—(5.) Tributes (gifts) from foreign kings.—(6.) Commerce; especially in Solomon's time (1 K. x. 22, 29, &c.).

<sup>1</sup> Military conquest discouraged by the prohibition of the use of horses. (See Josh. xi. 6.) For an example of obedience to this law see 2 Sam. viii. 4, and of disobedience to it see 1 K. x. 26-29. ARMY; HORSE.

(IV.) ECCLESIASTICAL AND CEREMONIAL LAW.

(A) Law of SACRIFICE (considered as the sign and the appointed means of the union with God, on which the holiness of the people depended).

(1.) Ordinary Sacrifices.

(a) The whole BURNT-OFFERING (Lev. i.) of the herd or the flock; to be offered continually (Ex. xxix. 38-42); and the fire on the altar never to be extinguished (Lev. vi. 8-13).

(b) The MEAT-OFFERING (ii., vi. 14-23) of flour, oil, and frankincense, unleavened, and seasoned with salt.

(c) The PEACE-OFFERING (iii., vii. 11-21) of the herd or the flock; either a thank-offering, or a vow, or free-will offering.

(d) The SIN-OFFERING, or Trespass-Offering (iv., v., vi.).

(a) For sins committed in ignorance (iv.).

(b) For vows unwittingly made and broken, or uncleanness unwittingly contracted (v.).

(c) For sins wittingly committed (vi. 1-7).

(2.) Extraordinary Sacrifices.

(a) At the Consecration of Priests (viii., ix.).

(b) At the Purification of Women (xii.).

(c) At the Cleansing of Lepers (xiii., xiv.).

(d) On the Great Day of Atonement (xvi.).

(e) On the Great Festivals (xxiii.).

(b) Law of Holiness (arising from the union with God through sacrifice).

(1.) Holiness of Persons.

(a) Holiness of the whole people as "children of God" (Ex. xix. 5, 6; Lev. xi.-xv., xviii., xviii.; Deut. xiv. 1-21), shown in

(a) The dedication of the FIRST-BORN (Ex. xiii. 2, 12, 13, xxi. 23, 30, &c.); and the offering of all firstlings and first-fruits (Deut. xxvi., &c.).

(b) Distinction of CLEAN and UNCLEAN food (Lev. xi., Deut. xiv.).

(c) Provision for PURIFICATION (Lev. xiii., xiii., xiv., xv.; Deut. xxiii. 1-14).

(d) LAWS against disfigurement (Lev. xix. 27; Deut. xiv. 1; compare Deut. xxv. 3, against excessive scourging).

(e) LAWS against unnatural marriages and lusts (Lev. xviii., xx.).

(2.) Holiness of the Priests (PRIEST) (and LEVITES).

(a) Their consecration (Lev. viii., ix.; Ex. xxix.).

(b) Their special qualifications and restrictions (Lev. xxi., xxi. 1-9).

(c) Their rights (Deut. xviii. 1-6; Num. xviii.) and authority (Deut. xvii. 8-13).

(2.) Holiness of Places and Things.

(a) The TABERNACLE, with the ark, the veil, the altars, the laver, the priestly robes, &c. (Ex. xxv.-xxviii., xxx.). TEMPLE.

(b) The Holy Place chosen for the permanent erection of the Tabernacle (Deut. xii. xiv. 23-29), where only all sacrifices were to be offered, and all tithes, first-fruits, vows, &c., to be given or eaten.

(3.) Holiness of Times.

(a) The SABBATH (Ex. xx. 9-11, xxiii. 12, &c.).

(b) The SABBATHAL YEAR (xxiii. 10, 11; Lev. xxv. 1-7, &c.).

(c) The Year of JUBILEE (xxv. 8-16, &c.).

(d) The PASSOVER (Ex. xii. 9-27; Lev. xxiii. 4-14).

(e) The Feast of Weeks (PENTECOST) (xxiii. 15, &c.).

(f) The Feast of Tabernacles (xxiii. 32-34). TABERNACLE, FEAST OF.

(g) The Feast of Trumpets (xxiii. 23-25). TRUMPETS, FEAST OF.

(h) The Day of Atonement (xxiii. 30-32, &c.). ATONEMENT, DAY OF.

Such is the substance of the Mosaic Law. The leading principle of the whole is its Theocratic character, i. e. its reference of all actions and thoughts of men directly and immediately to the will of God. It follows from this, that it is to be regarded not merely as a law, i. e. a rule of conduct, based on known truth and acknowledged authority, but also as a Revelation of God's nature and His dispensations. But this theocratic character of the Law depends necessarily on the belief in God, as not only the Creator and sustainer of the world, but as, by special covenant, the head of the Jewish nation. (Jehovah.) This immediate reference to God as their king is clearly seen as the groundwork of their whole polity. From this theocratic nature of the Law follow important deductions with regard to (a) the view which it takes of political society; (b) the extent of the scope of the Law; (c) the penalties by which it is enforced; and (d) the character which it seeks to impress on the people. (a.) The Mosaic Law seeks the basis of its polity, first, in the absolute sovereignty of God, next in the relationship of each individual to God, and through God to his countrymen. It is clear that such a doctrine, while it contradicts none of the common theories (of the delegation of individual rights to political authorities, mutual needs of men, "social compact," &c.), yet lies beneath them all. (b.) The Law, as proceeding directly from God, and referring directly to Him, is necessarily absolute in its supremacy and unlimited in its scope. It is supreme over the governors, as being only the delegates of the Lord, and therefore it is incompatible with any despotic authority in them. On the other hand, it is supreme over the governed, recognizing no inherent rights in the individual, as prevailing against, or limiting the law. It regulated the whole life of an Israelite. His actions were rewarded and punished with great minuteness and strictness; and that according to the standard, not of their consequences, but of their intrinsic morality. His religious worship was defined and enforced in an elaborate and unceasing ceremonial. (c.) The penalties and rewards by which the Law is enforced are such as depend on the direct theocracy. With regard to individual actions, as some penalties are generally inflicted by the subordinate, and some only by the supreme authority, so among the Israelites some penalties came from the hand of man, some directly from the providence of God. The bearing of this principle on the inquiry as to the revelation of a future life, in the Pentateuch, is easily seen. The sphere of moral and religious action and thought to which the Law extends is beyond the cognizance of human laws, and the scope of their ordinary penalties, and is therefore left by them to the retribution of God's inscrutable justice, which, being but imperfectly seen here, is contemplated especially as exercised in a future state. Hence arises the expectation of a direct revelation of this future state in the Mosaic Law. Such a revelation is certainly not given. The truth seems to be that, in a law which appeals directly to God Himself for its authority and its sanction, there cannot be that broad line of demarcation between this life and the next, which is drawn for those whose power is limited by the grave. (d.) But perhaps the most important consequence of the theocratic nature of the Law was the peculiar character of goodness which it sought to impress on the people. The Mosaic Law, beginning with piety, as its first object, enforces most emphatically the purity essential to those who, by their union with God, have recovered the hope of intrinsic goodness, while it views righteousness and love rather as deductions from these than as independent objects (Deut. vi. 4-13; Lev. xix. 18, &c.). The appeal is not to any dignity of human nature, but to the obligations of communion with a Holy God. The subordination, therefore, of this idea also to the religious idea is enforced; and so long as the due supremacy of the latter was preserved, all other duties would find their places in proper harmony. But the usurpation of that supremacy in practice by the idea of personal and national sanctity was that which gave its peculiar color to the Jewish character. It is evident that this characteristic of the Israelites would tend to preserve the seclusion which, under God's providence, was intended for them, and would in its turn be fostered by it.—III. In considering the relation of the Law to the future, it is important to be guided by the general principle laid down in Heb. vii. 19, "The Law made nothing perfect." This principle will be applied in different degrees to its bearing (a) on the after-history of the Jewish commonwealth before the coming of Christ; (b) on the coming of our Lord Himself; and (c) on the dispensation of the Gospel. (a.) To that after-history the Law was, to a great extent, the key. It was indeed often neglected, and even forgotten; yet still it formed the standard from which the people knowingly departed, and to which they constantly returned; and to it therefore all which was peculiar in their national and individual character was due. Its direct influence was probably greatest in the periods before the establishment of the kingdom, and after the Babylonish Captivity. The last act of Joshua was to bind the Israelites to it as the charter of their occupation of the conquered land (Josh. xxiv. 24-27); and, in the semi-anarchical period of the Judges, the Law and the Tabernacle were the only centres of any thing like national unity. The establishment of the kingdom (KING) was due to an impatience of this position, and a desire for a visible and personal centre of authority, much the same in nature as that which plunged them so often in idolatry. In the kingdom of Israel (ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF), after the separation, the deliberate rejection of the leading principles of the Law by Jeroboam and his successors was the beginning of a gradual declension into idolatry and heathenism. But in the kingdom of Judah (JUDAH, KINGDOM OF) the very division of the monarchy and consequent diminution of its splendor, and the need of a principle to assert against the superior material power of Israel, brought out the Law once more in increased honor and influence. (PROPHET.) Far more was this the case after the CAPTIVITY. (EZRA.) The loss of the independent monarchy, and the cessation of prophecy, both combined to throw the Jews back upon the Law alone, as their only distinctive pledge of nationality, and sure guide to truth. This love for the Law, rather than any abstract patriotism, was the strength of the Maccabean struggle against the Syrians (ANTIOCHUS EPIPHANES; MACCABEES, &c.), and the success of that struggle, enthroning a Levitical power, deepened the feeling from which it sprang. The Law thus became the moulding influence of the Jewish character. The PHARISEES, truly representing the chief strength of the people, systematized this feeling. Against this idolatry of the Law there were two reactions. The first was that of the SANDUCEES; one which had its basis in the idea of a higher love and service of God, independent of the Law and its sanctions. The other, that of the ESSENES, was an attempt to burst the bonds of the formal law, and assert its ideas in all fulness, freedom, and purity. (b.) The relation of the Law to the advent of Christ is also laid down clearly by St. Paul. The Law was the servant (A. V. "schoolmaster"), whose task it was to guide the child to the true teacher (Gal. iii. 24); and Christ was "the end" or object "of the Law" (Rom. x. 4). As being subsidiary to the promise, it had accomplished its purpose when the promise was fulfilled. In its national aspect it had existed to guard the faith in the theocracy. The chief hindrance to that faith had been the difficulty of realizing the invisible presence of God, and of conceiving a communion with the infinite Godhead which should not crush or absorb the finite creature (compare Deut. v. 24-23; Num. xvii. 12, 13; Job ix. 32-35, xiii. 21, 22; Is. xiv. 13, lxiv. 1, &c.). This difficulty was now to pass away for ever, in the Incarnation of the Godhead in One truly and visibly man. (JESUS CHRIST; MESSIAH; SAVIOUR; SON OF GOD.) In its individual, or what is usually called its "moral" aspect, the Law bore equally the stamp of transitoriness and insufficiency. It had declared the authority of truth and goodness over man's will, and taken for granted in man the existence of a spirit which could recognize that authority: but it had done no more. Its presence had therefore detected the existence and the sinfulness of sin, as alien alike to God's will and man's true nature; but it had also brought out with more vehement and desperate antagonism the power of sin dwelling in man as fallen (Rom. vii. 7-25). The relation of the Law to Christ in its sacrificial and ceremonial aspect, will be more fully considered elsewhere. (SACRIFICE.) (c.) It remains to consider how far it has any obligation or existence under the dispensation of the Gospel. As a means of JUSTIFICATION or salvation, it ought never to have been regarded, even before Christ: it needs no proof to show that still less can this be so since He has come. But yet the question remains whether it is binding on Christians, even when they do not depend on it for salvation. It seems clear enough, that its formal coercive authority as a whole ended with the close of the Jewish dispensation. It referred throughout to the Jewish covenant, and in many points to the constitution, the customs, and even the local circumstances of the people. That covenant was preparatory to the Christian, in which it is now absorbed; those customs and observances have passed away. It follows, by the very nature of the case, that the formal obligation to the Law must have ceased with the basis on which it is grounded. But what then becomes of the declaration of our Lord, that He came "not to destroy the Law, but to perfect it," and that "not one jot or one tittle of it shall pass away?" what of the fact, consequent upon it, that the Law has been revered in all Christian Churches, and had an important influence on much Christian legislation? The explanation of the apparent contradiction lies in the difference between positive and moral obligation. The positive obligation of the Law, as such, has passed away; but every revelation of God's Will, and of the righteousness and love which are its elements, imposes a moral obligation, by the very fact of its being known, even on those to whom it is not primarily addressed. To apply this principle practically there is need of much study and discretion, in order to distinguish what is local and temporary from what is universal, and what is mere external form from what is the essence of an ordinance.

Lawyer, the A. V. translation of Gr. nomikos; see below. The title "lawyer" is generally supposed to be "scribe," both on account of its etymological meaning, and also because the man, who is also called a "lawyer" in Mat. xxii. 35 and Lk. x. 25, is called "one of the scribes" in Mk. xii. 28. If the common reading in Lk. xi. 44-46 be correct, it will be decisive against this; for this distinguishes "scribes" in verse 44 from "lawyers" in verses 45, 46. But Tischendorf, Tregelles, Alford, &c., with some of the best MSS., omit "scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites" from verse 44. By the use of the Gr.

nomikos (Tit. iii. 9 [A. V. "about the law"]) as a simple adjective, it seems more probable that the title "scribe" was a legal and official designation, but that the name nomikos, translated "lawyer," was properly a mere epithet = one learned in the law, and only used as a title in common parlance (compare the use of it in Tit. iii. 13, "Zenias the lawyer"). Lazarus (L. fr. Heb. = ELEAZAR). 1. Lazarus of Bethany, the brother of MARTHA and Mary (MARY, SISTER OF LAZARUS) (Jn. xi. 1). All that we know of him is derived from the Gospel of John, and that records little more than the facts of his death and resurrection. We are able, however, without doing violence to the principles of a true historical criticism (so Professor Plumptre, the original author of this article), to arrive at some conclusions helping us, with at least some measure of probability, to fill up these scanty outlines. (1.) The language of Jn. xi. 1 implies that the sisters were the better known. Lazarus is "of Bethany, of the village of Mary and her sister Martha." From this, and from the order of the three names in Jn. xi. 5, we may reasonably infer that Lazarus was the youngest of the family. (2.) The house in which the feast is held appears, from Jn. xii. 2, to be that of the sisters. Martha "serves," as in Lk. x. 38. Mary takes upon herself that which was the special duty of a hostess toward an honored guest (compare Lk. vii. 46). The impression left on our minds by this account, if it stood alone, would be that they were the givers of the feast. In Mat. xxvi. 6, and Mk. xiv. 3, the same fact appears as occurring in "the house of Simon the leper;" but a leper, as such, would have been compelled to lead a separate life, and certainly could not have given a feast and received a multitude of guests. Among the conjectural explanations of this difference, the hypothesis that this Simon was the father of the two sisters and of Lazarus, that he had been smitten with leprosy, and that actual death, or the civil death that followed on his disease, had left his children free to act for themselves, is at least as probable as any other, and has some support in early ecclesiastical traditions. (3.) All the circumstances of Jn. xi. and xii. point to wealth and social position above the average. (4.) A comparison of Mat. xxvi. 6 and Mk. xiv. 3 with Lk. vii. 36, 44, suggests another conjecture that harmonizes with and in part explains the foregoing. If Simon the leper were also the Pharisee, it would explain the fact just noticed of the friendship between the sisters of Lazarus and the members of that party in Jerusalem. It would follow on this assumption that the Pharisee, whom we thus far identify with the father of Lazarus, was probably one of the members of that sect, sent down from Jerusalem to watch the new teacher. (5.) Some coincidences suggest the identification of Lazarus with the young ruler that had great possessions (Mat. xix.; Mk. x.; Lk. xviii.). The age (Mat. xix. 20, 22) agrees with what has been before inferred (see above, 1), as does the fact of wealth above the average with what we know of the condition of the family at Bethany (see 2). If the father were an influential Pharisee, if there were ties of some kind uniting the family with that body, it would be natural enough that the son, even in comparative youth, should occupy the position of a "ruler." But further, it is of this rich young man that Mark uses the emphatic word ("Jesus, beholding him, loved him") which is used of no others in the Gospel-history, save of the beloved apostle and of Lazarus and his sisters (Jn. xi. 5). Combining these inferences, then, we get, with some measure of likelihood, an insight into one aspect of the life of the Divine Teacher and Friend, full of the most living interest. The village of Bethany and its neighborhood were a frequent retreat from the controversies and tumults of Jerusalem (xviii. 2; Lk. xxi. 37, xxii. 39). At some time or other one household, wealthy, honorable, belonging to the better or Nicodemus section of the Pharisees (see above, 1, 2, 3), learns to know and reverence Him. Disease or death removes the father from the scene, and the two sisters are left with their younger brother to do as they think right. In them and in the brother over whom they watch, He finds that which is worthy of His love. But two at least (Martha and Lazarus) need an education in the spiritual life. A few weeks pass away, and then comes the sickness of Jn. xi. One of the sharp malignant fevers of Palestine cuts off the life that was so precious. The sisters know how truly the Divine Friend has loved him on whom their love and their hopes centred. They send to Him in the belief that the tidings of the sickness will at once draw Him to them (xi. 3). Slowly, and in words which (though afterward understood otherwise) must at the time have seemed to the disciples those of one upon whom the truth came not at once but by degrees, He prepares them for the worst. "This sickness is not unto death"—"Our friend Lazarus sleepeth"—"Lazarus is dead." The work which He was doing as a teacher or a healer (x. 41, 42) in Bethabara, or the other Bethany, (x. 40 and i. 28), was not interrupted, and continues for two days after the message reaches Him. Then comes the journey, occupying two days more. When He and His disciples come, three days have passed since the burial. The friends from Jerusalem, chiefly of the Pharisee and ruler class, are there with their consolations. The sisters receive the Prophet, each according to her character. His sympathy with their sorrow leads Him also to weep. Then comes the work of might as the answer of the prayer which the Son offers to the Father (xi. 41, 42). The stone is rolled away from the mouth of the rock-chamber in which the body had been placed. "He that was dead came forth, bound hand and foot with grave-clothes; and his face was bound about with a napkin." (BURIAL; JESUS CHRIST; MIRACLES; TOMB.) It is well not to break in upon the silence which hangs over the interval of that "four days' sleep." But Lazarus must have learned "what it is to die." One scene more meets us, and then the life of the family which has come before us with such daylight clearness lapses again into obscurity. The fame of the wonder spreads rapidly among the ruling class, some of whom have witnessed it. It becomes one of the proximate occasions of the plots of the Sanhedrim against our Lord's life (ver. 47-53). It brings Lazarus no less than Jesus within the range of their enmity (xii. 10). They persuade themselves apparently that they see in him one who has been a sharer in a great imposture, or who has been restored to life through some demoniac agency. But others gather round to wonder and congratulate. In the house which, though it still bore the father's name (see 2 above), was the dwelling of the sisters and the brother, there is a supper, and Lazarus is there, and Martha serves, no longer jealously, and Mary pours out her love in the costly offering of the spikenard ointment, and finds herself once again misjudged and hastily condemned. After this all direct knowledge of Lazarus ceases. It would be as plausible an explanation of the strange fact recorded by MARK alone (xiv. 51) as any other, if we were to suppose that Lazarus, whose home was near, who must have known the place to which the Lord "ofttimes resorted," was drawn to the garden of Gethsemane by the approach of the officers "with their torches and lanterns and weapons" (Jn. xviii. 3), and in the haste of the night-alarm rushed eagerly, "with the linen cloth cast about his naked body," to see whether he was in time to render any help.—Apocryphal traditions even are singularly scanty and jejune, as if the silence which "sealed the lips of the Evangelists" had restrained others also. They have nothing more to tell of Lazarus than the meagre tale that follows:—He lived for thirty years after his resurrection, and died at the age of sixty. When he came forth from the tomb, it was with the bloom and fragrance as of a bridegroom. He and his sisters, with Mary the wife of Cleophas, and other disciples, were sent out to sea by the Jews in a leaky boat, but miraculously escaped destruction, and were brought safely to Marseilles. There he preached the Gospel, and founded a church, and became its bishop. After many years, he suffered martyrdom, and was buried, some said there; others, at Citium in Cyprus. Finally his bones and those of Mary Magdalene were brought from Cyprus to Constantinople by the Emperor Leo the Philosopher, and a church erected to his honor. Some apocryphal books were extant bearing his name.—The Canons of St. Victor at Paris occupied a priory dedicated to St. Lazarus. This was assigned in 1638 to the fraternity of the Congregation founded by St. Vincent de Paul, and the mission priests sent forth by it consequently became conspicuous as the Lazarists.—The question why the first three Gospels omit all mention of so wonderful a fact as the resurrection of Lazarus, has from a comparatively early period forced itself upon interpreters and apologists. The explanations given of the perplexing phenomenon are briefly these:—(1.) That fear of drawing down persecution on one already singled out for it, kept the three Evangelists, writing during the lifetime of Lazarus, from all mention of him; and that, this reason for silence being removed by his death, St. John could write freely. (2.) That the writers of the first three Gospels confine themselves, as by a deliberate plan, to the miracles wrought in Galilee (that of the blind man at Jericho being the only exception), and that they therefore abstained from all mention of any fact, however interesting, that lay outside that limit. (3.) That the narrative, in its beauty and simplicity, its human sympathies and marvellous transparency, carries with it the evidence of its own truthfulness. (4.) Another explanation, suggested by the attempt to represent to one's self what must have been the sequel of such a fact as that now in question upon the life of him who had been affected by it, may perhaps be added. The history of monastic orders, of sudden conversions after great critical deliverances from disease or danger, offers an analogy which may help to guide us. In such cases it has happened, in a thousand instances, that the man has felt as if the thread of his life was broken, the past buried for ever, old things vanished away. He retires from the world, changes his name, speaks to no one, or speaks only in hints, of all that belongs to his former life, shrinks, above all, from making his conversion, his resurrection from the death of sin, the subject of common talk. Assume only that the laws of the spiritual life worked in some such way on Lazarus, and it will seem hardly wonderful that such a man should shrink from publicity, and should wish to take his place as the last and lowest in the company of believers. The facts of the case are, at any rate, singularly in harmony with this last explanation. Matthew and Mark omit equally all mention of the three names. John, writing long afterward, when all three had "fallen asleep," feels that the restraint is no longer necessary, and puts on record, as the Spirit brings all things to his remembrance, the whole of the wonderful history. The circumstances of his life, too, all indicate that he more than any other Evangelist was likely to have lived in that innermost circle of disciples, where these things would be most lovingly and reverently remembered.—2. The name Lazarus occurs also in the well-known parable of Lk. xvi. 19-31. In this parable alone we meet with a proper name. Were the thoughts of men called to the etymology of the name (= ELEAZAR), as signifying that he who bore it had in his poverty no help but God, or as meaning in the shortened form (Lazarus), one who had become altogether helpless? Or was Lazarus some actual beggar, like him who lay at the beautiful gate of the Temple, familiar, therefore, both to the disciples and the Pharisees? Neither of these suggestions can be accepted as quite satisfactory (so Professor Plumptre). If we assume the identity suggested in No. 1 (5.), or if, leaving that as unproved, we remember only that the historic Lazarus belonged by birth to the class of the wealthy and influential Pharisees, as in No. 1 (3.), could any thing be more significant than the introduction of this name into such a parable? Not Eleazar the Pharisee, rich, honored, blameless among men, but Eleazar the beggar, full of leprous sores, lying at the rich man's gate, was the true heir of blessedness, for whom was reserved the glory of being in Abraham's bosom. Very striking, too, it must be added, is the coincidence between the teaching of the parable and of the history in another point. The Lazarus of the one remains in Abraham's bosom because "if men hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded, though one rose from the dead." The Lazarus of the other returned from it, and yet bears no witness to the unbelieving Jews of the wonders or the terrors of Hades. In this instance also the name of Lazarus has been perpetuated in an institution of the Christian Church. The leper of the Middle Ages appears as a Lazzaro. Among the orders, half military and half monastic, of the twelfth century, was one which bore the title of the Knights of St. Lazarus (A. D. 1119), whose special work it was to minister to the lepers, first of Syria, and afterward of Europe. The use of lazaretto and leper-house for the leper-hospitals then founded in all parts of Western Christendom, no less than that of lazarous for the mendicants of Italian towns, are indications of the effect of the parable upon the mind of Europe in the Middle Ages, and thence upon its later speech.

Lead [leɪ] (Heb. 'ophereth; Gr. molibdos), a common metal, found generally in veins of rocks, though seldom in a metallic state, and most commonly in combination with sulphur. It was early known to the ancients, and the allusions to it in Scripture indicate that the Hebrews were well acquainted with its uses. The rocks in the neighborhood of Sinai yielded it in large quantities, and it was found in Egypt. That it was common in Palestine is shown by Ecclus. xlvii. 18—"thou didst multiply silver as lead" (compare 1 K. x. 27). It was among the spoils of the Midianites which the children of Israel brought with them to the plains of Moab after their return from the slaughter of the tribe (Num. xxxi. 22). The ships of Tarshish supplied the market of Tyre with lead, as with other metals (Ez. xxvii. 12). Its heaviness, to which allusion is made in Ex. xv. 10, and Ecclus. xxii. 14, caused it to be used for weights, which were either in the form of a round flat cake (Zech. v. 7), or a rough, unfashioned lump or "stone" (ver. 8); stones having in ancient times served the purpose of weights (compare Prov. xvi. 11). In modern metallurgy lead is used with tin in the composition of solder for fastening metals together. That the ancient Hebrews were acquainted with the use of solder is evident from Is. xli. 7. No hint is given as to the composition of the solder, but probably lead was one of the materials employed, its usage for such a purpose being of great antiquity. The ancient Egyptians used it for fastening stones together in the rough parts of a building, and it was found by Mr. Layard among the ruins of Nimroud. (NINEVEH.) In Job xix. 24 the allusion is supposed to be to the practice of carving inscriptions upon stone, and pouring molten lead into the cavities of the letters, to render them legible, and at the same time preserve them from the action of the air. Oxide of lead is largely employed in modern pottery for the formation of glazes, and its presence has been discovered in the earthenware found in Egypt and Nineveh. But the phrase in Ecclus. xxxviii. 30, A. V. "to lead it over," is in the Greek simply to complete the smearing, the material employed for the glazing not being indicated. In modern metallurgy lead is employed for purifying silver from other mineral products. The alloy is mixed with lead, exposed to fusion upon an earthen vessel, and submitted to a blast of air. By this means the dross is consumed. This process is called the cupelling operation, with which the description in Ez. xxii. 18-22, in the opinion of Mr. Napier, accurately coincides. HANDICRAFT; METALS; MIXES.

Leaf, Leaves. The word occurs in the A. V. either in the singular or plural, in three different senses—1. Leaf or leaves of a tree (Heb. leah, teraph, 'aphi; Gr. phyllon). The olive-leaf is mentioned in Gen. viii. 11. Fig-leaves formed the first covering of our parents in Eden. The barren fig-tree (Mat. xxi. 19; Mk. xi. 13) on the road between Bethany and Jerusalem "had on it nothing but leaves." The oak-leaf is mentioned in Is. i. 30, and vi. 13. The righteous are often compared to green leaves (Jer. xvii. 8). The ungodly on the other hand are as "an oak whose leaf fadeth" (Is. i. 30). In Ez. xlvii. 12 and Rev. xxii. 1, 2, there is probably an allusion to some tree whose leaves were used by the Jews as a medicine or ointment; indeed, it is very likely that many plants and leaves were thus made use of by them, as by the old English herbalists.—2. Leaves of doors. The Heb. te'at'im, which occurs very many times in the Bible, and which in 1 K. vi. 34 is translated "leaves" in the A. V., = brams, ribs, sides, &c. (in l. c. = sides or leaves of a double door, Ges.). In the last clause of this verse, the Heb. kela'im, elsewhere translated "herbs," here "leaves," is regarded by Gesenius, Winer, &c., as an error for te'at'im, but by Keil as an Aramaic form of the latter. In Ez. xli. 24 the Heb. delat (literally door) is the representative of both doors and leaves; in 1 K. vi. 32 it is translated in the plural "doors," margin "leaves of doors." (GATE.)—3. Leaves of a book or roll. The Heb. deleth occurs in this sense in Jer. xxxvi. 23 only, and is translated by Gesenius columns.

* League. ALLIANCES.

Le'ah (Heb. wearied, Ges.), daughter of LABAN (Gen. xxix. 16). The dulness or weakness of her eyes was so notable, that it is mentioned as a contrast to the beautiful form and appearance of her younger sister Rachel. Her father took advantage of the opportunity which the local marriage-rite afforded to pass her off in her sister's stead on the unconscious bridegroom, and excused himself to Jacob by alleging that the custom of the country forbade the younger sister to be given first in marriage. Jacob's preference of Rachel grew into hatred of Leah, after he had married both sisters. Leah, however, bore to him, in quick succession, Reuben, Simeon, Levi, Judah, then Issachar, Zebulun, and Dinah, before Rachel had a child. She died some time after Jacob reached the S. country in which his father Isaac lived. She was buried in the family grave in Machpelah (xlix. 31).

Leas'ing [leez-] = falsehood. This word is retained in the A. V. of Ps. iv. 2, v. 6, from the older English versions; but the Heb. cázab of which it is the rendering is elsewhere almost uniformly translated "lies" (Ps. xl. 4, lviii. 3, &c.).

Leath'er (Heb. 'ôr; Gr. adj. dermatinos, translated "leathern"). The notices of leather in the Bible are singularly few; indeed the word occurs but twice in the A. V., and in each instance in reference to a GIRDLE (2 K. i. 8; Mat. iii. 4). There are, however, other instances in which the word "leather" might with propriety be substituted for "skin" (Lev. xi. 32, xiii. 48; Num. xxxi. 20). BOTTLE; DRESS; HANDICRAFT: HORSE; SANDAL.

Leav'en (Heb. šôr, hâmets or châmets; Gr. zumê). Various substances were known to have fermenting qualities; but the ordinary leaven consisted of a lump of old dough in a high state of fermentation, which was inserted into the mass of dough prepared for baking. (BREAD.) The use of leaven was strictly forbidden in all offerings made to the Lord by fire, and particularly in the feast of the PASSOVER. In reference to these prohibitions, Amos (iv. 5) ironically bids the Jews of his day to "offer a sacrifice of thanksgiving with leaven." In other instances, where the offering was to be consumed by the priests, and not on the altar, leaven might be used. Various ideas were associated with the prohibition of leaven in the instances above quoted. But the most prominent idea, which applies equally to all the cases of prohibition, is connected with the corruption which leaven itself had undergone, and which it communicated to bread in the process of fermentation. To this property of leaven our Saviour points when He speaks of the "leaven (i. e. the corrupt doctrine) of the Pharisees and of the Sadducees" (Mat. xvi. 6); and St. Paul, when he speaks of the "old leaven" (1 Cor. v. 7). Another quality of leaven is noticed, viz. its secretly penetrating and diffusive power (v. 6; Gal. v. 9; Mat. xiii. 33).

* Leaves, pl. of LEAF.

Leb'a-na (Heb. the white, poetically = the moon, Ges.; = LEBANAN), one of the Nethinim whose descendants returned from Babylon with Zerrubbabel (Neh. vii. 48); = LEBANAH and LABANA.

Leb'a-nah (Heb.) = LEBANA (Ezr. ii. 45).

Leb'a-non (Heb., see below; Gr. Libanon; L. LIBANUS), a mountain range in the N. of PALESTINE. The name Lebanon (= white) was applied either on account of the snow, which, during a great part of the year, covers its whole summit, or on account of the white color of its limestone cliffs and peaks. It is the white mountain—the Mont Blanc of Palestine. Lebanon is represented in Scripture as lying upon the northern border of the land of Israel (Deut. i. 7, xi. 24; Josh. i. 4). Two distinct ranges bear this name. They both begin in latitude 33° 20', and run in parallel lines from S. W. to N. E. for about ninety geographical miles, enclosing between them a long fertile valley from five to eight miles wide, anciently called "CELOSRYIA," "the valley of Lebanon" (Josh. xi. 17), the modern el-Buk'a. The western range is the "Libanus" of the old geographers, and the Lebanon of Scripture. The eastern range was called "Antilibanus" by geographers, and "Lebanon toward the sun-rising" by the sacred writers (Josh. xiii. 5). A deep valley called W. el-Teim separates the southern section of Antilibanus from both Lebanon and the hills of Galilee. Lebanon—the western range—commences on the S. at the deep ravine of the Litany, the ancient river Leontes, which drains the valley of Celosyria, and falls into the Mediterranean five miles N. of Tyre. It runs N. E. in a straight line parallel to the coast, to the opening from the Mediterranean into the plain of Emesa, called in Scripture the "Entrance of Hamath" (Num. xxxiv. 8). Here Nahr el-Kebir—the ancient river Eleutherus—sweeps round its northern end, as the Leontes does round its southern. The average elevation of the range is from 6,000 to 8,000 feet; but two peaks rise considerably higher, Suntn 8,500 feet; Dahar el-Kudib (the highest peak, about twenty-five miles from the N. end, and near the celebrated cedars) 10,051 feet (so Porter in Kitto). (SNOW.) The central ridge or back-bone of Lebanon has smooth, barren sides, and gray rounded sunmits. It is entirely destitute of verdure, and is covered with small fragments of limestone, from which white crowns and jagged points of naked rock shoot up at intervals. Here and there a few stunted pine-trees or dwarf oaks are met with. The line of cultivation runs along at the height of about 6,000 feet; and below this the features of the western slopes are entirely different. The descent is gradual; but is everywhere broken by precipices and towering rocks which time and the elements have chiselled into strange, fantastic shapes. Ravines of singular wildness and grandeur furrow the whole mountain-side, looking in many places like huge rents. Here and there, too, bold promontories shoot out, and dip perpendicularly into the bosom of the Mediterranean. The rugged limestone banks are scantily clothed with the evergreen oak, and the sandstone with pines; while every available spot is carefully cultivated. The cultivation is wonderful, and shows what all Syria might be if under a good government. Fig-trees cling to the naked rock; vines are trained along narrow ledges; long ranges of mulberries, on terraces like steps of stairs, cover the more gentle declivities; and dense groves of olives fill up the bottoms of the glens. Hundreds of villages are seen—here built amid labyrinths of rocks; there clinging like swallows' nests to the sides of cliffs; while convents, no less numerous, are perched on the top of every peak. The vine is still largely cultivated in every part of the mountain. Lebanon also abounds in olives, figs, and mulberries; while some remnants exist of the forests of pine, oak, and CEDAR, which formerly covered it (1 K. v. 6; Ps. xxix. 5; Is. xiv. 8; Ezr. iii. 7). (FOREST.) Considerable numbers of wild beasts still inhabit its retired glens and higher peaks; the writer (Porter) has seen jackals, hyenas, wolves, bears, and panthers (2 K. xiv. 9; Cant. iv. 8; Hab. ii. 17). Some noble streams of classic celebrity (Leontes, Lycus, Adonis, &c.) have their sources high up in Lebanon, and rush down in sheets of foam through sublime glens, to stain with their ruddy waters the transparent bosom of the Mediterranean. Along the base of Lebanon runs the irregular plain of Phenicia; nowhere more than two miles wide, and often interrupted by bold rocky spurs, that dip into the sea. The main ridge of Lebanon is composed of Jura limestone, and abounds in fossils. Long belts of more recent sandstone run along the western slopes, which is in places largely impregnated with iron. Lebanon was originally inhabited by the Hivites and Gilytes (Judg. iii. 8; Josh. xiii. 5, 6). The whole mountain-range was assigned to the Israelites, but was never conquered by them (xiii. 2-6; Judg. iii. 1-3). During the Jewish monarchy it appears to have been subject to the Phenicians (1 K. v. 2-6; Ezr. iii. 7). From the Greek conquest until modern times Lebanon had no separate history. The northern half of the mountain-range is peopled almost exclusively by Maronite Christians, about 200,000 in number (so Porter in Kitto); in the southern half the Druzes (about 80,000, so Porter) predominate. American Protestant missionaries have been laboring usefully more than forty years among this population.—ANTILIBANUS. The main chain of Antilibanus commences in the plateau of Bashan, near the parallel of Cesarea Philippi, runs N. to Hermon, and then N. E. in a straight line till it sinks down into the great plain of Emesa, not far from the site of Riblah. HERMON is the loftiest peak; the next highest is a few miles N. of the site of Abila (ABILENE), beside the village of Blulan, and has an elevation of about 7,000 feet. The rest of the ridge averages about 5,000 feet; it is in general bleak and barren, with shelving gray declivities, gray cliffs, and gray rounded summits. Here and there we meet with thin forests of dwarf oak and juniper. The western slopes descend abruptly into the Buk'a; but the features of the eastern are entirely different. Three side-ridges here radiate from Hermon, like the ribs of an open fan, and form the supporting walls of three great terraces. (ABANA; PHARPAR.) Antilibanus is more thinly peopled than its sister range; and it is more abundantly stocked with wild beasts. Antilibanus is only once distinctly mentioned in Scripture, where it is accurately described as "Lebanon toward the sun-rising" (Josh. xiii. 5). "The tower of Lebanon which looketh toward Damascus" (Cant. vii. 4) is doubtless Hermon, which forms the most striking feature in the whole panorama round that city.

Leb'a-oth (Heb. limcaan), one of the last group of the cities of "the South" of Judah (Josh. xv. 32), probably = BETH-LEBAOTH and BETH-BIREI; identified by Wilton (in Fairbairn) with el-Beyuth, a ruined site on a low hill about four miles N. E. of Tell'Arad (Arad); but Rowlands (in Fairbairn under "S. Country") supposes it probably Birein, a site with four wells and ruins a few miles S. or S. by E. of el'Aujeh. AZEM.

Leb-be'us (L.) = LEBBEUS.

* Leb-be'us (L. Lebbæus, from Heb. libbai = of heart, i. e. heartly or courageous, Herz, Lange, &c.; little heart, darling, Jerome, Winer; compare THADDEUS), a name of the Apostle JUDAS, THE BROTHER OF JAMES (Mat. x. 3). The MSS. here give different readings: the A. V. and Received Greek Text are supported by the Alexandrian and some other MSS.; but some MSS. and critical editors read "Lebbeus" only, some "Thaddeus" only.

Le-bo'nah (Heb. frankincense, Ges.), a place named in Judg. xxi. 19 only; now the village of el-Lubbân, W. of, and close to, the Nâblus road, about eight miles N. of Betûn (Bethel), and two from Seilân (Shiloh). Its appearance is ancient, and in the rocks above it are excavated sepulchres (Robinson).

Le'cah (Heb. a going, journey, Ges.), a name mentioned in the genealogies of Judah (1 Chr. iv. 21 only) as a descendant of Shelah, or a town colonized by Eä 2.

* Leek'es. LAVER.

Leech. HORSE-LEECH.

Leeks. The Hebrew hâtsir or châtsir, which in Num. xi. 5 is translated leeks, occurs twenty times in the Hebrew text. The Hebrew term (properly Common Leek (Allium Porrum).

= grass) (GRASS 1) is derived from a root signifying "to be green," and may therefore stand in this passage for any green food, lettuce, endive, &c., as Ludwig and Maillet have conjectured (compare our term "greens"); yet as it is mentioned together with onions and garlic in the text, and as the most ancient versions unanimously understand leeks by the Hebrew word, we may be satisfied with our own translation, which is justified by the green color of the leek, and the grass-like form of its leaves. Another interpretation, first proposed by Hengstenberg, and received by Kitto (Pictorial Bible, Num. xi. 5), adopts a more literal translation of the original word, for, says Kitto, "among the wonders in the natural history of Egypt, it is mentioned by travellers that the common people there eat with special relish a kind of grass similar to clover." Mayer says of this plant (the fenugreek, Trigonella Fœnum-Græcum), that it is similar to clover, but its leaves more pointed, and that great quantities of it are eaten by the people. The leek is too well known to need description. Its botanical name is Allium Porrum.

Lees. The Hebrew shemer bears the radical sense of preservation, and was applied to "lees" from the custom of allowing the wine to stand on the lees in order that its color and body might be better preserved. Hence the expression "wine on the lees" = a generous, full-bodied liquor (Is. xxv. 6). The wine undisturbed became thick and syrupy; hence the proverb "to settle upon one's lees," to express the sloth, indifference, and gross stupidity of the ungodly (Jer. xlviii. 11; Zeph. i. 12). Before the wine was consumed, it was necessary to strain off the lees; such wine was then termed "well refined" (Is. xxv. 6). To drink the lees, or "dregs," was an expression for the endurance of extreme punishment (Ps. lxxv. 8).

Le'gion (fr. L. legio), the chief subdivision of the Roman ARMY, containing about 6,000 infantry, with a contingent of cavalry. The term in the Bible = any large number, with the accessory ideas of order and subordination (Mat. xxvi. 53; Mk. v. 9, 15; Lk. viii. 30).

Le'ha-blm (Heb. flames; flame-colored, Fû.; = LUBIM, Ges., R. S. Poole), occurring only in Gen. x. 13, the name of a Mizraite people or tribe. Mr. R. S. Poole has no doubt that they = the Rblw or Libu of the Egyptian inscriptions, and that from them Libya and the Libyans derived their name. LUBIM.

Le'hi (Heb. jaw-bone, Ges., Fû., &c.), a place in Judah, probably on the confines of the Philistines' country, between it and the cliff Etam; the scene of Samson's well-known exploit with the jawbone (Judg. xv. 9, 14, 19). It contained an eminence—RAMATH-LEHI, and a spring—EN-HAKKORE. BEEI-LAHAI-ROI has been supposed = Lehi. But the situations do not suit. The same consideration would also appear fatal to the identification proposed by Van de Velde at Tell el-Lekhiyeh, in the extreme S. of Palestine. As far as the name goes, a more probable suggestion would be Beit-Likiyeh, a village on the northern slopes of the great Wady Suleiman, about two miles below the upper Beth-horon. But see ETAM 2; ETAM, THE ROCK.

* Le'mech [-mek] (Heb.) = LAMECH 2 (Gen. v. 25, margin).

Lem'u-el (Heb. to God, i. e. dedicated or devoted, W. A. Wright; of God, sc. created, Ges.), the name of an unknown king to whom his mother addressed the prudential maxims in Prov xxxi. 1-9. The Rabbinical commentators identify Lemuel with Solomon. Grotius, adopting a fanciful etymology from the Arabic, makes Lemuel = Iiezekiah. Hitzig and others regard him as king or chief of an Arab tribe dwelling on the borders of Palestine, and elder brother of AGUR, whose name stands at the head of Prov. xxx. JAKEH.

* Lend'er. LOAN.

Len tiles, or Len tiles (Heb. 'adashim). There can not be the least doubt (so Mr. Houghton) that the A. V. is correct in its translation of the Hebrew word which occurs in the four following passages:—Gen. xxv. 34; 2 Sam. xvii. 28, xxiii. 11; Ez. iv. 9. The lentile is a small leguminous or bean-like plant, Errum Lens. There are three or four kinds, all of which are still much esteemed in those countries where they are grown, viz. the south of Europe, Asia, and North Africa: the red lentile is still a favorite article of food in the East. The modern Arabic name of this plant = the Hebrew; it is known in Egypt, Arabia, Syria, &c., by the name 'Adas. Robinson (i. 167) found lentiles "very palatable, and could well conceive that to a weary hunter, faint with hunger, they might be quite a dainty." Kitto (Pict. Bible) says he has often partaken of red pottage, prepared by seething the lentiles in water, and then adding a little suet, to give them a flavor. (Edom.) Lentile BRAD is still eaten by the poor of Egypt. Food.

* Len tisk. MASTICH.

Leopard (Leopardus varius).—(Fbn.)

námér, which occur in the seven following passages—Is. xi. 6; Jer. v. 6, xiii. 23; Dan. vii. 6;

Hos. xiii. 7; Cant. iv. 8; Hab. i. 8. Leopard occurs also as the translation of the Gr. pardalis in Eccles. xxviii. 23, and in Rev. xiii. 2. The leopard (Leopardus varius; Felis Leopardus, Linn.) belongs to the cat family. Its swiftness is well known; so great is the flexibility of its body, that it can take surprising leaps, climb trees, or crawl snake-like upon the ground. Jeremiah and Hosea allude to its insidious habits: it will take up its position in some spot near a village, and watch for a favorable opportunity for plunder. From the passage of Canticles, referred to above, we learn that the hilly ranges of Lebanon were in ancient times frequented by these animals, and it is now not uncommonly seen in and about Lebanon, and the southern maritime mountains of Syria. Under the name námér (spotted), not improbably another animal, viz. the cheetah, or hunting leopard (Gueparda jubata), may be included; which is tamed by the Mohammedans of Syria, who employ it in hunting the gazelle.

Lep'er (Heb. participles lámra, metórá, fem. metórá'ath; Gr. leprosa), Lep're-ry (Heb. lámra'ath; Gr. lepra). The predominant and characteristic form of leprosy in Scripture is a white variety, covering either the entire body or a large tract of its surface; which has obtained the name of Lepra Mosaica. Such were the cases of Moses, Miriam, Naaman, and Gehazi (Ex. iv. 6; Num. xii. 10; 2 K. v. 1, 27; compare Lev. xiii. 13). But, remarkably enough, in the Mosaic ritual-diagnosis of the disease (Lev. xiii., xiv.), this kind, when overspreading the whole surface, appears to be regarded as "clean" (xiii. 12, 13, 16, 17). The Egyptian bondage, with its studied degradations and privations, and especially the work of the kiln under an Egyptian sun, must have had a frightful tendency to generate this class of disorders; hence Manetho asserts that the Egyptians drove out the Israelites as infected with leprosy—a strange reflex, perhaps, of the Mosaic narrative of the "plagues" of Egypt, yet probably also containing a germ of truth. The sudden and total change of food, air, dwelling, and mode of life, caused by the Exodus, to this nation of newly-emancipated slaves may possibly have had a further tendency to produce skin-disorders, and severe repressive measures may have been required in the desert-moving camp to secure the public health, or to allay the panic of infection. Hence it is possible that many, perhaps most of this repertory of symptoms, may have disappeared with the period of the Exodus, and the snow-white form, which had pre-existed, may alone have ordinarily continued in a later age. But amongst these Levitical symptoms, the scaling, or peeling off of the surface, is nowhere mentioned. The principal morbid features are a rising or swelling, a scab or baldness, and a bright or white spot (xiii. 2). But especially a white swelling in the skin, with a change of the hair of the part from the natural black to white or yellow (3, 10, 4, 20, 25, 30), or an appearance of a taint going "deeper than the skin," or again, "raw flesh" appearing in the swelling (10, 14, 15), were critical signs of pollution. The mere swelling, or scab, or bright spot, was remanded for a week as doubtful (4, 21, 26, 31), and for a second such period, if it had not yet pronounced (5). If it then spread (7, 22, 27, 35), it was decided as polluting. But if after the second period of quarantine the trace died away and showed no symptom of spreading, it was a mere scab, and the patient was adjudged CLEAN (6, 23, 34). This tendency to spread seems especially to have been relied on. A spot most innocent in all other respects, if it "spread much abroad," was unclean; whereas, as before remarked, the man so wholly overspread with the evil that it could find no further range, was on the contrary "clean" (12, 13). These two opposite criteria seem to show, that whilst the disease manifested activity, the Mosaic law imputed pollution to and imposed segregation on the sufferer, but that the point at which it might be viewed as having run its course was the signal for his readmission to communion. It is clear (so Mr. Hayman, the original author of this article) that the leprosy of Lev. xiii. xiv., means any severe disease spreading on the surface of the body in the way described, and so shocking of aspect, or so generally suspected of infection, that public feeling called for separation. It is now undoubted that the "leprosy" of modern Syria, and which has a wide range in Spain, Greece, and Norway, is the Elephantiasis Græcorum. It is said to have been brought home by the crusaders into the various countries of Western and Northern Europe. It certainly was not the distinctive white leprosy, nor do any of the described symptoms in Lev. xiii. point to elephantiasis. "White as snow" (2 K. v. 27) would be as inapplicable to elephantiasis as to small-pox. Further, the most striking and fearful results of this modern so-called "leprosy" are wanting in the Mosaic description—the transformation of the features to a leonine expression, and the corrosion of the joints, so that the fingers drop piecemeal. (MEDICINE.) Whether we regard Lev. xiii. as speaking of a group of diseases having mutually a mere superficial resemblance, or a real affinity, it need not perplex us that they do not correspond with the three species of leprosy of Hippocrates (the Gr. alphos, leuké [= white], and melas [= black]), which are said by Bateman to prevail still respectively as Lepa alphoides, Lepa vulgaris, and Lepa nigricans. The first has more minute and whiter scales, and the circular patches in which they form are smaller than those of the vulgaris, which appears in scaly discs of different sizes, having nearly always a circular form, first presenting small distinct red shining elevations of the cuticle, then white scales which accumulate sometimes into a thick crust; or, as Dr. Mason Good describes its appearance, as having a spreading scale upon an elevated base; the elevations depressed in the middle, but without a change of color; the black hair on the patches, which is the prevailing color of the hair in Palestine, participating in the whiteness, and the patches themselves perpetually widening in their outline. A phosphate of lime probably gives their bright glossy color to the scaly patches. The third, nigricans, or rather subfusca, is rarer, in form and distribution resembling the second, but differing in the dark livid color of the patches. The scaly incrustations of the first species infest the flat of the fore-arm, knee, and elbow-joints, but on the face seldom extend beyond the forehead and temples (compare 2 Chr. xxvi. 19, "the leprosy rose up in his forehead"). The cure of this is not difficult; the second scarcely ever heals (Celsus). The third is always accompanied by a cachectic condition of body. Further, elephantiasis itself has also passed current under the name of the "black leprosy." It is possible that the "freckled spot" of the A. V. in Lev. xiii. 39 may correspond with the harmless Lepa alphoides, since it is noted as "clean." There is a remarkable concurrence between the description by Æschylus (Choeph. 271-274) of the disease which was to produce "lichens coursing over the flesh, eroding with fierce voracity the former natural structure, and white hairs shooting up over the part diseased," and some of the Mosaic symptoms; the spreading energy of the evil is dwelt upon both by Moses and by Æschylus, as vindicating its character as a scourge of God. But the symptoms of "white hairs" is a curious and exact confirmation of the genuineness of the detail in the Mosaic account, especially as the poet's language would rather imply that the disease spoken of was not then domesticated in Greece, but the strange horror of some other land. There remains a curious question, before we quit Leviticus, as regards the leprosy of garments and houses. Some have thought garments worn by leprorous patients intended. This classing of garments and house-walls with the human epidermis, as leprorous, has moved the mirth of some, and the wonder of others. Yet modern science has established what goes far to vindicate the Mosaic classification as more philosophical than such cavils. It is now known that there are some skin-diseases which originate in an acarus (= mite, tick, &c.), and others which proceed from a fungus. In these we may probably find the solution of the paradox. The analogy between the insect which frets the human skin and that which frets the garment that covers it, between the fungous growth that lines the crevices of the epidermis and that which creeps in the interstices of masonry, is close enough for the purposes of a ceremonial law, to which it is essential that there should be an arbitrary element intermingled with provisions manifestly reasonable. Michaelis has suggested a nitrous efflorescence on the surface of the stone, produced by saltpetre, or rather an acid containing it, and issuing in red spots, and cites the example of a house in Lubeck; he mentions also exfoliation of the stone from other causes; but probably these appearances would not be developed without a greater degree of damp than is common in Palestine and Arabia. It is manifest also that a disease in the human subject caused by an acarus or by a fungus would be certainly contagious, since the propagative cause could be transferred from person to person. The lepers of the N. T. do not seem to offer occasion for special remark, save that by the N. T. period the disease, as known in Palestine, probably did not differ materially from the record of it by Hippocrates. "Leprosy," says Mr. Jennings (in Fbn.), "was polluting, spreading (in respect to the person affected), transmissive, and incurable by any known remedy. It was therefore the standing symbol of sin, the most malignant evil in God's universe." PURIFICATION; UNCLEANNESS.

Le'thech [-theh] (Heb. a measure for grain, so called from pouring, Ges.) (Hos. iii. 2, margin). WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

* Let'ter, Let'ters. EPISTLE; WRITING.

Let'tus (fr. Gr.) = HATTUSH (1 Esd. viii. 29).

Le-tu'shim (Heb. the hammered, the sharpened, Ges.), second son of DEDAN, son of JOKSHAN (Gen. xxv. 3 [and 1 Chr. i. 32, Vulgate]). Fresnel identifies the name with Tasm, one of the ancient and extinct tribes of ARABIA. LEUMMIM.

Le-um'mim (Heb. peoples, nations), third son, or descendant, of DEDAN son of JOKSHAN (Gen. xxv. 3 [1 Chr. i. 32, Vulgate]), being in the plural form like his brethren, Asshurim and Letushim. The name evidently refers to a tribe or people sprung from Dedan.

Leummim has been identified with the Alloumaitai of Ptolemy, and by Fresnel with an Arab tribe called Umeiyim. The latter was one of the very ancient tribes of ARABIA of which no genealogy is given by the Arabs, and who appear to have been ante-Abrahamic, and possibly aboriginal inhabitants of the country.

Le'vi (Heb. a joining, Ges.). 1. Third son of JACOB by his wife Leah. This, like most other names in the patriarchal history, was connected with the thoughts and feelings that gathered round the child's birth. As derived from Heb. lavah, to adhere, it gave utterance to the hope of the mother that the affections of her husband, which had hitherto rested on the favored Rachel, would at last be drawn to her. "This time will my husband be joined unto me, because I have borne him three sons" (Gen. xxix. 34). The new-born child was to be a fresh link binding the parents to each other more closely than before. One fact alone is recorded in which he appears prominent. The sons of Jacob have come from Padan-aram to Canaan with their father, and are with him "at Shalem, a city of Shechem." Their sister Dinah goes out "to see the daughters of the land" (xxiv. 1), i. e. as the words probably indicate, and as Josephus (i. 21) distinctly states, to be present at one of their great annual gatherings for some festival of Nature-worship, analogous to that which we meet with afterward among the Midianites (Num. xxv. 2). (IDOLATRY.) The license of the time or the absence of her natural guardians exposes her, though yet in earliest youth, to lust and outrage. A stain is left, not only on her, but on the honor of her kindred, which, according to the rough justice of the time, nothing but blood could wash out. The duty of extorting that revenge fell, as in the case of Amnon and Tamar (2 Sam. xiii. 22), on the brothers rather than the father. Simeon and Levi take the task upon themselves. The history that follows is that of a cowardly and repulsive crime (Gen. xxxiv. 25-31). For the offence of one man, they destroy and plunder a whole city. They cover their murderous schemes with fair words and professions of friendship. They make the very token of their religion the instrument of their perfidy and revenge. Their father, timid and anxious as ever, utters a feeble lamentation. Of other facts in the life of Levi, there are none in which he takes, as in this, a prominent and distinct part. He shares in the hatred which his brothers bear to Joseph, and joins in the plots against him (xxxvii. 4). Simeon appears to have been foremost in this attack on the favored son of Rachel; and it is at least probable that in this, as in their former guilt, Simeon and Levi were brethren. Afterward Levi, with his three sons, GERSHON, KOHATH, MERARI, went down into Egypt (xlii. 11). When his father's death draws near, and the sons are gathered round him, he hears the old crime brought up again to receive its sentence from the lips that are no longer feeble and hesitating. Simeon and Levi, no less than the incestuous first-born, had forfeited the privileges of their birthright. They were to be divided in Jacob and scattered in Israel (xlix. 5 ff.). Levi died in Egypt at the age of 137 (Ex. vi. 16). From him were descended MOSES and AARON with the priests (HIGH-PRIEST; PAIEST) and LEVITES.—2. Son of Melch; one of the near ancestors of our Lord; great-grandfather of Joseph (Lk. iii. 24).—3. A more remote ancestor of Christ; son of Simeon (iii. 29).—4. MATTHEW (Mk. ii. 14; Lk. v. 27, 29).

Le-vi'a-than (Heb. livyathan) occurs five times in the text of the A. V., and once in the margin of Job iii. 8, where the text has "mourning." In the Hebrew Bible livyathan (= "leviathan," except in Job iii. 8) is found only in Job iii. 8, xl. 25 (xli. 1, A. V.); Ps. lxxiv. 14, civ. 26; Is. xxvii. 1. In the margin of Job iii. 8, and text of Job xli. 1, and Ps. lxxiv. 14, the crocodile is most clearly the animal denoted by the Hebrew word (so Mr. Houghton, the original author of this article). The crocodile, Crocodilus vulgaris, is clothed on the entire upper part of the body with distinct series of bony scales imbedded in the skin, and constituting a coat-of-mail capable of resisting the most powerful enemy. The skull is remarkably solid, with bony crests. There is a single row of conical, pointed teeth in each jaw, locking into each other. The crocodile is said to attain a length of twenty-five feet. A huge, fierce, cunning, carnivorous reptile, it is greatly dreaded in the hot regions of which it is a native. It was worshipped by the ancient Egyptians. Job iii. 8 is beset with difficulties. There can, however, be little doubt that the margin is the correct rendering. There appears to be some reference to those who practised enchantments. The detailed description of leviathan given in Job xli. indisputably belongs to the crocodile. The Egyptian crocodile also is certainly the leviathan in Ps. lxxiv. 14. The leviathan of Ps. civ. 26 Mr. Houghton regards as some animal of the whale family. The "great and wide sea" must be the Mediterranean, and the whale is found there. The Orcas Gladiator (Gray), or common grampus, and the Physeter Antiquorum (Gray), or the Korqual of the Mediterranean (Cuvier), are two species of the whale family not uncommon in the Mediterranean, and anciently the species may have been more numerous. The crocodile is a fresh-water animal; but, as allied reptiles frequent salt water, the crocodile may anciently have been found in the Mediterranean. There is some uncertainty about the leviathan of Is. xxvii. 1. As the term leviathan is evidently used in no limited sense, not improbably "leviathan the piercing serpent," or "leviathan the crooked serpent," may denote some species of the great rock-snakes (Boa family) which are common in S. and W. Africa, perhaps the Hortulia Seba, which Schneider, under the synonym Boa hieroglyphica, appears to identify with the huge serpent represented on the Egyptian monuments. Mr. R. S. Poole (in Kitto) regards leviathan as always = the crocodile; Mr. Gosse (in Fairbairn) regards it as specifically = the crocodile, though perhaps in a later age used indefinitely for any huge reptile. Perhaps monster may be as good a translation of the Heb. livyathān as any that can be found.

* Lev'i-rate (fr. L. levir = husband's brother)

LAW. MARRIAGE.

Le'vis (L.), in 1 Esd. ix. 14, is simply a corruption of "the Levite" in Ezr. x. 15.

Le'vite (fr. Heb. = descendant of LEVI 1); plural Le'vites. The analogy of the names of the other tribes of Israel would lead us to include under "Levites" and "sons of Levi" the whole tribe that traced its descent from Levi. The existence of another division, however, within the tribe itself, in the higher office of the priesthood (PRIEST) as limited to "the sons of Aaron," gave to the common form, in this instance, a peculiar meaning. Most frequently the Levites are distinguished, as such, from the priests (1 K. viii. 4; Ezr. ii. 70; Jn. i. 19, &c.), and this is the meaning which has perpetuated itself. Sometimes the word extends to the whole tribe, the priests included (Num. xxv. 2; Josh. xxi. 3, 41; Ex. vi. 25; Lev. xxv. 32, &c.). Sometimes again it is added as an epithet of the smaller portion of the tribe, and we read of "the priests the Levites" (Josh. iii. 3; Ez. xlv. 15). The history of the tribe and of the functions attached to its several orders, is obviously essential to any right apprehension of the history of Israel as a people. It will fall naturally into four great periods. I. The time of the Exodus. II. The period of the Judges. III. That of the Monarchy. IV. That from the Captivity to the destruction of Jerusalem.—I. The absence of all reference to the consecrated character of the Levites in Genesis is noticeable enough. The prophecy of Jacob (Gen. xlix. 5-7) was indeed fulfilled with singular precision; the massacre of the Shechemites may have contributed to influence the history of Levi's descendants, by fostering in them the same fierce wild zeal against all that threatened to violate the purity of their race; but generally what strikes us is the absence of all recognition of the later character. In the genealogy of Gen. xlv. 11, in like manner, the list does not go lower down than the three sons of Levi, and they are given in the order of their birth, not in that which would have corresponded to the official superiority of the Kohathites. There are no signs, again, that the tribe of Levi had any special preëminence over the others during the Egyptian bondage. Within the tribe itself there are some slight tokens that the Kohathites are gaining the first place (Ex. iv. 14, vi. 23). But as yet there are no traces of a caste-character, no signs of any intention to establish an hereditary priesthood. Up to this time the Israelites had worshipped the God of their fathers after their fathers' manner. (FIRST-BORN.) It was apparently with this as their ancestral worship that they came up out of Egypt. The "young men" of the sons of Israel offer sacrifices (xxiv. 5). They, we may infer, are the priests who remain with the people while Moses ascends the heights of Sinai (xix. 22-24). They represented the truth that the whole people were "a kingdom of priests" (xix. 6). Neither they nor the "officers and judges" appointed to assist Moses in administering justice (xviii. 25) are connected in any special manner with the tribe of Levi. The first step toward a change was made in the institution of an hereditary priesthood in the family of Aaron, during the first withdrawal of Moses to the solitude of Sinai (xxviii. 1). The next extension of the idea of the priesthood grew out of the terrible consecration of themselves, Ex. xxxii. (CALF.) The tribe stood forth, separate and apart, recognizing even in this stern work the spiritual as higher than the natural, and therefore counted worthy to be the representative of the ideal life of the people, "an Israel within an Israel." From this time accordingly they occupied a distinct position. The tribe of Levi was to take the place of that earlier priesthood of the first-born as representatives of the holiness of the people. The minds of the people were to be drawn to the fact of the substitution by the close numerical correspondence of the consecrated tribe (22,000)<sup>1</sup> with that of those whom they replaced (22,273; Num. iii.). As the Tabernacle was the sign of the presence among the people of their unseen King, so the Levites were, among the other tribes of Israel, as the royal guard that waited exclusively on Him. When the people were at rest, they encamped as guardians round the sacred tent (Num. i. 51, xviii. 22). The Levites might come nearer than the other tribes; but they might not sacrifice, nor burn incense, nor see the "holy things" of the sanctuary till they were covered (iv. 15). When on the march, no hands but theirs might strike the tent at the commencement of the day's journey, or carry the parts of its structure during it, or pitch the tent once again when they halted (i. 51). It was obviously essential for such a work that there should be a fixed assignment of duties; and now accordingly we meet with the first outlines of the organization which afterward became permanent. The division of the tribe into the three sections that traced their descent from the sons of Levi, formed the groundwork of it. (GERSHON; KOHATH; MERARI.) The work which they all had to do required a man's full strength, and, therefore, though twenty was the starting-point for military service (Num. i.), they were not to enter on their active service till they were thirty (iv. 28, 30, 35).<sup>2</sup> At fifty they were to be free from all duties but those of superintendence (viii. 25, 26). The result of this limitation gave to the Kohathites 2,750 on active service out of 8,600; to the sons of Gershon 2,630 out of 7,500; to those of Merari 3,200 out of 6,200 (iv.). Of these the Kohathites, as nearest of kin to the priests, held from the first the highest offices. They were to bear all the vessels of the sanctuary, the ark itself included (iii. 31, iv. 15; Deut. xxxi. 25), after the priests had covered them with dark-blue cloth which was to hide them from all profane gaze; and thus they became also the guardians of all the sacred treasures which the people had so freely offered. The Gershonites had to carry the tent-hangings and curtains (Num. iv. 22-26). The heavier burden of the boards, bars, and pillars of the Tabernacle fell on the sons of Merari. Before the march began, the whole tribe was once again solemnly set apart (viii. 5 ff.). The new institution was, however, to receive a severe shock from those who were most interested in it. The section of the Levites whose position brought them into contact with the tribe of Reuben conspired with it to reassert the old patriarchal system of a household priesthood (xvi.). (KORAH 4.) When their self-willed ambition had been punished, it was time also to provide more definitely for them, and this involved a permanent organization for the future as well as for the present. Jehovah was to be their inheritance (xviii. 20; Deut. x. 9, xviii. 2). They were to have no territorial possessions. In place of them they were to receive from the others the tithes of the produce of the land, from which they, in their turn, offered a TITHE to the priests, as a recognition of their higher consecration (Num. xviii. 21, 24, 26; Neh. x. 37). When the wanderings of the people should be over, and the Tabernacle have a settled place, great part of the labor that had fallen on them would come to an end, and they, too, would need a fixed abode. Distinctness and diffusion were both to be secured by the assignment to the whole tribe of forty-eight cities, with an outlying "suburb" (Num. xxxv. 2) of meadow-land for the pasturage of their flocks and herds. (SUBURBS.) The reverence of the people for them was to be heightened by the selection of six of these as cities of refuge. Through the whole land the Levites were to take the place of the old household priests, sharing in all festivals and rejoicings (Deut. xii. 19, xiv. 26, 27, xxvi. 11). Every third year they were to have an additional share in the produce of the land (xiv. 28, xxvi. 12). To "the priests the Levites" was to belong the office of preserving, transcribing, and interpreting the law (xvii. 9-12, xxxi. 26). They were solemnly to read it every seventh year at the Feast of Tabernacles (xxxi. 9-13). They were to pronounce the curses from Mount Ebal (xxvii. 14). Such, if one may so speak, was the ideal of the religious organization which was present to the mind of the lawgiver. The great principle was, that the warrior-caste who had guarded the tent of the Captain of the hosts of Israel, should be throughout the land as witnesses that the people still owed allegiance to Him. As yet, no traces appear of their character as a learned caste, and of the work which afterward belonged to them as hymn-writers and musicians. (MUSIC.)—II. The successor of Moses, though belonging to another tribe, did faithfully all that could be done to convert this idea into a reality. The submission of the GIBBONITES, after they had obtained a promise that their lives should be spared, enabled him to relieve the tribe-divisions of Gershon and Merari of the most burdensome of their duties. The conquered Hivites became "hewers of wood and drawers of water" for the house of Jehovah and for the congregation (Josh. ix. 27). (NETRINIM; SOLOMON'S SERVANTS, CHILDREN OF.) As soon as the conquerors had advanced far enough to proceed to a partition of the country, the forty-eight cities were assigned to them (xxi.) thus:

<sup>2</sup> The mention of twenty-five in Num. viii. 24, as the age of entrance, may be understood either of a probationary period during which they were trained for their duties (Talmud, Raab, Maimonides, &c.), or of the lighter work of keeping the gates of the Tabernacle (Rashbam, Aben Ezra, and most modern expositors). Bähr, &c., follow another ancient Jewish interpretation that Num. iv. treats of the necessary age of the Levites for the requirements in the wilderness, and ch. viii. gives their age for the promised land, when in their division among the tribes a larger number would be wanted (Dr. Ginsburg, in Kitto).

The scanty memorials in Judges fail to show how far, for any length of time, the reality answered to the idea. The tendency of the people to fall into the idolatry of the neighboring nations showed either that the Levites failed to bear their witness to the truth or had no power to enforce it. The old household priesthood revives, and there is the risk of the national worship breaking up into individualism (Judg. xvii.). (MICAH 1; JONATHAN 5.) The shameless license of the sons of ELI may be looked upon as the result of a long period of decay, affecting the whole order. The work of SAMUEL was the starting-point of a better time. Himself a Levite, and, though not a priest, belonging to that section of the Levites which was nearest to the priesthood (1 Chr. vi. 28), adopted as it were, by a special dedication, into the priestly line and trained for its offices (1 Sam. ii. 18), he appears as infusing a fresh life, the author of a new organization. There is no reason to think, indeed, that the companies or schools of the sons of the prophets which appear in his time (x. 5), and are traditionally said to have been founded by him, consisted exclusively of Levites; but there are many signs that the members of that tribe formed a large element in the new order, and received new strength from it. (PROPHET.—III. The capture of the Ark by the Philistines did not entirely interrupt the worship of the Israelites, and the ministrations of the Levites went on, first at Shiloh (1 Sam. xiv. 3), then for a time at Nob (xxii. 11), afterward at Gibeon (1 K. iii. 2; 1 Chr. xvi. 39). The history of the return of the Ark to BETH-SHEMESH after its capture by the Philistines, and its subsequent removal to KIRJATH-JEARIM, points apparently to some strange complications rising out of the anomalies of this period, and affecting, in some measure, the position of the tribe of Levi. (ABINADAB 1; HIGH PLACES.) The rule of Samuel and his sons, and the prophetic character now connected with the tribe, tended to give them the position of a ruling caste. In the strong desire of the people for a king, we may perhaps trace a protest against the assumption by the Levites of a higher position than that originally assigned. The reign of SAUL, in its later period, was at any rate the assertion of a self-willed power against the priestly order. (AHIMELECH 1; GIBBONITES.) The reign of DAVID, however, wrought the change from persecution to honor (1 Chr. xii. 26). When his kingdom was established, there came a fuller organization of the whole tribe. Their position in relation to the priesthood was once again definitely recognized. When the Ark was carried up to its new resting-place in Jerusalem, their claim to be the bearers of it was publicly acknowledged (xv. 2). (ORBD-EDOM.) In the procession which attended the ultimate conveyance of the Ark to its new resting-place the Levites were conspicuous, wearing their linen ephods, and appearing in their new character as minstrels (xv. 27, 28). In the worship of the Tabernacle under David, as afterward in that of the Temple, we may trace a development of the simpler arrangements of the wilderness and of Shiloh. The Levites were the gatekeepers, vergers, sacristans, choristers of the central sanctuary of the nation. They were, in the language of 1 Chr. xliii. 24-32, "to wait on the sons of Aaron for the service of the house of Jehovah, in the courts, and the chambers, and the purifying of all holy things." This included the duty of providing "for the shew-bread, and the fine flour for meat-offering, and for the unleavened bread." They were, besides this, "to stand every morning to thank and praise Jehovah, and likewise at even." They were lastly "to offer"—i. e. to assist the priests in offering—"all burnt-sacrifices to Jehovah in the sabbaths and on the set feasts." They lived for the greater part of the year in their own cities, and came up at fixed periods to take their turn of work (xxv., xxvi.). How long it lasted we have no sufficient data for determining. The education which the Levites received for their peculiar duties, no less than their connection, more or less intimate, with the schools of the prophets (PROPHET), would tend to make them, so far as there was any EDUCATION at all, the teachers of the others, the transcribers and interpreters of the Law, the chroniclers of the times in which they lived. (SCRIBE.) We have some striking instances of their appearance in this new character. (JUDGE; SHEMAIAH 8.) The two books of Chronicles bear unmistakable marks of having been written by men whose interests were all gathered round the services of the Temple, and who were familiar with its records. The former subdivisions of the tribe were recognized in the assignment of the new duties, and the Kohathites retained their old preëminence (1 Chr. ix. 19, 32, xv. 5-10, xvi. 30). (ASAPH; HEMAN; JEDUTHUN.) Now they were to enter on their work at the age of twenty (xxiii. 24-27). As in the old days of the Exodus, so in the organization under David, the Levites were not included in the general census of the people (xxi. 8), and formed accordingly no portion of its military strength. A separate census, made apparently before the change of age just mentioned (xxiii. 3), gives—24,000 over the work of the Temple, 6,000 officers and judges, 4,000 porters, i. e. gatekeepers, and, as such, bearing arms (ix. 19; 2 Chr. xxxi. 2), 4,000 praising Jehovah with instruments. The latter number, however, must have included the full choruses of the Temple. The more skilled musicians among the sons of Heman, Asaph, and Jeduthun are numbered at 288, in 24 sections of 12 each. (MUSIC.) The revolt of the ten tribes, and the policy pursued by JEROBOAM I (CALF; IDOLATRY), led to a great change in the position of the Levites. They were the witnesses of an appointed order and of a central worship. He wished to make the priests the creatures and instruments of the king, and to establish a provincial and divided worship. The natural result was, that they left the cities assigned to them in the territory of Israel, and gathered round the metropolis of Judah (2 Chr. xi. 13, 14). In the kingdom of Judah they were, from this time forward, a powerful body, politically as well as ecclesiastically. We find them prominent in the war of Abijah against Jeroboam (xlii. 10-12). They are sent out by Jehoshaphat to instruct and judge the people (xix. 8-10). The apostasy that followed on the marriage of Jehoram and Athaliah exposed them for a time to the dominance of a hostile system; but the services of the Temple appear to have gone on, and the Levites were again conspicuous in the counter-revolution effected by Jehoiada (xliii.), and in restoring the Temple to its former stateliness under Joash (xxiv. 5). The closing of the Temple under Ahaz involved the cessation at once of their work and of their privileges (xxviii. 24). Under Hezekiah they again became prominent, as consecrating themselves to the special work of cleansing and repairing the Temple (xxix. 12-15, 34); and the hymns of David and of Asaph were again renewed. Their old privileges were restored, they were put forward as teachers (xxx. 22), and the payment of tithes, which had probably been discontinued under Ahaz, was renewed (xxxi. 4). The genealogies of the tribe were revised (ver. 17), and the old classification kept its ground. The reign of Manasseh was for them, during the greater part of it, a period of depression. That of Josiah witnessed a fresh revival and reorganization (xxxiv. 8-13). In the great passover of his eighteenth year they took their place as teachers of the people, as well as leaders of their worship (xxxv. 3, 15). Then came the Egyptian and Chaldean invasions, and the rule of cowardly and apostate kings. The sacred tribe itself showed itself unfaithful (Ez. xlv. 10-14, xlviii. 11). They had, as the penalty of their sin, to witness the destruction of the Temple, and to taste the bitterness of exile.—IV. After the Captivity. The position taken by the Levites in the first movements of the return from Babylon indicates that they had cherished the traditions and maintained the practices of their tribe. They, we may believe, were those who were specially called on to sing to their conquerors one of the songs of Zion. It is noticeable, however, that in the first body of returning exiles they are present in a disproportionately small number (Ezr. ii. 36-42). Those who do come take their old parts at the foundation and dedication of the second Temple (iii. 10, vi. 18). In the next movement, under Ezra, their reluctance (whatever may have been its origin) was even more strongly marked. None of them presented themselves at the first great gathering (viii. 15). The special efforts of Ezra did not succeed in bringing together more than 38, and their place had to be filled by 220 of the Nethinim (ver. 20). Those who returned with him resumed their functions at the feast of Tabernacles as teachers and interpreters (Neh. viii. 7), and those who were most active in that work were foremost also in chanting the hymn-like prayer which appears in Nch. ix. as the last great effort of Jewish psalmody. They are recognized in the great national covenant, and the offerings and tithes which were their due are once more solemnly secured to them (x. 37-39). They take their old places in the Temple and in the villages near Jerusalem (xii. 29), and are present in full array at the great feast of the Dedication of the Wall. The two prophets who were active at the time of the Return, Haggai and Zechariah, if they did not belong to the tribe, helped it forward in the work of restoration. The strongest measures are adopted by Nehemiah, as before by Ezra, to guard the purity of their blood from the contamination of mixed marriages (Ezr. x. 23); and they are made the special guardians of the holiness of the Sabbath (Neh. xii. 22). The last prophet of the O. T. sees, as part of his vision of the latter days, the time when the Lord "shall purify the sons of Levi" (Mal. iii. 3). The guidance of the O. T. fails us at this point, and the history of the Levites in relation to the national life becomes consequently a matter of inference and conjecture. The SYNAGOGUE worship, then originated, or receiving a new development, was organized irrespectively of them, and thus throughout Palestine there were means of instruction in the Law with which they were not connected. During the period that followed the Captivity they contributed to the formation of the so-called Great Synagogue. (SYNAGOGUE, THE GREAT.) They, with the priests, theoretically constituted and practically formed the majority of the permanent SANHEDRIM, and as such had a large share in the administration of justice even in capital cases. They take no prominent part in the Maccabean struggles, though they must have been present at the great purification of the Temple. They appear but seldom in the history of the N. T. Where we meet with their names it is as the type of a formal heartless worship, without sympathy and without love (Lk. x. 32). In Jn. i. 19 they appear as delegates of the Jews, i. e. of the Sanhedrin, to inquire into the credentials of the Baptist, and giving utterance to their own Messianic expectations. The mention of a Levite of Cyprus in Acts iv. 36 shows that the changes of the previous century had carried that tribe also into "the dispersed among the Gentiles." Later on in the history of the first century, when the Temple had received its final completion under the younger Agrippa, we find one section of the tribe engaged in a new movement. With that strange unconsciousness of a coming doom which so often marks the last stage of a decaying system, the singers of the Temple thought it a fitting time to apply for the right of wearing the same linen garment as the priests, and persuaded the king that the concession of this privilege would be the glory of his reign (Jos. xx. 8, § 6). The other Levites at the same time asked for and obtained the privilege of joining in the Temple choruses, from which hitherto they had been excluded. The destruction of the Temple so soon after they had attained the object of their desires came as with a grim irony to sweep away their occupation, and so to deprive them of every vestige of that which had distinguished them from other Israelites. They were merged in the crowd of captives that were scattered over the Roman world, and disappear from the stage of history. Looking at the long history of which the outline has been here traced, we find in it the light and darkness, the good and evil, which mingle in the character of most corporate or caste societies. On the one hand, the Levites, as a tribe, tended to fall into a formal worship, a narrow and exclusive exaltation of themselves and of their country. On the other hand, they were chosen, together with the priesthood, to bear witness of great truths which might otherwise have perished from remembrance, and they bore it well through a long succession of centuries. It is not often, in the history of the world, that a religious caste or order has passed away with more claims to the respect and gratitude of mankind than the tribe of Levi (so Prof. Plumptre).

Le-vi't-eus (L. adj. = pertaining to LEVI, or to the LEVITES, Levitical; fr. the title in the Vulg. Liber Leviticus, i. e. the Levitical book. The Heb. title is vayyikrá [A. V. "and called"], the first word in the book giving it its name). (PENTATEUCH.)—Contents. The book consists of the following principal sections:—I. The laws touching sacrifices (chapters i.-vii.). II. An historical section containing, first, the consecration of Aaron and his sons (chapter viii.); next, his first offering for himself and his people (ix.); and lastly, the destruction of Nadab and Abihu, the sons of Aaron, for their presumptuous offence (x.). III. The laws concerning purity and impurity, and the appropriate sacrifices and ordinances for putting away impurity (xi.-xvi.). IV. Laws chiefly intended to mark the separation between Israel and the heathen nations (xvii.-xx.). V. Laws concerning the priests (xxi., xxii.); and certain holy-days and festivals (xxiii., xxv.), together with an episode (xxiv.). The section extends from chapter xxi. 1 to xxvi. 2. VI. Promises and threats (xxvi. 3-46). VII. An appendix containing the laws concerning vows (xxvii.).—I. EXODUS concludes with the account of the completion of the Tabernacle. From the Tabernacle, thus rendered glorious by the Divine Presence, issues the legislation contained in Leviticus. As Jehovah draws near to the people in the Tabernacle, so the people draw near to Jehovah in the offering. Without offerings none may approach Him. The regulations respecting the sacrifices fall into three groups, and each of these groups again consists of a decalogue of instructions. Bertheau has observed that this principle runs through all the laws of Moses. His arrangement, though not fully approved, is here given in the main, as suggestive at least of the main structure of the book. 1. The first group of regulations (chapters i.-iii.) deals with three kinds of offerings: the burnt-offering, the meat-offering, and the thank-offering. i. The BURNT-OFFERING (chapter i.) in three sections. It might be either (1.) a male without blemish from the herds, verses 3-9; or, (2.) a male without blemish from the flocks, or lesser cattle, verses 10-13; or (3.) it might be fowls, an offering of turtle-doves or young pigeons, verses 14-17. ii. The next group (chapter ii.) presents many more difficulties. The MEAT-OFFERING, or bloodless offering, in four sections: (1.) in its uncooked form, consisting of fine flour with oil and frankincense, verses 1-3; (2.) in its cooked form, of which three different kinds are specified—baked in the oven, fried, or boiled, verses 4-10; (3.) the prohibition of leaven, and the direction to use salt in all the meat-offerings, 11-13; (4.) the oblation of FIRST-FRUIITS, 14-16. This seems on the whole the best arrangement of the group (so Mr. J. J. S. Perowne). The Masoretic arrangement is in five sections: verses 1-3; 4; 5, 6; 7-13; 14-16. iii. The "PEACE-OFFERING" (A. V.), or "thank-offering" (Ewald) (chapter iii.), in three sections. Strictly speaking this falls under two heads: first, when it is of the herd; and secondly, when it is of the flock. But this last has again its subdivision; for the offering when of the flock may be either a lamb or a goat. Accordingly the three sections are verses 1-5; 7-11; 12-16; and verse 17 a general conclusion. This concludes the first Decalogue of the book. 2. Chapters iv., v. The laws concerning the sin-offering and the trespass- (or guilt-) offering. The SIN-OFFERING (chapter iv.) is treated of under four specified cases, after a short introduction to the whole in verses 1, 2: (1.) the sin-offering for the priest, 3-12; (2.) for the whole congregation, 13-21; (3.) for a ruler, 22-26; (4.) for one of the common people, 27-35. After these four cases, in which the offering is to be made for four different classes, there follow provisions respecting three several kinds of transgression for which atonement must be made (v. 1-4). We may follow Bertheau, Baumgarten, and Knobel, in regarding them as special instances in which a sin-offering was to be brought. The Decalogue is then completed by the three regulations respecting the guilt-offering (or trespass-offering), verses 14-16, 17-19, 20-26. As in the former Decalogue, the nature of the offerings, so in this the person and the nature of the offence are the chief features in the several statutes. 3. Chapters vi., vii. Naturally upon the law of sacrifices follows the law of the priests' duties when they offer the sacrifices. In this group the different kinds of offerings are named in nearly the same order as in the two preceding Decalogues, except that the offering at the consecration of a priest follows, instead of the thank-offering, immediately after the meat-offering, which it resembles; and the thank-offering now appears after the trespass-offering. There are therefore, in all, six kinds of offerings; and in each the priest has his distinct duties. Bertheau has arranged the enactments respecting these duties in five Decalogues: vi. 9-13 and 14-18; 19-30; vii. 1-10; 11-21; 23-33. Chapter vii. closes with a brief historical notice of the fact that these several commands were given to Moses on Mount Sinai (verses 35-38).—II. Chapters viii.—x. This section is entirely historical. In chapter viii. we have the account of the consecration of Aaron and his sons by Moses before the whole congregation. In chapter ix. Aaron offers, eight days after his consecration, his first offering for himself and the people. Chapter x. tells how Nadab and Abihu perished because of their presumption.—III. Chapters xi.—xvi. The first seven Decalogues had reference to the putting away of guilt. The next seven concern themselves with the putting away of impurity. That chapters xi.—xv. hang together so as to form one series of laws there can be no doubt. The only question is about chapter xvi., which by its opening is connected immediately with the occurrence related in chapter x. Historically it would seem therefore that chapter xvi. ought to have followed chapter x. And as this order is neglected, it would lead us to suspect that some other principle of arrangement than that of historical sequence has been adopted. This we find in the solemn significance of the Day of Atonement (xvi.). 1. The first Decalogue in this group refers to CLEAN and unclean flesh. (UNCLEAN MEATS.) Five classes of animals are pronounced unclean. The first four enactments declare what animals may and may not be eaten, whether (1.) beasts of the earth (2-8), or (2.) fishes (9-12), or (3.) birds (13-20), or (4.) creeping things with wings (21-23). The next four are intended to guard against pollution by contact with the carcass of any of these animals: (5.) ver. 24-26; (6.) ver. 27, 28; (7.) ver. 29-33; (8.) ver. 39, 40. The ninth and tenth specify the last class of animals which are unclean for food; (9.) 41, 42, and forbid any other kind of pollution by means of them, (10.) 43-45. Ver. 46 and 47 are merely a concluding summary. 2. Chapter xii. Women's purification in childbed. The whole of this chapter, according to Bertheau, constitutes the first law of this Decalogue. The remaining nine are to be found in the next chapter, which treats of the signs of leprosy in man and in garments. 3. Chapter xiv. 1-32. "The law of the leper in the day of his cleansing," i. e. the law which the priest is to observe in purifying the leper. The priest is mentioned in ten verses, each of which begins one of the ten sections of this law (3, 4, 5, 11, 12, 14, 15, 16, 19, 20). 4. Chapter xiv. 33-57. The leprosy in a house, concluding with a short summary, verses 54-57, which closes the statute concerning leprosy. 5 and 6. The law of uncleanness by issue, &c., in two decalogues; chapters xv. 1-15; 16-31. Ver. 32 and 33 form merely the same general conclusion as in xiv. 54-57. 7. Chapter xvi. treats of the Great Day of Atonement. (ATONEMENT, DAY OF.) The Law itself is contained in ver. 1-28. Ver. 29-34 consist of an exhortation to its careful observance. In the act of atonement three persons are concerned. The high-priest—in this instance Aaron; the man who leads away the goat for Azazel into the wilderness; and he who burns the skin, flesh, and dung of the bullock and goat of the sin-offering without the camp. The last two have special purifications assigned them. The ninth and tenth enactments prescribe what these purifications are. The duties of Aaron consequently ought, if the division into decades is correct, to be comprised in eight enactments. According to this the Decalogue will stand thus:—(1.) ver. 2; (2.) ver. 8-5; (3.) ver. 6, 7; (4.) ver. 8; (5.) ver. 9, 10; (6.) ver. 11-19; (7.) ver. 20-22; (8.) ver. 23-25; (9.) ver. 26; (10.) ver. 27, 28. We have now reached the great central point of the book. Two great truths have been established: first, that God can only be approached by means of appointed sacrifices; next, that man in nature and life is full of pollution, which must be cleansed. And now a third is taught, viz. that not by several cleansings for several sins and pollutions can guilt be put away. The several acts of sin are but so many manifestations of the sinful nature. For this, therefore, also must atonement be made.—IV. Chapters xvii.—xx. And now Israel is reminded that it is the holy nation. The great atonement offered, it is to enter upon a new life. It is a separate nation, sanctified and set apart for the service of God. Here consequently we find those laws and ordinances which especially distinguish the nation of Israel from all other nations. Here again we may trace, as before, a group of seven decalogues. But the several decalogues are not so clearly marked; nor are the characteristic phrases and the introductions and conclusions so common. In chapter xviii. there are twenty enactments, and in chapter xix. thirty. In chapter xvii., on the other hand, there are only six, and in chapter xx. there are fourteen. Bertheau, in order to preserve the usual arrangement of the laws in decalogues, would transpose chapter xviii., and place it after chapter xix. There is, however (so Mr. Perowne), a point of connection between chapters xvii. and xviii. which must not be overlooked, and which seems to indicate that their position in our present text is the right one. All the six enactments in chapter xvii. (ver. 8-5, ver. 6, 7, ver. 8, 9, ver. 10-12, ver. 13, 14, ver. 15) bear upon the nature and meaning of the sacrifice to Jehovah as compared with the sacrifices offered to false gods. It would seem, too, that it was necessary to guard against any license to idolatrous practices, which might possibly be drawn from the sending of the goat for Azazel into the wilderness, especially, perhaps, against the Egyptian custom of appeasing the Evil Spirit of the wilderness, and averting his malice. (ATONEMENT, DAY OF.) To this there may be an allusion in ver. 7. Perhaps, however, it is better and more simple to regard the enactments in these two chapters as directed against two prevalent heathen practices, the eating of blood and fornication. In ch. xviii., after the introduction, ver. 1-5, there follow twenty enactments concerning unlawful marriages and unnatural lusts. The first ten are contained one in each verse, ver. 6-15. The next ten range themselves in like manner with the verses, except that ver. 17 and 28 contain each two. Ch. xix. Three Decalogues, introduced by the words, "Ye shall be holy, for I Jehovah your God am holy," and ending with, "Ye shall observe all my statutes, and all my judgments, and do them. I am Jehovah." The laws here are of a very mixed character, and many of them merely a repetition of previous laws.—V. We come now to the last group of seven decalogues—ch. xxi.-xxvi. 2. The subjects comprised in these enactments are—first, the personal purity of the priests. They may not defile themselves for the dead; their wives and daughters must be pure, and they themselves must be free from all personal blemish (ch. xxi.). Next, the eating of the holy things is permitted only to priests who are free from all uncleanness: they and their household only may eat them (xxii. 1-16). Thirdly, the offerings of Israel are to be pure and without blemish (xxii. 17-33). The fourth series provides for the due celebration of the great festivals when priests and people were to be gathered together before Jehovah in holy convocation (xxiii. 1-38). Bertheau omits ch. xxiii. 39-44 and ch. xxiv.<sup>1</sup> Mr. Perowne considers the former a later addition, containing further instructions respecting the Feast of Tabernacles. Ch. xxiv. has first a command concerning the oil for the lamps of the Tabernacle, which is a repetition of Ex. xxvii. 20, 21; then, directions about the shew-bread; lastly, certain enactments arising out of the BLASPHEMY of Shelomith's son, with a brief notice of the infliction of the punishment in his case. Bertheau's fifth Decalogue is in ch. xxv. 7-22, respecting the SABBATICAL YEAR and the JUBILEE; the sixth in xxv. 23-33, respecting the tenure and sale of lands and houses, the redemption of them at the Jubilee, and usury; the seventh in xxv. 39-xxvi. 2, respecting servants, idols, the Sabbath, and the sanctuary.—VI. The seven decalogues are now fitly closed by promises of the richest blessings to those that hearken unto and do these commandments, and threats of utter destruction to those that break the covenant of their God (xxvi. 3-45).—VII. The legislation is evidently completed in ch. xxvi. 46:—"These are the statutes and judgments and laws which Jehovah made between Him and the children of Israel in Mount Sinai by the hand of Moses." Ch. xxvii. is a later appendix (so Mr. Perowne, with some German critics, &c.; see below).—Integrity. This is very generally admitted. Those critics even who are in favor of different documents in the PENTATEUCH assign nearly the whole of this book to one writer, the Elohist, or author of the original document. According to Knobel, the only portions which are not to be referred to the Elohist, are—Moses' rebuke of Aaron because the goat of the sin-offering had been burnt (x. 16-20); the group of laws in ch. xvii.-xx.; certain additional enactments respecting the Sabbath and the Feast of Weeks and of Tabernacles (xxiii., part of ver. 2, ver. 8, 18, 19, 22, 39-44); the punishments ordained for blasphemy, murder, &c. (xxiv. 10-23); the directions respecting the Sabbatical year (xxv.

18-22), and the promises and warnings contained in ch. xxvi.—We must not quit this book without a word on what may be called its spiritual meaning. That so elaborate a ritual looked beyond itself we cannot doubt. It was a prophecy of things to come; a shadow whereof the substance was Christ and His kingdom. We may not always be able to say what the exact relation is between the type and the antitype. But we cannot read the Epistle to the Hebrews and not acknowledge that the Levitical priests "served the pattern and type of heavenly things"—that the sacrifices of the Law pointed to and found their interpretation of the Lamb of God—that the ordinances of outward purification signified the true inner cleansing of the heart and conscience from dead works to serve the living God. One idea, moreover, penetrates the whole of this vast and burdensome ceremonial, and gives it a real glory even apart from any prophetic significance. Holiness is its end. Holiness is its character. Lib'anus (L.; Gr. Libanos, fr. Heb.) = LEBANON (1 Esd. iv. 48, v. 55; 2 Esd. xv. 20; Jd. i. 7; Eccles. xxiv. 13, l. 12). ANTILIBANUS.

Lib'er-tines [-tinz] (see below). This word occurs once only in the N. T. (Acts vi. 9). The question is, who were these "Libertines," and in what relation did they stand to the others who are mentioned with them? Of the name itself there have been several explanations. (1.) The other names (in ver. 9) being local, this also has been referred to a supposed town of Libertum, in the pro-consular province of Africa, as if = those from Libertum.—(2.) Conjectural readings have been proposed, but every rule of textual criticism is against the reception of a reading unsupported by a single MS. or version.—(3.) Taking the word in its received meaning as fr. L. = freedmen, Lightfoot finds in it a description of natives of Palestine, who, having fallen into slavery, had been manumitted by Jewish masters.—(4.) Grotius and Vitranga explain the word as describing Italian freedmen who had become converts to Judaism.—(5.) The earliest explanation of the word (Chrysostom) has been adopted by the most recent authorities (Winer, Meyer, Kitto, Fairbairn, &c.), that the Libertini are Jews who, having been taken prisoners by Pompey and other Roman generals in the Syrian wars, had been reduced to slavery, and had afterward been emancipated, and returned, permanently or for a time, to the country of their fathers. Under Tiberius (A. n. 19), 4,000 were banished from Rome to Sardinia.

Lib'nah (Heb. whilcnas, learnness, Ges.). 1. A city in the S. W. part of the Holy Land. It was taken by Joshua immediately after the rout of Beth-horon (Josh. x. 29-32, 39, xii. 15). Lib'nah belonged to the district of the maritime lowland of Judah (SEPHELA), among the cities of which district it is enumerated (xv. 42). Lib'nah was appropriated with its "suburbs" to the priests (xxi. 13; 1 Chr. vi. 57). In the reign of Jehoram the son of Jehoshaphat it "revolted" from Judah at the same time with Edom (2 K. viii. 22; 2 Chr. xxi. 10). On completing or relinquishing the siege of LACHISH, Sennacherib laid siege to Lib'nah (2 K. xiv. 8; Is. xxxvii. 8). It was the native place of Hamutal, the queen of Josiah, and mother of Jehoshaz (2 K. xxiii. 31) and Zedekiah (xxiv. 18; Jer. lii. 1). Lib'nah is described by Eusebius and Jerome merely as a village of the district of Eleutheropolis. Its site has hitherto escaped not only discovery, but, until lately, even conjecture. Stanley would locate it at <sup>1</sup> "We are not to look for such logical arrangements as may be found in a modern code. The law to Israel was given in a popular manner, and recorded in a book meant for all to study; and its regulations partly arose, in the course of Providence, out of emergencies which the Divine purpose had arranged for bringing out some particulars of the Divine commands" (Professor Douglas, in Fbn.).

Tell es-Sâfeh, a white-faced hill, five miles N. W. of Beit Jibrin. (GATH.) Van de Velde places it with confidence at Arâk el-Menshiyeh, a hill with a small village and some ruins, four miles W. of Beit Jibrin. Wilton (in Fbn.) identifies it with Lebben, a village almost five miles S. of Gaza.—2. A station at which the Israelites encamped, on their journey between the wilderness of Sinai and Kadesh (Num. xxxiii. 20, 21); = LABAN in Deut. i. 1? Wilton (in Fbn.) identifies it with Hajr el-Abyad (= the white stone), a place about sixty miles S. W. of Beer-sheba. KADESH; WILDERNESS OF THE WANDERING.

Lib'ni (Heb. white, Ges.). 1. Eldest son of Gershom, the son of Levi (Ex. vi. 17; Num. iii. 18; 1 Chr. vi. 17, 20), and ancestor of the family of the LIBNITES.—2. Son of Mahli, or Mahali, son of Merari (vi. 29). Some suppose that he = No. 1, and that something has been omitted (compare ver. 29 with 20, 42).

Lib'nites, the = the descendants of LIBNI, son of Gershom (Num. iii. 21, xxvi. 58). GERSHONITES; LEVITES.

Lib'ya [-e-ah] (L. fr. Gr. Libúē; compare LEHABIM, LUBIM) occurs in Acts ii. 10, in the periphrasis "the parts of Libya about CYRENE," which obviously means the Cyrenaica. The name Libya is applied by the Greek and Roman writers to the African continent, generally excepting Egypt. For "Libya" (Ez. xxx. 5, xxxviii. 5) the margin has "PHUT." LUBIM.

* Lib'y-ans [-e-anz] = people of LIBYA (Jer. xlvi. 9, margin "Put;" Dan. xi. 43). LUBIM; PHUT.

Lice (Heb. cinnîn, cinnâm), pl. of louse, a well-known parasitic insect. This word occurs in the A. V. only in Ex. viii. 16-18, and in Ps. cv. 31; both of which passages have reference to the third great plague of Egypt. The Hebrew word—which, with some slight variation, occurs only in Ex. viii. 16-18, and in Ps. cv. 31—has given occasion to whole pages of discussion. Some commentators (Michaelis, Oedmann, Rosenmüller, Harenberg, Geddes, Harriis), with Philo, and Origen, and indeed modern writers generally, suppose that gnats are the animals intended by the original word; while, on the other hand, the Jewish Rabbis, Josephus, Bochart, Bryant, &c., favor the A. V. translation. The old versions are claimed by Bochart as supporting the opinion that lice are here intended. On the whole, this much appears certain (so Mr. Houghton), that those commentators who assert that cinnîn means gnats or mosquitoes, have arrived at this conclusion without sufficient authority; they have based their arguments solely on the evidence of the LXX., though it is by no means proved that the Greek word (aknips, pl. kniphes, probably originally = any small irritating creature) used by these translators has any reference to gnats. It appears, therefore, that there is not sufficient authority for rejecting the A. V. translation lice. PLAGUES OF EGYPT.

Liea-ten'ants. The Heb. ahashdarpan or achashdarpan was the official title of the satraps or viceroys who governed the provinces of the Persian empire; it is rendered "lieutenant" in Esth. iii. 12, viii. 9, ix. 3; Ezr. viii. 36, and the kindred Chaldaic word is translated "prince" in Dan. iii. 2, 3, 27, vi. 1 ff.

* Life, the A. V. translation of—1. Heb. hay or chay (Gen. i. 20, ii. 7, 9, iii. 14, 17, &c.), also translated "living" (i. 21, 24, iii. 20, &c.), "living thing" (i. 28, vi. 19), &c.—Heb. nephesh (i. 30, ix. 4, 5, &c.), usually translated "soul" (xii. 5, 13; Ps. xi. 1, 11, &c.), sometimes "mind" (xxiii. 8, &c.), "person" (xiv. 21, &c.), "heart" (Ex. xxiii. 9, &c.), &c.—8. Gr. bios (= the present life, Robinson, N. T. Lex.) (Lk. viii. 14; 1 Tim. ii. 2; 2 Tim. ii. 4; 1 Pet. iv. 3; 1 Jn. ii. 16), also translated "living" (Mk. xii. 44; Lk. xv. 12, 30, xxi. 4), "good" (1 Jn. iii. 17).—4. Gr. zôê (Mat. vii. 14, and about 180 other passages in N. T.). The kindred Gr. verb zaô, translated "to live," &c., occurs as often.—5. Gr. pneuma (Rev. xiii. 19), usually translated "SPIRIT" or "ghost."—6. Gr. psuchê (Mat. ii. 20, vi. 25, x. 39, &c.), often translated "SOUL" (x. 28, xi. 29, &c.).—"Life" and "to live" are used in the Scriptures to denote the physical existence of men, animals, &c. (Gen. xxv. 7; Acts xvii. 25, 28, &c.); the possession or enjoyment of that which makes existence valuable, viz. happiness, or well-being (Ps. xvi. 11; Acts ii. 28, &c.), which in the case of intelligent moral beings is closely connected with the favor of God and conformity to His character (Rom. vi. 4, viii. 6; Eph. iv. 18); the existence which is pre-eminently worthy of the name "life," viz. the immortality of blessedness and glory, which is enjoyed by holy beings in heaven, and which is to be the portion of believers in the Lord Jesus Christ (Mat. xix. 16, 17; Rom. ii. 7, v. 17, vi. 23, &c.). DAMNATION; DEATH; ETERNAL, &c.

* Light [lite] (Heb. ôr; Gr. phôs, &c.) denotes not only the element or medium by which we see (Gen. i. 3-5, &c.), and the sun or other source of illumination (i. 14 ff., &c.); but also that which illuminates or enlightens in an intellectual, moral, or spiritual sense (Mat. vi. 23; Jn. i. 4, v. 35, &c.). Light is opposed to DARKNESS, and in the Scriptures is closely connected with LIFE. "God is light" in the highest sense (1 Jn. i. 5); heaven is the world of "light" (Col. i. 12); purity, holiness, goodness, characterize "the children of light" (1 Cor. xvi. 8; Eph. v. 8); Jesus Christ is the "light of the world" (Jn. ix. 5), &c.

Lign-al'ces [lig-nal'oze, or line-al'oze]. ALOES.

Ligure, or Lig'ure (Heb. lshem), a precious stone mentioned in Ex. xxviii. 19, xxxix. 12, as the first in the third row of the high-priest's breast-plate. It is impossible to say, with any certainty, what stone is denoted by the Hebrew term. The LXX. version generally, the Vulgate and Josephus, understand the lyncurium or figurium; but it is a matter of considerable difficulty to identify the figurium of the ancients with any known precious stone. Dr. Woodward and some old commentators have supposed that it was some kind of belemnite; others, amber; others again, opal; Dr. Watson, the tourmaline; Beckmann, Braun, Epiphanius, J. de Laet, Hill, Rosenmüller, the hyacinth stone of modern mineralogists. So King (Natural History of Precious Stones) makes the Gr. lungkourion, L. lyncurium = the modern JACINTH. But Theophrastus, speaking of the properties of the lyncurium, says that it attracts not only light particles of wood, but fragments of iron and brass. Now, there is no peculiar attractive power in the hyacinth. More probable, though still inconclusive (so Mr. Houghton), appears the opinion of those who identify the lyncurium with the tourmaline, or more definitely with the red variety known as rubellite, which is a hard stone and used as a gem, and sometimes sold for red sapphire. Tourmaline becomes, as is well known, electrically polar when heated. It is a mineral found in many parts of the world usually in prismatic crystals. The word ligure is unknown in modern mineralogy.

* Lik'e-neas. ADAM; IDOL.

Lik'hi (Heb. learnā, Ges.), a Manassite, son of Shemida, the son of Manasseh (1 Chr. vii. 19).

Lil'y (Heb. shūshān, shūshannāh; Gr. krinon). The Hebrew word is rendered "rose" in the Chaldee Targum, and by Maimonides and other rabbinical writers, with the exception of Kimchi and Ben Melech, who in 1 K. vii. 19 translated it by "violet." But krinon, or "lily," is the uniform rendering of the LXX., and probably the true one, as it is supported by the analogy of the Arabic and Persian susan, which has the same meaning to this day, and by the existence of the same word in Syriac and Coptic. But although there is little doubt that the word denotes some plant of the lily family, it is by no means certain what individual species it especially designates. Dioscorides bears witness to the beauty of the lilies of Syria and Pisidia, from which the best perfume was made. If the Heb. shūshān or shūshannāh of the O. T. = the Gr. krinon of the Sermon on the Mount, which there seems no reason to doubt, the plant designated by these terms must have been a conspicuous object on the shores of the Lake of Genesareth (Mat. vi. 28; Lk. xii. 27); it must have flourished in the deep broad valleys of Palestine (Cant. ii. 1), among the thorny shrubs (ii. 2) and pastures of the desert (Is. iv. 5, vi. 3), and must have been remarkable for its rapid and luxuriant growth (Hos. xiv. 5; Ecclus. xxxix. 14). That its flowers were brilliant in color would seem to be indicated in Mat. vi. 28, where it is compared with the gorgeous robes of Solomon; and that this color was scarlet or purple is implied in Cant. v. 13. There appears to be no species of lily which so completely answers all these requirements as the Lilium Chalcedonicum, or Scarlet Martagon, which grows in profusion in the Levant (so Mr. Wright). But direct evidence on the point is still to be desired from the observation of travellers. Other plants have been identified with the shūshān. Gesenius derives the word from a root signifying to be white, and it has hence been inferred that the shūshān is the white lily. Dr. Royle (in Kitto) identified the "lily" of the Canticles with the lotus of Egypt, in spite of the many allusions to "feeding among the lilies." The purple flowers of the klab, or wild artichoke, which abounds in the plain N. of Tabor and in the valley of Esdraelon, have been thought by some to be the "lilies of the field" alluded to in Mat. vi. 28 (Wilson). Bonar mentions a plant, with lilac flowers like the hyacinth, and called by the Arabs usueih, which he considered to be of the species denominated lily in Scripture. Stanley suggests that the name "lily" "may include the numerous flowers of the tulip or amaryllis kind, which appear in the early summer, or the autumn of Palestine." The Phœnician architects of Solomon's Temple decorated the capitals of the columns with "lily-work," i. e. with leaves and flowers of the lily (1 K. vii.), corresponding to the lotus-headed capitals of Egyptian architecture. The rim of the "brazen sea" was possibly wrought in the form of the recurved margin of a lily-flower (1 K. vii. 26).

Lime (Heb. sid). This substance is noticed only in Deut. xxvii. 2, 4 (A. V. "PLASTER"), in Is. xxxiii. 12, and in Am. ii. 1. Limestone is the common rock of PALESTINE. "The burnings of lime" (Is. l. c.) figuratively express complete destruction. FURNACE; HANDICRAFT; MORTAR.

Lil'e-s. 1. Heb. shēsh, usually translated "fine linen;" once (Prov. xxxi. 22) "silk;" in Esth. i. 6 "marble," and "blue," margin "marble;" in Cant. v. 15 "marble." As Egypt was the great centre of the linen manufacture of antiquity, it is in connection with that country that we find the first allusion to it in the Bible. Joseph, when promoted to be ruler of Egypt, was arrayed "in vestures of fine linen" (shēsh, margin "silk," Gen. xli. 42), and among the offerings for the Tabernacle of things which the Israelites had brought out of Egypt were "blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine linen" (Ex. xxv. 4, xxxv. 6). Of this were made the ten embroidered hangings of the Tabernacle, the veil before the Holy of Holies and the curtains for the entrance (xxvi. 1, 31, 36), the ephod of the high-priest with its curious girdle and the breastplate, the high-priest's tunic and mitre (xxviii. 6, 8, 15, 39), the tunics, turbans, and drawers of the inferior priests (xxxix. 27, 28).—2. Heb. bad, uniformly translated "linen." In Ex. xxviii. 42, and Lev. vi. 10, the drawers of the priests and their flowing robes are said to be of linen (Heb. bad); and the tunic of the high-priest, his girdle and mitre, which he wore on the Day of Atonement, were of the same material (Lev. xvi. 4). From a comparison of Ex. xxviii. 42 with xxxix. 28 it seems clear that bad = shēsh; or, if there be any difference between them, the latter probably = the spun threads, the former = the linen woven from them. The wise-hearted among the women of the congregation spun the flax used by Bezaleel and Aholiab for the hangings of the Tabernacle (Ex. xxxv. 25); and the making of linen (shēsh) was one of the occupations of women, of whose dress it formed a conspicuous part (Prov. xxxi. 22, A. V. "silk;" Ex. xvi. 10, 13; compare Rev. xviii. 16). In Ex. xxvii. 7 shēsh is enumerated among the products of Egypt, which the Tyrians imported and used for the sails of their ships; and the vessel constructed for Ptolemy Philopator is said by Athenæus to have had a sail of byssus (see below). In no case is bad used for other than a dress worn in religious ceremonies (1 Sam. ii. 18, xxii. 18; 2 Sam. vi. 14; Dan. x. 5, &c.), though the other terms rendered "linen" are applied to the ordinary dress of women and persons in high rank.—3. Heb. bûta, always translated "fine linen," except in 2 Chr. v. 12 (A. V. "white linen"), is apparently a late word, and probably = the Gr. bussos (L. bussus), by which it is represented by the LXX. It was used for the dresses of the Levite choir in the Temple (2 Chr. v. 12), for the loose upper garment worn by kings over the close-fitting tunic (1 Chr. xv. 27), and for the veil of the Temple, embroidered by the skill of the Tyrian artificers (2 Chr. iii. 14). Mordecai was arrayed in robes of fine linen (bûta) and purple (Esth. viii. 15) when honored by the Persian king, and the dress of the rich man in the parable was purple and fine linen (Gr. bussos, Lk. xvi. 19). "Fine linen" (Gr. bussos), purple and silk, are enumerated in Rev. xviii. 12 as among the merchandise of the mystical Babylon.—4. Heb. étun occurs but once (Prov. vii. 16, A. V. "fine linen"), and there in connection with Egypt. It was probably a kind of thread, made of fine Egyptian flax, and used for ornamenting the coverings of beds with tapestry-work.—5. Schultens suggests that the Gr. sindôn is derived from the Heb. addin, which is used of the thirty linen garments which Samson promised to his companions (Judg. xiv. 12, 18). It was made by women (Prov. xxxi. 24), and used for girdles and under-garments (Is. iii. 28; compare Mk. xiv. 51, 52, A. V. "linen cloth"). Linen was used for the winding-sheets of the dead by the Hebrews as well as by the Greeks (Gr. sindôn, Mat. xxvii. 59; Mk. xv. 46; Lk. xxiii. 53; Gr. othonion, Lk. xxiv. 12; Jn. xix. 40, xx. 5-7). Towels were made of it (Jn. xiii. 4, 5), and napkins (xi. 44), like the coarse linen of the Egyptians. The dress of the poor (Ecclus. xl. 4) was probably unbleached flax, such as was used for barbers' towels.—6. The general term which included all those already mentioned was the Heb. pishteh (= Gr. linon), which was employed—like our "cotton"—to denote not only the "FLAX" (Judg. xv. 14) or raw material from which the linen was made, but also the plant itself (Josh. ii. 6), and the manufacture from it. It is generally opposed to wool, as a vegetable product to an animal (A. V. "linen," Lev. xiii. 47, 48, 52, 59; Deut. xxii. 11; A. V. "flax," Prov. xxxi. 13; Hos. ii. 5, 9), and was used for nets (Is. xix. 9), girdles (Jer. xiii. 1), and measuring-lines (Ez. xl. 3), as well as for the dress of the priests (xlv. 17, 18). From a comparison of the last-quoted passages with Ex. xxviii. 42, and Lev. vi. 10 (3), xvi. 4, 28, it is evident that the Heb. bad and pishteh denote the same material, the latter being the more general term. It is equally apparent, from a comparison of Rev. xv. 6 with xix. 8, 14, that the Gr. linon (in A. V. "linen") and bussinon (from bussos, in A. V. "fine linen") are essentially the same.—7. One word remains to be noticed, which our A. V. has translated "linen yarn" (1 K. x. 28; 2 Chr. i. 16), brought out of Egypt by Solomon's merchants. The Heb. mikveh, or mikvé, is explained by some as the name of a place. In translating the word "linen yarn" the A. V. followed Junius and Tremellius. From time immemorial Egypt was celebrated for its linen (Ez. xxvii. 7). It was the dress of the Egyptian priests (Hds. ii. 87, 81). Panopolis, or Chemmis (the modern Akhmim) was anciently inhabited by linen-weavers (Strabo, xvii. 41, p. 813). According to Herodotus (ii. 86) the mummy-cloths were of byssus. Combining the testimony of Herodotus as to the mummy-cloths with the results of microscopic examination, it seems clear that byssus was linen, and not cotton. "Fine linen is" (i. e. symbolizes) "the righteousness of the saints" (Rev. xix. 8).

Lin'tel = the beam which forms the upper part of the framework of a door. In the A. V. "lintel" is the rendering of three Hebrew words. 1. Avil (1 K. vi. 31); translated "post" throughout Ez. xl., xli. The true meaning of this word is extremely doubtful.—2. Caphôr (Am. ix. 1; Zeph. ii. 14). The marginal rendering, "chapter, or κνορ," of both these passages is undoubtedly the more correct.—3. Mashlôph (Ex. xii. 22, 28); also rendered "upper door-post" in Ex. xii. 7. That this is the true rendering is admitted by all modern philologists.

Lin'us (L. fr. Gr. = flax?), a Christian at Rome, known to St. Paul and to Timothy (2 Tim. iv. 21). That the first bishop of Rome after the apostles was named Linus is a statement in which all ancient writers agree (so Mr. Bullock). The early and unequivocal assertion of Irenæus, corroborated by Eusebius and Theodoret, is sufficient to prove the identity of the bishop with St. Paul's friend. The date of his appointment, the duration of his episcopate, and the limits to which his episcopal authority extended, are points which have been discussed at great length. Eusebius and Theodoret, followed by Baronius and Tillemont, state that he became bishop of Rome after the death of St. Peter. On the other hand, the words of Irenæus—" [Peter and Paul] when they founded and built up the Church [of Rome] committed the office of its episcopate to Linus"—certainly admit, or rather imply, the meaning, that he held that office before the death of St. Peter. The duration of his episcopate is given by Eusebius as A. D. 68-80; by Tillemont as 66-78; by Baronius as 67-78; by Pearson as 56-67; and by Baraterius as 56-67. The statement of Rufinus, that Linus and Cletus were bishops in Rome whilst St. Peter was alive, has been quoted in support of a theory that Linus was bishop in Rome only of the Christians of Gentile origin, while at the same time another bishop exercised the same authority over the Jewish Christians there. Linus is reckoned by Pseudo-Hippolytus, and in the Greek Menæa, among the seventy disciples.

Lion. Rabbinical writers discover in the O. T. seven Hebrew names of the lion, which they assign to the animal at seven periods of its life. 1. Gûr, or Gôr, a cub, A. V. "whelp" (Gen. xlix. 9; Deut. xxxiii. 22; Jer. li. 88; Nah. ii. 12, &c.). 2. Ciphir, "a young lion" (Judg. xiv. 5; Job iv. 10; Ez. xix. 2, &c.). 3. Art, or Aryeh, a full-grown lion (Gen. xlix. 9; Judg. xiv. 5, 8, &c.). 4. Shahal or shahal, a lion more advanced in age and strength, A. V. "fierce lion" (Job iv. 10, x. 16, xxviii. 8); elsewhere "lion" (Ps. xci. 13; Prov. xxvi. 13; Hos. v. 14, xiii. 7). 5. Shahats or shachats, a lion in full vigor (Job xxviii. 8). 6. Lâli, or Lâiyâd, an old lion (Gen. xlix. 9; Job iv. 11, &c.). 7. Layish, a lion decrepit with age (Job iv. 11; Is. xxx. 6, &c.).—Bochart differs from this arrangement in every point but the second. In the first place, gûr is applied to the young of other animals besides the lion; e. g. the sea-monsters in Lam. iv. 8 (A. V. "young ones"). Secondly, ciphir differs from gûr in being old enough to roar and go forth after prey (compare Ez. xix. 2 ff.). It is translated "lion" in Ps. xxxv. 17; Prov. xix. 12, xx. 2, xxviii. 1; Jer. xxv. 38, li. 38; elsewhere "young lion." Art or aryeh is a generic term, applied to all lions without regard to age. The "young lion" (Heb. ciphir arayôth) of Judg. xiv. 5 is in verse 8 called the "lion" (aryeh).

Bochart is palpably wrong in rendering shahal or shachal by a black lion (so Mr. Wright). Gesenius makes it a poetic epithet, from his roaring. Shahals or shachals literally = elation, pride. Hence the sons of pride (A. V. "lion's whelps," Job xxviii. 8; "children of pride," xli. 34) = the larger and nobler beasts of prey, so called from their proud gait (Gesenius). Lābi or lābiya is properly a lioness (so Bochart, Gesenius), though translated in A. V. "old lion" (Gen. xlix. 9; Nah. ii. 11), "great lion" (Num. xxiii. 24, xxiv. 9; Joel i. 6), "stout lion" (Job iv. 11), "young" lion (Is. xxx. 6), "lion" (Deut. iii. 20; Job xxxviii. 33; Is. v. 29; Hos. xiii. 8), and "lioness" only in Ez. xix. 2. Layish is another poetic name. So far from being applied to a lion weak with age, it denotes one in full vigor (A. V. "old lion," Job iv. 11; Is. xxx. 6: "lion," Prov. xxx. 30). In the N. T. the Greek león is uniformly translated "lion" (2 Tim. iv. 17, &c.).—At present lions do not exist in Palestine, though they are said to be found in the desert on the road to Egypt (Schwarz, Desc. of Pal.: see Is. xxx. 6). They abound on the banks of the Euphrates between Bussorah and Bagdad, and in the marshes and jungles near the rivers of Babylonia. This species, according to Layard, is without the dark and shaggy mane of the African lion, though he adds in a note that he had seen lions on the river Karoon with a long black mane. A full-grown Asiatic lion weighs above 450 pounds; an African lion often above 500 (Col. C. H. Smith, in Kitto). But though lions have now disappeared from Palestine, they must in ancient times have been numerous. The names LEBAOTH (Josh. xv. 32), BETH-LEBAOTH (xix. 6), ARIEH (2 K. xv. 25), and LAISH (Judg. xviii. 7; 1 Sam. xxv. 44), were probably derived from the presence of or connection with lions, and point to the fact that they were at one time common. They had their lairs in the forests which have vanished with them (Jer. v. 6, xii. 8; Am. iii. 4), in the tangled brushwood (Jer. iv. 7, xxv. 38; Job. xxxviii. 40), and in the caves of the mountains (Cant. iv. 8; Ez. xix. 9; Nah. ii. 12). The cane-brake on the banks of the Jordan, the "pride" of the river, was their favorite haunt (Jer. xlix. 19, l. 44; Zech. xi. 3). The lion of Palestine was probably the Asiatic variety, described by Aristotle and Pliny as distinguished by its short curly mane, and by being shorter and rounder in shape. It was less daring than the longer-maned species, but when driven by hunger it not only ventured to attack the flocks in the desert in presence of the shepherd (Is. xxxi. 4; 1 Sam. xvii. 34), but laid waste towns and villages (2 K. xvii. 25, 26; Prov. xxii. 13, xxvi. 13), and devoured men (1 K. xiii. 24, xx. 33; 2 K. xvii. 25; Ez. xix. 3, 6). The shepherds sometimes ventured to encounter the lion single-handed (1 Sam. xvii. 34), and the vivid figure employed by Amos (iii. 12), the herdsman of Tekoa, was but the transcript of a scene which he must have often witnessed. At other times they pursued the animal in large bands, raising loud shouts to intimidate him (Is. xxxi. 4), and drive him into the net or pit they had prepared to catch him (Ez. xix. 4, 8). Benaiah, one of David's heroes, had distinguished himself by slaying a lion in his den (2 Sam. xxiii. 20). The kings of Persia had a menagerie of lions (Chaldee gōh [= a pit, den, in which lions were kept, Gesenius] Dan. vi. 7, &c.). When captured alive they were put in a cage (Ez. xix. 9), but it does not appear that they were tamed. The strength (Judg. xiv. 18; Prov. xxx. 30; 2 Sam. i. 23), courage (2 Sam. xvii. 10;

Prov. xxviii. 1; Is. xxxi. 9; Nah. ii. 11), and ferocity (Gen. xlix. 9; Num. xxiv. 4) of the lion were proverbial. The "lion-faced" warriors of Gad were among David's most valiant troops (1 Chr. xii. 8); and the hero Judas Maccabeus is described as "like a lion, and like a lion's whelp roaring for his prey" (1 Mc. iii. 4). The lion was the symbol of strength and sovereignty. Among the Hebrews, and throughout the O. T., the lion was the achievement of the princely tribe of Judah, while in the closing book of the canon it received a deeper significance as the emblem of Him who "prevailed to open the book and loose the seven seals thereof" (Rev. v. 5). On the other hand its fierceness and cruelty rendered it an appropriate metaphor for a fierce and malignant enemy (Ps. vii. 2, xxii. 21, lvii. 4; 2 Tim. iv. 17), and hence for the arch-fiend himself (1 Pet. v. 8). The figure of the lion was employed as an ornament both in architecture and sculpture (1 K. vii. 29, 36, x. 19, 20).

* Lip (Heb. aphah; Gr. cheilos) is often used in the Scriptures both literally and figuratively (Gen. xi. 1, margin; Lev. v. 4, &c.). Most of the various phrases denoting speech or manner of speaking, as "lying lips" (Prov. x. 18), &c., are easily understood. CALF; MOURNING.

* Lit'ters, the A. V. translation of Hebrew plural lābbāim (Is. lxvi. 20 only; margin "coaches"). The Hebrew denotes (so Fairbairn, Gesenius, &c.) a sort of portative couch, palanquin, or sedan-chair. The same Hebrew word occurs in Num. vii. 3, A. V. "covered wagons," literally litter-wagons, i. e. wagons covered and commodious, like litters. (WAGONS.) Litters borne by men were anciently in use among the Egyptians. Somewhat similar vehicles, borne between mules, between or on camels, &c., are frequently used in the East.

* Liv'er (Heb. cabéd), an important internal organ of the body (Prov. vii. 23, &c.). CAUL 1; DIVINATION 14.

Lizard (Heb. lédáh). The Hebrew word, which with its English rendering occurs only in Lev. xi. 30, appears to be correctly translated in the A. V. Lizards of various kinds abound in Egypt, Palestine, and Arabia. (CHAMELEON; MOLE 1; TORTOISE.) All the old versions agree in identifying the lédáh with some saurian. The LXX., the Vulgate, the Targum of Jonathan, with the Arabic versions, understand a lizard. The Syriac has a word which is generally translated salamander, but probably this name was applied also to the lizard. The Greek word, with its slight variations, which the LXX. use, appears to point to some lizard belonging to the Geckotidae. Bochart has successfully argued that the lizard denoted by the Hebrew word is that kind which the Arabs call vachara, the translation of which term is thus given by Goliuz: "An animal like a lizard, of a red color, and adhering to the ground, breathes poison into whatever food or drink it has touched." This description will be found to agree with the character of the Fan-Foot Lizard (Ptyodactylus Gecko), common in Egypt and in parts of Arabia, and perhaps also found in Palestine. It is reddish brown, spotted with white. The Geckos live on insects and worms, which they swallow whole. They derive their name from the peculiar sound which some of the species utter, described as similar to the double click often used in riding, and made by some movement of the tongue against the roof of the mouth. They are oviparous, producing a round egg with a hard calcareous shell.

* Loaf. BREAD.

Lo-am-mi (Heb. = not my people), the figurative name given by the prophet HOSEA to his second son by Gomer, the daughter of Diblaim (Hos. i. 9), to denote the rejection of the kingdom of Israel by Jehovah. Its significance is explained in ver. 9, 10.

Loan. The law of Moses did not contemplate any raising of loans for the purpose of obtaining capital, a condition perhaps alluded to in the parables of the "pearl" and "hidden treasure" (Mat. xiii. 44, 45). (COMMERCE; DEPOSIT.) Such persons as bankers and sureties, in the commercial sense (Prov. xxii. 26; Neh. v. 3), were unknown to the earlier ages of the Hebrew commonwealth. The Law strictly forbade any interest to be taken for a loan to any poor person, and at first, as it seems, even in the case of a foreigner; but this prohibition was afterward limited to the Hebrews only, from whom, of whatever rank, not only was no USURY on any pretence to be exacted, but relief to the poor by way of loan was enjoined, and excuses for evading this duty were forbidden (Ex. xxii. 25; Lev. xxv. 35, 37; Deut. xv. 3, 7-10, xiii. 19, 20). (ALMS.) As commerce increased, the practice of usury, and so also of SURETYSHIP, grew up; but the exaction of it from a Hebrew appears to have been regarded to a late period as discreditable (Prov. vi. 1, 4, xi. 15, xvii. 18, xx. 16, xxii. 26; Ps. xv. 5, xxvii. 13; Jer. xv. 10; Ez. xviii. 13, xxii. 12). Systematic breach of the law in this respect was corrected by Nehemiah after the return from Captivity (Neh. v. 1, 13). The MONEY-CHANGERS, who had seats and tables in the Temple, were traders whose profits arose chiefly from the exchange of money with those who came to pay their annual half-shekel. In making loans no prohibition is pronounced in the Law against taking a pledge of the borrower, but certain limitations are prescribed in favor of the poor. 1. The outer garment, if taken in pledge, was to be returned before sunset. (BED.) 2. The prohibition was absolute in the case of (a) the widow's garment, and (b) a millstone of either kind (Deut. xxiv. 6, 17). 3. A creditor was forbidden to enter a house to reclaim a pledge, but was to stand outside till the borrower should come forth to return it (10, 11). 4. The original Roman law of debt permitted the debtor to be enslaved by his creditor until the debt was discharged; and he might even be put to death by him. The Jewish law, as it did not forbid temporary bondage in the case of debtors, so it forbade a Hebrew debtor to be detained as a bondman longer than the seventh year, or at farthest the year of JUBILEE (Ex. xxi. 2; Lev. xxv. 39, 42; Deut. xv. 9). The "bill," in Lk. xvi. 6, 7, = the bond or note executed by a debtor or tenant as evidence of obligation (Robinson, N. T. Lexicon, Van Oosterzee [in Lange], &c.).

Loaves (plural of loaf). BREAD.

Lock (Heb. man'úl). Where European locks have not been introduced, the locks of Eastern houses are usually of wood, and consist of a partly hollow bolt from fourteen inches to two feet long for external doors or gates, or from seven to nine inches for interior doors. The bolt passes, through a groove in a piece attached to the door, into a socket in the door-post. In the groove-piece are from four to nine small iron or wooden sliding-pins or wires, which drop into corresponding holes in the bolt, and fix it in its place. CLAY; GATE; KEY; SEAL.

Lo'cust (fr. L.), a well-known insect, which commits terrible ravages on vegetation in the countries which it visits. In the Bible there are frequent allusions to locusts; and there are nine or ten Hebrew words supposed to denote different varieties or species of this destructive family. They belong to the order Orthoptera. This order is divided into two large groups or divisions, viz. Cursoria and Saltatoria. From Lev. xi. 21, 22, we learn the Hebrew names of four different kinds of Saltatorial Orthoptera. "These may ye eat of every flying creeping thing that goeth upon all four, which have legs above their feet to leap withal upon the earth; even those of them ye may eat, the arbeh (A. V. 'locust') after his kind, and the sālām (A. V. 'bald locust') after his kind, and the hargōl or chargōl (wrongly translated by the A. V. 'beetle,' an insect which would be included amongst the flying creeping things forbidden as food in ver. 23 and 42) after his kind, and the hagbō or chagbō (A. V. 'grasshopper') after his kind." Besides the names mentioned in this passage, there occur five other Hebrew names in the Bible, all of which Bochart (iii. 251, &c.) considers to represent so many distinct species of locusts, viz. gōb, gāzām, hānīl or chānīl, yelek, and tsēlētsēl. Akrīs is the only Greek word in the N. T. = "locust." In the LXX. this = Nos. 1, 2, and 8 below.—1. Arbeh ("locust," "grasshopper") is the most common name for locust, the word occurring twenty-four times in the

Hebrew Bible. The A. V. in the four following passages has "grasshopper," Judg. vi. 5, vii. 12; Job xxxix. 20; Jer. xlv. 23: in all the other places it has "locust." The word arbeh, from a root signifying to be numerous, is probably sometimes used in a wide sense to express any of the larger devastating species. It is the locust of the Egyptian plague. (PLAQUES, THE TEN.) In almost every passage where arbeh occurs, reference is made to its terribly destructive powers. It is one of the flying creeping creatures that were allowed as food by the law of Moses (Lev. xi. 21). In this passage it is clearly the representative of some species of winged Saltatorial Orthoptera, probably either the Acridium peregrinum, or the Edipoda migratoria, for these two species are the most destructive of the family. Of the former species

M. Olivier (Voyage dans l'Empire Ottoman, ii. 424) thus writes: "With the burning S. winds (of Syria) there come from the interior of Arabia and from the most southern parts of Persia clouds of locusts (Acridium peregrinum), whose ravages to these countries are as grievous and nearly as sudden as those of the heaviest hail in Europe. We witnessed them twice. It is difficult to express the effect produced on us by the sight of the whole atmosphere filled on all sides and to a great height by an innumerable quantity of these insects, whose flight was slow and uniform, and whose noise resembled that of rain: the sky was darkened, and the light of the sun considerably weakened. In a moment the terraces of the houses, the streets, and all the fields were covered by these insects, and in two days they had nearly devoured all the leaves of the plants. Happily they lived but a short time, and seemed to have migrated only to reproduce themselves and die; in fact, nearly all those we saw the next day had paired, and the day following the fields were covered with their dead bodies." This species is found in Arabia, Egypt, Mesopotamia, and Persia.—2. Hagbō or chagbō. In 2 Chr. vii. 13 the A. V. reads "locust," in the other passages (Lev. xi. 22; Num. xiii. 33; Eccl. xii. 5; Is. xl. 22) "grasshopper." Mr. Houghton, with Oedmann, supposes it = some small devastating locust; but is unable to determine the species. In the Talmud it is a collective name for many of the locust tribe, eight hundred kinds being supposed to exist!—3. Hargōl or chargōl. The A. V. translates this word "beetle;" it occurs only in Lev. xi. 22, but it is clear from the context that it denotes some species of winged Saltatorial orthopterous insect which the Israelites were allowed to use as food. Rev. J. F. Denham (in Kitto) endeavors to show that the Greek ophionachis of the LXX. denotes some species of Truxalis, a winged, leaping, insectivorous (?) locust, perhaps Truxalis nasutus. The Jews, however, interpret the Hebrew to mean a species of grasshopper, which Lewysohn identifies with Locusta viridissima.—4. Sālām (A. V. "bald locust") occurs only in Lev. xi. 22, as one of the four edible kinds of leaping insects. All that can be known of it is that it is some kind of Saltatorial orthopterous insect, winged, and good for food. Tychsen, however, arguing from what is said in the Talmud, viz. that "this insect has a smooth head, and that the female is without the sword-shaped tail," conjectures that the species here intended is Gryllus Evernor (Asso), a synonym that it is difficult to identify with any recorded species.—5. Gāām. (PALMER-WORM).—6. Gōb (A. V. in Nah. iii. 17, "great grasshoppers;" "grasshoppers," margin "green worms," in Am. vii. 1). This word is found only in Is. xxxiii. 4 (Heb. pl. gēbīm, A. V. "locusts"), and in the two places cited above. There is nothing in any of these passages that will help to point out the species denoted. That some kind of locust is intended seems probable from the passage in Nahum. Some writers, led by this passage, have believed that the Heb. word = the larva or grub state of some of the large locusts. Possibly it may represent the larva or nymph state of the insect, for the last stages of the larva differ but slightly from the nymph, both which states may therefore be comprehended under one name; the "great grasshoppers" of the A. V. in Nah. iii. 17 may easily have been the nymphs (which in all the Amelabola [= insects which do not undergo a metamorphosis] continue to feed as in their larva condition) encamping at night under the hedges, and, obtaining their wings as the sun arose, are then represented as flying away.—7. Hūndmāl or chānāmāl (A. V. "FROST"). Some (Lee, J. F. Denham, &c.) have supposed that this word, which occurs only in Ps. lxxviii. 47, denotes some kind of locust; but the concurrent testimony of the old versions, which interpret the word to signify hail or frost, ought to forbid the conjecture.—8. Yelek occurs in Ps. cv. 34; Jer. li. 14, 27; Nah. iii. 15, 16; Joel i. 4-ii. 25; it is rendered by the A. V. "cankerworm" in Joel and Nahum, and "caterpillar" in Psalms and Jeremiah. From the epithet of "rough" (Heb. šmār), applied to the word in Jeremiah, some have supposed the yelek to be the larva of some of the destructive Lepidoptera (= the butterfly, moth, &c.): the epithet šmār, however (Jer. li. 27), more properly = having spines = Vulgate aculeatus; bristling, Ges. Michaelis believes the yelek to be the cockchafer. Oedmann identifies the word with the Gryllus cristatus, Linn., a species, however, found only in South America. Tychem, arguing from the epithet "rough," believes that the yelek = the Gryllus hematopus, Linn. (Calliptamus hematopus, Aud. Serv.), a species found in S. Africa. The term spined may refer not to any particular species, but to the very spinous nature of the tibiae (L. = shin-bones) in all the locust tribe, and yelek (= the cropping, licking off insect) may be a synonym of some of the names already mentioned, or the word may denote the larva or pupa of the locust, which, from Joel i. 4, seems not improbable.—9. Hāšīl or chāšīl. (CATERPILLAR).—10. Tāšādānī, "locust." The derivation of this word seems to indicate some kind of locust. It occurs only in this sense in Deut. xxviii. 42, "All thy trees and fruit of thy land shall the locust consume." In the other passages where the Hebrew word occurs it represents some kind of tinkling musical instrument, and is generally translated "CYMBALS" by the A. V. The word is evidently onomatopœtic, and is here perhaps a synonym for some of the other names for locust. All that can be positively known respecting the tāšādānī is, that it is some kind of insect injurious to trees and crops.—The most destructive of the locust tribe that occur in the Bible lands are the Edipoda migratoria and the Acridium peregrinum, and as both these species occur in Syria, Arabia, &c., it is most probable that one or the other is denoted in those passages which speak of the dreadful devastations committed by these insects. Locusts occur in great numbers, and sometimes obscure the sun (Ex. x. 15; Jer. xvi. 23; Judg. vi. 5, vii. 12; Joel ii. 10; Nah. iii. 16). Their voracity is alluded to in Ex. x. 12, 15; Joel i. 4, 7, 12, and ii. 3; Deut. xxviii. 38; Ps. lxxviii. 46, cv. 34; Is. xxxiii. 4. They are compared to horses (Joel ii. 4; Rev. ix. 7). They make a fearful noise in their flight (Joel ii. 5; Rev. ix. 9). They have no king (Prov. xxx. 27). Their irresistible progress is referred to in Joel ii. 8, 9. They enter dwellings, and devour even the woodwork of houses (Ex. x. 6; Joel ii. 9, 10). They do not fly in the night (Nah. iii. 17). The sea destroys the greater number (Ex. x. 19; Joel ii. 20). Their dead bodies taint the air (ii. 20). They are used as food (Lev. xi. 21, 22; Mat. iii. 4; Mk. i. 6). There are different ways of preparing locusts for food: sometimes they are ground and pounded, and then mixed with flour and water and made into cakes, or they are salted and then eaten; sometimes smoked; boiled or roasted; stewed, or fried in butter.

Lod (Heb., perhaps strife, quarrel, Ges.; breach,  fissure, a cutting in the earth, division, Fū.), a town of Benjamin, founded by Shamed or Shamer (1 Chr. viii. 12; Ezr. ii. 83; Neh. vii. 37, xi. 35); now called Ludd; but most familiar to us as LYDIA.

Lo-de-bar or Lo-de-bar (Heb. no pasture, Ges., Fū.), a place named with Mahanaim, Roglim, and other Transjordanic towns (2 Sam. xvii. 27), and, therefore, no doubt on the eastern side of the Jordan. It was the native place of Machir, the son of Ammiel (ix. 4, 5). Its site is unknown.

* Lodge (Is. i. 8). COTTAGE 2; CUCUMBERS.

Lodge, to. This word in the A. V. of the O. T.—with one exception only, to be noticed below—is used to translate the Hebrew verb līn or līn, which has, at least in the narrative portions of the Bible, almost invariably the force of passing the night. The same Hebrew word is otherwise translated in the A. V. by "lie all night" (2 Sam. xii. 16; Cant. i. 13; Job xxix. 19); "tarry all night," &c. (Gen. xix. 2; Judg. xix. 10; Jer. xiv. 8); "remain," i. e. until the morning (Ex. xxiii. 18). The one exception above-named occurs in Josh. ii. 1, Heb. shāchab, elsewhere rendered "to lie," or "sleep." In the N. T. it is the translation of the Gr. aulizomai = to pass the night, Robinson, N. T. Lex. (Mat. xxi. 17), also translated "to abide" (Lk. xxi. 37); Gr. katauo, literally = to loose, dissolve, unbind (Lk. ix. 12), once translated "to be guest" (xix. 7), &c.; Gr. kataskenō, literally = to pitch tent, spoken of the birds (Mat. xiii. 32; Mk. iv. 32; Lk. xiii. 19), also translated "to rest" sc. in the grave (Acts ii. 26); Gr. zenizō = to receive as a guest, to entertain, and in passive, to be entertained, to lodge, Robinson, N. T. Lex. (Acts x. 6, 18, 23, 32, xxi. 16, xxviii. 7), also translated "to entertain" (Heb. xiii. 2), &c.; Gr. zenodocheō, A. V. "to lodge strangers" (1 Tim. v. 10 only). HOSPITALITY; INN.

* Loins (Heb. hālṣayim or chālṣayim, moth-nayim, &c.; Gr. osphues) = the lower region of the back, or the parts where the "GIRDLE" was worn; regarded as the seat of strength, procreative power, &c. (Gen. xxxv. 11, xxxvii. 34; Ex. xxviii. 42; Mat. iii. 4, &c.).

* Lois (Gr. better, Walton's Polyglott), grandmother of TIMOTHY, and doubtless the mother of his mother EUNICE (2 Tim. i. 5). It seems likely that Lois had resided long at Lystra; and almost certain that from her, as well as from Eunice, Timothy obtained his intimate knowledge of the Jewish Scriptures (2 Tim. iii. 15).

Lord, as applied to the Deity, is the almost uniform rendering in the A. V. of the O. T. of the Heb. Yehōvāh = JEHOVAH, which would be more properly represented as a proper name. The reverence which the Jews entertained for the sacred name of God forbade them to pronounce it, and in reading they substituted for it either Adōnāi, i. e. "Lord," or Elohim, i. e. "God," according to the vowel-points by which it was accompanied. The title Adōnāi is also rendered "Lord" in the A. V., though this, as applied to God, is of infrequent occurrence in the historical books. But in the poetical and prophetic books it is more frequent, excepting Job, where it occurs only in xxviii. 28, and Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Canticles, where it is not once found. The difference between Jehovah and Adōnāi (or Adōn) is generally marked in the A. V. by printing the word in small capitals (LORD) when it represents the former (Gen. xv. 4, &c.), and with an initial capital only when it is the translation of the latter (Ps. xlvii. 5; Is. i. 24, x. 16); except in Ex. xxiii. 17, xxxiv. 23, where "the Lord God" should be more consistently "the Lord Jehovah."—The Heb. Adōn, usually translated "lord" or "master," and applied to men (Gen. xviii. 12, xxiii. 6, 11, 15, xxiv. 9 ff., &c.), sometimes = "Lord," i. e. the Deity (Ex. xxiii. 17; Neh. iii. 5; Ps. xlvii. 5, &c.).—The Heb. and Phœnician ba'al (BAAL; BAALI) is translated "lord" in Num. xxi. 28 and Hos. ii. 16, margin.—Other Hebrew words translated "lord" are gib'ir (Gen. xxvii. 29, 37), seren (applied only to the "lords" of the PHILISTINES), sar (CAPTAIN), shalish. (ARMY).—The Chal. mārē = "Lord" (Dan. ii. 47, v. 23) and "lord" (iv. 19, 24).—The Chal. rab (adj. = great) is once translated "lord" (ii. 10).—"Lord" or "lord" is the common translation of Gr. kurios, which occurs many hundred times in the N. T. (Mat. xxii. 43, 44 twice, 45, xxiv. 45 ff., &c.), and is sometimes translated "master" (vi. 24, xv. 27, &c.), or "sir" (xiii. 27, xxi. 30, &c.). Kurios ("Lord") both in the N. T. and LXX. often denotes the Deity, and = Jehovah, Adōnāi, &c. It is the common title ("Lord") of our Saviour JESUS CHRIST, and in this application often stands alone (1 Cor. ii. 8, iv. 5, ix. 1 ff.; Heb. ii. 3; Jas. v. 7 ff., &c.).—The Gr. despoēs is five times translated "Lord" (Lk. ii. 29; Acts iv. 24; 2 Pet. ii. 1; Jude 4; Rev. vi. 10), and five times "master" (1 Tim. vi. 1, 2; 2 Tim. ii. 21; Tit. ii. 9; 1 Pet. ii. 18). See also RABBI.

Lord's Day, the. It has been questioned, though not seriously until of late years, what is the meaning of the Greek phrase hē Kuriakē Hēmera, which occurs in one passage only of the Holy Scripture (Rev. i. 10), and is, in our English version, translated "the Lord's Day." The general consent both of Christian antiquity and of modern divines has referred it to the weekly festival of our Lord's Resurrection, and identified it with "the first day of the week," or "Sunday," of every age of the Church. The views antagonistic to this general consent are—1. That "the Lord's Day" here = the SABBATH, because that institution is called in Is. lviii. 13, by the Almighty Himself, "My holy day." To this it is replied—If St. John had intended to specify the Sabbath, he would surely have used that word which was by no means obsolete, or even obsolescent, at the time of his composing Revelation. 2. That "the Lord's Day" = "the day of judgment," to which a large portion of Revelation may be conceived to refer. But this would involve a strange mixture of the metaphorical and the literal. 3. That "the Lord's Day" = that on which the Lord's Resurrection was annually celebrated, or Easter-day. But it was long doubted on what day in the annual cycle it should be celebrated, and no patristical authority can be quoted for this interpretation.—Supposing, then, that the Lord's Day is here meant, Scripture says very little concerning it. But that little seems to indicate that the divinely inspired apostles, by their practice and by their precepts, marked the first day of the week as a day for meeting together to break bread, for communicating and receiving instruction, for laying up offerings in store for charitable purposes, for occupation in holy thought and prayer. The first day of the week so devoted seems also to have been the day of the Lord's Resurrection. The Lord rose on the first day of the week, and appeared, on the very day of His rising, to His followers on five distinct occasions—to Mary Magdalene, to the other women, to the two disciples on the road to Emmaus, to St. Peter separately, to ten apostles collected together. After eight days, i. e. according to the ordinary reckoning, on the first day of the next week, He appeared to the eleven. (JESUS CHRIST.) On the day of PENTECOST, which in that year fell on the first day of the week (so Dr. Hessey, the original author of this article, and others), "they were all with one accord in one place," had spiritual gifts conferred on them, and in their turn began to communicate those gifts, as accompaniments of instruction, to others. Many years after the occurrence at Pentecost, when Christianity had begun to assume something like a settled form, St. Paul and his companions arrived at Troas (Acts xx. 7), and "abode seven days, and upon the first day of the week when the disciples came together to break bread, Paul preached unto them." In 1 Cor. xvi. 1, 2, that same St. Paul writes thus: "Now concerning the collection for the saints, as I have given order to the churches in Galatia, even so do ye. Upon the first day of the week, let every one of you lay by him in store, as God hath prospered him, that there be no gatherings when I come." In Heb. x. 25, the injunction "not forsaking the assembling of ourselves together, as the manner of some is, but exhorting one another," seems to imply that a regular day for such assembling existed, and was well known. And lastly, in the passage given above, St. John describes himself as being in the Spirit "on the Lord's Day." Taken separately, perhaps, and even all together, these passages seem scarcely adequate to prove that the dedication of the first day of the week to the purposes above-mentioned was a matter of apostolic institution, or even of apostolic practice. But it is at any rate an extraordinary coincidence, that almost immediately after we emerge from Scripture, we find the same day mentioned in a similar manner, and directly associated with the Lord's Resurrection; and it is an extraordinary fact that we never find its dedication questioned or argued about. The results of our examination of the principal writers of the two centuries after the death of St. John (Clement of Rome, Ignatius, the epistle ascribed to Barnabas, Pliny's well-known letter to Trajan, Justin Martyr, Bardesanes, Dionysius bishop of Corinth, Irenæus, Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, Origen, Minucius Felix, Cyprian, Commodian, Victorinus, and Peter bishop of Alexandria) are as follows: The Lord's Day (a name which has now come out more prominently, and is connected more explicitly with our Lord's Resurrection than before) existed during these two centuries as a part and parcel of apostolical, and so of Scriptural Christianity. It was never defended, for it was never impugned, or at least only impugned as other things received from the apostles were. It was never confounded with the Sabbath, but carefully distinguished from it. It was not an institution of severe Sabbatical character, but a day of joy and cheerfulness, rather encouraging than forbidding relaxation. Religiously regarded, it was a day of solemn meeting for the Holy Eucharist, for united prayer, for instruction, for alms-giving; and though, being an institution under the law of liberty, work does not appear to have been formally interdicted, or rest formally enjoined, Tertullian seems to indicate that the character of the day was opposed to worldly business. Finally, whatever analogy may be supposed to exist between the Lord's Day and the SABBATH, in no passage that has come down to us is the Fourth Commandment appealed to as the ground of the obligation to observe the Lord's Day. (LAW OF MOSES; TEN COMMANDMENTS.)—There are three principal views in respect to the Lord's Day; the first denying entirely the religious character and obligation of the day; the second considering the observance of it as a day of rest to be an ecclesiastical institution, not a divine ordinance; the third maintaining that the Sabbath was instituted at the creation, reenacted in the Fourth Commandment, and perpetuated in the Lord's Day.—But on whatever grounds "the Lord's Day" may be supposed to rest, it is a great and indisputable fact that A. D. 321, four years before the Council of Nice, it was recognized by Constantine in his celebrated edict, as "the venerable Day of the Sun." The terms of the document are these:—"The Emperor Constantine to Augustus Heliadius. Let all judges and city people, and the business of all arts, rest on the venerable Day of the Sun. Yet let those situated in the country freely and without restraint attend to the cultivation of the fields, since it frequently happens that not more fitly on any day may corn be deposited in the furrows or vines in the trenches, lest through the moment's opportunity the benefit granted by heavenly foresight be lost. Given on the nones (i. e. 7th day) of March, Crispus II. (i. e. second time) and Constantine II. (i. e. second time) being consuls." Some have endeavored to explain away this document by alleging—(1.) that "the Day of the Sun" or Sunday is not the Christian name of the Lord's Day, and that Constantine did not therefore intend to acknowledge it as a Christian institution; (2.) that, before his conversion, Constantine had professed himself to be especially under the guardianship of the sun, and that, at the very best, he intended to make a religious compromise between sun-worshippers, properly so called, and the worshippers of the "Sun of Righteousness," i. e. Christians; (3.) that Constantine's edict was purely a kalendrical one, and intended to reduce the number of public holidays. (4.) That Constantine then instituted Sunday for the first time as a religious day for Christians. The fourth of these statements is absolutely refuted, both by quotations from writers of the second and third centuries, and by the terms of the edict itself. The three other statements concern themselves rather with what Constantine meant than with what he did. But with such considerations we have little or nothing to do. It is a fact, that in A. D. 321, in a public edict, which was to apply to Christians as well as to Pagans, he put especial honor upon a day already honored by the former—judiciously calling it by a name which Christians had long employed without scruple, and to which, as it was in ordinary use, the Pagans could scarcely object. What he did for it was to insist that worldly business, whether by the functionaries of the law or by private citizens, should be intermitted during its continuance. Were any other testimony wanting to the existence of Sunday as a day of Christian worship at this period, it might be supplied by the Council of Nice, A. D. 325. The Fathers there and then assembled assume it as an existing fact, and only notice it incidentally in order to regulate the posture of Christian worshippers upon it.

* Lord's Prayer, a name commonly given (not in the Scriptures) to the prayer which our Lord Jesus Christ taught His disciples (Mat. vi. 9-13; Lk. xi. 2-4). PRAYER.

Lord's Supper (Gr. kuriakon deipnon). The words which thus describe the great central act of the worship of the Christian Church occur in but one single passage of the N. T. (1 Cor. xi. 20). Of the fact which lies under the name we have several notices, and from these, incidental and fragmentary as they are, it is possible to form a tolerably distinct picture. To examine these notices in their relation to the life of the Christian society in the first stages of its growth, and so to learn what "the Supper of the Lord" actually was, will be the object of this article (abridged from Prof. Plumptre's original article).—I. The starting-point of this inquiry is found in the history of that night when JESUS CHRIST and His disciples met together to eat the PASSOVER (Mat. xxvi. 19; Mk. xiv. 16; Lk. xxii. 13). The manner in which the Paschal feast was kept by the Jews of that period differed in many details from that originally prescribed by Ex. xii. The ceremonies of the feast took place in the following order (so Prof. Plumptre, after Lightfoot and Meyer): (1.) The members of the company that were joined for this purpose met in the evening and reclined on couches (compare Mat. xxvi. 20; Lk. xxii. 14; Jn. xiii. 23-25). The head of the household, or celebrant, began by a form of blessing "for the day and for the wine," pronounced over a cup, of which he and the others then drank. (2.) All present then washed their hands; this also having a special benediction. (3.) The table was then set out with the Paschal lamb, unleavened bread, bitter herbs, and the dish known as Harebœth or Chârœbœth, a sauce made of dates, figs, raisins, and vinegar, and designed to commemorate the mortar of their bondage in Egypt. (4.) The celebrant first, and then the others, dipped a portion of the bitter herbs into the sauce and ate them. (5.) The dishes were then removed, and a cup of wine again brought. Then followed an interval allowed theoretically for the questions that might be asked by children or proselytes, who were astonished at such a strange beginning of a feast, and the cup was passed round and drunk at the close of it. (6.) The dishes being brought on again, the celebrant repeated the commemorative words which opened what was strictly the Paschal supper, and pronounced a solemn thanksgiving, followed by Psalms cxiii. and cxiv. (7.) Then came a second washing of the hands, with a short form of blessing as before, and the celebrant broke one of the two loaves or cakes of unleavened bread, and gave thanks over it. All then took portions of the bread and dipped them, together with the bitter herbs, into the sauce, and so ate them. (8.) After this they ate the flesh of the Paschal lamb, with bread, &c., as they liked; and after another blessing, a third cup, known especially as the "cup of blessing," was handed round. (9.) This was succeeded by a fourth cup, and the recital of Psalms cxv.–cxviii., followed by a prayer, and this was accordingly known as the cup of the Hallel (Heb. = praise thou; see HALLELUJAH), or of the Song. (10.) There might be, in conclusion, a fifth cup, provided that the "great Hallel" (possibly Psalms cxx.–cxxxviii.) was sung over it.—Comparing the ritual thus gathered from Rabbinic writers with the N. T., and assuming first, that it represents substantially the common practice of our Lord's time; and secondly, that the meal of which He and His disciples partook was either the Passover itself, or an anticipation of it, conducted according to the same rules, we are able to indicate, though not with absolute certainty, the points of departure which the old practice presented for the institution of the new. To (1.) or (3.), or even to (8.), we may refer the first words and the first distribution of the cup (Lk. xxii. 17, 18); to (2.) or (7.) the dipping of the sop of Jn. xiii. 26; to (7.), or to an interval during or after (8.), the distribution of the bread (Mat. xxvi. 26; Mk. xiv. 22; Lk. xxii. 19; 1 Cor. xi. 23, 24); to (9.) or (10.) ("after supper," Lk. xxii. 20) the thanksgiving, and distribution of the cup, and the hymn with which the whole was ended.—The narratives of the Gospels show how strongly the disciples were impressed with the words which had given a new meaning to the old familiar acts. They leave unnoticed all the ceremonies of the Passover, except those which had thus been transferred to the Christian Church and perpetuated in it. Old things were passing away, and all things becoming new. They had looked on the bread and the wine as memorials of the deliverance from Egypt. They were now told to partake of them "in remembrance" of their Master and Lord. The festival had been annual. No rule was given as to the time and frequency of the new feast that thus supervened on the old, but the command, "Do this as oft as ye drink it" (1 Cor. xi. 25), suggested the more continual recurrence of that which was to be their memorial of One whom they would wish never to forget. The words, "This is my body," gave to the unleavened bread a new character (compare, on the form of the expression, Gen. xii. 26; Dan. vii. 17, 23, 24; Mat. xiii. 38, 39; Gal. iv. 25; Rev. i. 20, &c.). They had been prepared for language that would otherwise have been so startling, by the teaching of Jn. vi. 32–58, and they were thus taught to see in the bread that was broken the witness of the closest possible union and incorporation with their Lord. The cup, which was "the new testament in His blood," would remind them, in like manner, of the wonderful prophecy in which that new covenant had been foretold (Jer. xxxi. 31–34). It is possible there may have been yet another thought connected with these symbolic acts. The funeral customs of the Jews involved, at or after the burial, the administration to the mourners of bread (compare Jer. xvi. 7, margin; Ez. xxiv. 17; Hos. ix. 4; Tob. iv. 17), and of wine, known, when thus given, as "the cup of consolation." May not the bread and the wine of the Last Supper have had something of that character, preparing the minds of Christ's disciples for His departure by treating it as already accomplished? May we not conjecture, without leaving the region of history for that of controversy, that the thoughts, desires, emotions, of that hour of divine sorrow and communion would be such as to lead the disciples to crave earnestly to renew them? Would it not be natural that they should seek that renewal in the way which their Master had pointed out to them? From this time, accordingly, the words "to break bread" appear to have had for the disciples a new significance. It may not have assumed indeed, as yet, the character of a distinct liturgical act; but when they met to break bread, it was with new thoughts and hopes, and with the memories of that evening fresh on them.—II. In the account (Acts) of the life of the first disciples at Jerusalem, a prominent place is given to this act, and to the phrase which indicated it. Writing, we must remember, with the definite associations that had gathered round the words during the thirty years that followed the events he records, he describes the baptized members of the Church as continuing steadfast in or to the teaching of the apostles, in fellowship with them and with each other, and in breaking of bread and in prayers (Acts ii. 42). Taken in connection with the account in the preceding verses of the love which made them live as having all things common, we can scarcely doubt that this implies that the chief actual meal of each day was one in which they met as brothers, and which was either preceded or followed by the more solemn commemorative acts of the breaking of the bread and the drinking of the cup. It will be convenient to anticipate the language and the thoughts of a somewhat later date, and to say that, apparently, they thus united every day the feast of Love (FESTAS OF CHARITY) with the celebration of the Eucharist. In a society consisting of many thousand members there would naturally (so Prof. Plumptre) be many places of meeting. The congregation assembling in each place would come to be known as "the Church" in this or that man's house (Rom. xvi. 5, 23; 1 Cor. xvi. 19; Col. iv. 15; Phn. 2). When they met, the place of honor would naturally be taken by one of the apostles, or some elder representing him. It would belong to him to pronounce the blessing and thanksgiving, with which the meals of devout Jews always began and ended. The materials for the meal would be provided out of the common funds of the Church, or the liberality of individual members. The bread (unless the converted Jews were to think of themselves as keeping a perpetual Passover) would be such as they habitually used. The wine (probably the common red wine of Palestine, Prov. xxiii. 31) would, according to their usual practice, be mixed with water. But if this was to be more than a common meal after the pattern of the Essenes, it would be necessary to introduce words that would show that what was done was in remembrance of their Master. At some time, before or after the meal of which they partook as such, the bread and the wine would be given with some special form of words or acts, to indicate its character.

New converts would need some explanation of the meaning and origin of the observance. What would be so fitting and so much in harmony with the precedents of the Paschal feast as the narrative of what had passed on the night of its institution (1 Cor. xi. 23-27)? With this there would naturally be associated (as in Acts ii. 42) prayers for themselves and others. Their gladness would show itself in the psalms and hymns with which they praised God (Heb. ii. 46, 47; Jas. v. 13). The analogy of the Passover, the general feeling of the Jews, and the practice of the Essenes may possibly have suggested ablutions, partial or entire, as a preparation for the feast (Heb. x. 22; Jn. xiii. 1-15). At some point in the feast those who were present, men and women sitting apart, would rise to salute each other with the "holy kiss" (1 Cor. xvi. 20; 2 Cor. xiii. 12). The next traces that meet us are in 1 Cor., and the fact that we find them is in itself significant. The commemorative feast has not been confined to the personal disciples of Christ, or the Jewish converts whom they gathered round them at Jerusalem. The title of the "cup of blessing" (1 Cor. x. 16) has been imported into the Greek Church. The synonym of "the cup of the Lord" (ver. 21) distinguishes it from the other cups that belonged to the "Feast of Charity." The word "fellowship" is passing by degrees into the special signification of "Communion." The apostle refers to his own office as breaking the bread and blessing the cup (ver. 16). The table on which the bread was placed was the Lord's Table. But the practice of the Feast of Charity as well as the observance of the commemorative feast had been transferred to Corinth, and this called for a special notice. Evils had sprung up which had to be checked at once. The meeting of friends for a social meal, to which all contributed, was a sufficiently familiar practice in the common life of Greeks of this period; and the club-feasts were associated with plans of mutual relief or charity to the poor. The Feast of Charity of the new society would seem to them to be such a feast, and hence came a disorder that altogether frustrated the object of the Church in instituting it. What was to be the remedy for this terrible and growing evil St. Paul does not state explicitly. He reserves formal regulations for a later personal visit. In the mean time he gives a rule which would make the union of the Feast of Charity and the Lord's Supper possible without the risk of profanation. They were not to come even to the former with the keen edge of appetite. They were to wait till all were met, instead of scrambling tumultuously to help themselves (xi. 33, 34). In one point, however, the custom of the Church of Corinth differed apparently from that of Jerusalem. The meeting for the Lord's Supper was no longer daily (ver. 20, 33). The directions given in 1 Cor. xvi. 2 suggest the constitution of a celebration on the first day of the week. The meeting at Troas is on the same day (Acts xx. 7). The tendency of this language, and, therefore, probably of the order subsequently established, was to separate what had hitherto been united. We stand, as it were, at the dividing point of the history of the two institutions, and henceforth each takes its own course. One, as belonging to a transient phase of the Christian life, and varying in its effects with changes in national character or forms of civilization, passes through many stages, and finally dies out. The other also has its changes. The morning celebration takes the place of the evening.

In Acts xx. 11 we have an example of the way in which the transition may have been effected. The disciples at Troas meet together to break bread. The hour is not definitely stated, but the fact that St. Paul's discourse was protracted till past midnight and the mention of the many lamps indicate a later time than that commonly fixed for the Gr. deipnon (= "supper;" see MEALS). Then came the teaching and the prayers, and then, toward early dawn, the breaking of bread, which constituted the Lord's Supper, and for which they were gathered together. If this midnight meeting may be taken as indicating a common practice, originating in reverence for an ordinance which Christ had enjoined, we can easily understand how the next step would be to transfer the celebration of the Eucharist permanently to the morning hour, to which it had gradually been approximating. The recurrence of the same liturgical words in Acts xxvii. 35 makes it probable, though not certain, that the food of which St. Paul thus partook was intended to have, for himself and his Christian companions, the character at once of the Feast of Charity and the Eucharist. ATONEMENT; SAVIOUR.

Le-ru-ha mah (Heb. = the uncompassionated), the name of the daughter of HOSEA the prophet, given to denote the utterly ruined and hopeless condition of the kingdom of Israel, on whom JEHOVAH would no more have mercy (Hos. i. 6). RUMAH.

Lot (Heb. a covering, veil, Ges.), son of Haran, and, therefore, nephew of ABRAHAM (Gen. xi. 27, 31). His sisters were MILCAH the wife of Nahor, and ISCAH, by some identified with SARAH. Haran died before the emigration of Terah and his family from Ur of the Chaldees (ver. 28), and Lot was therefore born there. He removed with the rest of his kindred to Haran, and again subsequently with Abraham and Sarai to Canaan (xii. 4, 5). With them he took refuge in Egypt from a famine, and with them returned, first to the "South" (xiii. 1), and then to their original settlement between Bethel and Ai (ver. 3, 4). But the pastures of the hills of Bethel, which had with ease contained the two strangers on their first arrival, were not able any longer to bear them, so much had their possessions of sheep, goats, and cattle increased since that time. There was no disagreement between Abraham and Lot—their relations continued good to the last—but between the servants who tended their countless herds disputes arose, and a parting was necessary. From some one of the round, swelling hills which surround BETHEL—from none more likely than that which stands immediately on its E.—the two Hebrews looked over the comparatively empty land, in the direction of Sodom, Gomorrah, and Zoar (xiii. 10). And Lot lifted up his eyes toward the left, and beheld all the precinct of the Jordan that it was well watered everywhere; like a garden of Jehovah; like that unutterably green and fertile land of Egypt he had only lately quitted. It was exactly the prospect to tempt a man who had no fixed purpose of his own, who had not like Abraham obeyed a stern inward call of duty. So Lot left his uncle on the barren hills of Bethel, and he "chose all the precinct of the Jordan, and journeyed east," down the ravines which give access to the Jordan valley: and then, when he reached it, turned again southward and advanced as far as SODOM (ver. 11, 12).—The next occurrence in the life of Lot is his capture by the four kings of the East, and his rescue by Abram (xiv.). (ABRAHAM; CHEDORLAOMER).—The last scene preserved to us in the history of Lot is well known. He is still living in Sodom (xix.). Some years have passed. But in the midst of the licentious corruption of Sodom he still preserves some of the delightful characteristics of his wandering life, his fervent and chivalrous hospitality (ver. 2, 8), the unleavened bread of the tent of the wilderness (ver. 3), the water for the feet of the wayfarers (ver. 2) affording his guests a reception identical with that which they had experienced that very morning in Abraham's tent on the heights of Hebron (compare xviii. 3, 6). His deliverance from the guilty and condemned city points the allusion of St. Peter (2 Pet. ii. 6-9). Where Zoar was situated, in which he found a temporary refuge during the destruction of the other cities of the plain, we do not know with absolute certainty. The end of Lot's wife (Edih in the Jewish traditions) is commonly treated as one of the difficulties of the Bible. But it surely need not be so. "His wife looked back from behind him, and she became a pillar of salt." The value and the significance of the story to us are contained in the allusion of Christ (Lk. xvii. 32). Later ages have not been satisfied so to leave the matter, but have insisted on identifying the "pillar" with some one of the fleeting forms which the perishable rock of the S. end of the Dead Sea is constantly assuming in its process of decomposition and liquefaction. The story of the origin of the nations of Moab and Ammon from the incestuous intercourse between Lot and his two daughters, with which his history abruptly concludes, has been often treated as if it were a Hebrew legend which owed its origin to the bitter hatred existing from the earliest to the latest times between the "Children of Lot" and the Children of Israel. But even the most destructive critics allow that the narrative is a continuation without a break of that which precedes it, while they fail to point out any marks of later date in the language of this portion; and it cannot be questioned that the writer records it as an historical fact. Even if the legendary theory were admissible, there is no doubt of the fact that Ammon and Moab sprang from Lot (Deut. ii. 9, 19; Ps. lxxxiii. 8). The Arabic local name of the Dead Sea is Bahr Lüt = Sea of Lot.

Lot. The custom of deciding doubtful questions by lot is one of great extent and high antiquity, recommending itself as a sort of appeal to the Almighty, secure from all influence of passion or bias, and is a sort of DIVINATION said to be employed even by the gods themselves (Homer, Il. xxii. 209; Cicero, de Div. i. 34, ii. 41). Among the Jews also the use of lots, with a religious intention, direct or indirect, prevailed extensively. The religious estimate of them may be gathered from Prov. xvi. 33. The following are historical or ritual instances—1. Choice of men for an invading force (Judg. i. 1, xx. 10). 2. Partition (a) of the soil of Palestine among the tribes (Num. xxv. 55; Josh. xviii. 10; Acts xiii. 19); (b) of Jerusalem, i. e. probably its spoil or captives among captors (Ob. 11); of the land itself in a similar way (1 Mc. iii. 36); (c) Peopling of Jerusalem by inhabitants drawn by lot (Neh. xi. 1, 2); (d) Apportionment of possessions, or spoil, or of prisoners, to foreigners or captors (Joel iii. 3; Nah. iii. 10; Mat. xxvii. 35). 3. (a) Settlement of doubtful questions (Prov. xvi. 33, xviii. 18). (b) A mode of DIVINATION among heathens by means of arrows, two inscribed, and one without mark (Hos. iv. 12; Ez. xxi. 21). (PURIM.) (c) Detection of a criminal (Josh. vii. 14, 18). (d) Appointment of persons to offices or duties (1 Sam. x. 20, 21; 1 Chr. xxiii. 28, xxiv. 3, 5, 19, 20-31, xxv. 8, xxvi. 13; Acts i. 24-26). (e) Selection of the scape-goat on the Day of Atonement (Lev. xvi. 8, 10). 4. The use of words heard or passages chosen at random from Scripture.

Lo'tan (Heb. covering, Ges.), eldest son of Seir the Horite (Gen. xxxvi. 20, 22, 29; 1 Chr. i. 38, 39).

Lots, Feast of. PURIM.

* Love [luv] (Heb. ahabâh; Gr. agapê) denotes not only natural affection (Gen. xxix. 20; 2 Sam. i. 26, &c.), but also the pure spiritual affection which belongs to God and holy beings (Rom. xiii. 10; 1 Jn. iv. 7, 8, &c.). Love may involve complacency or delight in the character of its object, e. g. God's love toward the holy, or their love toward Him and other holy beings (Jn. v. 42, xvii. 26, &c.); or it may involve only benevolence or compassion without any approbation of its object's character, e. g. God's love toward sinners (Rom. v. 8; compare Jn. iii. 16, &c.). Love, in the heavenly or Christian sense, is a fruit of the Spirit (Rom. v. 5; Gal. v. 22); it is opposed to all unrighteousness and is satisfied only with likeness to Jesus Christ and God (Rom. xiii. 10; 1 Jn. iv. 17; comp. Mat. xxii. 36-40, &c.). "We love Him because He first loved us" (1 Jn. iv. 19). CHARITY; FAITH; MERCY, &c.

Love-Festivals. FEASTS OF CHARITY.

* Low Country (2 Chr. xxvi. 10, xxviii. 18), or Low Plains (1 Chr. xxvii. 28; 2 Chr. ix. 27), the A. V. translation of Heb. shephelah = SEPHELA. JCDAH 1 (II.); PLAIN 6; VALLEY 5.

Lo'zon (Gr.), ancestor of certain "sons of Solomon's servants" who returned with Zorobabel (1 Esd. v. 33); = DAKON.

La'bim, La'bims (Heb. Lûbim, Lubbin = LIBYANS, strictly inhabitants of a dry and thirsty land, Ges.), an African nation mentioned as contributing, together with Cushites (A. V. "Ethiopians") and Sukkiim, to Shishak's army (2 Chr. xii. 3); and apparently as forming with Cushites the bulk of Zerah's army (xvi. 8); spoken of by Nahum (iii. 9), with Put or Phut, as helping No-Amon (Thebes), of which Cush and Egypt were the strength; and by Daniel (xi. 43) as paying court with the Cushites to a conqueror of Egypt or the Egyptians. For more precise information we look to the Egyptian monuments, upon which we find representations of a people called Febu or Lebu, who (so Mr. R. S. Poole) = the Lubim. These Lebu were a warlike people, with whom Menptah and Rameses III., who both ruled in the thirteenth century B. C., waged successful wars. The latter king routed them with much slaughter. The sculptures of the great temple he raised at Thebes, now called that of Medinet Haboo, give us representations of the Lebu, showing that they were fair, and of what is called a Shemitic type, like the Berbers and Kabyles. They are distinguished as northern, i. e. as parallel to, or north of, Lower Egypt. The Lubim probably = the Mizraite LEBABIM. The historical indications of the Egyptian monuments thus lead us to place the seat of the Lubim, or primitive Libyans, on the African coast, westward of Egypt, perhaps extending far beyond the Cyrenaica. (CYRENE; LIBYA.) They seem to have been first reduced by the Egyptians about 1250 B. C., and afterward driven inland by the Phœnician and Greek colonists. Now they still remain on the northern confines of the Great Desert, and even within it, and in the mountains.

Lu'cas (L. = LUKE), a friend and companion of St. Paul during his imprisonment at Rome (Phn. 24); = LUKE, the beloved physician (Col. iv. 14; 2 Tim. iv. 11).

Lu'ci-fer [-se-] (L., literally light-bringing; Heb. heylel). The name is, in Is. xiv. 12, coupled with the epithet "son of the morning," and clearly = a bright star, and probably what we call the morning star. In this passage it is a symbolical representation of the king of Babylon, in his splendor and in his fall. Its application (from St. Jerome downward) to SATAN in his fall from heaven, arises probably from the fact that the Babylonian empire is in Scripture represented as the type of tyrannical and self-idolizing power, and especially connected with the empire of the Evil One in the Apocalypse.

Lu'ci-us [lu'she-us in L., as Eng. usually pronounced lu'shus] (L., born in the day-time, Freund; a common Roman prænomen or first name). 1. A Roman consul, said to have written the letter to Ptolemy (Euergetes), which assured Simon I. of the protection of Rome (about B. C. 139-8; 1 Mc. xv. 10, 15-24). The whole form of the letter—the mention of one consul only, the description of the consul by the prænomen, the omission of the senate and of the date—shows that it cannot be an accurate copy of the original document; but there is nothing in the substance of the letter which is open to just suspicion. The imperfect transcription of the name has led to the identification of Lucius with three distinct persons—(1.) (Lucius?) Furius Philus, who was not consul till B. C. 136, and is therefore at once excluded. (2.) Lucius Cæcilius Metellus Calvus, who was consul in B. C. 142. (3.) The third identification with Lucius Calpurnius Piso, who was consul B. C. 139, is most probably correct.—2. A kinsman or fellow-tribesman of St. Paul (Rom. xvi. 21), by whom he is said by tradition to have been ordained bishop of the church of Cenchrea; thought by some = No. 3.—3. "Lucius of CYRENE" is first mentioned in the N. T. in company with Barnabas, Simeon, called Niger, Manaen, and Saul, who are described as prophets and teachers of the church at Antioch (Acts xiii. 1). Whether Lucius was one of the seventy disciples, as stated by Pseudo-Hippolytus, is quite a matter of conjecture, but it is highly probable that he formed one of the congregation to whom St. Peter preached on the day of Pentecost (ii. 10); and there can hardly be a doubt that he was one of "the men of Cyrene," who, being "scattered abroad upon the persecution that rose about Stephen," went to Antioch preaching the Lord Jesus (xi. 19, 20). He is commonly supposed = No. 2. There is certainly no sufficient reason for regarding him as = LUKE. Different traditions make Lucius bishop of Cenchrea, of Cyrene, and of Laodicea in Syria.

* Lu'cre [-ker] (Fr. fr. L.) = gain, especially that which is obtained unworthily (1 Sam. viii. 3; 1 Tim. iii. 3, 8; Tit. i. 7, 11; 1 Pet. v. 2).

Lud (Heb. progeny, Sim.; full of windings, tortuous, from the course of the river Meander on the border of Lydia, Schl.), fourth name in the list of the sons of Shem (Gen. x. 22; 1 Chr. i. 17), that of a person or tribe, or both, descended from him. It has been supposed that Lud was the ancestor of the Lydians (Jos. i. 6, § 4), and thus represented by the Lydus of their mythical period. (LYDIA.) But the Egyptian monuments show us in the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth centuries B. C. a powerful people called Ruten or Luden, probably (so Mr. R. S. Poole) seated near Mesopotamia, and apparently

N. of Palestine, whom some, however, make the Assyrians. Perhaps the Lydians first established themselves near Palestine, and afterward spread into Asia Minor; the occupiers of the old seat of the race being destroyed or removed by the Assyrians. LUDIM.

Lu'dim (Heb. pl. of לוד), a Mizraite people or tribe (Gen. x. 13; 1 Chr. i. 11). From their position at the head of the list of the Mizraites, they were probably (so Mr. R. S. Poole) settled to the W. of Egypt, perhaps further than any other Mizraite tribe. LUD and the Ludim are mentioned in Is. lxvi. 19; Jer. xlii. 9 (A. V. "Lydians"); Ez. xxvii. 10, xxx. 5 (A. V. "Lydia"). There can be no doubt that but one nation is intended in these passages, and thus far the preponderance of evidence seems in favor of the Mizraite Ludim. From the Egyptian monuments we learn that several foreign nations contributed allies or mercenaries to the Egyptian armies. Among them we identify the Rebu with the LUBIM, and the Sharyatana with the CHERETHIM, who also served in David's army. The rest of these foreign troops seem to have been of African nations, but this is not certain. From the Greek writers we learn that Ionian, Carian, and other Greek mercenaries, formed an important element in the Egyptian army in all times when the country was independent, from the reign of Psammetichus until the final conquest by Ochus. These mercenaries were even settled in Egypt by Psammetichus. There does not seem to be any mention of them in the Bible, unless they = Lud and the Ludim in the passages above-mentioned. It must be recollected that it is reasonable to connect the Shemite Lud with the Lydians, and that at the time of the prophets by whom Lud and the Ludim are mentioned, the Lydian kingdom generally or always included the more western part of Asia Minor, so that the terms Lud and Ludim might well apply to the Ionian and Carian mercenaries drawn from this territory. We must therefore hesitate before absolutely concluding that this important portion of the Egyptian mercenaries is not mentioned in the Bible, upon the prima facie evidence that the only name which could stand for it would seem to be that of an African nation.

Lu'hith (Heb. made of boards, probably having boarded houses, Ges.), the As-cent of, a place in Moab; apparently the ascent to a sanctuary or holy spot on an eminence. It occurs only in Is. xv. 5, and the parallel passage of Jeremiah (xlviii. 5). In the days of Eusebius and Jerome it was still known and stood between Areopolis (Ar) and Zoar. M. de Saulcy places it at Kharbel-Noushin; but this is N. of Areopolis, and cannot be said to lie between it and Zoar.

Luke (fr. Gr. Loukas; L. Lucas, an abbreviated form of Lucanus [i. e. Lucanian, of or from Lucania, a district in South Italy], or of Lucilius [i. e. born at daylight, the common name of a Roman clan]; not to be confounded with LUCIUS. The name Luke occurs three times in the N. T. (Col. iv. 14; 2 Tim. iv. 11; Phn. 24, A. V. "Lucas"), and probably in all three the third evangelist is the person spoken of. (LUKE, GOSPEL OF.) Combining the traditional element with the scriptural, the uncertain with the certain, we are able (so Archbishop Thomson) to trace the following dim outline of the evangelist's life. He was born at Antioch in Syria (Eusebius, Hist. iii. 4); in what condition of life is uncertain. That he was taught the science of medicine ("the beloved physician") does not prove that he was of higher birth than the rest of the disciples. The tradition that Luke was also a painter, and of no mean skill, rests on the authority of Nicephorus (ii. 43), and of other late writers. He was not born a Jew, for he is not reckoned among them "of the circumcision" by St. Paul (compare Col. iv. 11 with ver. 14). The date of his conversion is uncertain. The statement of Epiphanius and others, that he was one of the seventy disciples, has nothing very improbable in it (but compare Lk. i. 2); whilst that which Theophylact adopts (on Lk. xxiv.), that he was one of the two who journeyed to Emmaus with the risen Redeemer, has found modern defenders. The first ray of historical light falls on the evangelist when he joins St. Paul at Troas, and shares his journey into Macedonia. The sudden transition to the first person plural in Acts xvi. 9 is most naturally explained, after all the objections that have been urged, by supposing that Luke, the writer of the Acts, formed one of St. Paul's company from this point. As far as Philippi the evangelist journeyed with the apostle. The resumption of the third person on Paul's departure from that place (xvii. 1) would show that Luke was now left behind. During the rest of St. Paul's second missionary journey we hear of Luke no more. But on the third journey the same indication reminds us that Luke is again of the company (xx. 5), having joined it apparently at Philippi, where he had been left. With the apostle he passed through Miletus, Tyre, and Cesarea to Jerusalem (xx. 5, xxi. 18). Between the two visits of Paul to Philippi seven years had elapsed (A. D. 51 to A. D. 58), which the evangelist may have spent in Philippi and its neighborhood preaching the Gospel. There remains one passage, which, if it refers to St. Luke, must belong to this period. "We have sent with him" (i. e. Titus) "the brother whose praise is in the gospel throughout all the churches" (2 Cor. viii. 18). The subscription of the epistle sets forth that it was "written from Philippi, a city of Macedonia, by Titus and Lucas," and it is an old opinion that Luke was the companion of Titus, although he is not named in the body of the epistle. If this be so, we are to suppose that during the "three months" of Paul's sojourn at Philippi (Acts xx. 3) Luke was sent from that place to Corinth on this errand. He again appears in the company of Paul in the memorable journey to Rome (xvii. 1). He remained at his side during his first imprisonment (Col. iv. 14; Phn. 24); and if it is to be supposed that the Second Epistle to Timothy was written during the second imprisonment, then the testimony of 2 Tim. iv. 11 shows that he continued faithful to the apostle to the end of his afflictions. After the death of St. Paul, the acts of his faithful companion are hopelessly obscure to us. In a passage of Epiphanius (cont. Her. li. 11) we find that receiving the commission to preach the Gospel, Luke preaches first in Dalmatia and Gallia, in Italy and Macedonia. Probably he died in advanced life; but whether he suffered martyrdom or died a natural death, whether in Bithynia or Achaia, or some other country, it is impossible to determine amidst contradictory voices. That he died a martyr, between A. D. 75 and A. D. 100, would seem to have the balance of suffrages in its favor.

Luke (see above), Gospel of. (GOSPELS.) I. The third Gospel is ascribed, by the general consent of ancient Christendom, to "the beloved physician," LUKE, the friend and companion of the Apostle Paul. It has been shown already that the Gospels were in use as one collection, and were spoken of undoubtingly as the work of those whose names they bear, toward the end of the second century. (CANON.) But as regards the genuineness of St. Luke any discussion is entangled with a somewhat difficult question, viz. what is the relation of the Gospel we possess to that which was used by Marcion? The case may be briefly stated. The religion of Jesus Christ announced salvation to Jew and Gentile, through Him who was born a Jew, of the seed of David. The two sides of this fact produced very early two opposite tendencies in the Church. One party thought of Christ as the MESSIAH of the Jews; the other as the Redeemer of the human race. Marcion of Sinope, who flourished in the first half of the second century, expressed strongly the tendency opposed to Judaism. He views the O. T., not as a preparation for the coming of the Lord, but as something hostile in spirit to the Gospel. This divorcement of the N. T. from the Old was at the root of Marcion's doctrine. In his system the God of the O. T. was a lower being, a Demiurge, engaged in a constant conflict with matter, over which he did not gain a complete victory. (PHILOSOPHY.) But the holy and eternal God, perfect in goodness and love, comes not in contact with matter, and creates only what is like to and cognate with Himself. Marcion admitted the Epistles of St. Paul, and a Gospel which he regarded as Pauline, and rejected the rest of the N. T., not from any idea that the books were not genuine, but because they were, as he alleged, the genuine works of men who were not faithful teachers of the Gospel they had received. But what was the Gospel which Marcion used? The ancient testimony (Irenæus; Tertullian) is very strong on this point; it was the Gospel of St. Luke, altered to suit his peculiar tenets. He did not, however, ascribe to Luke by name the Gospel thus corrupted, calling it simply the Gospel of Christ. The opinion that he formed for himself a Gospel, on the principle of rejecting all that savored of Judaism in an existing narrative, and that he selected Luke as needing the least alteration, seems to have been held universally in the Church, until Semler started a doubt, the prolific seed of a large controversy; from the whole result of which, however, the cause of truth has little to regret. His opinion was that the Gospel of St. Luke and that used by Marcion were drawn from one and the same original source, neither being altered from the other. From this controversy we gain the following result:—Marcion was in the height of his activity about A. D. 138, soon after which Justin Martyr wrote his Apology; and he had probably given forth his Gospel some years before, i. e. about A. D. 130. At the time when he composed it, he found the Gospel of St. Luke so far diffused and accepted that he based his own Gospel upon it, altering and omitting. (NEW TESTAMENT, I. § 4.) Therefore we may assume that, about A. D. 120, the Gospel of St. Luke which we possess was in use, and was familiarly known. The theory that it was composed about the middle or end of the second century is thus overthrown; and there is no positive evidence of any kind to set against the harmonious assertion of all the ancient Church that this Gospel is the genuine production of St. Luke. —II. Date of Luke. We have seen that this Gospel was in use before the year 120. From internal evidence the date can be more nearly fixed. From Acts i. 1 it is clear that it was written before the ACTS OF THE APOSTLES. The book of the Acts was probably completed about the end of the second year of St. Paul's imprisonment, i. e. about A. D. 68. How much earlier the Gospel, described as "the former treatise" (Acts i. 1), may have been written is uncertain. Probably it was written at Cesarea during St. Paul's imprisonment there, A. D. 58-60 (Thiersch).—III. Place where the Gospel was written. If the time has been rightly indicated, the place would be Cesarea. Other suppositions are—that it was composed in Achaia and the region of Bœotia (Jerome), in Alexandria (Syriac version), in Rome (Ewald, &c.), in Achaia and Macedonia (Hilgenfeld), and Asia Minor (Köstlin). It is impossible to verify these traditions and conjectures.—IV. Origin of the Gospel. The preface, contained in the first four verses of the Gospel, describes the object of its writer. Here are several facts to be observed. There were many narratives of the life of our Lord current at the early time when Luke wrote his Gospel. The ground of fitness for the task St. Luke places in his having carefully followed out the whole course of events from the beginning. He does not claim the character of an eye-witness from the first; but possibly he may have been a witness of some part of our Lord's doings. The ancient opinion, that Luke wrote his Gospel under the influence of Paul, rests on the authority of Irenæus, Tertullian, Origen, and Eusebius. The two first assert that we have in Luke the Gospel preached by Paul; Origen calls it "the Gospel quoted by Paul;" alluding to Rom. ii. 16; and Eusebius refers Paul's words, "according to my Gospel" (2 Tim. ii. 8), to Luke, in which Jerome concurs. The language of the preface is against the notion of any exclusive influence of St. Paul. The four verses could not have been put at the head of a history composed under the exclusive guidance of Paul, or of any one apostle, and as little could they have introduced a Gospel simply communicated by another. The truth seems to be that St. Luke, seeking information from every quarter, sought it from the preaching of his beloved master, St. Paul; and the apostle in his turn employed the knowledge acquired from other sources by his disciple. Upon the question whether Luke made use of the GOSPELS of Matthew and Mark, no opinion given here could be conclusive. Probably Matthew and Luke wrote independently, and about the same time. Some regard Mark as the oldest N. T. writing; others, as the last, and framed upon the other two. "A calm review of the evidence will, however, lead most unbiased readers to the conclusion that all three wrote in perfect independence of one another; each, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, giving a distinct view of the great complex whole, the reflex of the writer's own individual impressions" (E. Venables, in Kitto). (See Harmony under GOSPELS; INSPIRATION.)—V. Purpose for which the Gospel was written. The evangelist professes to write that THEOPHILUS "might know the certainty of those things wherein he had been instructed" (Lk. i. 4). Theophilus evidently was a Gentile reader. We must admit, but with great caution, on account of the abuses to which the notion has led, that there are traces in the Gospel of a leaning toward Gentile rather than Jewish converts. As each Gospel has within certain limits its own character and mode of treatment, we shall recognize with Olshausen that "St. Luke has the peculiar power of exhibiting with great clearness of conception and truth, not so much the discourses of Jesus as His conversations, with all the incidents that gave rise to them, with the remarks of those who were present, and with the final results." Mr. Venables (in Kitto) makes "universality" the chief characteristic which distinguishes Luke from Matthew and Mark. "The message he delivers is not for the Gentiles as such, as distinguished from the Jews, but for men." So Dr. Van Oosterzee (Comm. in Lange's Series) styles it "the Gospel of Universal Humanity."—VI. Language and Style of the Gospel. It has never been doubted that the evangelist wrote his Gospel in Greek. Whilst Hebraisms are frequent, classical idioms and Greek compound words abound. The number of words used by Luke only is unusually great, and many of them are compound words for which there is classical authority. On comparing the Gospel with the Acts it is found that the style of the latter is more pure and free from Hebrew idioms; and the style of the later portion of the Acts is more pure than that of the former. Where Luke used the materials he derived from others, oral or written, or both, his style reflects the Hebrew idioms of them; but when he comes to scenes of which he was an eye-witness and describes entirely in his own words, these disappear.—VII. Quotations from the Old Testament. In the citations from the O. T., of the principal of which the following is a list, there are plain marks of the use of the SEPTUAGINT version:—

—VIII. Integrity of the Gospel—the first two Chapters. The Gospel of Luke is quoted by Justin Martyr and by the author of the Clementine Homilies. The silence of the Apostolic Fathers only indicates that it was admitted into the CANON somewhat late, which was probably the case. The result of the Marcion controversy is, as we have seen, that our Gospel was in use before A. D. 120. A special question, however, has been raised about the first two chapters, which Marcion omits. But there is no real ground for distinguishing between the first two chapters and the rest.—IX. Contents. This Gospel contains—1. A preface (i. 1-4). 2. An account of the time preceding the ministry of Jesus (i. 5-ii. 52). 3. Several accounts of discourses and acts of our Lord, common to Luke, Matthew, and Mark, related for the most part in their order, and belonging to Capernaum and the neighborhood (iii. 1-ix. 50). 4. A collection of similar accounts, referring to a certain journey to Jerusalem, most of them peculiar to Luke (ix. 51-xviii. 14). 5. An account of the sufferings, death, and resurrection of Jesus, common to Luke with the other Evangelists, except as to some of the accounts of what took place after the resurrection (xviii. 15 to the end).

Lu'na-tle (fr. L., the A. V. translation of Gr. pl. seléniazomenoi, both literally = moon-struck; see below). This word is used twice in the N. T. (Mat. iv. 24, xvii. 15), and evidently refers to some disease, affecting both the body and the mind, which might or might not be a sign of possession. (DEMONIACS.) By the description of Mk. ix. 17-26, it is concluded that this disease was epilepsy. The origin of this and equivalent words is to be found in the belief that diseases of a paroxysmal character were affected by the light or changes of the moon. The use of such words does not in the evangelist or in us involve any acceptance of the original belief.

MADNESS.

* Lust (Heb. ta'vâh, &c.; Gr. epithumia, hêdonê, orexis, pallos) = desire, usually some inordinate desire (Ps. lxxviii. 18, 30; Rom. i. 27, vii. 7; 1 Jn. ii. 16, 17, &c.).

Luz (Heb. ALMOND, Ges.; "HAZEL." A. V.). 1. It seems impossible to discover with precision whether Luz and BETHEL 1 represent one and the same town—the former the Canaanite, the latter the Hebrew name—or whether they were distinct places, though in close proximity. The latter is the natural inference from two of the passages in which Luz is spoken of (Gen. xxviii. 19; Josh. xvi. 2, xviii. 13). Other passages, however, seem to speak of the two as identical (Gen. xxxv. 6; Judg. i. 28). Mr. Grove's conclusion is that the two places were, during the times preceding the conquest, distinct, Luz being the city and Bethel the pillar and altar of Jacob: that after the destruction of Luz by the tribe of Ephraim the town of Bethel arose. —2. When the original Luz was destroyed, through the treachery of one of its inhabitants, the man who had introduced the Israelites into the town went into the "land of the Hittites" and built a city, which he named after the former one. This city was standing at the date of the record (Judg. i. 26); but its situation is unknown.

Lyc-a-o-nia (L. fr. Gr.; named [so some] from an ancient king Lycaon, or [so others] from its numerous wolves [Gr. lukos = wolf]), one of those districts of Asia Minor, which, as mentioned in the N. T., are to be understood rather in an ethnological than a strictly political sense. From what is said in Acts xiv. 11 of "the speech of Lycaonia," it is evident that the inhabitants of the district, in St. Paul's day, spoke something very different from ordinary Greek. Whether this language was some Syrian dialect, or a corrupt form of Greek, has been much debated. The fact that the Lycaonians were familiar with the Greek mythology is consistent with either supposition. Lycaonia is for the most part a dreary plain, bare of trees, destitute of fresh water, and with several salt lakes. It is, however, very favorable to sheep-farming. In the first notices of this district, which occur in connection with Roman history, we find it under the rule of robber-chieftains. After the provincial system had embraced the whole of Asia Minor, the boundaries of the provinces were variable; and Lycaonia was, politically, sometimes in CAPPADOCIA, sometimes in GALATIA. DERBE; ICONIUM; LYSTRA.

Ly'cia [lish'e-a] (L. fr. Gr.; named [so Herodotus] from Lycus, an Athenian), that southwestern region of the peninsula of Asia Minor which is immediately opposite the island of Rhodes. It is a remarkable district, both physically and historically. The last eminences of the range of Taurus come down here in majestic masses to the sea, forming the heights of Cragus and Antieragus, with the river Xanthus winding between them, and ending in the long series of promontories called by modern sailors the "seven capes," among which are deep inlets favorable to seafaring and piracy. The Lycians were incorporated in the Persian empire, and their ships were conspicuous in the great war against the Greeks (Herodotus, vii. 91, 92). After the death of Alexander the Great, Lycia was included in the Greek Seleucid kingdom, and was a part of the territory which the Romans forced Antiochus to cede. It was not till the reign of Claudius that Lycia became part of the Roman provincial system. At first it was combined with PAMPHYLIA. At a later period of the Roman empire it was a separate province, with MYRA for its capital. PATARA; PHASELIS.

the paralytic Eneas, the consequence of which was the conversion of a very large number of the inhabitants of the town and of the neighboring plain of Sharon. Here Peter was residing when the disciples of Joppa fetched him to that city in their distress at Tabitha's death (Acts ix. 32, 35, 38). Quite in accordance with these and the other scattered indications of Scripture, the modern town, Lydd or Ludd, stands in the Merj (meadow) Ibn 'Onair, part of the great maritime plain anciently named SHARON. It is nine miles from Joppa, and is the first town on the northern road between that place and Jerusalem. The watercourse outside the town is said still to bear the name of Abi-Batrus (Peter), in memory of the apostle. It was in the time of Josephus a place of considerable size, which gave name to one of the three or four "governments" or toparchies which Demetrius Soter (B. C. about 152) released from tribute, and transferred from Samaria to the estate of the Temple at Jerusalem (1 Mc. xi. 34; compare x. 30, 38, xi. 28, 57). A century later (B. C. about 45) Lydda, with Gophna, Emmaus, and Thamna, became the prey of the insatiable Cassius, by whom the whole of the inhabitants were sold into slavery to raise the exorbitant taxes imposed. From this they were soon released by Antony; but their city (A. D. 66) was burnt by Cestius Gallus on his way from Caesarea to Jerusalem. In less than two years, early in A. D. 68, it was in a condition to be again taken by Vespasian, then on his way to his campaign in the south of Judea. It was probably rebuilt in Hadrian's reign, and then received the name of Diospolis. When Eusebius wrote (A. D. 320-330), Diospolis was a well-known and much-frequented town. In Jerome's time, A. D. 404, it was an episcopal see. St. George, the patron saint of England, was a native of Lydda. After his martyrdom his remains were buried there, and over them a church was afterward built and dedicated to his honor. The erection of it is commonly ascribed to Justinian, but it is uncertain by whom it was built. When the country was taken possession of by the Saracens, in the early part of the eighth century, the church was destroyed; and in this ruined condition it was found by the Crusaders in A. D. 1099, who reconstituted the see, and added to its endowment the neighboring city and lands of Ramleh. Again destroyed by Saladin after the battle of Hattin in 1191, the church was again rebuilt by Richard Cœur-de-Lion. The town is, for a Mohammedan place, busy and prosperous. Lydda was, for some time previous to the destruction of Jerusalem, the seat of a very famous Jewish school, scarcely second to that of Jabneh.

Lyd'i-a (L. fr. Gr. Ludia; named [so Herodotus] from their king Lydus [Ludos in Gr.]; see LUD, LUDIM), a maritime province in the W. of Asia Minor, bounded by Mysia on the N., Phrygia on the E., and Caria on the S. The name occurs only in 1 Mc. viii. 8 (the rendering of the A. V. in Ez. xxx. 5 being for LUDIM); it is there enumerated among the districts which the Romans took away from Antiochus the Great after the battle of Magnesia in B. C. 190, and transferred to Eumenes II., king of Pergamus. Lydia had attained its greatest prosperity under its celebrated King Croesus, who subdued all Asia Minor W. of the river Halys, except Lycia and Cilicia, but was himself conquered by Cyrus, about B. C. 546, when the country became a Persian province. No nation in Asia (so Herodotus) was more warlike than the ancient Lydians. They are said to have been the first people who coined money. PHILADELPHIA, SARDIS, and THYATIRA were in Lydia. For the connection between Lydia and the Lud and Ludim of the O. T., see LUDIM. Lydia is included in the "Asia" of the N. T.

Lyd'i-a (L. fr. Gr. = native of Lydia [so Grotius] ?), the first European convert of St. Paul, and afterward his hostess during his first stay at PHILIPPI (Acts xvi. 14, 15, also 40). She was a Jewish proselyte at the time of the apostle's coming; and it was at the Jewish Sabbath-worship by the side of a stream (ver. 13) that the preaching of the Gospel reached her heart. Her native place was THYATIRA, famous for its dyeing-works; and Lydia was connected with this trade, either as a seller of dye, or of dyed goods. We infer that she was a person of considerable wealth, partly from her giving a home to St. Paul, partly from the mention of the conversion of her "household," under which term, whether children were included or not, slaves are no doubt comprehended. Of Lydia's character we are led to form a high estimate from her candid reception of the Gospel, her urgent hospitality, and her continued friendship to Paul and Silas when they were persecuted.

* Lyd'i-ans (= inhabitants of LYDIA), the A. V. translation of Heb. Lúdim in Jer. xlv. 9; probably here an African people. LUDIM.

Ly-sa'ni-as (L. fr. Gr. = ending sadness, one who terminates sorrow, L. & S.), mentioned by Luke (iii. 1) as being tetrarch of ABILENE (i. e. the district round Abila) in the fifteenth year of Tiberius, at the time when Herod Antipas was tetrarch of Galilee, and Herod Philip tetrarch of Iturea and Trachonitis. Josephus speaks of a prince named Lysanias who ruled over a territory in the neighborhood of Lebanon in the time of Antony and Cleopatra, sixty years before the time referred to by Luke, and also mentions Abilene as associated with the name of a tetrarch Lysanias, while recounting events of the reigns of Caligula and Claudius, i. e. about twenty years after the time mentioned in Luke. In the first case Abila is not specified at all, and Lysanias is not called tetrarch. But probably the Lysanias mentioned by Josephus in the second instance is actually the prince referred to by Luke.

Lys'i-as [lish'e-as] (L. fr. Gr. = loosing, relaxing, dissolving, Schl., Pape). 1. A nobleman of the blood-royal (1 Mc. iii. 32; 2 Mc. xi. 1), who was intrusted by ANTIOCHUS EPIPHANES (about B. C. 166) with the government of Southern Syria, and the guardianship of his son ANTIOCHUS EUPATOR (1 Mc. iii. 32; 2 Mc. x. 11). In the execution of his office Lysias armed a very considerable force against Judas Maccabeus. Two detachments of this army under Nicanor (2 Mc. viii.) and Gorgias were defeated by the Jews near Emmaus (1 Mc. iv.); and in the following year Lysias himself met with a much more serious reverse at Bethsura (B. C. 165), which was followed by the purification of the Temple. Shortly afterward Antiochus Epiphanes died (B. C. 164), and Lysias assumed the government as guardian of his son, who was yet a child (1 Mc. vi. 17). The war against the Jews was renewed; and after a severe struggle, Lysias, who took the young king with him, captured Bethsura, and was besieging Jerusalem when he received tidings of the approach of Philip, to whom Antiochus had transferred the guardianship of the prince (vi. 18; 2 Mc. xiii.). He defeated Philip (B. C. 163), and was supported at Rome; but in the next year, together with his ward, fell into the hands of DEMETRIUS SOTER, who put them both to death (1 Mc. vii. 2-4; 2 Mc. xiv. 2). 1 Mc. iv. 26-35 places the defeat of Lysias in the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes before the purification of the Temple; 2 Mc. x. 10, xi. 1, &c., in the reign of Antiochus Eupator after the purification. The mistake of date in 2 Mc. is one which might easily arise.—2. Claud'i-us Lys'i-as (see CLAUDIUS), a "chief CAPTAIN" or military tribune, who commanded the Roman troops in the citadel in Jerusalem under Felix the "governor." He rescued PAUL from the Jews, and afterward sent him with a strong guard to Caesarea. From his name and his obtaining Roman citizenship (CITIZEN) by purchase, it has been inferred that he was a Greek (Acts xxi. 31-40, xxii, xxiii, xxiv. 7, 22).

Ly-sim'a-chus (L. fr. Gr. = ending strife, L. & S.). 1. Son of Ptolemy of Jerusalem; Greek translator of the book of Esther (Esth. xi. 1).—2. A brother of the high-priest Menelaus, who was left by him as his deputy during his absence at the court of Antiochus. His tyranny and sacrilege excited an insurrection, during which he fell a victim to the fury of the people, about B. C. 170 (2 Mc. iv. 29–42).

Lystra (L. fr. Gr.), a city which has two points of extreme interest in connection respectively with St. Paul's first and second missionary journeys—(1.) as the place where divine honors were offered to him, after his miraculously healing a lame man, and where he was presently stoned (Acts xiv.); (2.) as probably the home of his chosen companion and fellow-missionary TIMOTHEUS (xvi. 1). The first settlement of Jews in Lystra, and the ancestors of Timotheus among them, may probably be traced to the establishment of Babylonian Jews in Phrygia by ANTIOCHUS THE GREAT three centuries before. Still it is evident that there was no influential Jewish population at Lystra: no mention is made of any synagogue; and the whole aspect of the scene described in Acts xiv. is thoroughly heathen. A church was founded at Lystra, and the names of its bishops appear in early councils. Lystra was undoubtedly in the eastern part of the great plain of LYCAONIA; and there are very strong reasons (so Dr. Howson, after Mr. Hamilton) for identifying its site with the ruins called Bin-bir-Kilisesh, about forty-five miles S. E. of Konie (Iconium), at the base of a conical mountain of volcanic structure, named the Karadagh. Here are the remains of a great number of churches. Pliny places this town in Galatia, and Ptolemy in Isauria; but these statements are quite consistent with its being placed in Lycaonia by St. Luke, as it is by Hierocles.

M

Ma'a-cah (fr. Heb. = MAACHAH). 1. Mother of Absalom; = MAACHAH 5 (2 Sam. iii. 3).—2. "Maacah," and (in 1 Chr.) "MAACHAH;" a small kingdom in close proximity to Palestine, which appears to have lain outside ARGOB (Deut. iii. 14) and BASHAN (Josh. xii. 5). Mr. Grove places Maacah to the east of the Lejah (Argob), in the stony desert of el-Krâ or el-Harra, which is to this day thickly studded with villages. Porter (in Kitto) makes Maacah embrace the S. and E. declivities of Hermon and a portion of the rocky declivity of ITUREA, and extend from the fountains of the Jordan N. E. to the plain of Damascus, and E. to the defiles of Argob, where the GESHURITES appear to have had their home. It is sometimes assumed to have been situated about ABKL-BETH-MAACHAH, but this is hardly probable. The Ammonite war was the only occasion on which the Maacathites came into contact with Israel, when their king assisted the children of Ammon against Joab with a force which he led himself (2 Sam. x. 6, 8; 1 Chr. xix. 7: in the first of these passages "King Maacah" should be "king of Maacah"). MAACHATHI.

Ma'a-chah [-kah] (Heb. oppression, Ges.). 1. Daughter or son of Nahor by his concubine Reumah (Gen. xxii. 24).—2. Father of Achish, who was king of Gath at the beginning of Solomon's reign (1 K. ii. 39). (MAOCH).—3. Daughter, or more probably grand-daughter, of Abishalom = Absalom, named after his mother; the third and favorite wife of Rehoboam, and mother of Abijah (1 K. xv. 2, 10, 13; 2 Chr. xi. 20–22). According to Josephus her mother was TAMAR 3, Absalom's daughter. But the mother of Abijah is elsewhere called "Michaiah, the daughter of UZIEL of Gibeah" (2 Chr. xiii. 2). Some regard "Maachah" and "Michaiah" as variations of the same name, but Mr. Wright thinks it is more probable that "Michaiah" is the error of a transcriber, and that "Maachah" is the true reading in all cases. During a part of the reign of her grandson ASA she occupied at the court of Judah the high position of "King's Mother" (compare 1 K. ii. 19), which has been compared with that of the Sultana Valide in Turkey. (QUEEN.) It may be that at Abijah's death, after a short reign of three years, ASA was left a minor, and Maachah acted as regent, like Athaliah under similar circumstances. If this conjecture be correct, it would serve to explain the influence by which she promoted the practice of idolatrous worship. (IDOL 4).—4. Concubine of Caleb the son of Hezron (1 Chr. ii. 48).—5. Daughter of Talmi, king of Geshur, and mother of Absalom (iii. 2): also called MAACHAH in A. V. of 2 Sam. iii. 3.—6. Wife of Machir the Manassite (1 Chr. vii. 15, 16).—7. Wife of Jehiel, father or founder of Gibeon (viii. 29, ix. 35).—8. Father of Hanan, one of David's heroes (xi. 43).—9. A Simeonite, father of Shephathiah, prince of his tribe in David's reign (xxvii. 16).—10. A small kingdom, = MAACHAH 2 (xix. 7).

Ma-ach'a-thil (Heb. sing., used collectively), and Ma-ach'a-thites (fr. the same), the = the inhabitants of the small kingdom of MAACHAH (MAACHAH 2) (Deut. iii. 14; Josh. xii. 5, xiii. 11, 13). Individual Maachathites were not unknown among the warriors of Israel (2 Sam. xxiii. 34; Jer. xl. 8; 2 K. xxv. 23).

Ma'a-dal (Heb. = MAADIAH, Ges.), one of the sons of Bani who had married a foreign wife (Ezr. x. 34).

Ma-a-di'ah (fr. Heb. = ornament of Jehovah, Ges.), one of the priests, or families of priests, who returned with Zerubbabel and Jeshua (Neh. xii. 5); elsewhere (ver. 17) called MOADIAH.

Ma'al, or Ma'al (Heb. compassionate? Ges.), one of the priests' sons who assisted at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem under Nehemiah (Neh. xii. 36).

Ma'a-leh-a-crab'blim (Heb., see below), the name (Josh. xv. 3) elsewhere translated in the A. V. "the ascent of," or "the going up to, AKRABBIM."

Ma'a-ul = BANI 4 (1 Esd. ix. 34).

Ma'a-rath (Heb. a naked or treadless place, Ges., Fū.), one of the towns of Judah, in the mountains (Josh. xv. 58). HALHUL, BETH-ZUR, and GEDOR, which occur in company with it, have been identified at a few miles to the N. of Hebron, but Maarath has hitherto eluded observation.

Ma-a-se'i'ah [-see'yah] (Heb. work of Jehovah, Ges.). The name of four persons who had married foreign wives in the time of Ezra. 1. A descendant of Jeshua the priest (Ezr. x. 18).—2. A priest, of the sons of Harim (21).—3. A priest, of the sons of Pashur (22).—4. A layman, a descendant of Pashur-moab (30).—5. Father of the priest (?) Azariah, who assisted Nehemiah in rebuilding the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 23).—6. One of those who stood on the right hand of Ezra when he read the law to the people (viii. 4); probably a priest.—7. A Levite (?) who assisted on the same occasion (viii. 7).—8. A chief of the people who or whose descendants signed the covenant with Nehemiah (x. 25).—9. Son of Baruch and descendant of Pharez, the son of Judah (xi. 5). (ASAI 8).—10. A Benjamite, ancestor of Sallu (xi. 7).—11. Two priests of this name are mentioned (xii. 41, 42) as taking part in the musical service which accompanied the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem under Ezra and Nehemiah. One of them probably = No. 6.—12. Father of Zephaniah, who was a priest in Zedekiah's reign (Jer. xxi. 1, xxix. 25, xxxvii. 3).—13. Father of Zedekiah the false prophet (xxix. 21).—14. One of the porters and Levites of the second rank, appointed by David to sound "with psalteries on Alamoth" (1 Chr. xv. 18, 20).—15. Son of Adaiah, and one of the captains of hundreds under Jehoiada and Joash, king of Judah (2 Chr. xxiii. 1).—16. An officer of high rank in the reign of Uzziah (xxvi. 11); probably a Levite (compare 1 Chr. xxiii. 4), and engaged in a semi-military capacity.—17. The "king's son" (compare JERAHMEEL 3; JOASH 4; MALCHIAH 8), killed by Zichri in the invasion of Judah by Pekah during the reign of Ahaz (2 Chr. xxviii. 7).—18. Governor of Jerusalem in Josiah's reign (xxxiv. 8).—19. Son of Shallum; a Levite of high rank in the reign of Jehoiakim (Jer. xxxv. 4; compare 1 Chr. ix. 19).—20. A priest; ancestor of Baruch and Seraiah, the sons of Neriah (Jer. xxxii. 12, li. 59).

Ma-a-si-al (fr. Heb. = MAASEIAH, Ges.), a priest who after the return from Babylon dwelt in Jerusalem (1 Chr. ix. 12). AMASHAI.
Ma-a-si-as (fr. Gr.) = MAASEIAH 20 (Bar. i. 1).
Ma'ath (Gr. = MAHATH, Lord A. C. Hervey), son of Mattathias in the genealogy of Jesus Christ (Lk. iii. 26).
Ma'az (fr. Heb. = anger, Ges.), son of Ram, the first-born of Jerahmeel (1 Chr. ii. 27).
Ma-a-z'i'ah (fr. Heb. = consolation of Jehovah, Ges.). 1. A priest in David's reign, head of the twenty-fourth course (1 Chr. xxiv. 18).—2. One of the priests who signed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 8); probably a descendant or representative of the family of No. 1.

Mab'da-i, or Mab'dal (Gr.) = BENAI 8 c. (1 Esd. ix. 34).

* Mab-nad'e-bal (Ezr. x. 40, marg.). MACHNADEBAI.

Mac'a-lon (fr. Gr.) (1 Esd. v. 21) = MICHMAH in the lists of Ezra and Nehemiah.

Mac'ca-bees (fr. Heb., see below), the. This title, which was originally (in the singular "Maccabeus") the surname of Judas, one of the sons of Mattathias, was afterward extended to the heroic family of which he was one of the noblest representatives, and in a still wider sense to the Palestinian martyrs in the persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes, and even to the Alexandrine Jews who suffered for their faith at an earlier time. The original term Maccabi (Gr. form Makkabaios; L. Maccabeus) has been variously derived. Some have maintained that it was formed from the combination of the initial letters (מכב = meby) of the Hebrew sentence, "Who among the gods is like unto thee, Jehovah?" (Ex. xv. 11.), which is supposed to have been inscribed upon the banner of the patriots. Another derivation has been proposed, which, although direct evidence is wanting, seems satisfactory (so Mr. Westcott, the original author of this article). According to this the word is formed from Heb. makkábáh = a hammer, giving a sense not altogether unlike that in which Charles Martel derived a surname from his favorite weapon. (AXE; HAMMER 2.) Although the name Maccabees has gained the widest currency, that of Asmoneans, or Hasmoneans, is the proper name of the family. The origin of this name also has been disputed, but the obvious derivation from Heb. Hashmôn or Chashmôn (Gr. Asmonaios, L. Asmoneus = Asmoneus, or Asmoneus), great-grandfather of Mattathias, seems certainly correct. The connection of the various members of the Maccabean family will be seen from the accompanying table:

THE ASMONEAN FAMILY.

The original authorities for the history of the Maccabees are extremely scanty; but for the course of the war itself 1 Mc. is a most trustworthy, if an incomplete witness. 2 Mc. adds some important details to the history of the earlier part of the struggle, and of the events which immediately preceded it; but all the statements which it contains require close examination, and must be received with caution. (MACCABEES, BOOKS OF.) Josephus follows 1 Mc., for the period which it embraces, very closely; but slight additions of names and minute particulars indicate that he was in possession of other materials, probably oral traditions, which have not been elsewhere preserved. On the other hand there are cases in which, from haste or carelessness, he has misinterpreted his authority. From other sources little can be gleaned.—1. The essential causes of the Maccabean War have been already pointed out. (ANTIOCHUS IV.) The annals of the Maccabean family, "by whose hand deliverance was given unto Israel" (1 Mc. v. 62), present the record of its progress. The standard of independence was first raised by MATTATHIAS, a priest of the course of Joarib (or Jehoiarib), which was the first of the twenty-four courses (1 Chr. xxiv. 7), and consequently of the noblest blood. The persecutions of Antiochus Epiphanes had already roused his indignation, when emissaries of the king, headed by Apelles (Jos. xii. 6, § 2), came to MODIN, where he dwelt, and required the people to offer idolatrous sacrifices. Mattathias rejected the overtures made to him first, and when a Jew came to the altar to renounce his faith, slew him, and afterward Apelles. After this he fled with his sons to the mountains (B. C. 168), whither he was followed by numerous bands of fugitives. (ASSIDEANS.) He seems, however, to have been already advanced in years when the rising was made, and he did not long survive the fatigues of active service. He died B. C. 166, and "was buried in the sepulchre of his fathers at Modin" (1 Mc. ii.).—2. Mattathias himself named JUDAS—apparently his third son—as his successor in directing the war of independence (ii. 66). The energy and skill of "Maccabeus" (= the Maccabee), as Judas is often called in 2 Mc., fully justified his father's preference. It appears that he had already taken a prominent part in the first secession to the mountains (2 Mc. v. 27). His first enterprises were night attacks and sudden surprises (viii. 6, 7); and when his men were encouraged by these means, he ventured on more important operations, and defeated Apollonius (1 Mc. iii. 10–12) and Seron (13–24) at Beth-horon. Shortly afterward Antiochus Epiphanes, whose resources had been impoverished by the war (27–31), left the government of the Palestinian provinces to LYSIAS. Lysias organized an expedition against Judas; but his army, a part of which had been separated from the main body to effect a surprise, was defeated by Judas at Emmaus with great loss, B. C. 166 (iii. 46–53); and in the next year Lysias himself was routed at Bethsura. After this success Judas was able to occupy Jerusalem, except the "tower" (vi. 18, 19), and he purified the Temple (iv. 36, 41–53) on the 25th of Chisleu, exactly three years after its profanation (i. 59). (DEDICATION, FEAST OF THE.) The next year was spent in wars with frontier nations (v.); but in spite of continued triumphs the position of Judas was still precarious. In B. C. 163 Lysias laid siege to Jerusalem. The accession of DEMETRIUS I. SOTER brought with it fresh troubles to the patriot Jews. A large party of their countrymen, with ALCIVUS at their head, gained the ear of the king, and he sent NICANOR against Judas. Nicanor was defeated, first at Capharsalama, and again in a decisive battle at Adasa, near to the glorious field of Beth-horon (B. C. 161) on the 18th Adar (vii. 49; 2 Mc. xv. 36), where he was slain. This victory was the greatest of Judas's successes, and practically decided the question of Jewish independence, but it was followed by an unexpected reverse. A new invasion under BACCHIDES took place. Judas was able only to gather a small force to meet the sudden danger. Of this a large part deserted him on the eve of the battle; but the courage of Judas was unshaken, and he fell at Eleasa, fighting at desperate odds against the invaders. His body was recovered by his brothers, and buried at Modin "in the sepulchre of his fathers" (B. C. 161).—3. After the death of Judas the patriotic party seems to have been for a short time wholly disorganized, and it was only by the pressure of unparalleled sufferings that they were driven to renew the conflict. For this purpose they offered the command to JONATHAN, surnamed Apphus (the wary), the youngest son of Mattathias. He retired to the lowlands of the Jordan (1 Mc. ix. 42), where he gained some advantage over Bacchides (B. C. 161), who made an attempt to hem in and destroy his whole force. After two years Bacchides again took the field against Jonathan (B. C. 158). This time he seems to have been but feebly supported, and after an unsuccessful campaign he accepted terms which Jonathan proposed; and after his departure Jonathan "judged the people at Michmash" (ix. 73), and gradually extended his power. The claim of ALEXANDER BALAS to the Syrian crown gave a new importance to Jonathan and his adherents. The success of Alexander led to the elevation of Jonathan, who assumed the high-priestly office (HIGH-PRIEST); and not long after he placed the king under fresh obligations by the defeat of Apollonius, a general of the younger Demetrius (x.). After the death of Alexander, Jonathan attached himself to ANTIOCHUS VI. He at last fell a victim to the treachery of TRYPHON, B. C. 144 (xi. 8–xii. 4).—4. As soon as SIMON, the last remaining brother of the Maccabean family, heard of the detention of Jonathan in Ptolemais by Tryphon, he placed himself at the head of the patriot party. His skill in war had been proved in the lifetime of Judas (v. 17–23), and he had taken an active share in the campaigns of Jonathan (xi. 59). Tryphon, after carrying Jonathan about as a prisoner for some little time, put him to death; and then, having murdered Antiochus, seized the throne. On this Simon made overtures to DEMETRIUS II. (B. C. 143), which were favorably received, and the independence of the Jews was at length formally recognized. The long struggle was now triumphantly ended, and it remained only to reap the fruits of victory. This Simon hastened to do. The prudence and wisdom for which he was already distinguished at the time of his father's death (ii. 65), gained for the Jews the active support of Rome (xv. 16–21), in addition to the confirmation of earlier treaties. After settling the external relations of the new state upon a sure basis, Simon regulated its internal administration. With two of his sons he was murdered at Dôk ("Docus") by Ptolemeus, B. C. 135 (xvi. 11–16).—5. The treason of Ptolemeus failed in its object. JOHANNES (L. = JOHN) HYRCANUS, one of the sons of Simon, escaped from the plot by which his life was threatened, and at once assumed the government (B. C.

135). At first he was hard pressed by ANTIOCHUS SIDETES, and only able to preserve Jerusalem on condition of dismantling the fortifications and submitting to a tribute, B. C. 133. He reduced Idumea, confirmed the alliance with Rome, and at length succeeded in destroying Samaria, the hated rival of Jerusalem, B. C. 109. The external splendor of his government was marred by the growth of internal divisions; but John escaped the fate of all the older members of his family, and died in peace, B. C. 106-5. His eldest son Aristobulus I., who succeeded, was the first who assumed the kingly title, though Simon had enjoyed the fulness of the kingly power. (For the subsequent history, see JERUSALEM.)—6. Two of the first generation of the Maccabean family still remain to be mentioned. These, though they did not attain to the leadership of their countrymen like their brothers, shared their fate—ELEAZAR by a noble act of self-devotion, JOHN, apparently the eldest brother, by treachery.—7. The great outlines of the Maccabean contest, which are somewhat hidden in the annals thus briefly epitomized, admit of being traced with fair distinctness. The disputed succession to the Syrian throne (B. C. 153) was the political turning-point of the struggle, which may thus be divided into two great periods. During the first period (B. C. 168-153) the patriots maintained their cause with varying success against the whole strength of Syria; during the second (B. C. 153-139) they were courted by rival factions, and their independence was acknowledged from time to time, though pledges given in times of danger were often broken when the danger was over. The paramount importance of Jerusalem is conspicuous throughout the whole war. The occupation of Jerusalem closed the first act of the war (B. C. 165). On the death of Judas the patriots were reduced to as great distress as at their first rising. So far it seemed that little had been gained when the contest between Alexander Balas and Demetrius I. opened a new period (B. C. 153). The former unfruitful conflicts at length produced their full harvest. When the Jewish leaders had once obtained legitimate power they proved able to maintain it, though their general success was checkered by some reverses. The solid power of the national party was seen by the slight effect which was produced by the treacherous murder of Jonathan. Simon was able at once to occupy his place, and carry out his plans.—8. The war, thus brought to a noble issue, if less famous, is not less glorious than any of those in which a few brave men have successfully maintained the cause of freedom or religion against overpowering might. For it is not only in their victory over external difficulties that the heroism of the Maccabees is conspicuous: their real success was as much imperilled by internal divisions as by foreign force.—9. The view of the Maccabean war which regards it only as a civil and not as a religious conflict, is essentially one-sided. If there were no other evidence than the book of DANIEL, that alone would show how deeply the noblest hopes of the theocracy were centred in the success of the struggle. When the feelings of the nation were thus again turned with fresh power to their ancient faith, we might expect that there would be a new creative epoch in the national literature; or, if the form of Hebrew composition was already fixed by sacred types, a prophet or psalmist would express the thoughts of the new age after the models of old time. Yet in part at least the leaders of Maccabean times felt that they were separated by a real chasm from the times of the kingdom or of the exile. If they looked for a prophet in the future, they acknowledged that the spirit of prophecy was not among them. The volume of the prophetic writings was completed, and, as far as appears, no one ventured to imitate its contents. But the Hagiographa (BIBLE, III. 3), though they were already long fixed as a definite collection, were not equally far removed from imitation. The apocalyptic visions of DANIEL served as a pattern for the visions incorporated in the book of Enoch (ENOCH, BOOK OF), and it has been commonly supposed by German theologians, that the Psalter (PSALMS) contains compositions of the Maccabean date. This supposition is at variance with the best evidence on the history of the CANON.—10. The collection of the so-called Psalms of Solomon furnishes a strong confirmation of the belief that all the canonical Psalms are earlier than the Maccabean era. This collection, which bears the clearest traces of unity of authorship, is, almost beyond question, a true Maccabean work. There is every reason to believe that the book was originally composed in Hebrew; and it presents exactly those characteristics which are wanting in the other (conjectural) Maccabean Psalms.—11. Elsewhere there is little which marks the distinguishing religious character of the era. The notice of the Maccabean heroes in the book of Daniel is much more general and brief than the corresponding notice of their great adversary; but it is not on that account less important as illustrating the relation of the famous chapter (Dan. xi. 29-35) to the simple history of the period which it embraces.—12. The history of the Maccabees does not contain much which illustrates in detail the religious or social progress of the Jews. It is obvious that the period must not only have intensified old beliefs, but also have called out elements which were latent in them. One doctrine at least, that of a resurrection, and even of a material resurrection (2 Mc. xiv. 46), was brought out into the most distinct apprehension by suffering. And as it was believed that an interval elapsed between death and judgment, the dead were supposed to be in some measure still capable of profiting by the intercession of the living. Thus much is certainly expressed in the famous passage, 2 Mc. xii. 43-45, though the secondary notion of a purgatorial state is in no way implied in it. On the other hand it is not very clear how far the future judgment was supposed to extend. The firm faith in the righteous providence of God, shown in the chastening of His people, as contrasted with His neglect of other nations, is another proof of the widening view of the spiritual world, which is characteristic of the epoch (2 Mc. iv. 16, 17, v. 17-20, vi. 12-16, &c.). (APOCRYPHA.)—13. The various glimpses of national life during the period, show on the whole a steady adherence to the Mosaic law. Probably the law was never more rigorously fulfilled. The importance of the Antiochian persecution in fixing the Canon of the O. T. has been already noticed. (CANON II.) The interruption of the succession to the high-priesthood (HIGH-PRIEST) was the most important innovation, and one which prepared the way for the dissolution of the state. After various arbitrary changes the office was left vacant for seven years upon the death of Alcimus. The last descendant of Jozadak (ONIAS 5), in whose family it had been for nearly four centuries, fled to Egypt, and established a schismatic worship; and at last, when the support of the Jews became important, the Maccabean leader, Jonathan, of the family of Joarib, was elected to the dignity by the nomination of the Syrian king (1 Mc. x. 20), whose will was confirmed, as it appears, by the voice of the people (compare xiv. 35).—14. Little can be said of the condition of literature and the arts which has not been already anticipated. In common intercourse the Jews used the Aramaic dialect which was established after the return: this was "their own language" (2 Mc. vii. 8, 21, 27, xii. 37; SHemitic Languages); but it is evident from the narrative quoted that they understood Greek, which must have spread widely through the influence of Syrian officers. There is not, however, the slightest evidence that Greek was employed in Palestinian literature till a much later date. The description of the monument erected by Simon at Modin, in memory of his family (1 Mc. xiii. 27-30), is the only record of the architecture of the time.—15. The only recognized relics of the time are the coins which bear the name of "Simon," or "Simon Prince (Nasi) of Israel" in Samaritan letters. The privilege of a national coinage was granted to Simon, B. C. 140, by Antiochus VII. Sidetes (1 Mc. xv. 6). MONEY.

Mac-ca-bees (see above, and III. below), Books of. Four books which bear the common title of "Maccabees" are found in some MSS. of the LXX. Two of these were included in the early current Latin versions of the Bible, and thence passed into the Vulgate. As forming part of the Vulgate they were received as canonical by the council of Trent, and retained among the Аpostolika by the reformed churches. The two other books obtained no such wide circulation, and have only a secondary connection with the Maccabean history. But all the books, though they differ most widely in character and date and worth, possess points of interest which make them a fruitful field for study. If the historic order were observed, the so-called third book would come first, the fourth would be an appendix to the second, which would retain its place, and the first would come last; but it will be more convenient to examine the books in the order in which they are found in the MSS., which was probably decided by some vague tradition of their relative antiquity.—I. The First Book of Maccabees.—1. 1 Mc. contains a history of the patriotic struggle, from the first resistance of Mattathias to the settled sovereignty and death of Simon, a period of thirty-three years (B. C. 168-135). The opening chapter gives a short summary of the conquests of Alexander the Great, and describes at greater length the oppression of Antiochus Epiphanes. The great subject of the book begins with the enumeration of the Maccabean family (ii. 1-5), which is followed by an account of the part which the aged Mattathias took in rousing and guiding the spirit of his countrymen (ii. 6-70). The remainder of the narrative is occupied with the exploits of his five sons. Each of the three divisions, into which the main portion of the book thus naturally falls, is stamped with an individual character derived from its special hero—(1.) Judas, (2.) Jonathan, (3.) Simon. (MACCABEES.) The history, in this aspect, presents a kind of epic unity. 2. While the grandeur and unity of the subject invest the book with almost an epic beauty, it never loses the character of history (so Mr. Westcott, original author of this article). The earlier part of the narrative, including the exploits of Judas, is cast in a more poetic mould than any other part, except the brief eulogy of Simon (xiv. 4-15); but when the style is most poetical (i. 37-40, ii. 7-13, 49-68, iii. 3-9, 18-22, iv. 8-11, 30-33, 38, vi. 10-13, vii. 37, 38, 41, 42)—and this poetical form is chiefly observable in the speeches—it seems to be true in spirit. The great marks of trustworthiness are everywhere conspicuous. Victory and failure and despondency are, on the whole, chronicled with the same candor. There is no attempt to bring into open display the working of providence. So far as the circumstances admit, the general accuracy of the book is established by the evidence of other authorities; but for a considerable period it is the single source of our information. 3. In some points, however, the writer appears to have been imperfectly informed, especially in the history of foreign nations; and in some, again, he has been supposed to have magnified the difficulties and successes of his countrymen. Of the former class of objections, two, which turn upon the description given of the foundation of the Greek kingdoms of the East (1 Mc. i. 5-9), and of the power of Rome (viii. 1-16), deserve notice from their intrinsic interest. After giving a rapid summary of the exploits of Alexander, the writer states that the king, conscious of approaching death, "divided his kingdom among his servants who had been brought up with him from his youth" (i. 6). In this instance the author has probably accepted without inquiry the opinion of his countrymen; in the other it is distinctly said that the account of the greatness of Rome was brought to Judas by common report (viii. 1, 2). The errors in detail are only such as might be expected in oral accounts. The very imperfection of the writer's knowledge is instructive. 4. Much has been written as to the sources from which the narrative was derived, but there does not seem to be evidence sufficient to indicate them with any certainty. In one passage (ix. 22) the author implies that written accounts of some of the actions of Judas were in existence. It appears, again, to be a reasonable conclusion, from the mention of the official records of the life of Hyrcanus (xvi. 24), that similar records existed at least for the high-priesthood of Simon. Many documents are inserted in the text of the history, but even when they are described as "copies" it is questionable whether the writer designed to give more than the substance of the originals. But whatever were the sources of different parts of the book, and in whatever way written, oral and personal information were combined in its structure, the writer made the materials which he used truly his own; and the minute exactness of the geographical details carries the conviction that the whole finally rests upon the evidence of eye-witnesses. 5. The language of the book does not present any striking peculiarities. Both in diction and structure it is generally simple and unaffected, with a marked and yet not harsh Hebraistic character. The number of peculiar words is not very considerable, especially when compared with those in 2 Mc. 6. The testimony of antiquity leaves no doubt but that the book was first written in Hebrew. Origen, in his famous catalogue of the books of Scripture, after enumerating the contents of the O. T. according to the Hebrew canon, adds: "But without (i. e. excluded from the number of) these is the Maccabean history, which is entitled Sarbeth Sabanaiel." Mr. Westcott regards this as the correct reading, but cannot interpret it as Hebrew. But Michaelis, Ginsburg (in Kitto), and most modern commentators, read Sarbeth Sarbane el, and make it Hebrew = History of the princes of the sons of God, i. e. of Israel. The statement of Jerome is quite explicit:—"The first book of Maccabees," he says, "I found in Hebrew; the second is Greek, as can be shown in fact from its style alone." A question, however, might be raised whether the book was written in Biblical Hebrew, or in the later Aramaic (Chaldee); but it seems almost certain that the writer took the canonical histories as his model. Yet it is by no means unlikely that the Hebrew was corrupted by later idioms, as in the most recent books of the O. T. 7. The whole structure of 1 Mc. points to Palestine as the place of its composition. This fact itself is a strong proof for a Hebrew original, for there is no trace of a Greek Palestinian literature during the Hasmonean dynasty, though the wide use of the LXX., toward the close of the period, prepared the way for the apostolic writings. But though the country of the writer can be thus fixed with certainty, there is considerable doubt as to his date. From xvi. 23, 24, it has been concluded that he must have written after the death of Hyrcanus, B. C. 106. It cannot certainly have been composed long after his death. We may place the date of the original book between B. C. 120 and 100. The date and person of the Greek translator are wholly undetermined. 8. In a religious aspect the book is more remarkable negatively than positively. The historical instinct of the writer confines him to the bare recital of facts, and were it not for the words of others which he records, it might seem that the true theocratic aspect of national life had been lost. Not only does he relate no miracles, such as occur in 2 Mc., but he does not even refer the triumphant successes of the Jews to divine interposition. It is a characteristic of the same kind that he passes over without any clear notice the Messianic hopes, which, as appears from the Psalms of Solomon and the Book of Enoch, were raised to the highest pitch by the successful struggle for independence. But it is throughout inspired by the faith to which it gives us definite expression. 9. The book does not seem to have been much used in early times. Eusebius assumes an acquaintance with the two books; and scanty notices of the first book, but more of the second, occur in other, especially later writers. 10. The books of Maccabees were not included by Jerome in his translation of the BIBLE. (CANON.) The version of the two books incorporated in the Vulgate was consequently derived from the old Latin, current before Jerome's time. This version was obviously made from the Greek, and in the main follows it closely. The Syriac version given in the Polyglotts is, like the Latin, a close rendering of the Greek. —II. The Second Book of Maccabees.—1. The history of 2 Mc. begins some years earlier than that of 1 Mc., and closes with the victory of Judas Maccabeus over Nicanor. It thus embraces a period of twenty years, from B. C. 180 (?) to B. C. 161. For the few events noticed during the earlier years it is the chief authority; during the remainder of the time the narrative goes over the same ground as 1 Mc., but with very considerable differences. The first two chapters are taken up by two letters supposed to be addressed by the Palestinian to the Alexandrine Jews, and by a sketch of the author's plan, which proceeds without any perceptible break from the close of the second letter. The main narrative occupies the remainder of the book. This presents several natural divisions, which appear to coincide with the "five books" of Jason on which it was based. The first (ch. iii.) contains the history of Heliodorus (about B. C. 180). The second (iv.-vii.) gives varied details of the beginning and course of the great persecution (B. C. 175-167). The third (viii.-x. 9) follows the fortunes of Judas to the triumphant restoration of the Temple service (B. C. 166, 165). The fourth (x. 10-xiii.) includes the reign of Antiochus Eupator (B. C. 164-162). The fifth (xiv., xv.) records the treachery of Alcimus, the mission of Nicanor, and the crowning success of Judas (B. C. 162, 161). 2. The relation of the letters with which the book opens to the substance of the book is extremely obscure. The first (i. 1-9) is a solemn invitation to the Egyptian Jews to celebrate "the Feast of Tabernacles in the month Casleu" (i. e. the Feast of the Dedication, i. 9). The second (i. 10-ii. 18), which bears a formal salutation from "the council and Judas" to "Aristobulus . . . and the Jews in Egypt," is a strange, rambling collection of legendary stories of the death of "Antiochus," of the preservation of the sacred fire and its recovery by Nehemiah, of the hiding of the vessels of the sanctuary by Jeremiah, ending—if indeed the letter can be said to have any end—with the same exhortation to observe the Feast of Dedication (ii. 10-18). For it is impossible to point out any break in the construction or style after ver. 19, so that the writer passes insensibly from the epistolary form in ver. 16 to that of the epitomizer in ver. 29. For this reason some critics, both in ancient and modern times, have considered that the whole book is intended to be included in the letter. It seems more natural to suppose that the author found the letters already in existence when he undertook to abridge the work of Jason, and attached his own introduction to the second letter for the convenience of transition, without considering that this would necessarily make the whole appear to be a letter. The letters themselves can lay no claims to authenticity. Some have supposed that the original language of one, or of both the letters was Hebrew, but this cannot be made out by any conclusive arguments. 3. The writer himself distinctly indicates the source of his narrative—"the five books of Jason of Cyrene" (ii. 23), of which he designed to furnish a short and agreeable epitome for the benefit of those who would be deterred from studying the larger work. His own labor, which he describes in strong terms (ii. 26, 27; compare xv. 38, 39), was entirely confined to condensation and selection; all investigation of detail he declares to be the peculiar duty of the original historian. Of Jason himself nothing more is known than may be gleaned from this mention of him. There are certainly many details in the book which show a close and accurate knowledge (iv. 21, 29 ff., viii. 1 ff., ix. 29, x. 12, 13, xiv. 1), and the errors in the order of events may be due wholly, or in part, to the epitomizer. 4. The district of CYRENE was most closely united with that of ALEXANDRIA. In both the predominance of Greek literature and the Greek language was absolute. The work of Jason must therefore have been composed in Greek; and the style of the epitome, as Jerome remarked, proves beyond doubt that the Greek text is the original. It is scarcely less certain that 2 Mc. was compiled at Alexandria. 5. The style of the book is extremely uneven. At times it is elaborately ornate (iii. 15-39, v. 20, vi. 12-16, 28-29, vii. &c.); and again, it is so rude and broken, as to seem more like notes for an epitome than a finished composition (xiii. 19-26); but it nowhere attains to the simple energy and pathos of the first book. The vocabulary corresponds to the style. It abounds in new or unusual words. Hebraisms are very rare. Idiomatic Greek phrases are much more common; and the writer evidently had a considerable command over the Greek language. 6. In the absence of all evidence as to the person of Jason, there are no data which fix the time of the composition of his original work, or of the epitome given in 2 Mc. within very narrow limits. The superior limit of the age of the epitome, though not of Jason's work, is determined by the year (124 B. C.) mentioned in one of the introductory letters (i. 10); but Mr. Westcott is inclined to place the original work of Jason not later than 100 B. C., and the epitome fifty years later. 7. To estimate the historical worth of the book it is necessary to consider separately the two divisions into which it falls. The narrative in iii.-vii. is in part anterior (iii.-iv. 6) and in part (iv. 7-vii.) supplementary to the brief summary in 1 Mc. i. 10-64: that in viii.-xv. is, as a whole, parallel with 1 Mc. iii.-vii. In the first section the book itself is, in the main, the sole source of information: in the second, its contents can be tested by the trustworthy records of the first book. The chief differences between the first and second books lie in the account of the campaigns of Lysias and Timotheus. Differences of detail will always arise where the means of information are partial and separate; but the differences alleged to exist as to these events are more serious. The relation between the two books may be not inaptly represented by that existing between the books of Kings and Chronicles. In each case the later book was composed with a special design, which regulated the character of the materials employed for its construction. But as the design in 2 Mc. is openly avowed by the compiler, so it seems to have been carried out with considerable license. The groundwork of facts is true, but the dress in which the facts are presented is due, in part at least, to the narrator. Not improbably the error with regard to the first campaign of Lysias arose from the mode in which it was introduced by Jason as a prelude to the more important measures of Lysias in the reign of Antiochus Eupator. In other places (as very obviously in xiii. 19 ff.) the compiler may have disregarded the historical dependence of events while selecting those best suited for the support of his theme. If these remarks are true, it follows that 2 Mc. viii.-xv. is to be regarded not as a connected and complete history, but as a series of special incidents from the life of Judas, illustrating the providential interference of God in behalf of His people, true in substance, but embellished in form; and this view of the book is supported by the character of the earlier chapters, in which the narrative is unchecked by independent evidence. 8. Besides the differences between the two books of Maccabees as to the sequence and details of common events, there is considerable difficulty as to the chronological data which they give. Both follow the Seleucian era ("the era of contracts;" "of the Greek kingdom;" 1 Mc. i. 10), but in some cases in which the two books give the date of the same event, the first book gives a date one year later than the second (1 Mc. vi. 16 | 2 Mc. xi. 21, 33; 1 Mc. vi. 20 | 2 Mc. xiii. 1); yet on the other hand they agree in 1 Mc. vii. 1 | 2 Mc. xiv. 4. This discrepancy seems to be due not to a mere error, but to a difference of reckoning; for all attempts to explain away the discrepancy are untenable.

The true era of the Seleucidæ began in October (Dius) B. C. 312; but there is evidence that considerable variations existed in Syria in the reckoning by it. A very probable mode of explaining (at least in part) the origin of the difference has been supported by most of the best chronologists. Though the Jews may have reckoned two beginnings to the year from the time of the Exodus, yet it appears that the Biblical dates are always reckoned by the so-called ecclesiastical year, which began with Nisan (April), and not by the civil year, which was afterward in common use, which began with Tisri (October). Now, since the writer of 1 Mc. was a Palestinian Jew, and followed the ecclesiastical year in his reckoning of months (1 Mc. iv. 52), it is probable that he commenced the Seleucian year not in autumn (Tisri), but in spring (Nisan). If the year began in Nisan (reckoning from spring 312 B. C.), the events which fell in the last half of the true Seleucian year would be dated one year forward, while the true and the Jewish dates would agree in the first half of the year. On other grounds, indeed, it is not unlikely that the difference in the reckoning of the two books is still greater than is thus accounted for. The Chaldeans dated their Seleucian era one year later than the true time from 311 B. C., and probably from October (Dius; compare 2 Mc. xi. 21, 33). If, as is quite possible, the writer of 2 Mc.—or rather Jason of Cyrene, whom he epitomized—used the Chaldean dates, there may be a maximum difference between the two books of one and a half years, which is sufficient to explain the difficulties of the chronology of the events connected with the death of Antiochus Epiphanes. 9. The most interesting feature in 2 Mc. is its marked religious character, by which it is clearly distinguished from the first book. "The manifestations made from heaven on behalf of those who were zealous to behave manfully in defence of Judaism" (2 Mc. ii. 21). The events related historically in the former book are in this regarded theocratically, if the word may be used (xv. 22-24; compare 1 Mc. vii. 41, 42, &c.). The doctrine of Providence is carried out in a most minute parallelism of great crimes and their punishment (iv. 38, v. 9, 10, &c.). On a larger scale the same idea is presented in the contrasted relations of Israel and the heathen to the Divine Power (i. 26, xiv. 15; vi. 12-17). 10. The history of the book, as has been already noticed (§ 6), is extremely obscure. It is first mentioned by Clement of Alexandria; and Origen, in a Greek fragment of his commentaries on Exodus, quotes vi. 12-16, with very considerable variations of text, from "the Maccabean history." At a later time the history of the martyred brothers was a favorite subject with Christian writers; and in the time of Jerome and Augustine the book was in common and public use in the Western Church, where it maintained its position till it was at last definitely declared to be canonical at the Council of Trent. (CANON.) 11. The Latin version adopted in the Vulgate, as in the case of the first book, is that current before Jerome's time, which Jerome left wholly untouched in the apocryphal books, with the exception of Judith and Tobit. It is much less close to the Greek than in the former book. The Syriac version is of still less value. The Arabic so-called version of 2 Mc. is really an independent work (see V. below).—III. The Third Book of the Maccabees contains the history of events which preceded the great Maccabean struggle. The name "MACCABEES" here = martyrs, in reference to the Alexandrian Jews who suffered for their faith's sake either immediately before or after the Maccabean period (Ginsburg, in Kitto). After the decisive battle of Raphia (B. C. 217), envoys from Jerusalem, following the example of other cities, hastened to PROLEMY PHILOPATOR to congratulate him on his success. After receiving them the king resolved to visit the holy city. He offered sacrifice in the Temple, and was so much struck by its majesty that he urgently sought permission to enter the sanctuary. When this was refused he resolved to gratify his curiosity by force, regardless of the consternation with which his design was received (ch. i.). On this, Simon the high-priest, after the people had been with difficulty restrained from violence, kneeling in front of the Temple implored divine help. At the conclusion of the prayer the king fell paralyzed into the arms of his attendants, and on his recovery returned at once to Egypt without prosecuting his intention. But angry at his failure he commanded that the Alexandrian Jews should be deprived of their citizenship (ALEXANDRIA) and branded with an ivy leaf, unless initiated into the orgies of BACCHUS (ii.). This order being evaded or despised, he commanded all the Jews in the country to be arrested and sent to Alexandria (iii.). The gathered multitudes were confined in the Hippodrome outside the city. The scribes toiled forty days in vain to take down their names for execution (iv.). The king ordered that five hundred elephants should be drugged, to trample the prisoners to death on the morrow. The Jews prayed. The king was overpowered by sleep, and then by forgetfulness; but the execution thus twice deferred was again ordered to take place at daybreak (v.). Then Eleazar, an aged priest, prayed for his people, and, as he ended, the royal train came to the Hippodrome. On this a heavenly vision was seen by all but the Jews. The elephants trampled down their attendants; the king's wrath was turned to pity; the Jews were set free, and a great feast was prepared for them; and they resolved to observe a festival, in memory of their deliverance, during their sojourn in strange lands (vi.). A royal letter to the governors of the provinces set forth the circumstances of their escape, and assured them of the king's protection. Permission was given them to take vengeance on their renegade countrymen, and the people returned to their homes in triumph, "crowned with flowers, and singing praises to the God of their fathers" (vii.). 2. The form of the narrative sufficiently shows that the object of the book has modified the facts which it records. The writer, in his zeal to bring out the action of Providence, has colored his history, so that it has lost all semblance of truth. In this respect the book offers an instructive contrast to the Book of Esther. 3. But while it is impossible to accept the details of the book as historical, some basis of truth must be supposed to lie beneath them. The yearly festival (vi. 36, vii. 19) can hardly have been a mere fancy of the writer; and the pillar and synagogue at Ptolemais (vii. 20) must have been connected in some way with a signal deliverance. Besides this, Josephus (Ap. ii. 5) relates a very similar occurrence which took place in the reign of Ptolemy VII. (Physcon). 4. Assuming rightly that the book is an adaptation of history, Ewald and Grimm have endeavored to fix exactly the circumstances by which it was called forth. It is argued that the writer designed to portray Caligula under the name of the sensual tyrant who had in earlier times held Egypt and Syria, while he sought to nerve his countrymen for their struggle with heathen power, by reminding them of earlier deliverances. It is unnecessary to urge the various details in which the parallel between the acts of Caligula and the narrative fail. 5. The language of the book betrays most clearly its Alexandrine origin. Both in vocabulary and construction it is rich, affected, and exaggerated. The form of the sentences is strained, and every description is loaded with rhetorical ornament. As a natural consequence the meaning is often obscure, and the writer is led into exaggerations which are historically incorrect. 6. From the abruptness of the commencement it has been thought that the book is a mere fragment of a larger work. It is possible that the narrative may have formed the sequel to an earlier history, or that the introductory chapter has been lost. 7. The evidence of language is not decisive as to the date. It might, indeed, seem to belong to the early period of the empire (B. C. 40-70). But such a date is purely conjectural. 8. The uncertainty of the date of the composition of the book corresponds with the uncertainty of its history. In the Apostolical Canons "three books of the Maccabees" are mentioned, of which this is probably the third, as it occupies the third place in the oldest Greek MSS., which contain also the so-called fourth book. It is found in a Syriac translation, and is quoted with marked respect by Theodoret of Antioch (died about A. D. 457). No ancient Latin version of it occurs; and it is not contained in the Vulgate.—IV. The Fourth Book of Maccabees contains a rhetorical narrative of the martyrdom of Eleazar and of the "Maccabean family," following in the main the same outline as 2 Mc. The second title of the book, On the Supreme Sovereignty of Reason, explains the moral use made of the history. 2. The book was ascribed in early times to Josephus; and it is found under his name in many MSS. of the great Jewish historian. In the Alexandrine and Sinaitic MSS. it is called simply "the fourth of Maccabees." The internal evidence against the authorship by Josephus is so great as to outweigh the testimony of Eusebius, from whom probably the later statements were derived. 3. The book was written before the destruction of Jerusalem, and probably after 2 Mc. It might be referred, not unnaturally, to the troubled times which immediately preceded the war with Vespasian (about A. D. 67). 4. As a historical document the narrative is of no value. Its interest centres in the fact that it is a unique example of the didactic use which the Jews made of their history. The style is very ornate and labored; but it is correct and vigorous, and truly Greek. The richness and boldness of the vocabulary is surprising. 5. The philosophical tone of the book is essentially stoical; but the stoicism is that of a stern legalist. The dictates of reason are supported by the remembrance of noble traditions, and by the hope of a glorious future. The Jew stands alone, isolated by character and by blessing. 6. The original Greek is the only ancient text in which the book has been published, but a Syriac version is preserved in several MSS.—V. The Fifth Book of Maccabees (see III. above) is printed in Arabic in the Paris and London Polyglotts; and contains a history of the Jews from the attempt of HELIODORUS to the birth of our Lord. The writer made use of 1 and 2 Mc., and of Josephus, and has no claim to be considered an independent authority. It has been supposed that the book was originally written in Hebrew, or at least that the Greek was strongly modifind by Hebrew influence. Dr. Cotton published The Five Books of Maccabees in English (Oxford, Eng., 1832).

Mac-e-do-ni-a [mas-] (L. fr. Gr.; derived [so Hesiod] from Macedo, a son of Jupiter and founder of the nation; or [so others] from KITTIM or CHITTIM; more probably fr. Gr. adj. makednos = tall, denoting the country of tall men), the first part of Europe which received the Gospel directly from St. Paul, and an important scene of his subsequent missionary labors and the labors of his companions. In a rough and popular description it is enough to say that Macedonia is the region bounded inland by the range of Hæmus or the Balkan northward and the chain of Pindus westward, beyond which the streams flow respectively to the Danube and the Adriatic; that it is separated from Thessaly on the S. by the Cambunian hills, running easterly from Pindus to Olympus and the Ægean; and that it is divided on the E. from Thrace by a less definite mountain-boundary running southward from Hæmus. Of the space thus enclosed, two of the most remarkable physical features are two great plains, one watered by the Axios, which comes to the sea at the Thermaic gulf, not far from THESSALONICA; the other by the Strymon, which, after passing near PHILIPPI, flows out below AMPHIPOLIS. Between the mouths of these two rivers a remarkable peninsula projects, dividing itself into three points, on the furthest of which Mount Athos rises nearly into the region of perpetual snow. Across the neck of this peninsula St. PAUL travelled more than once with his companions. This general sketch would sufficiently describe the Macedonia which was ruled over by PHILIP I and ALEXANDER THE GREAT, and which the Romans conquered from PERSEUS. At first the conquered country was divided by Æmilius Paulus into four districts. This division was only temporary. The whole of Macedonia, along with Thessaly and a large tract along the Adriatic, was made one province and centralized under the jurisdiction of a proconsul, who resided at Thessalonica. We have now reached the definition which corresponds with the usage of the term in the N. T. (Acts xvi. 9, 10, 12, &c.). Three Roman provinces, all familiar to us in the writings of St. Paul, divided the whole space between the basin of the Danube and Cape Matapan. The border-town of ILLYRICUM was Lissus on the Adriatic. The boundary-line of ACHAIA nearly coincided, except in the western portion, with that of the kingdom of modern GREECE, and ran in an irregular line from the Acroceraunian promontory to the bay of Thermopylæ and the N. of Eubœa. By subtracting these two provinces, we define Macedonia. The history of Macedonia in the period between the Persian wars and the consolidation of the Roman provinces in the Levant is touched in a very interesting manner by passages in the Apocrypha (1 Mc. i. 1, vi. 2, viii. 5). (CHITTIM.) In Esth. xvi. 10, Haman is described as a MACEDONTIAN, and in xvi. 14 is still to have contrived his plot for the purpose of transferring the kingdom of the Persians to the Macedonians. This sufficiently betrays the late date and spurious character of these apocryphal chapters; but it is curious thus to have our attention turned to the early struggle of Persia and Greece. The account of St. Paul's first journey through Macedonia (Acts xvi. 10-xvii. 15) is marked by copious detail and well-defined incidents. At the close of this journey he returned from Corinth to Syria by sea. On the next occasion of visiting Europe, though he both went and returned through Macedonia (xx. 1-6), the narrative is a very slight sketch, and the route is left uncertain, except as regards Philippi. The character of the Macedonian Christians is set before us in Scripture in a very favorable light. The candor of the Bereans (BEREA 1) is highly commended (xvii. 11); the Thessalonians were evidently objects of St. Paul's peculiar affection (1 Th. ii. 8, 17-20, iii. 10); and the Philippians, besides their general freedom from blame, are noted as remarkable for their liberality and self-denial (Phil. iv. 10, 14-19; see 2 Cor. ix. 2, xi. 9). APOLLONIA; NEAPOLIS.

Mac-e-do-ni-an = one from MACEDONIA (Esth. xvi. 10, 14; Acts xxvii. 2). In 2 Mc. viii. 20 "Macedonians" = soldiers of the Seleucid successors of Alexander in Syria. In 5 Mc. it is applied to the Seleucid princes at Antioch, and to the Ptolemies at Alexandria.

Mach'-ba-nai [mak-] (L. fr. Heb. = what like my sons? Ges.; fat, thick one, Fû.), one of the lion-faced warriors of Gad who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chr. xii. 13).

Mach-ben'-ah (fr. Heb. = a cloak, mantle, Ges.; kno', lump, of localities, Fû.). Sheva, the father of Machbenah, is named in the genealogical list of Judah as the offspring of Maachah, the concubine of Caleb son of Hezron (1 Chr. ii. 49). Perhaps Machbenah was a town founded or colonized by the family of Maachah. To the position of the town we possess no clew.

Ma'chi (Heb. diminution, wasting away of the mother's strength, Sim.), father of Geuel the Gadite spy (Num. xiii. 15).

Ma'chir [-kir] (Heb. sold, Ges.). 1. Eldest son (Josh. xvii. 1) of the patriarch Manasseh by an Aramite or Syrian concubine (1 Chr. vii. 14, and the LXX. of Gen. xli. 20). His children are commemorated as having been caressed by Joseph before his death (Gen. i. 23). His wife was MAACHAH 6, a Benjamite, the "sister of Huppim and Shuppim" (1 Chr. vii. 15). His son GILEAD is repeatedly mentioned, and a daughter Abiah married Hezron, a chief of Judah (1 Chr. ii. 21, 24). At the time of the conquest the family of Machir had become very powerful, and a large part of the country on the E. of Jordan was subdued by them (Num. xxxii. 39; Deut. iii. 15). So great was their power that the name of Machir occasionally superseded that of Manasseh (Josh. xiii. 31; Judg. v. 14).—2. Son of Ammiel; a powerful chief of one of the Transjordanic tribes, but whether of Manasseh—the tribe of his namesake—or of Gad, must remain uncertain till we know where Lodebar, to which place he belonged, was situated. He rendered essential service to the cause of Saul (ΜΕΓΙΣΤΟΝΕΤΗ) and of David successively—in each case when they were in difficulty (2 Sam. ix. 4, 5, xvii. 27-29).

Ma'ch'-mas (Gr.) = MICHMASH (1 Mc. ix. 73).

Ma'ch-na'd-e'-bai (Heb. what like the liberal? Ges.; gift of the noble one, Fû.), one of the sons of Bani who put away his foreign wife (Ezr. x. 40, margin "Mabnadebai" in some copies).

Ma'ch-pe'-lah (Heb. portion, part, lot, Ges.; a winding, spiral form, Fû.; double sc. cave or field, Targums, LXX., Vulg., &c.), the spot containing the wooded field, in the end of which was the cave which ABRAHAM purchased from the sons of Heth, and which became the burial-place of Sarah, Abraham himself, Isaac, Rebekah, Leah, and Jacob. Its position is—with one exception—uniformly specified as “facing [A. V. ‘before’] Mamre” (Gen. xliii. 17, 19, xxv. 8, xlix. 30, l. 13). There are few, if any, of the ancient sites of Palestine of whose genuineness we can feel more assured than Machpelah.

The traditional spot at HEBRON has every thing in its favor as far as position goes; while the wall which encloses the Haram, or sacred precinct in which the sepulchres themselves are reported, and probably with truth, still to lie, is a monument certainly equal, and probably superior in age to any thing remaining in Palestine (so Mr. Grove). It is a quadrangular building of about 200 feet in length by 115 feet in width, its dark-gray walls rising fifty or sixty in height, without window or opening of any description, except two small entrances at the S. E. and S. W. corners. It is surrounded by a colonnade of forty-eight square pilasters. It stands nearly on the crest of the hill which forms the eastern side of the valley on the slopes and bottom of which the town is strewn. The ancient Jewish tradition ascribes its erection to David. The spot is one of the most sacred of Moslem sanctuaries, and since the occupation of Palestine by them has been entirely closed to Christians, and partially so to Jews. But in 1862 the Prince of Wales and his party were allowed to visit the interior, and Stanley (Lectures on the Jewish Church, App. ii. to Part i.) has given a description of it, the main points in which are here presented. After reaching “the S. E. corner of the massive wall of enclosure,” beyond which travellers had not been allowed to go, and then mounting “the steep flight of the exterior staircase, which by its long ascent showed that the platform of the mosque was on the uppermost slope of the hill, and therefore above the level where, if anywhere, the sacred cave would be found, a sharp turn at once brought us within the precincts and revealed to us for the first time the wall from the inside. We passed at once through an open court into the mosque.” This he regards as “originally a Byzantine church, converted at a much later period into a mosque. The tombs of the patriarchs do not profess to be the actual places of sepulture, but are merely monuments or cenotaphs in honor of the dead who lie beneath. Each is enclosed within a separate chapel or shrine, closed with gates or railings similar to those which surround or enclose the special chapels or royal tombs in Westminster Abbey. The two first of these shrines or chapels are contained in the inner portico or narthex, before the entrance into the actual building of the mosque. In the recess on the right is the shrine of Abraham, in the recess on the left that of Sarah, each guarded by silver gates. The shrine of Sarah we were requested not to enter as being that of a woman. A pall lay over it. The shrine of Abraham, after a momentary hesitation, was thrown open. The chamber is cased in marble. The so-called tomb consists of a coffin-like structure, about six feet high, built up of plastered stone or marble, and hung with three carpets—green embroidered with gold. Within the area of the mosque were shown the tombs of Isaac and Rebekah. They are placed under separate chapels, in the walls of which are windows, and of which the gates are grated, not with silver, but iron bars. The shrines of Jacob and Leah were shown in recesses, corresponding to those of Abraham and Sarah, but in a separate cloister, opposite the entrance of the mosque. In the interior of the mosque, at the corner of the shrine of Abraham, was a small circular hole, about eight inches across, of which one foot above the pavement was built of strong masonry, but of which the lower part, as far as we could see and feel, was of the living rock. This cavity appeared to open into a dark space beneath, and that space (which the guardians of the mosque believed to extend under the whole platform) can hardly be any thing else than the ancient cave of Machpelah. This was the only aperture which the guardians recognized." The party were led to believe that "the original entrance to the cave must be on the S. face of the hill, between the mosque and the gallery containing the shrine of Joseph, and entirely obstructed by the ancient Jewish wall." M. Pierotti, who as engineer to the Pasha of Jerusalem had an opportunity of examining the building before the visit described above, says: "The true entrance to the patriarchs' tomb is to be seen close to the western wall of the enclosure, and near the N. W. corner: it is guarded by a very thick iron railing, and I was not allowed to go near it. I observed that the Mussulmans themselves did not go very near it. In the court opposite the entrance gate of the mosque there is an opening, through which I was allowed to go down for three steps, and I was able to ascertain by sight and touch that the rock exists there, and to conclude it to be about five feet thick. From the short observations I could make during my brief descent, as also from the consideration of the eastern wall of the mosque, and the little information I extracted from the chief santon" (= sain', or Mohammedan priest), "who jealously guards the sanctuary, I consider that a part of the grotto exists under the mosque, and that the other part is under the court, but at a lower level than that lying under the mosque" (London Times of April 30, 1862, quoted in Fairbairn).

Meron (fr. Gr. = a long head, L. & S.), surname of Ptolemaeus, or Ptolemee, the son of Dorymenes (1 Mc. iii. 38), and governor of Cyprus under Ptolemy Philometer (2 Mc. x. 12).

* Mad. MADNESS.

Madai, or Mad'a-i (Heb., perhaps mid, middle, implying that Media is in the middle of Asia, or rather of the world, Ges.), which occurs in Gen. x. 2, among the sons of Japheth, has been commonly regarded as a personal appellation; and most commentators call Madai the third son of Japheth, and the progenitor of the Medes. But Rawlinson considers "Madai" in Gen. x. as representing, not a person, but a family or race descended from Japheth, viz. the Medes.

Ma-di'a-bun (fr. Gr.). The sons of Madiabun, according to 1 Esd. v. 58 (not in Ezr. iii. 9), were among the Levites who superintended the restoration of the Temple under Zerobabel.

Ma'di-an (Gr.) = MIDIAN (Jd. ii. 26; Acts vii. 29).

* Mad'man. MADNESS.

Mad-man'nah (Heb. dunghill, Ges.), one of the towns in the S. district of Judah (Josh. xv. 31), apparently = BETH-MARCBOTH. To Eusebius and Jerome it appears to have been well known. It was called in their time Menois, and was not far from Gaza. About fifteen miles S. S. W. from Gaza is now d-Minydu, which is suggested by Kiepert, and adopted by Wilton and by Porter (in Kitto), as the modern representative of Menois, and therefore of Madmannah. In 1 Chr. ii. 49 Shaph, son of Caleb's concubine Maachah, is called "the father," i. e. founder of Madmannah.

Mad'men (Heb. dunghill, Ges.), a place in Moab, threatened with destruction in Jer. xlviii. 2, but not elsewhere named, and of which nothing is yet known. MADMENAH 2.

Mad-me'nah (Heb. dunghill, Ges.). 1. One of the Benjamite villages N. of Jerusalem, the inhabitants of which were frightened away by the approach of Sennascherib along the northern road (Is. x. 31).—2. In Is. xxv. 10, margin, "Mudmenah" may = No. 1, or more appropriately MADMEN, the Moabite town. The A. V. text is "dunghill."

Mad'mess. The Hebrew words rendered in the A. V. "mad," "madman," "madness," &c., vary considerably. In Deut. xxviii. 28, 34; 1 Sam. xxi. 14, 15, &c., they are derivatives of the root ahdga' (= to be stirred or excited): in 1 Sam. xxi. 13; Jer. xxv. 16, l. 38, li. 7; Eccl. i. 17, &c., from the root hâlal (= to flash out as light or sound); in Prov. xxvi. 18 from the root lahah (= to have burning thirst). In the N. T. the Greek words generally used are mainomai or mania (Jn. x. 20; Acts xli. 15, xxvi. 24, 25; 1 Cor. xiv. 23); but in 2 Pet. ii. 16 the Greek is paraphronia, and in Lk. vi. 11 anoia. These passages show (so Mr. Barry) that in Scripture "madness" is recognized as a derangement, proceeding either from weakness and misdirection of intellect, or from ungovernable violence of passion; and in both cases it is spoken of, sometimes as arising from the will and action of man himself, sometimes as inflicted judicially by the hand of God. In one passage alone (Jn. x. 20) is madness expressly connected with demoniacal possession (DEMONIACS) by the Jews in their cavil against our Lord; in none is it referred to any physical causes. Among Oriental, as among most semi-civilized nations, madmen were looked upon with a kind of reverence, as possessed of a quasi-sacred character. (LUNATICS.)

Ma'don (Heb. contention, strife, Ges.), one of the principal cities of Canaan before the conquest, probably in the north. Its king joined Jabin and his confederates in their attempt against Joshua at the waters of Merom, and like the rest was killed (Josh. xi. 1, xii. 19). Schwarz, on very slight grounds, proposes to discover Madon at Kefr Menda, a village with extensive ancient remains, at the western end of the Plain of Buttauf, four or five miles N. of Sepphoris.

Ma'e-lus (fr. Gr.) = MIAMIN 1 (1 Esd. ix. 26).

Mag'blsh (Heb. a gathering, Ges.; fortress, Fū.), a proper name in Ezr. ii. 30, of a man or of a place; it is probably the latter, as all the names from Ezr. ii. 20 to 34, except Elam and Harim, are names of places. From the position of Magblsh in the list, it would seem to be in the tribe of Benjamin. (MAGPIASH).

Mag'da-la (Gr. fr. Heb. = lower = MIDDOL), a name found in the received Greek text and the A. V. of Mat. xv. 39 only, where Tischendorf, Lachmann, and Alford, with the Vatican, Sinaitic, and Beza's MSS., the Syriac version, &c., have "Magadan." Lange prefers "Magdalan," the reading of the Ephrem MS., Coptic version, &c., but a good many MSS. support the A. V. Into the limits of Magadan Christ came by boat, over the Lake of Gennesaret, after feeding the four thousand on the mountain of the eastern side (Mat. xv. 39); and from thence, after a short encounter with the Pharisees and Sadducees, He returned in the same boat to the opposite shore. In the parallel narrative of Mk. viii. 10 we find the "parts of DALMANUTHA." The Magdala which conferred her name on MARY MAGDALENE was probably (so Prof. Hackett, with Robinson, Wilson, Porter [in Kitto], &c.) the place of that name mentioned in the Jerusalem Talmud as near Tiberias, and this again is probably the modern d-Mejdel, a miserable little Moslem village, where ruins of a watch-tower appear to remain, lying on the water's edge at the S. E. corner of the

* Mag-da-le-ne [often pronounced in three syllables, Mag-da-lene; compare the English Magdalen, derived from it] (Gr.) = one from MAGDALA (Mk. xvi. 9). MARY MAGDALENE.

Mag-di-el (Heb. praise of God, Ges.), a "DUKE" of Edom, descended from Esau (Gen. xxxvi. 43; 1 Chr. i. 54). The name does not yet appear to have been met with, as borne by either tribe or place.

Ma'ged = MAKED (1 Mc. v. 36).

Magi [-ji] (L. pl. of magus; Gr. magos, pl. magoi; Heb. mag; see below), A. V. "wise men" (Mat. ii.). It does not fall within the scope of this article (originally by Prof. Plumptre) to enter fully into the history of the Magi as an order, and of the relation in which they stood to the religion of Zoroaster. What has to be said will be best arranged under the four following heads:—I. The position occupied by the magi in the history of the O. T.—II. The transition-stages in the history of the word and of the order between the close of the O. T. and the time of the N. T., so far as they affect the latter.—III. The Magi as they appear in the N. T.—IV. The later traditions which have gathered round the Magi of Mat. ii.—I. In the Hebrew text of the O. T. the word occurs but twice, and then only incidentally. In Jer. xxxix. 3 and 18 we meet among the Chaldean officers sent by Nebuchadnezzar to Jerusalem one with the name or title of Rab-mag. This word is interpreted as equivalent to chief of the Magi. Historically the Magi are conspicuous chiefly as a Persian religious caste. Herodotus connects them with another people by reckoning them among the six tribes of the Medes (i. 101). They appear in his history of Astyages as interpreters of dreams (i. 120), the name having apparently lost its ethnological, and acquired a caste significance. But in Jeremiah they appear at a still earlier period among the retinue of the Chaldean king. The very word Rab-mag (if the received etymology of Magi be correct) presents a hybrid formation. The first syllable is unquestionably Shemitic, the last is all but unquestionably Aryan. The problem thus presented admits of two solutions:—(1.) If we believe the CHALDEANS to have been a Hamitic people, closely connected with the Babylonians, we must then suppose that the colossal schemes of greatness which showed themselves in Nebuchadnezzar's conquests led him to gather round him the wise men and religious teachers of the nations which he subdued, and that thus the sacred tribe of the Medes rose under his rule to favor and power. (2.) If, on the other hand, with Rénan, we look on the Chaldeans as themselves belonging to the Aryan family, there is even less difficulty in explaining the presence among the one people of the religious teachers of the other. The Magi took their places among "the astrologers and star-gazers and monthly prognosticators." (MAGIC.) It is with such men that we have to think of Daniel and his fellow-exiles as associated. They are described as "ten times wiser than all the magicians and astrologers" (Dan. i. 20). The office which Daniel accepted (v. 11) was probably identical with that of the Rab-mag who first came before us. The name of the Magi does not meet us in the Biblical account of the Medo-Persian kings. If, however, we identify the ARTAXERXES who stops the building of the Temple (Ezr. iv. 17-22) with the Pseudo-Smerdis of Herodotus and the Gomates of the Behistun inscription, we may see here also another point of contact. The Magian attempt to reassert Median supremacy, and with it probably a corrupted Chaldaic form of Magianism, in place of the purer faith in Ormuzd (the good demon) of which Cyrus had been the propagator, would naturally be accompanied by antagonism to the people whom the Persians had protected and supported. The immediate renewal of the suspended work on the triumph of Darius (iv. 24, v. 1, 2, vi. 7, 8) falls in, it need hardly be added, with this hypothesis. Under Xerxes, the Magi occupy a position which indicates that they had recovered from their temporary depression. No great change is traceable in their position during the decline of the Persian monarchy. (PERSIANS.) As an order they perpetuated themselves under the Parthian kings. The name rose to fresh honor under the Sassanids.—II. In the mean time the word was acquiring a new and wider signification. It presented itself to the Greeks as connected with a foreign system of divination, and the religion of a foe whom they had conquered, and it soon became a by-word for the worst form of imposture. The rapid growth of this feeling is traceable perhaps in the meanings attached to the word by the two great tragedians. In Æschylus (Persæ, 291) it retains its old significance as denoting simply a tribe. In Sophocles (Ed. Tyr. 387) it appears among the epithets of reproach which the king heaps upon Teiresias. At one time the good, and at another the bad side of the word is uppermost. Both meanings appear in the later lexicographers. The word thus passed into the hands of the LXX., and from them into those of the writers of the N. T., oscillating between the two meanings, capable of being used in either. The relations which had existed between the Jews and Persians would perhaps tend to give a prominence to the more favorable associations in their use of it. In Dan. i. 20, ii. 2, 10, 27, v. 11, it is used, as has been noticed, for the priestly diviners with whom the prophet was associated. There were, however, other influences at work tending to drag it down. The swarms of impostors that were to be met with in every part of the Roman empire, known as Chaldei (= Chaldeans, i. e. soothsayers), Mathematici (= mathematicians, i. e. astrologers), and the like, bore this name also.—III. We need not wonder, accordingly, to find that this is the predominant meaning of the word in the N. T. The noun and the verb derived from it (magica, A. V. "sorcery"; magus, A. V. "to use sorcery") are used in describing the impostor, who is therefore known distinctively as Simon Magus (Acts viii. 9, 11). Another of the same class (Bar-jesus) is described (xiii. 8) as having, in his cognomen Elymas, a title = Magus. In one memorable instance, however, the word retains (probably, at least) its better meaning. In the Gospel of St. Matthew, written (according to the general belief of early Christian writers) for the Hebrew Christians of Palestine, we find it (Mat. ii. 1, 7, 16, A. V. "wise men"), not as embodying the contempt which the frauds of impostors had brought upon it through the whole Roman empire, but in the sense which it had had, of old, as associated with a religion which they respected, and an order of which one of their own prophets had been the head. The vagueness of the description leaves their country undefined, and implies that probably the evangelist himself had no certain information. We cannot wonder that there should have been very varying interpretations given of words that allowed so wide a field for conjecture. Some of these are, for various reasons, worth noticing. (1.) The feeling of some early writers that the coming of the "wise men" was the fulfilment of the prophecy which spoke of the gifts of the men of Sheba and Seba (Ps. lxxii. 10, 15; compare Is. lx. 6) led them to fix on Arabia as the country of the Magi (Justin Martyr, Tertullian, Baronius, Grotius, Lightfoot, &c.). (2.) Others have conjectured Mesopotamia as the great seat of Chaldean astrology (Origen), or Egypt as the country in which magic was most prevalent (Meyer). (3.) The historical associations of the word led others again, with greater probability, to fix on Persia (Chrysostom, Theophylact, Calvin, Olshausen), while Hyde suggests Parthia. It is perhaps a legitimate inference from Mat. ii. that in these Magi we may recognize, as the Church has done from a very early period, the first Gentile worshippers of the Christ. The narrative supplies us with an outline which we may legitimately endeavor to fill up, as far as our knowledge enables us, with inference and illustration. Some time after the birth of Jesus (Jesus Christ) there appeared among the strangers who visited Jerusalem these men from the far East. They were not idolaters. Their form of worship was looked upon by the Jews with greater tolerance and sympathy than that of any other Gentiles (compare Wis. xiii. 6, 7). Whatever may have been their country, their name indicates that they would be watchers of the stars, seeking to read in them the destinies of nations. They say that they have seen a star in which they recognize such a prognostic. They are sure that one is born King of the Jews, and they come to pay their homage. It may have been simply that the quarter of the heavens in which the star appeared indicated the direction of Judea. It may have been that some form of the prophecy of Balaam, that a "star should rise out of Jacob" (Num. xxiv. 17) had reached them, either through the Jews of the Dispersion, or through traditions running parallel with the O. T., and that this led them to recognize its fulfilment. It may have been, lastly, that the traditional predictions ascribed to their own prophet Zoroaster, led them to expect a succession of three deliverers, two working as prophets to reform the world and raise up a kingdom; the third (Zosiosh), the greatest of the three, coming to be the head of the kingdom, to conquer Ahri-man (the evil demon) and to raise the dead. It is not unlikely that they appeared as the representatives of many others who shared the same feeling. They came, at any rate, to pay their homage to the king whose birth was thus indicated (compare Gen. xliii. 11; Ps. lxxii. 15; 1 K. x. 2, 10; 2 Chr. ix. 24; Cant. iii. 6, iv. 14). The arrival of such a company, bound on so strange an errand, in the last years of the tyrannous and distrustful Herod, could hardly fail to attract notice and excite a people, among whom Messianic expectations had already begun to show themselves (Lk. ii. 25, 38). The Sanhedrin was convened, and the question where the Messiah was to be born was formally placed before them. The answer given, based upon the traditional interpretation of Mic. v. 2, that Bethlehem was to be the birthplace of the Christ, determined the king's plans. He had found out the locality. It remained to determine the time: with what was probably a real belief in astrology, he inquired of them diligently, when they had first seen the star. If he assumed that that was contemporaneous with the birth, he could not be far wrong. The Magi accordingly are sent on to Bethlehem, as if they were but the forerunners of the king's own homage. As they journeyed, they again saw the star, which, for a time, it would seem, they had lost sight of, and it guided them on their way. (STAR OF THE WISE MEN.) The pressure of the crowds, which a fortnight, or four months, or well-nigh two years before, had driven Mary and Joseph to the rude stable of the caravanserai of Bethlehem, had apparently abated, and the Magi entering "the house" (Mat. ii. 11) fell down and paid their homage and offered their gifts. Once more they receive guidance through the channel which their work and their studies had made familiar to them. From first to last, in Media, in Babylon, in Persia, the Magi had been famous as the interpreters of dreams. That which they received now need not have involved a disclosure of the plans of Herod to them. It was enough that it directed them to "return to their own country another way." With this their history, so far as the N. T. carries us, comes to an end. It need hardly be said that this part of the Gospel narrative has had to bear the brunt of the attacks of a hostile criticism. The omission of all mention of the Magi in a Gospel which enters so fully into all the circumstances of the infancy of Christ as that of Luke, and the difficulty of harmonizing this incident with those which he narrates, have been urged as at least throwing suspicion on what Matthew alone has recorded. So far as we cannot explain it, our ignorance of all, or nearly all, the circumstances of the composition of the GOSPELS is a sufficient answer. It is, however, at least possible that St. Luke, knowing that the facts related by St. Matthew were already current among the churches, sought rather to add what was not yet recorded. Something too may have been due to the leading thoughts of the two Gospels. (LUKE, GOSPEL OF; MATTHEW, GOSPEL OF).—IV. In this instance, as in others, what is told by the Gospel-writers in plain simple words, has become the nucleus for a whole cycle of legends. A Christian mythology has overshadowed that which itself had nothing in common with it. (1.) The Magi are no longer thought of as simply "wise men," members of a sacred order. The prophecies of Ps. lxxii.; Is. xlix. 7, 23, lx. 16, must be fulfilled in them, and they become princes, or kings. (2.) The number of the Wise Men, which Matthew leaves altogether undefined, was arbitrarily fixed. They were three. (3.) Symbolic meanings were found for each of the three gifts. The gold they offered as to a king. With the myrrh they prefigured the bitterness of the Passion, the embalmment for the burial. With the frankincense they adored the divinity of the Son of God. (4.) Later on, the names are added, and Gaspar, Melchior, and Balthazar, take their place among the objects of Christian reverence, and are honored as the patron saints of travellers. In the Eastern Church, where, it would seem, there was less desire to find symbolic meanings than to magnify the circumstances of the history, the traditions assume a different character. The Magi arrive at Jerusalem with a retinue of 1,000 men, having left behind them, on the further bank of the Euphrates, an army of 7,000. They have been led to undertake their journey by a prophecy of Zoroaster, &c. Among other relics supplied to meet the demands of the market which the devotion of Helena had created, the bodies of the Magi are discovered somewhere in the East, are brought to Constantinople, and placed in the great church which, as the Mosque of St. Sophia, still bears in its name the witness of its original dedication to the Divine Wisdom. The favor with which the people of Milan received the emperor's prefect Eustorgius called for some special mark of favor, and on his consecration as bishop of that city, he obtained for it the privilege of being the resting-place of the precious relics. When Milan fell into the hands of Frederick Barbarossa (A. D. 1162), the influence of the Archbishop of Cologne prevailed on the emperor to transfer them to that city. In that proud cathedral which is the glory of Teutonic art the shrine of the Three Kings has for six centuries been shown as the greatest of its many treasures.

Mag'le [maj-], Ma-g'i'clans [ma-jish'anz] (both fr. L.; see Ma'ci). The magical arts spoken of in the Bible are those practised by the Egyptians, the Canaanites, and their neighbors, the Hebrews, the Chaldeans, and probably the Greeks. With the lowest race magic is the chief part of religion. The Nigritians, or blacks of this race, show this in their extreme use of amulets and their worship of objects which have no other value in their eyes but as having a supposed magical character through the influence of supernatural agents. With the Turanians, or corresponding whites of the same great family—we use the word white (so Mr. R. S. Poole, the original author of this article) for a group of nations mainly yellow, in contradistinction to black—incantations and witchcraft occupy the same place, shamanism characterizing their tribes in both hemispheres. The ancient Egyptians show their partly-Nigritian origin not alone in their physical characteristics and language but in their religion. With the Shemites magic takes a lower place. Nowhere is it even part of religion; yet it is looked upon as a powerful engine, and generally unlawful or lawful according to the aid invoked. Among many of the Shemite peoples there linger the remnants of a primitive fetichism. Sacred trees and stones are revered from an old superstition, of which they do not always know the meaning, derived from the nations whose place they have taken. Thus fetichism remains, although in a kind of fossil state. The importance of astrology with the Shemites has tended to raise the character of their magic, which deals rather with the discovery of supposed existing influences than with the production of new influences. The only direct association of magic with religion is where the priests, as the educated class, have taken the functions of magicians; but this is far different from the case of the Nigritians, where the magicians are the only priests. The Iranians (Tongres, Confusion or) assign to magic a still less important position. It can scarcely be traced in the relics of old-nature-worship, which they with greater skill than the Egyptians interwove with their more intellectual beliefs. Magic always maintained some hold on men's minds; but the stronger intellects despised it. The Hebrews had no magic of their own. It was so strictly forbidden by the Law that it could never afterward have had any recognized existence, save in times of general heresy or apostasy, and the same was doubtless the case in the patriarchal ages. The magical practices which obtained among the Hebrews were therefore borrowed from the nations around. The hold they gained was such as we should have expected with a Shemite race, making allowance for the discredit thrown upon them by the prohibitions of the Law. From the first entrance into the Land of Promise until the destruction of Jerusalem we have constant glimpses of magic practised in secret, or resorted to, not alone by the common but also by the great. The Talmud abounds in notices of contemporary magic among the Jews, showing that it survived idolatry notwithstanding their original connection, and was supposed to produce real effects. The Koran in like manner treats charms and incantations as capable of producing evil consequences when used against a man. It is a distinctive characteristic of the Bible that from first to last it warrants no such trust or dread.—In examining the mentions of magic in the Bible, we must keep in view the curious inquiry whether there be any reality in the art. We would at the outset protest against the idea, once very prevalent, that the conviction that the seen and unseen worlds were often more manifestly in contact in the Biblical ages than now necessitates a belief in the reality of the magic spoken of in the Scriptures. The theft and carrying away of Laban's TERAPHIM by Rachel seems to indicate the practice of magic in Padan-aram at this early time. It appears that Laban attached great value to these objects, from what he said as to the theft and his determined search for them (Gen. xxxi. 19, 30, 32-35). The most important point is that Laban calls them his "gods" (30, 32), although he was not without belief in the true God (24, 49-58); for this makes it almost certain that we have here not an indication of the worship of strange gods, but the first notice of a superstition that afterward obtained among those Israelites who added corrupt practices to the true religion. There is no description of these images; but from the account of Michal's stratagem to deceive Saul's messengers, it is evident, if only one image be there meant, as is very probable, that they were at least sometimes of the size of a man, and perhaps in the head and shoulders, if not lower, of human shape, or of a similar form (1 Sam. xix. 18-16). The worship or use of teraphim after the occupation of the Promised Land cannot be doubted to have been one of the corrupt practices of those Hebrews who leaned to idolatry, but did not abandon their belief in the God of Israel. The account of Michal's images in Judg. xvii., xviii., compared with Hos. iii. 4, 5, shows our conclusion to be correct. We pass to the magical use of teraphim. By the Israelites they were consulted for oracular answers. This was apparently done by the Danites who asked Micah's Levite to inquire as to the success of their spying expedition (Judg. xviii. 6, 7). In later times this is distinctly stated of the Israelites: "For the teraphim have spoken vanity, and the diviners have seen a lie, and have told false dreams" (Zech. x. 2). It cannot be supposed that, as this first positive mention of the use of teraphim for divination by the Israelites is after the return from Babylon, and as that use obtained with the Babylonians in the time of Nebuchadnezzar, therefore the Israelites borrowed it from their conquerors; for these objects are mentioned in earlier places in such a manner that their connection with divination must be intended, if we bear in mind that this connection is undoubted in a subsequent period (compare 1 Sam. xv. 22, 23; 2 K. xxiii. 24). The only account of the act of divining by teraphim is in a remarkable passage relating to Nebuchadnezzar's advance against Jerusalem: "Also thou son of man, appoint thee two ways, that the sword of the king of Babylon may come: both twain (two swords) shall come forth out of one land: and choose thou a place, choose (it) at the head of the way to the city. Appoint a way, that the sword may come to Rabbath of the Ammonites, and to Judah in Jerusalem the defended. For the king of Babylon stood at the parting of the way, at the head of the two ways, to use divination: he shuffled arrows, he consulted with teraphim, he looked in the liver. (DIVINATION 10, 13, 14.) At his right hand was the divination for Jerusalem" (Ex. xxi. 19-22). Before speaking of the notices of the Egyptian magicians in Genesis and Exodus, there is one passage that may be examined out of the regular order. Joseph, when his brethren left after their second visit to buy corn, ordered his steward to hide his silver cup in Benjamin's sack, and afterward sent him after them, ordering him to claim it, thus: "(Is) not this (it) in which my lord drinketh, and whereby indeed he divineth?" (Gen. xli. 5). Two uses of cups or the like for magical purposes have obtained in the East from ancient times. In one use either the cup itself bears engraved inscriptions, supposed to have a magical influence, or it is plain and such inscriptions are written on its inner surface in ink. In both cases water poured into the cup is drunk by those wishing to derive benefit, as, e. g. the cure of diseases, from the inscriptions, which, if written, are dissolved. This use, in both its forms, obtains among the Arabs in the present day. In the other use the cup or bowl was of very secondary importance. It was merely the receptacle for water, in which, after the performance of magical rites, a boy looked to see what the magician desired. This is the practice of the modern Egyptian magicians, where the difference that ink is employed and is poured into the palm of the boy's hand is merely accidental. As this latter use only is of the nature of divination, it is probable that to it Joseph referred. (DIVINATION 12.) The magicians of Egypt are spoken of as a class in the histories of JOSEPH and MOSES. When Pharaoh's officers were troubled by their dreams, being in prison they were at a loss for an interpreter. Before Joseph explained the dreams he disclaimed the power of interpreting save by the divine aid, saying "(Do) not interpretations (belong) to God? tell me (them), I pray you" (Gen. xl. 8). In like manner when Pharaoh had his two dreams we find that he had recourse to those who professed to interpret dreams. Joseph, being sent for on the report of the chief of the cupbearers, was told by Pharaoh that he had heard that he could interpret a dream. From the expectations of the Egyptians and Joseph's disavowals, we see that the interpretation of dreams was a branch of the knowledge to which the ancient Egyptian magicians pretended. We again hear of the magicians of Egypt in the narrative of the events before the Exodus. They were summoned by Pharaoh to oppose Moses. The account of what they effected requires to be carefully examined, from its bearing on the question whether magic be an imposture. We read: "And the Lord spake unto Moses and unto Aaron, saying, When Pharaoh shall speak unto you, saying, Show a miracle for you: then thou shalt say unto Aaron, Take thy rod, and cast (it) before Pharaoh, (and) it shall become a serpent." It is then related that Aaron did thus, and afterward: "Then Pharaoh also called the wise men and the enchanters (A. V. "sorcerers"): now they, the scribes (A. V. "magicians") of Egypt, did so by their secret arts (A. V. "ENCHANTMENTS"): for they cast down every man his rod, and they became serpents, but Aaron's rod swallowed up their rods" (Ex. vii.

8-12). The rods were probably long staves like those represented on the Egyptian monuments, not much less than the height of a man. If the Heb. word tannin used mean here a "serpent," the Egyptian magicians may have feigned a change: if it signify a crocodile they could scarcely have done so. (DRAGON 2.) The names by which the magicians are designated are to be noted. (DIVINATION 2, 8.) That which we render "scribes" seems here to have a general signification = wise men and enchanters. The last term is more definite = users of incantations. On the occasion of the first plague, the turning the rivers and waters of Egypt into blood, the opposition of the magicians again occurs. "And the scribes of Egypt did so by their secret arts" (vii. 22). When the second plague, that of frogs, was sent, the magicians again made the same opposition (viii. 7). The plague of lice came, and when Aaron had worked the wonder the magicians opposed him: "And the scribes did so by their secret arts to bring forth the lice, but they could not: so there were lice upon man and upon beast. And the scribes said unto Pharaoh, This (is) the finger of God: but Pharaoh's heart was hardened, and he hearkened not unto them, as the Lord had said" (viii. 18, 19, Heb. 14, 15). After this we hear no more of the magicians. (JANNES AND JAMBRES; PLAGUES, THE TEN.) All we can gather from the narrative is that the appearances produced by them were sufficient to deceive Pharaoh on three occasions. We turn to the Egyptian illustrations of this part of the subject. Magic, as we have before remarked, was inherent in the ancient Egyptian religion. The Ritual is a system of incantations and directions for making amulets, with the object of securing the future happiness of the disembodied soul. However obscure the belief of the Egyptians as to the actual character of the state of the soul after death may be to us, it cannot be doubted that the knowledge and use of the magical amulets and incantations treated of in the Ritual was held to be necessary for future happiness, although it was not believed that they alone could insure it, since to have done good works, or, more strictly, not to have committed certain sins, was an essential condition of the acquittal of the soul in the great trial in Hades. Besides the Ritual the ancient Egyptians had books of a purely magical character. The main source of their belief in the efficacy of magic appears to have been the idea that the souls of the dead, whether justified or condemned, had the power of revisiting the earth and taking various forms. Bearing in mind the Nigritian nature of Egyptian magic, we may look for the source of these ideas in primitive Africa. Like all nations who have practised magic generally, the Egyptians separated it into a lawful kind and an unlawful. A belief in unlucky and lucky days, in actions to be avoided or done on certain days, and in the fortune attending birth on certain days, was extremely strong. Astrology was also held in high honor. The belief in omens probably did not take an important place in Egyptian magic, if we may judge from the absence of direct mention of them. The superstition as to "the evil eye" appears to have been known, but there is nothing else that we can class with phenomena of the nature of animal magnetism. Two classes of learned men had the charge of the magical books: one of these, the name of which has not been read phonetically, would seem = the scribes, as Mr. Poole translates the word, spoken of in the history of Joseph; whereas the other has the general sense of "wise men," like the other class here mentioned. The Law contains very distinct prohibitions of all magical arts. Besides several passages condemning them, one specification is so full that it seems evident that its object is to include every kind of magical art. The Israelites are commanded in this passage not to learn the abominations of the peoples of the Promised Land. Then follows this prohibition: "There shall not be found with thee one who offereth his son or his daughter by fire, a practiser of divinations (Heb. kôsem kîsdmim), a worker of hidden arts (mê'ônén), an augurer (mênahêsh or mênachêsh), an enchanter (mêcaahshêph), or a fabricator of charms (hôbêr hâber or chôbêr châber), or an inquirer by a familiar spirit (shôel ôb), or a wizard (yiddê'ônî) (for the preceding terms, see DIVINATION, 6, 7, 8, 9, 5, 4), or a consulter of the dead (dôrêsh el-hammêlîm, A. V. "necromancer;" see below). It is added that these are abominations, and that on account of their practice the nations of Canaan were to be driven out (Deut. xviii. 9-14, especially 10, 11). It is remarkable that the offering of children should be mentioned in connection with magical arts. The last Hebrew term, dôrêsh el-hammêlîm, is very explicit, meaning a consulter of the dead: "necromancer" is an exact translation, if the original signification of the latter is retained, instead of the more general one it now usually bears. The history of BALAAM shows the belief of some ancient nations in the powers of soothsayers. When the Israelites had begun to conquer the Land of Promise, Balak, the king of Moab, and the elders of Midian, resorting to Pharaoh's expedient, sent by messengers with "the rewards of divination in their hands" (Num. xxii. 7) for Balaam the diviner (Josh. xiii. 22, A. V. "soothsayer;" see DIVINATION 6), whose fame was known to them though he dwelt in Aram. Balak's message shows what he believed Balaam's powers to be (Num. xxii. 5, 6). We are told, however, that Balaam, warned of God, first said that he could not speak of himself, and then by inspiration blessed those whom he had been sent for to curse. He appears to have received inspiration in a vision or a trance. From xxiv. 1 it would seem that it was his wont to use enchantments (DIVINATION 8), and that when on other occasions he went away after the sacrifices had been offered, he hoped that he could prevail to obtain the wish of those who had sent for him, but was constantly defeated. The building new altars of the mystic number of seven, and the offering of seven oxen and seven rams, seem to show that Balaam had some such idea. The account of Saul's consulting the witch of Endor (1 Sam. xxviii. 3-20) is the foremost place in Scripture of those which refer to magic. The supernatural terror of which it is full cannot, however, be proved to be due to this art, for it has always been held by sober critics that the appearing of SAMUEL was permitted for the purpose of declaring the doom of SAUL, and not that it was caused by the incantations of a sorceress. We can see no reason whatever for supposing that the narrative is an interpolation. There is a simplicity in the manners described that is foreign to a later time. The circumstances are agreeable with the rest of the history, and especially with all we know of Saul's character. Here, as ever, he is seen resolved to gain his ends without caring what wrong he does: he wishes to consult a prophet, and asks a witch to call up his shade. Most of all the vigor of the narrative, showing us the scene in a few words, proves its antiquity and genuineness. From the beginning to the end of this strange history we have no warrant for attributing supernatural power to magicians. Viewed reasonably, it refers to the question of apparitions of the dead as to which other places in the Bible leave no doubt. The connection with magic seems purely accidental. The witch is no more than a bystander after the first: she sees Samuel, and that is all. The apparition may have been a terrible fulfilment of Saul's desire, but this does not prove that the measures he used were of any power. In the later days of the two kingdoms magical practices of many kinds prevailed among the Hebrews, as we especially learn from the condemnation of them by the prophets. Every form of idolatry which the people had adopted in succession doubtless brought with it its magic, which seems always to have remained with a strange tenacity that probably made it outlive the false worship with which it was connected. In the historical books of Scripture there is little notice of magic, excepting that wherever the false prophets are mentioned we have no doubt an indication of the prevalence of magical practices. But in the prophets we find several notices of the magic of the Hebrews in their times, and some of the magic of foreign nations. Isaiah says that the people had become "workers of hidden arts" (A. V. "soothsayers;" see DIVINATION 7) "like the Philistines," and apparently alludes in the same place to the practice of magic by the children of the East (ii. 6). In another place the prophet reproves the people for seeking "unto them that have familiar spirits, and unto the wizards that chirp, and that mutter" (viii. 19). (DIVINATION 5, 4.) The practices of one class of magicians are still more distinctly described (xxix. 8, 4). Isaiah alludes to the magic of the Egyptians when he says that in their calamity "they shall seek to the idols, and to the charmers" (Heb. pl. îlîm = mutterers, whisperers, i. e. necromancers, ventriloquists, imitating artificially the supposed voice of the shades or spirits of the dead, Ges.; literally veilings, concealings, hence necromancers, Fû.), "and to them that have familiar spirits, and to the wizards" (xix. 8). In xlvi. 12, 18, the magic of Babylon is characterized by the prominence given to astrology (A. V. "the astrologers" [margin "viewers of the heavens"], "the star-gazers, the monthly prognosticators" [margin "that give knowledge concerning the months"]), no magicians being mentioned excepting practisers of this art; unlike the case of the Egyptians, with whom astrology seems always to have held a lower place than with the Chaldean nation. (ASTROLOGY; CHALDEANS.) In both instances the folly of those who seek the aid of magic is shown. Micah, declaring the judgments coming for the crimes of his time, speaks of the prevalence of divination among prophets, who most probably were such pretended prophets as the opponents of Jeremiah, not avowed prophets of idols, as Ahab's seem to have been (iii. 8, 7, 11). These prophets seem to have practised unlawful arts, and yet to have expected revelations. Jeremiah was constantly opposed by false prophets, who pretended to speak in the name of the Lord, saying that they had dreamt, when they told false visions, and who practised various magical arts (xiv. 14, xxlii. 25-40, xxvii. 9, 10—where the several designations applied to those who counselled the people not to serve the king of Babylon may be used in contempt of the false prophets—xxix. 8, 9). Ezekiel affords some remarkable details of the magic of his time, in the clear and forcible descriptions of his visions. From him we learn that fetishism was among the idolatries which the Hebrews, in the latest days of the kingdom of Judah, had adopted from their neighbors, like the Romans in the age of general corruption that caused the decline of their empire (viii. 7-12). This IDOLATRY was probably borrowed from Egypt, for the description perfectly answers to that of the dark sanctuaries of Egyptian temples, with the sacred animals portrayed upon their walls, and does not accord with the character of the Assyrian sculptures, where creeping things are not represented as objects of worship. With this low form of idolatry an equally low kind of magic obtained, practised by prophetesses who for small rewards made AMULETS by which the people were deceived (xiii. 17-23). The passage must be allowed to be very difficult, but it can scarcely be doubted (so Mr. Poole) that amulets are referred to by the "pillows" and "kerchiefs" made and sold by these women, and perhaps also worn by them. (PILLOW 2.) If so, we have a practice analogous to that of the modern Egyptians, who hang amulets of the kind called hegib upon the right side, and of the Nubians, who hang them on the upper part of the arm. The notice of Nebuchadnezzar's divination by arrows, where it is said "he shuffled arrows" (xii. 21), must refer to a practice the same as or similar to the kind of divination by arrows called El-Meyzar, in use among the pagan Arabs, and forbidden in the Koran. (DIVINATION 10.) The references to magic in Daniel relate wholly to that of Babylon, and not so much to the art as to those who used it. DANIEL, when taken captive, was instructed in the learning of the Chaldeans and placed among the "wise men of Babylon" (ii. 18), i. e. the MAGI, for the term is used as including "magicians," "sorcerers," "enchanters" (A. V. "soothsayers"), "astrologers" (Heb. and Chal. ashshaph = one who practises hidden arts, an enchanter, magician, Gcs.), and "CHALDEANS," the last being apparently the most important class (ii. 2, 4, 5, 10, 12, 14, 18, 24, 27; compare i. 20). (DIVINATION 1, 2, 3.) As in other cases the true prophet was put to the test with the magicians, and he succeeded where they utterly failed. After the Captivity it is probable that the Jews gradually abandoned the practice of magic. Zephariah speaks indeed of the deceit of teraphim and diviners (x. 2), and foretells a time when the very names of idols should be forgotten and false prophets have virtually ceased (xiii. 1-4), yet in neither case does it seem certain that he is alluding to the usages of his own day. In the Apocrypha we find indications that in the later centuries preceding the Christian era magic was no longer practised by the educated Jews. In Wisdom the writer, speaking of the Egyptian magicians, treats their art as an imposture (Wis. xvii. 7). The book of Tobit (TOBIT, Book or) is an exceptional case. If we hold that it was written in Persia or a neighboring country, and, with Ewald, date its composition not long after the fall of the Persian empire, it is obvious that it relates to a different state of society from that of the Jews of Egypt and Palestine. If, however, it was written in Palestine about the time of the Maccabees, as others suppose, we must still recollect that it refers rather to the superstitions of the common people than to those of the learned. In the N. T. we read very little of magic. (MAGI.) Our Lord is not said to have been opposed by magicians, and the apostles and other early teachers of the Gospel seem to have rarely encountered them. Philip the deacon, when he preached at

Samaria, found there Simon a famous magician, commonly known as SIMON MAGUS, who had had great power over the people; but he is not said to have been able to work wonders, nor, had it been so, is it likely that he would have soon been admitted into the Church (Acts viii. 9-24). When St. Barnabas and St. Paul were at Paphos, as they preached to the proconsul Sergius Paulus, ELYMAS, a Jewish sorcerer and false prophet, withstood them, and was struck blind for a time at the word of St. Paul (xiii. 6-12). At Ephesus, certain Jewish exorcists signally failing, both Jews and Greeks were afraid, and abandoned their practice of magical arts (xix. 18, 19). (EPHESUS, § 3; EXORCIST.) We have besides the remarkable case of the "damsel having a spirit of divination which brought her masters much gain by foretelling," from whom St. Paul cast out the spirit of divination (xvi. 16-18). This is a matter belonging to another subject than that of magic. (DIVINATION 5; PYTHON.) Our examination of the various notices of magic in the Bible gives us this general result:—They do not, as far as we can understand, once state positively that any but illusive results were produced by magical rites. They therefore afford no evidence that man can gain supernatural powers to use at his will. This consequence goes some way toward showing that we may conclude that there is no such thing as real magic; for although it is dangerous to reason on negative evidence, yet in a case of this kind it is especially strong.—Magic has been divided into two classes, (1.) natural or scientific magic, which attributes its wonders to a deep practical acquaintance with the powers of nature; (2.) supernatural or spiritual, which ascribes them to celestial or infernal agency. The first requires a knowledge of the mode in which the powers of nature act, and then an ability to apply these powers to the production of extraordinary results. The second demands no intimate knowledge of nature, nor ordinarily any special moral or intellectual preparation, but relies for the production of its wonders entirely on the powers of spiritual beings, and claims for its works the character of MIRACLES (Rev. H. Christmas, in Fairbairn). Mr. Poole in his article treats especially of the second class. SATAN:

Ma-gid'do (fr. Gr.) = MEGIDDO (1 Esd. i. 29 only).

* Mag'-is-trate. ELDER; JUDGE, &c.

* Mag'-ni'-ficent = magnificent (1 Chr. xxii. 5).

Ma'-gog (Heb., see below), a name applied in Scripture both to a person and to a land or people. In Gen. x. 2 Magog appears as the second son of Japheth in connection with Gomer (the Cimmerians) and Madai (the Medes): In Ez. xxxviii. 2, xxxix. 1, 6, it appears as a country or people of which Gog was the prince, in conjunction with Meshech (the Moschici), Tubal (the Tibareni), and Rosh (the Roxolani, A. V. "chief"). In the latter of these senses there is evidently implied an etymological connection between Gog and Ma-gog, the Ma being regarded by Ezekiel as a prefix significant of a country. In this case Gog contains the original element of the name, which may possibly have its origin in some Persian root.<sup>1</sup> The notices of Ma-gog would lead us to fix a northern locality: not only did all the tribes mentioned in connection with it belong to that quarter, but it is expressly stated by Ezekiel that he was to come up from "the sides of the north" (xxxix. 2), from a country adjacent to that of Togarmah or Armenia (xxxviii. 6), and not far from "the isles" or maritime regions of Europe (xxxix. 6). The people of Magog further appear as having a force of cavalry (xxxviii. 15), and as armed with the bow (xxxix. 3). From the above data, combined with the consideration of the time at which Ezekiel lived, the conclusion has been drawn that Magog represents the important race of the Scythians. In identifying Magog with the

Scythians, however, we do not (so Mr. Bevan) use the latter term in a strictly ethnographical sense, but as a general expression for the tribes living N. of the Caucasus. We regard Magog as essentially a geographical term, just as it was applied by the Syrians of the middle ages to Asiatic Tartary, and by the Arabians to the district between the Caspian and Euxine seas. The inhabitants of this district in the time of Ezekiel were undoubtedly the people generally known by the classical name of Scythians. Forced from their original quarters N. of the Caucasus by the Massagetae, they descended into Asia Minor, took Sardis (B. C. 629), spread into Media (B. C. 624), where they defeated Cyaxares; thence directed their course to Egypt, and were bribed off by Psammetichus; on their return attacked the temple of ATARGATIS at Acalon; were finally ejected B. C. 596, after having made their name a terror to the whole Eastern world (Hdt. i. 103 ff.). (SCYTHOPOLIS.) With the memory of these events yet fresh, Ezekiel selects the Scythians as the symbol of earthly violence, arrayed against the people of God, but meeting with a signal and utter overthrow. He depicts their avarice and violence (Ez. xxxviii. 7-13), and the fearful vengeance executed upon them (14-28)—a massacre so tremendous that seven months would hardly suffice for the burial of the corpses in the valley Hamon-gog (xxxix. 11-16).

The imagery of Ezekiel has been transferred in the Apocalypse to describe the final struggle between Christ and ANTICHRIST (Rev. xx. 8). As far as the Biblical notices are concerned, it is sufficient to state that the Scythians of Ezekiel's age—the Scythians of Herodotus—were probably a Japhetic race. TONGUES, CONFUSION OF.

Ma'gor-mis'sa-bib (Heb. = terror on every side), the name given by Jeremiah to Pashur the priest, when he smote him and put him in the stocks for prophesying against the idolatry of Jerusalem (Jer. xx. 3).

Mag'pi-geh (Heb. moth-killer? Ges.; collector of clusters of stars, Fü.), a chief of the people, or family representative of the people who signed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh. x. 20); supposed by Calmet and Junius = MAGBISH.

Ma'ha-lah (Heb. disease = MAHLAH, Ges.), one of the three children of Hammoleketh, the sister of Gilead (1 Chr. vii. 18); probably a woman.

Ma-ha-la'le-el, or Ma-hal'a-lel (Heb. praise of God, Ges.). 1. The fourth in descent from Adam through Seth; son of Cainan (Gen. v. 12, 13, 15-17; 1 Chr. i. 2).—2. A descendant of Perez, or Pharez, the son of Judah (Neh. xi. 4).

Ma'ha-lath (Heb. a stringed instrument, a lyre or guitar, Ges. [see next article]; the lovely? Fü.). 1. Daughter of Ishmael, and one of the wives of Esau (Gen. xxviii. 9).—2. One of the eighteen wives of King Rehoboam, apparently his first (2 Chr. xi. 18 only). She was her husband's cousin, the daughter of King David's son Jerimoth.

Ma'ha-lath (Heb., see below). The title of Ps. liii., in which this rare word occurs, was rendered in the Geneva version, "To him that excelleth on Mahalath," explained in the margin to be "an instrument or kind of note." This expresses in short the opinions of most commentators. Connecting the word with māhōl or māchōl (Ex. xv. 20; Ps. cx. 4), rendered "DANCE" in the A. V., but supposed by many from its connection with instruments of music to be one itself, Jerome renders the phrase "on Mahalath," by per chorum (L. = by chorus, i. e. dance). The title of Ps. liii. in the Chaldee and Syriac versions contains no trace of the word, which is also omitted in the almost identical Ps. xiv. From this fact alone it might be inferred that it was not intended to point enigmatically to the contents of the psalm. Aben Ezra understands by it the name of a melody to which the psalm was sung, and Rashi explains it as "the name of a musical instrument," adding, however, immediately, with a play upon the word, "another discourse on the sickness" (Heb. mahālāh or machālāh) of Israel when the Temple was laid waste." But the most probable of all conjectures (so Mr. Wright), and one which Gesenius approves, is that of Ludolf, who quotes the Ethiopic mahlet or machlet, by which the kithara of the LXX. (A. V. "HARP") is rendered in Gen. iv. 21. Fürst explains Mahalath as the name of a musical corps dwelling at Abel-meholah, just as by Gittith he understands the band of Levite minstrels at Gath-rimmon. Hengstenberg, J. A. Alexander, Lengerke, &c., translate "on Mahalath" by on sickness, referring to the spiritual malady of the sons of men. Delitzsch considers Mahalath as indicating to the choir the manner in which the psalm was to be sung.

Ma'ha-lath Le-an'moth (Heb., see below). The Geneva version of Ps. lxxviii., in the title of which these words occur, has "upon Malath Leannoth," and in the margin, "i. e. to humble. It was the beginning of a song, by the tune whereof this psalm was sung." It is a remarkable proof of the obscurity which envelops the former of the two words (MAHALATH) that the same commentator explains it differently in each of the passages in which it occurs. In De Wette's translation it is a flute in Ps. liii., a guitar in Ps. lxxxviii.; and while Rashi in the former passage explains it as a musical instrument, he describes the latter as referring to one sick of love and affliction who was afflicted with the punishments of the Captivity. Augustine and Theodoret both understand leannoth of responsive singing. There is nothing, however, in the construction of the psalm to show that it was adapted for responsive singing; and if leannoth be simply "to sing," it would seem almost unnecessary. It has reference, more probably to the character of the psalm, and might be rendered to humble, or afflict, in which sense the root occurs in verse 7. In support of this may be compared, "to bring to remembrance," in the titles of Ps. xxxviii. and lxx.; and "to thank," 1 Chr. xvi. 7. Hengstenberg, J. A. Alexander, Lengerke, &c., regard Ps. lxxxviii. as a prayer of one recovered from severe bodily sickness, and render the Hebrew phrase concerning afflictive sickness.

Ma'ha-li (fr. Heb.) = MAHLI 1 (Ex. vi. 19 only).

Ma-ha-na'im (fr. Heb. = two camps or hosts), a town on the E. of the Jordan, intimately connected with the early and middle history of Israel. It received its name at the most important crisis of the life of Jacob. He had parted from Laban in peace after their hazardous encounter on Mount Gilead (Gen. xxxi.), and the next step in the journey to Canaan brings him to Mahanaim: "Jacob went on his way; (and he lifted up his eyes and saw the camp of God encamped<sup>1</sup>); and the angels (or messengers) of God met him. And when he saw them he said, This is God's host (Heb. mah-shanah), and he called the name of that place Mahanaim." How or when the town of Mahanaim arose on the spot thus signalized we are not told. We next meet with it in the records of the conquest. The line separating Gad from Manasseh appears to have run through or close to it, since it is named in the specification of the frontier of each tribe (Josh. xiii. 26, 29). It was also on the southern boundary of the district of Bashan (ver. 30). But it was certainly within the territory of Gad (xxi. 38, 39), and therefore on the S. side of the torrent Jabbok, as indeed we should infer from the history of Genesis, in which it lies between Gilead—probably the modern Jebel Jil'ad—and the torrent. The town with its "suburbs" was allotted to the Merarite Levites (Josh. xxi. 39; 1 Chr. vi. 80). From some cause—the sanctity of its original foundation, or the strength of its position—Mahanaim had become in the time of the monarchy a place of mark (2 Sam. ii. 9, 12, iv. 6). The same causes which led Abner to fix Ishbosheth's residence at Mahanaim probably induced David to take refuge there when driven out of the western part of his kingdom by Absalom (xvii. 24; 1 K. ii. 8). It was then a walled town, capacious enough to contain the "hundreds" and the "thousands" of David's followers (2 Sam. xviii. 1, 4; compare "ten thousand," ver. 3); with gates and the usual provision for the watchman of a fortified town. Mahanaim was the seat of one of Solomon's commissariat officers (1 K. iv. 14); and it is alluded to in the Song which bears his name (Cant. vi. 13, margin). On the monument of Sheshonk (Shishak) at Karnak, in the twenty-second cartouche—one of those believed to contain the names of Israelite cities conquered by that king—a name appears which is read as M<sup>a</sup>-ha-n-m<sup>a</sup>, i. e. Mahanaim. If this interpretation may be relied on, it shows that the invasion of Shishak was more extensive than we should gather from the records of the Bible (2 Chr. xii.), which are occupied mainly with occurrences at the metropolis. As to the identification of Mahanaim with any modern site or remains little can be said. To Eusebius and Jerome it appears to have been unknown. A place called Mahneh does certainly exist among the villages of the E. of Jordan, marked on Kiepert's map (1856) as about twenty-five miles exactly E. of Beth-shan. Its identity with Mahanaim has been upheld by Porter (Handbook, 322), Wilson (ii. 362, 641), &c. Tristram, in March, 1864 (Land of Israel, 483), visited Birket Mahneh (pool of Mahneh), a natural pond, near which are some ruins of modern Arab dwellings, and traces of ancient buildings, occupying several acres, and regards "these grass-grown mounds" as the site of ancient Mahanaim (see map of JORDAN, &c.). But the distance of Mahneh from the Jordan and from both the Wady Zurka and the Yarmuk—each of which has claims to represent the Jabbok—seems to forbid this conclusion (so Mr. Grove). Porter (in Kitto) asks, May not Mahanaim = GERASA?

Ma'ha-neh-dan (Heb. = the "Camp of Dan"), a name which commemorated the last encampment of the band of 600 Danite warriors before setting out on their expedition to Laish. The position of the spot is specified as "behind Kirjath-jearim" (Judg. xviii. 12), and "between Zorah and Eshtaol" (xiii. 25). Mr. Williams (Holy City, i. 12 n.) was shown a site on the N. side of the Wady Ismail, and about ten miles nearly W. from Jerusalem, which bore the name of Beit Mahanem, and which he suggests may be identical with Mahaneh-dan. The position is certainly very suitable; but the name does not occur in the lists or maps of other travelers.

Ma'ha-ral, or Ma-har'a-l (Heb. impetuous, Ges.), an inhabitant of Netophah in Judah, and one of David's captains, descended from Zerah (2 Sam. xxiii. 28; 1 Chr. xi. 80, xxvii. 18).

Ma'hath (Heb. taking, grasping, Ges.). 1. Son of Amasai, a Kohathite of the house of Korah (1 Chr. vi. 35). (AHIMOTH.)—2. Also a Kohathite, son of Amasai, in the reign of Hezekiah (2 Chr. xxix. 12); apparently the same who is mentioned 2 Chr. xxxi. 13.

Ma'ha-vite (fr. Heb. pl. = Mahavites), the designation of Eliel, one of King David's "valiant men" (1 Chr. xi. 46 only).

Ma-ha'zi-oth (Heb. visions, Ges.), one of the fourteen sons of Heman the Kohathite; chief of the twenty-third course of musicians (1 Chr. xxv. 4, 30).

Ma'her-sha'lai-hash'-baz (Heb. hasting to the spoil he speeds to the prey, Ges.), son of Isaiah; so named by divine direction, to indicate that Damascus and Samaria were soon to be plundered by the king of Assyria (Is. viii. 1-4).

Mah'lah (Heb. disease, Ges.), the eldest of the five daughters of ZELOPHKAD (Num. xxvii. 1-11).

Mah'll (Heb. sickly, Ges.). 1. Son of Merari, the son of Levi, and ancestor of the family of the MAHLITES (Num. iii. 20; 1 Chr. vi. 19, 29, xxiii. 21, xxiv. 26, 28; Ezr. viii. 18); = MAHALI.—2. Son of Mushi, and grandson of Merari (1 Chr. vi. 47, xxiii. 23, xxiv. 30).

Mah'ttes, the, = the descendants of MAHLI the son of Merari (Num. iii. 33, xxvi. 58).

Mah'ten (Heb. sickly, Ges.), the first husband of RUTH. He and his brother Chilion were sons of Elimelech and Naomi, and "Ephrathites of Bethlehem-judah" (Ru. i. 2, 5, iv. 9, 10; compare 1 Sam. xvii. 12).

Ma'hel (Heb. a dance, dancing, sc. in a circle, Ges.), father of ETHAN the Ezrahite, and HEMAN, CHALCOL, and DARDA, the four men most famous for wisdom next to Solomon himself (1 K. iv. 31). In 1 Chr. ii. 6 similar names belong to sons of Zerah.

Mal'-ne-as (fr. Gr.) = MASSEIAH 7 (1 Esd. ix. 48).

* Mal'd'-ser-vant. SERVANT; SLAVE.

* Mail, Coat of. ARMS, II. 1.

Ma'kaz (fr. Heb. = end, Ges.), a place, apparently a town named (1 K. iv. 9 only) in the specification of the jurisdiction of Solomon's commissariat officer, Ben-Dekar; probably in Dan; not discovered.

Ma'ked (Gr.), or Ma'ged, one of the "strong and great" cities of Gilead into which the Jews were driven by the Ammonites under Timotheus (1 Mc. v. 26, 36); site unknown.

Mak'-he'loth (Heb. pl. assemblies, choirs, Ges.), a place only mentioned in Num. xxxiii. 25 as that of a desert encampment of the Israelites. WILDERNESS OF THE WANDERING.

Mak'-ke'dah (Heb. place of shepherds, Ges.), a place memorable in the annals of the conquest of Canaan as the scene of the execution by Joshua of the five confederate kings: an act by which the victory of Beth-horon was consummated, and the subjection of the entire southern portion of the country secured (Josh. x. 10-30). This unquestionably occurred in the afternoon of that tremendous day, which "was like no day before or after it." After the execution of the chiefs Joshua turns to the town itself. To force the walls, to put the king and all the inhabitants to the sword (ver. 28), is to that indomitable energy, still fresh after the gigantic labors and excitements of the last twenty-four hours, the work of an hour or two. And now the evening has arrived, the sun is at last sinking—the first sun that has set since the departure from Gilgal—and the tragedy is terminated by cutting down the five bodies from the trees, and restoring them to the cave, which is then so blocked up with stones as henceforth never again to become refuge for friend or foe of Israel. The taking of Makkedah was the first in that series of sieges and destructions by which the Great Captain possessed himself of the main points of defence throughout this portion of the country. Eusebius and Jerome place it eight miles E. of Eleutheropolis, Beit Jibrin—a position irreconcilable with every requirement of the narrative (so Mr. Grove). Porter suggests a ruin on the northern slope of the Wady es-Sunt, about eight miles N. E. of Beit Jibrin, bearing the somewhat similar name of el-Klédiah. Van de Velde would place it at Sumcil, a village standing on a low hill six or seven miles N. W. of Beit Jibrin.

Mak'tesh (Heb., see below), a place evidently in JERUSALEM, the inhabitants of which are denounced by Zephaniah (i. 11). Ewald conjectures that it was the "Phœnician quarter" of the city. The meaning of "Mak'tesh" is probably a deep hollow, literally a mortar. This the Targum identifies with the torrent Kidron. But may it not have been the deep valley Tyropœon which separated the Temple from the upper city, and which at the time of Titus's siege was, as it still is, crowded with the "bazaars" of the merchants?

Mal'a-chi [-ki] (Heb. messenger of Jehovah, Ges.), the last, and therefore called "the seal" of the prophets, as his prophecies constitute the closing book of the Canon. Of his personal history nothing is known. A tradition preserved in Pseudo-Epiphanius relates that Malachi was of the tribe of Zebulun, and born after the Captivity at Sepha in the territory of that tribe. According to the same apocryphal story he died young, and was buried with his fathers in his own country. Jerome, in the preface to his Commentary on Malachi, mentions a belief current among the Jews, that Malachi was identical with Ezra the priest. With equal probability Malachi has been identified with Mordecai, Nehemiah, and Zerubbabel. The LXX. render "by Malachi" (Mal. i. 1) "by the hand of his angel;" and this translation appears to have given rise to the idea that Malachi, as well as Haggai and John the Baptist, was an angel in human shape (compare Mal. iii. 1; 2 Esd. i. 40). The time at which his prophecies were delivered is not difficult to ascertain. Cyril makes him contemporary with Haggai and Zechariah, or a little later. Syncellus places these three prophets under Joshua the son of Josedec. That Malachi was contemporary with Nehemiah is rendered probable by a comparison of Mal. ii. 8 with Neh. xiii. 15; Mal. ii. 10-16 with Neh. xiii. 23, &c.; and Mal. iii. 7-12 with Neh. xiii. 10, &c. That he prophesied after the times of Haggai and Zechariah is inferred from his omitting to mention the restoration of the Temple, and from no allusion being made to him by Ezra. The Captivity was already a thing of the long past, and is not referred to. The existence of the Temple-service is presupposed in Mal. i. 10, iii. 1, 10. The Jewish nation had still a political chief (i. 8), distinguished by the same title as that borne by Nehemiah (Neh. xii. 26), to which Gesenius assigns a Persian origin. (GOVERNOR 7.) Hence Vitringa, Kennicott, Hales, Davidson, and most Biblical critics, conclude that Malachi delivered his prophecies after the second return of Nehemiah from Persia (Neh. xiii. 6), and subsequently to the thirty-second year of Artaxerxes Longimanus, i. e. about B. C. 420. From the striking parallelism between the state of things indicated in Malachi's prophecies and that actually existing on Nehemiah's return from the court of Artaxerxes, it is on all accounts highly probable (so Mr. Wright) that the efforts of the secular governor were on this occasion seconded by the preaching of "Jehovah's messenger," and that Malachi occupied the same position with regard to the reformation under Nehemiah, which Isaiah held in the time of Hezekiah, and Jeremiah in that of Josiah. The last chapter of canonical Jewish history is the key to the last chapter of its prophecy. Malachi (so Ayre) was commissioned to reprove both priests and people, and to invite them to "reformation by promises of blessing and warnings of awful judgment." The book of Malachi is contained in four chapters in our version, as in the LXX., Vulgate, and Peshito-Syriac. In the Hebrew the third and fourth form but one chapter. The whole prophecy naturally divides itself into three sections, in the first of which Jehovah is represented as the loving father and ruler of His people (i. 2-ii. 9); in the second, as the supreme God and father of all (ii. 10-16); and in the third, as their righteous and final judge (i. 17-end). These may be again subdivided into smaller sections, each of which follows a certain order: first, a short sentence; then the skeptical questions which might be raised by the people; and, finally, their full and triumphant refutation. The prophet's language is smooth and easy, the style of the reasoner rather than of the poet. The prophecy of Malachi is alluded to in the N. T., and its canonical authority thereby established (compare Mk. i. 2, ix. 11, 12; Lk. i. 17; Rom. ix. 13). BIBLE; CANON; INSPIRATION; JOHN THE BAPTIST; PROPHET.

Mal'a-ahy = the prophet MALACHI (2 Esd. i. 40).

Mal'cham (Heb., see No. 2 below). 1. A Benjaminite chief, son of Shaharaim by his wife Hodesh (1 Chr. viii. 9).—2. The idol MOLECH, as some suppose (Zeph. i. 6). The word literally = "their king," as the margin of our version gives it, and is referred by Gesenius to an idol generally, as invested with regal honors by its worshippers.

Mal-chi'ah (fr. Heb. = Jehovah's king, Ges.). 1. A descendant of Gershon, the son of Levi, and ancestor of Asaph the minstrel (1 Chr. vi. 40).—2. One of the sons of Parosh, who had married a foreign wife (Ezr. x. 25).—3. One of the sons of Harim in Ezra's time, who had married a foreign wife (x. 31); probably = MALCHIJAH 4.—4. Son of Rechab, and ruler of the circuit (A. V. "PART") of Beth-haccerem. He took part in rebuilding the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 14).—5. "The goldsmith's son," who assisted Nehemiah in rebuilding the wall of Jerusalem (iii. 31).—6. One, probably a priest, who stood at the left hand of Ezra when he read the Law to the people in the street before the water-gate (viii. 4).—7. A priest, father of Pashur; = MALCHIJAH 1 (xi. 12; Jer. xxxviii. 1).—8. Son of Hammelech (or "the king's son," as it is translated in 1 K. xxii. 26; 2 Chr. xxviii. 7), into whose dungeon or cistern Jeremiah was cast (Jer. xxxviii. 6). It would seem (so Mr. Wright) that the title "king's son" was official, like that of "king's mother," and applied to one of the royal family, who exercised functions somewhat similar to those of Potiphar in the court of Pharaoh. JERAHMEEL 3; JOASH 4; MAASEIAH 17.

Mal-chi-el (Heb. God's king, i. e. appointed by Him, Ges.), son of Beriah, the son of Asher, and ancestor of the family of the MALCHIELITES (Gen. xli. 17; Num. xxvi. 45). In 1 Chr. vii. 31 he is called the father, i. e. founder, of Bircavith.

Mal-chi-el-ites, the = the descendants of MALCHIEL, the grandson of Asher (Num. xxvi. 45).

Mal-chi'jah (fr. Heb. = MALCHIAH). 1. A priest, the father of Pashur (1 Chr. ix. 12); = MALCHIAH 7, and MELCHIAH.—2. A priest, chief of the fifth of the twenty-four courses appointed by David (xxiv. 9).—3. A layman of the sons of Parosh, who put away his foreign wife (Ezr. x. 25).—4. Son, i. e. descendant, of Harim, and a participant in repairing the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 11); probably = MALCHIAH 3.—5. A priest who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah; probably = the family or representative of the course of MALCHIJAH 2 (x. 3).—6. A priest who assisted in the solemn dedication of the wall of Jerusalem under Ezra and Nehemiah (xii. 42).

Mal-chi'ram (Heb. = king of altitude, Ges.), son of Jeconiah, or Jehoiachin (1 Chr. iii. 18).

Mal-chi-shu'a, or Mal-chish'u-a (Heb. king of help, Ges.), also MELCHISHUA in A. V., son of King Saul (1 Sam. xiv. 49, xxxi. 2; 1 Chr. viii. 33, ix. 39). His position in the family (second or third son) cannot be exactly determined. Nothing is known of him beyond the fact that he fell, with his two brothers, and before his father, in the early part of the battle of Gilboa.

Mal'chus (L. fr. Gr. = MALLUCH), the servant of the high-priest, whose right ear PERAZ cut off at the time of the Saviour's apprehension in the garden, named only in Jn. xviii. 10. See Mat. xxvi. 51; Mk. xiv. 47; Lk. xxii. 49-51; Jn. xviii. 10. Only Luke the physician mentions the act of healing.

Ma-le-le-el, or Mal'e-leel (Gr.) = MAHALAKEEL, the son of Cainan (Lk. iii. 37; Gen. v. 12, margin).

Mal'les (Gr., a lock of wool). The people of Tarsus and Mallos revolted from Antiochus Epiphanes because he had bestowed them on one of his concubines (2 Mc. iv. 30). Mallos was an important city of Cilicia, lying at the mouth of the Pyramus (Seihun), on the shore of the Mediterranean, N. E. of Cyprus, and about twenty miles from TARSUS.

Mal-le'thi (Heb. my fulness; Ges.), a Kohathite, one of the fourteen sons of Heman the singer, and chief of the nineteenth course (1 Chr. xxv. 4, 26).

Jew's Mallow (Corchorus olivaceus).

Orach (Atriplex halimus).

V. "mallows," we are no doubt to understand some species of Orache, and in all probability the Atriplex halimus of botanists, a shrubby saline plant, the young tops of which are sometimes used as food, like spinach. It occurs only in Job. xxx. 4. Some writers, as R. Levi and Luther, with the Swedish and the old Danish versions, understood nettles to be denoted. Others have conjectured that some species of Mallow (Malva) is intended. Sprengel identifies with the Heb. word, the Jew's Mallow (Corchorus olitorius), which is still eaten in Arabia and Palestine, the leaves and pods being used as a pot-herb. But the Atriplex halimus has undoubtedly the best claim to represent the Heb. mallûah or mallûach (so Mr. Houghton, with Bochart, Drusius, Celsius, Hiller, Rosenmüller, &c.).

Mal lach [-lûk] (Heb. reigning, or counsellor, Ges.).

1. A Levite of the family of Merari, and ancestor of Ethan the singer (1 Chr. vi. 44).—2. One of the sons of Bani (Ezr. x. 29), and 3. one of the descendants of Harim (32) who had married foreign wives.—4. A priest or family of priests (Neh. x. 4) and 5. A chief of the people who signed the covenant with Nehemiah (27); = No. 2 or 3?—6. A priest or family of priests who returned with Zerubabel (xii. 2); = MELICU; probably = No. 4.

Ma-mal'as (1 Esd. viii. 44), perhaps a repetition of SHEMAIAH in Ezr. viii. 16. MASMAN.

Mam'mon (Mat. vi. 24; Lk. xvi. 9), a word which often occurs in the Chaldee Targums of Onkelos, and later writers, and in the Syriac Version, and which signifies riches. It is used in Mat. as a personification of riches.

Mam-ni-ta-nal'mus (fr. Gr.), in 1 Esd. ix. 34, a corruption of "Mattaniah, Mattenai," in Ezr. x. 37.

Mam're (Heb. fallening, fat, Ges.), an ancient Amorite, who, with his brothers Eshcol and Aner, was in alliance with Abram (Gen. xiv. 13, 24), and under the shade of whose oak-grove (A. V. "plain," "plains;" see OAK 3; PLAIN 7) the patriarch dwelt in the interval between his residence at Bethel and at Beer-sheba (xiii. 18, xviii. 1). The personality of this ancient chieftain, unmistakably though slightly brought out in the narrative just cited, is lost in the subsequent chapters. Mam're is there a mere local appellation (xxiii. 17, 19, xxv. 9, xlix. 30, l. 13); probably on the slope where is now the governor's residence, opposite the hill of the mosque at HEBRON. (MACHPELAH.) It does not appear beyond Genesis.

Ma-mu'chus (fr. Gr.) = MALLUCH 2 (1 Esd. ix. 30).

Man, the A. V. translation of—1. Heb. adam, used as (A) The name of the man created in the image of God (Gen. ii. 7, 8, 15 [margin "Adam"], 16, 18, 19 [A. V. "Adam"], &c.). It appears to be derived from adam = he or it was red or ruddy, like Edom. The epithet rendered red has a very wide signification in the Semitic languages. (COLORS.) When the Arabs apply the term red to man, they always mean by it fair. (B) The name of ADAM and his wife (v. 1, 2: compare i. 27, in which case there is nothing to show that more than one pair is intended). (C) A collective noun, indeclinable, having neither construct state, plural, nor feminine form, used to designate any or all of the descendants of Adam (vi. 1 ff., &c.); sometimes translated "person" (Num. xxxi. 28, 30, 35, &c.), also "mean man" (Is. ii. 9, v. 15, xxxi. 8), &c.—2. Heb. ish, apparently softened from an unused sing. ishesh, pl.

isheshim, rarely ishim; fem. ishshah, pl. ishshim, once ishshoth, "man," "men," "woman," "women" (Gen. ii. 23, iii. 1 ff., iv. 1, 23, &c.). The masculine is often translated "husband" (iii. 6, 16, xvi. 3, &c.), and the feminine "wife" (ii. 24, 25, iii. 8, 17, 20, 21, &c.). The kindred Heb. enosh is also found (Job v. 17, vii. 1, 17; Ps. lv. 13, 14 Heb., &c.; Exos), and the Chal. indah (Ezr. iv. 11; Dan. ii. 10, 38, 43, &c.).—3. Heb. ba'al (Gen. xx. 3; Josh. xxiv. 11, "men" of Jericho; Judg. ix. 2 ff., "men" of Shechem; xx. 5, "men" of Gibeon; 1 Sam. xxiii. 11, 12, "men" of Keilah, &c.), literally "lord" (Num. xxi. 28), "master" (Judg. xix. 22, 23, &c.), "owner" (Ex. xxi. 28 ff., &c.), also translated "husband" (Deut. xxii. 22, xxiv. 4, &c.), "BAAL," &c.—4. Heb. geber, "a man," from gabar, to be strong, generally with reference to his strength, corresponding to L. vir and Gr. anēr (below) (Ex. x. 11, xii. 37; Prov. xxiv. 5, xxviii. 3, 21, &c.), twice translated "mighty" (Is. xxii. 17; Jer. xli. 16). The kindred Heb. and Chal. geber is also used (Ps. xviii. 26; Ezr. iv. 21; Dan. ii. 25, &c.), likewise gibbôr (2 Sam. xxii. 26; 2 Chr. xiii. 3), usually "mighty man" (1 Sam. ii. 4, ix. 1, &c.; see GIANTS 2), &c.—5. Heb. pl. milchim, "men," always masculine (Deut. ii. 34, iii. 6, &c.), sometimes translated "few" (Ger. xxxiv. 30; Deut. iv. 27), "small" (Jer. xlv. 28), "persons" (Ps. xxvi. 4), &c. The kindred Heb. milchm is once found instead (Judg. xx. 48).—6. Gr. anēr = a man, in distinction from a woman or young person (Mat. vii. 24, 26, xii. 41, xiv. 21, 35, &c.), also translated "husband" (i. 16, 19; Eph. v. 22 ff., &c.), in pl. "sirs" (Acts vii. 26, &c.), once "fellows" (xvi. 5); in LXX. = No. 2.—7. Gr. anthrōpos = a man, i. e. one of the human race (Mat. iv. 4, 19, v. 13, 16, 19, &c.). It occurs more than five hundred times in the N. T. and almost always is translated "man" or in pl. "men." The adj. anthrōpinos is translated "of man," "man's," &c. (1 Cor. ii. 4, 13; 1 Pet. ii. 13, &c.); anthrōpareikos is translated literally in pl. "men-pleasers" (Eph. vi. 6; Col. iii. 22). The "old man" refers to the carnal or un sanctified nature; the "new man," the "inner man," &c., to the holy or sanctified disposition of the children of God or true Christians (Rom. vi. 6; Eph. iii. 16, iv. 22, 24, &c.). The word "man" is often inserted in the A. V. where the original is not thus limited, and "one" might properly take its place, e. g. Deut. xxviii. 29; Jn. x. 9, 18, 28, 29; Rev. v. 3, 4, &c. (For the creation and fall of man, the "man of sin," and various other connected subjects, see ADAM; ANTI-CHRIST; CHRONOLOGY; CREATION; DAY; SATAN; SERPENTS; SON OF MAN.)—Under the present article may properly come a brief consideration of the arguments respecting the unity of the human race, and the descent of the whole from one primitive pair. I. Mankind constitute one and the only species of a genus (Homo) essentially distinct from and superior to all other animals. A species, as commonly understood, includes "all those individuals that are derived from their like, and that reproduce their like;" or more definitely, in the case of organized beings, it is "the collective total of individuals which are capable of producing, one with another, an uninterruptedly fertile progeny" (B. S. xix. 631). There are some instances in which like does not produce like directly, but in alternate generations: e. g. a polyp produces a jelly-fish, and the latter, in its turn, a polyp (New Englander, viii. 549). Compare with this the well-known fact that among mankind ancestral characteristics, which are not noticeable in some generations, often reappear in succeeding ones; also the fact that among insects the same individual may have an entirely different structure at different periods of its existence (e. g. first a caterpillar or grub, then a chrysalis, then a perfect winged insect, &c.). In such cases the similarity of form, &c., disappears, but the bond of lineage remains. Prof. Dana has scientifically defined the essential idea of a species thus: "A species corresponds to a specific amount or condition of concentrated force, defined in the act or law of creation" (B. S. xiv. 860). That mankind thus constitute a single species appears from—1. Their physical structure and organization. All the varieties of mankind are alike in the number and equal length of the teeth and in the peculiarity of shedding them, in the 208 additional bones of the body, in erect stature, in the articulation of the head with the spinal column, in the possession of two hands, in the absence of the intermaxillary bone, in a smooth skin of the body and a head covered with hair, in the number and arrangement of the muscles, the digestive and all the other organs; they are all omnivorous, have a slower growth than any other animal, are subject to similar diseases, similar parasitic insects and intestinal worms, &c. (B. S. ix. 427; The Doctrine of the Unity of the Human Race, by John Bachman, D.D., Charleston, S. C., 1850). The wonderful structure of the hand, the power and adaptation of the face to express varied emotion, and the evident superiority of the human brain, all assist to mark the distinction in outward form between man and the brutes. But deserving of special mention is another characteristic in what Prof. Dana (in New Englander, xxii. 285 ff., 495 ff.) names cephalization, i. e. domination of the head (Gr. kephale) in the structure. "As the head is the seat of power in an animal," he says, "the part which gives honor to the whole, it is natural that among species rank should be marked by means of variations in the structure of the head; and not only by variations in structure, but also in the extent to which the rest of the body directly contributes, by its members, to the uses or purposes of the head." In examining the animal kingdom with reference to a transfer of members from the locomotive to the cephalic series, or the reverse, Prof. Dana finds that the two lowest divisions or sub-kingdoms (radiates and mollusks), the third or lowest class (worms) in the next higher sub-kingdom (articulates), and the three lower classes (birds, reptiles, and fishes) in the highest sub-kingdom (vertebrates), lack the requisite structure for the comparison. In the first class (mammals) of the highest sub-kingdom (vertebrates), there are but two pairs of limbs, and in this class man is alone in having the fore-limbs withdrawn from the locomotive series, and transferred to the service of the head. The uses of the fore-limbs in man are (1.) the inferior, depending on the demands of the appetite satisfied through the mouth (uses which are united to the locomotive in the monkeys and some other quadrupeds); (2.) the superior, depending on the demands of the mind and soul. A very large anterior portion of the body is thus turned over to the service of the head, so that the posterior or gastric portion of the animal reaches in man its minimum. In consequence of this peculiarity, the human form is erect, the body is placed directly beneath the brain, or the subordinating power, with no part posterior to it, and on two feet, the smallest possible number in an animal. In the first class (insecteans) of the second sub-kingdom (articulates), the first or highest order (insects) have three pairs of feet and three of mouth-organs, the next lower (spiders) have four pairs of feet and two of mouth-organs, the third or lowest (myriapods or centipedes) have a degradational character manifested in an unlimited number of segments of the body and pairs of feet. In the second class (crustaceans) of the second sub-kingdom are also three orders, the first (decapods) having five pairs of feet and six pairs of mouth-organs, the second (tetradeapods) having seven pairs of feet and four pairs of mouth-organs, the lowest (entomostracans) having defective feet, and some having three pairs of mouth-organs, others only two, others only one pair, others none. The numbers of pairs of feet, then, in the regular types of the animal kingdom, beginning with man, and ending with tetradeapods, are one, two, three, four, five, seven. Thus man is widely separated zoologically from all other animals, and placed at the very head of the animal kingdom.—2. Their mental and moral characteristics. Mankind differ from the whole brute creation in having souls, endowed with faculties for the acquirement of knowledge and wisdom, and with susceptibilities and voluntary powers fitting them for moral action. They are not compelled to stop short at adult age, and rest satisfied with the attainments of their ancestors or predecessors, but a boundless field for investigation, discovery, and invention, is opened before them, to discipline their powers and lead them onward and upward; they may be stimulated to exertion by higher motives than can be brought to bear upon the brutes; they have natural aspirations after excellence and immortality, and emotions of religious regard for a power that is higher than earthly; yet they are all naturally sinful, and both need the salvation of the Gospel, and may profit by it. The effects of the preaching of the Gospel and the earnest inculcation of religious truth are substantially alike in every clime and among every people: the proud Roman, the refined Greek, the barbarous Druid, the degraded Hottentot, the Hindoo, and the Polynesian, all of all races and regions, may be and are elevated by it, and fitted to glorify God and benefit their fellow-men on earth, and to inherit everlasting life through sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth.—3. The gift of speech and power of singing. Not only are these characteristic of mankind as a whole, but all are naturally capacitated to learn the same language and sing in harmony the same songs. The present differences in language, &c., may be rationally accounted for otherwise than by supposing them to be original distinctions which have existed ever since the creation. (TONGUES, CORRUPTION OR.)—4. Their fertile intermixture. Dr. Bachman has subjected to a critical examination the alleged facts in respect to the fertility of hybrids, and in his work above cited gives the results of long and patient and extensive observation and research on his own part, and of protracted and familiar correspondence with practical men and with eminent fellow-laborers in the same departments of science in both the Eastern and Western continents. He found that "out of the whole number of unnatural productions of this kind, there are but two authentic instances in which the result was not absolute sterility; and even these proved altogether unable to perpetuate themselves. Even admitting the production of a progeny by animals of mixed descent in one or two instances, it dies out after one or two generations." "Many of the supposed new races" were "shown conclusively to be mere varieties of some existing species, as the Japan peacock and the ring pheasant;" but "no race exists upon the earth which can be shown to have originated from the union of animals of different species." Prof. Wagner, of Germany, has shown, by the dissection of animals of mixed blood, and Dr. Bachman's researches confirm the statement, that "Nature has interposed, in the anatomical structure of such hybrids, an absolute barrier to their reproduction" (New Englander, viii. 550-552). The same law in respect to hybridity prevails in both the vegetable and animal kingdoms. Everywhere the purity of species has been guarded with great precision. The supposed cases of perpetuated fertile hybridity are exceedingly few in plants, still fewer among animals. "Moreover, if hybridity be begun, Nature commences at once to purify herself as of an ulcer on the system. The short run of hybridity between the horse and the ass, species very closely related, reaching its end in one single generation, instead of favoring the idea that perpetuated fertile hybridity is possible, is a speaking protest against a principle that would ruin the system if allowed free scope. . . . Were such a case [of perpetuated fertile hybridity] demonstrated by well-established facts, it would necessarily be admitted. . . . But until proved by arguments better than those drawn from domesticated animals (see below II. 1), we may plead the general principle against the possibilities on the other side. . . . We have a right to ask for well-defined facts, taken from the study of successive generations of the inter-breeding of species known to be distinct. Least of all should we expect that a law, which is so rigid among plants and the lower animals, should have its main exceptions in the highest class of the animal kingdom, and its most extravagant violations in the genus Homo; for, if there are more than one species of man, they have become, in the main, indefinite by intermixture. . . . There are other ways of accounting for the limited productiveness of the mulatto, without appealing to a distinction of species. There are causes, independent of mixture, which are making the Indian to melt away before the white man, the Sandwich Islander and all savage people to sink into the ground before the power and energy of higher intelligence. They disappear like plants beneath those of stronger root and growth, being depressed morally, intellectually, and physically, contaminated by new vices, tainted variously by foreign disease, and dwindled in all their hopes and aims and means of progress, through an overshadowing race. We have therefore reason to believe, from man's fertile intermixture, that he is one in species; and that all organic species are divine appointments which cannot be obliterated, unless by annihilating the individuals representing the species" (Prof. Dana, in B. S. xiv. 863 ff.).—5. Their adaptation to all regions and climates. White men have lived and labored for years in every quarter of the globe and every extreme of temperature—not only in the temperate regions of Europe, Asia, and America, but in the torrid regions of Africa and on the frozen shores of Greenland. African negroes have dwelt for generations in the United States, Canada, Great Britain, &c. Men from the most diverse regions, and of the most diverse previous habits, have met at the same table and lived together in the same way. The Jews, scattered among every nation under heaven, are a standing proof that men of one nation may go E., W., N., or

S., to all parts of the globe, and adapt themselves to the position and circumstances of every other nation.—II. Mankind are also of one parentage. This conclusion may be established by evidence.—1. From science. M. La Peyrère, in 1656, and in our own times Prof. Agassiz and others, have maintained that, while there is but one species of men, different races were created independently of one another. Prof. Agassiz seeks to remove from the philosophic definition of species (see above) the idea of a community of origin, and supposes that "multiple protoplasts" (i. e. several or many originals) were created of one and the same species. He divides the terrestrial globe into eight zoological kingdoms, or principal centres of creation (viz. the Arctic, Mongolian, European, American, Negro, Hottentot, Malay, Australian), which he subdivides into provinces, &c. He applies this doctrine of centres of creation to man as well as to animals in general, and plants. His theory has been scientifically examined and refuted by two eminent French professors, A. de Quatrefages and D. A. Godron. While certain types of animals, &c., and certain peculiarities in genera, and especially in species, characterize centres of creation that are really distinct, Prof. Agassiz conceives of them as something much too absolute. New Holland, e. g., forms a centre perfectly distinct and isolated in its mammals, but not in its insects. It has none of the monkey-tribe; nor has America any genus or species of that tribe which is found, at the same time, on the Eastern continent. Yet North America possesses a large number of genera and even several species of mammals which are common to both Europe and Asia; while South America is almost completely separated in this respect from the Eastern continent. But while the red man of the United States is regarded by Prof. Agassiz as the representative man of America, there are found in South America men so much like the Asiatics that they themselves call the Chinese their uncles, also on the same soil men whiter than those of Southern Europe generally, and likewise natives resembling the Canarians; so that while North America seems isolated in respect to its men from both Asia (but see below) and Europe, South America is closely connected with Asia, and approaches also Europe and Africa. Wild animals have indeed geographical limits, clearly defined for each species, which limits they do not pass over, at least of their own accord; though several species perform periodical migrations. But, by the agency of man, domestic animals, e. g. the ox, goat, sheep, horse, ass, hog, dog, cat, hen, and also the rat, mouse, house-fly, &c., have been disseminated in all inhabited lands. If man has been able to modify the laws of zoological geography in that which respects the animals subject to his dominion, why may he not have done this in that which concerns himself? Both Quatrefages and Godron conclude from an extensive induction of particulars not only that "all men form but one species," but that "this species originated in one single country, and probably that country was proportionally limited" (B. S. xix. 607 ff.).—In regard to the races and varieties of mankind, the number of which is given differently by different naturalists, "we fail to recognize any typical sharpness of definition or any general or well-established principle in the division of the groups" (Humboldt, Cosmos, translated by Otté, i. 856). Cuvier recognized three races; Blumenbach five (Caucasian, Mongolian, American, Ethiopian, Malayan); Prichard seven; Dr. Pickering (The Races of Men and their Geographical Distribution, published by the United States Government) enumerates eleven, viz. two white (the Caucasian or Arabian, and Abyssinian), three brown (the Mongolian, Hottentot, Malay), four blackish-brown (the Papuan, Negrillo, Telingan or dark East Indian, and Ethiopian), two black (the Australian, and the Negro). Dr. Prichard includes the American variety with the Mongolian, and in part with the Malay; and points out the various paths by which mankind might have spread from an Asiatic or African centre over the whole globe. The best naturalists affirm that the differences between the various races are not greater than those in domestic quadrupeds, and consist in those very characteristics which in these tend to form permanent varieties; viz. "stature; general conformation of the body; conformation of the skull; quantity, texture, and color of the hairy covering; psychical character, as shown in the increase of intelligence, in the acquirement of new methods of action, and in the disappearance of some of the natural instinctive propensities" (Dr. Carpenter, on Varieties of Mankind, in Cyclopædia of Anatomy and Physiology). Dr. Bachman has traced all the varieties of the horse, ox, hog, sheep, dog, domestic fowl, turkey, goose, duck, pigeon, Guinea pig, Barbary dove, Canary bird, gold fish, &c., in the case of each animal back to an original stock, and maintains after a thorough examination that it is impossible to find any legitimate grounds for distinguishing one of the numerous and curious forms as a distinct species. Those species of animals and plants are widely disseminated, and those only, which are capable of wide diffusion by ordinary physical agencies from an original centre of creation (New Englander, viii. 553, 560 ff.).—Says Humboldt (Cosmos, i. 858): "While we maintain the unity of the human species, we at the same time repel the depressing assumption of superior and inferior races of men. There are nations more susceptible of cultivation, more highly civilized, more ennobled by mental cultivation than others, but none in themselves nobler than others." Individuals from among the races considered most degraded have proved the capacity of their own race for intellectual and spiritual power as conclusively as Newton, or Whitefield, or any other Englishman has proved the same in regard to his countrymen. Rev. Lemuel Haynes, an illegitimate mulatto, who died in 1833, at the age of eighty, was for years, in spite of all the disadvantages of color, birth, and lack of the ordinary means of improvement, an able, respected, and useful minister of the Gospel, and a theological instructor in New England and New York State. Toussaint L'Ouverture, a full-blooded negro, and originally a slave, manifested extraordinary ability as the military and civil chief of St. Domingo, 1796-1802. It is also a well-known fact that when persons migrate from civilized and Christian communities, leaving the privileges and throwing off the restraints of their early years, their descendants, if not the emigrants themselves, often arrive at a very low point of degradation, intellectually, socially, and morally. No race is of itself permanently, and independently of moral and spiritual influences, refined, or intelligent, or virtuous, or excellent in any respect.—Some scientific men (Sir Charles Lyell, &c.) have argued in favor of the existence of men before the creation of Adam, and consequently of a different origin, from the fact that human remains, implements, &c., have been found in peat-beds and other strata of supposed great antiquity; but the essential points to be proved in all such cases are often silently assumed, and never fully established, viz. that the remains, implements, &c., have been in the position where they were found ever since the original deposition of the surrounding stratum, that the rate of geological change has been uniform from the beginning, &c. Many eminent geologists maintain that the present slow rate of deposits of mud, increase of strata, and other geological changes, cannot be applied to the earlier periods of geological history (B. S. xxi. 211 ff.). We know that sometimes as great changes have taken place in one year in some particular localities as there or elsewhere in many previous or following years. It was supposed that some pottery found in the Nile deposits had been buried there thirteen thousand years; but subsequent investigations showed it to be of modern date (Ayre). The juxtaposition of human and animal remains does not prove that the living men and the living animals were necessarily contemporaneous, until at length it is shown that the animal bones have been undisturbed since the death of the animals. Again, "it is very common to find certain species of one geological age surviving the extinction of their fellows and witnessing the introduction of new races" (B. S. xxiv. 457). Noah's being contemporary with Seth, Methuselah, Arphaxad, and Terah, does not prove the two last contemporaries of Seth, or antediluvians. Science favors, rather than opposes, the common parentage of mankind.—2. From tradition. While the authentic records of the most ancient nations go back only a few thousand years, many nations have had and have their traditions in respect to the origin of the race. "As far as I know," says Max Müller (Science of Language), "there has been no nation upon the earth, which, if it possessed any traditions on the origin of mankind, did not derive the human race from one pair, if not from one person." (ABARAT; NOAH; TONGUES, CONFUSION OF.)—3. From the Bible. ADAM is abundantly declared to be the head of the race (Gen. i., ii.; Rom. v. 12 ff.; 1 Cor. xv. 22, 45, &c.). "Eve . . . was the mother of all living" (Gen. iii. 20). Some have supposed a necessity for Pre-adamites in order to provide wives for Adam's sons (who evidently married their sisters; compare Gen. v. 4); some (La Perrière, &c.) have supposed that Genesis narrates the origin of the Hebrew race only, and that the Gentiles existed previously, &c. But the plain meaning of the passages is more easily harmonized with known facts (see above) than are these and other artificial interpretations. The evidence from all sources plainly supports the conclusion that "God . . . hath made of one blood all nations of men, for to dwell on all the face of the earth" (Acts xvii. 26).

MAN'S-EN (Gr. fr. Heb. = MEKAFEM), one of the teachers and prophets in the Church at Antioch at the time of the appointment of Saul and Barnabas as missionaries to the heathen (Acts xiii. 1 only). The name = consoler; and both that and his relation to Herod indicate that he was a Jew. The Herod with whom he was "brought up" (Gr. an-trophos) must have been Herod Antipas. Since Antipas was older than Archelaus, who succeeded Herod the Great soon after the birth of Christ, Manaen must have been somewhat advanced in years in A. D. 44, when he appears before us in Acts i. c. One of the two principal views in regard to the Gr. an-trophos in this passage is that it = comrade, associate, or, more strictly, one brought up, educated with another (Calvin, Grotius, Schott, Baumgarten, &c.). This is the more frequent sense of the word. The other view is that it = foster-brother, brought up at the same breast, and so Manas's mother, or the woman who reared him, would have been also Herod's nurse (A. V. margin, Kuinoel, Olshausen, De Wette, Alford, &c.). Walch thinks (according to Prof. Hackett) that Manas was educated in Herod's family along with Antipas and some of his other children, and at the same time stood in the stricter relation of foster-brother to Antipas. He lays particular stress on the statement of Josephus (xvii. 1, § 3) that the brothers Antipas and Archelaus were educated in a private way at Rome. It is singular that Josephus (xv. 10, § 5) mentions a certain Manaem, who was in high repute among the Essenes for wisdom and sanctity, and who foretold to Herod the Great, in early life, that he was destined to attain royal honors. Lightfoot surmises that the Manaem of Josephus may be "some very near relation" of the one mentioned in the Acts.

Man'a-hath (Heb. rest, Ges.), a place named in 1 Chr. viii. 6 only, in connection with the genealogies of the tribe of Benjamin. Of the situation of Manahath we know little or nothing. It is tempting to believe it = the MENCHAH mentioned, according to many interpreters, in Judg. xx. 48. Manahath is usually identified with a place of similar name in Judah (MANAHATHITES), but this identification is difficult to receive (so Mr. Grove).

Man'a-heth-ites, the. "Half the Manahethites" are named in the genealogies of Judah as descended from Shobal, the father of Kirjath-jearim (1 Chr. ii. 52), and half from Salma, the founder of Bethlehem (ver. 54). Fürst, &c., make the Hebrew phrase translated "half the Manahethites" in ver. 52 the proper name of a city, as in A. V. margin "HATS-HAMMENTCHOTH" (= midst of the resting-places), and the corresponding phrase in ver. 54, Hälei-ham-mänachti, a patronymic = an inhabitant of this city. Mr. Grove supposes this place to be in Judah, not the MANAHATH of 1 Chr. viii. 6, but probably = Manocho, one of the eleven cities which in the LXX. text are inserted between ver. 59 and 60 of Josh. xv.

Man-as-se's (Gr.) = MANASSEH 3, of the sons of Pahath-moab (1 Esd. ix. 31; compare Ezr. x. 30).

Ma-nas'sch (Heb. who makes forget, Ges.). 1. Eldest son of JOSEPH by his wife Asenath the Egyptian (Gen. xli. 51, xlvii. 20). The birth of the child was the first thing which had occurred since Joseph's banishment from Canaan to alleviate his sorrows and fill the void left by the father and the brother he so longed to behold, and it was natural that he should commemorate his acquisition in the name Manasseh, Forgetting—"For God hath-made-me-forget" (Heb. nashahani) all my toil and all my father's house." Both he and EPHRAIM were born before the commencement of the famine. Whether the elder of the two sons was inferior in form or promise to the younger, or whether there was any external reason to justify the preference of Jacob, we are not told. It is only certain that, when the youths were brought before their aged grandfather to receive his blessing and his name, and be adopted as foreigners into his family, Manasseh was degraded, in spite of the efforts of Joseph, into the second place. It is the first indication of the inferior rank in the nation which the tribe descended from him afterward held, in relation to that of his more fortunate brother. But though, like his grand-uncle Esau, Manasseh had lost his birthright in favor of his younger brother, he received, as Esau had, a blessing only inferior to the birthright itself. At the time of this interview Manasseh seems to have been about twenty-two years of age. Whether he married in Egypt we are not told. It is recorded that the children of MACHIR (his son by a concubine) were embraced by Joseph before his death, but of the personal history of the patriarch Manasseh himself no trait whatever is given in the Bible, either in the Pentateuch or in 1 Chronicles. The position of the tribe of Manasseh during the march to Canaan was with Ephraim and Benjamin on the W. side of the sacred Tent. The chief of the tribe at the time of the census at Sinai was Gamaliel, son of Pedahzur, and its numbers were then 32,200 (Num. i. 10, 35, ii. 20, 21, vii. 54-59). Forty years later Manasseh had increased to 52,700 (xxvi. 34). Of the three tribes who had elected to remain on that side of the Jordan, Reuben and Gad had chosen their lot because the country was suitable to their pastoral possessions and tendencies. But MACHIR, JAIR, and NOBAH, the sons of Manasseh, were no shepherds. They were pure warriors (xxxii. 39; Deut. iii. 18-15). The district which these ancient warriors conquered was among the most difficult, if not the most difficult, in the whole country. It embraced the hills of GILEAD with their inaccessible heights and impassable ravines, and the almost impregnable tract of ARGOB, the modern Lejah. (ASHTAROTH; EDREI; GOLAN.) The few personages of eminence whom we can with certainty identify as Manassites, such as GIDEON and JEPHTHAH—for ELIJAH and others may, with equal probability, have belonged to the neighboring tribe of GAD—were among the most remarkable characters that Israel produced. But with the one exception of Gideon the warlike tendencies of Manasseh seem to have been confined to the E. of the Jordan. There they thrived exceedingly, pushing their way northward over the rich plains of Jaulán and Jedür to the foot of Mount Hermon (1 Chr. v. 28). At the time of the coronation of David at Hebron, while the western Manasseh sent 18,000, and Ephraim itself 20,800, the eastern Manasseh, with Gad and Reuben, mustered 120,000. But, though thus outwardly prosperous, a similar fate awaited them in the end to that which befell Gad and Reuben; they gradually assimilated themselves to the old inhabitants of the country (ver. 25). They relinquished, too, the settled mode of life and the defined limits which befitted the members of a federal nation, and gradually became Bedouins of the wilderness (ver. 19, 22). On them first descended, the inevitable consequence of such misdoing. They, first of all Israel, were carried away by Pul and Tiglath-pileser, and settled in the Assyrian territories (ver. 26). The connection, however, between E. and W. had been kept up to a certain degree. In BETH-SHEAN, the most easterly city of the Cis-jordanic Manasseh, the two portions all but joined. David had judges or officers there for all matters sacred and secular (xxvi. 32); and Solomon's commissariat officer, Ben-Geber, ruled over the towns of Jair and the whole district of Argob (1 K. iv. 13). The genealogies of the tribe are preserved in Num. xxvi. 28-34; Josh. xvii. 1, &c.; and 1 Chr. vii. 14-19. But it seems impossible to unravel these so as to ascertain e. g. which of the families remained E. of Jordan, and which advanced to the W. Nor is it less difficult to fix the exact position of the territory allotted to the western half. In Josh. xvii. 14-18 we find the two tribes of Joseph complaining that only one portion had been allotted to them, viz. Mount Ephraim (ver. 15). In reply Joshua advises them to go up into the forest (ver. 15, A. V. "wood"), into the mountain which is a forest (ver. 18). This mountain clothed with forest can surely be nothing but CARMEL. The majority of the towns of Manasseh were actually on the slopes either of Carmel itself or of the contiguous ranges. (DOR; EN-DOR; IBLEAM; MEGIDDO; TAANACH.) From the absence of any attempt to define a limit to the possessions of the tribe on the N., it looks as if no boundary-line had existed on that side. On the S. side the boundary between Manasseh and Ephraim may be generally traced with tolerable certainty. It began on the E. in the territory of Issachar (xvii. 10) at a place called ASHER (ver. 7) now Yasir or Teydsir, twelve miles N. E. of Nablus. Thence it ran to MICHMETHAH, described as facing Shechem; then went to the right, i. e. apparently northward, to the spring of TAPPUAH 2; there it fell in with the watercourses of the torrent KANAH, along which it ran to the Mediterranean. From the indications of the history it would appear that Manasseh took very little part in public affairs. They either left all that to Ephraim, or were so far removed from the centre of the nation as to have little interest in what was taking place. That they attended David's coronation at Hebron has already been mentioned. When his rule was established over all Israel, each half had its distinct ruler—the western, Joel son of Pedaiah, the eastern, Iddo son of Zechariah (1 Chr. xxvii. 20, 21). From this time the eastern Manasseh fades entirely from our view, and the western is hardly kept before us by an occasional mention. Almost all the scattered notices have reference to the part taken by members of this tribe in the reforms of the good kings of Judah (2 Chr. xv. 9, xxx. 1, 10, 11, 18, xxxi. 1, xxxiv. 6, 9). After the Captivity some of Manasseh appear to have settled in Jerusalem (1 Chr. ix. 3).—2. Son of HEZEKIAH, and thirteenth king of Judah. (ISRAEL, KINGDOM OF; JUDAH, KINGDOM OF.) (In N. T. and Apocrypha MANASSE.) The reign of this monarch is longer than that of any other of the house of David. There is none of which we know so little, partly, perhaps, from the character and policy of the man, but doubtless partly from the abhorrence with which the following generation looked back upon it as the period of lowest degradation for their country. The birth of Manasseh is fixed twelve years before Hezekiah's death (2 K. xxi. 1). We must, therefore, infer that there had been no heir to the throne up to that comparatively late period in his reign, or that any that had been born had died, or that, as sometimes happened in the succession of Jewish and other Eastern kings, the elder son was passed over for the younger. Professor Plumptre supposes the first of these inferences the most probable. Hezekiah, it would seem, recovering from his sickness, anxious to avoid the danger that had threatened him of leaving his kingdom without an heir, married at or about this time HEPHZIBAH (2 K. xxi. 1), the daughter of one of the citizens or princes of Jerusalem (Jos. x. 3, § 1). The child born from this union is called Manasseh, because (so Prof. Plumptre thinks) this name embodied what had been for years the cherished object of Hezekiah's policy and hope. To take advantage of the overthrow of the rival kingdom by Shalmaneser, and the anarchy in which its provinces had been left, to gather round him the remnant of the population, to bring them back to the worship and faith of their fathers, this had been the second step in his great national reformation (2 Chr. xxx. 6). It was at least partially successful. "Divers of Asher, Manasseh, and Zebulun, humbled themselves and came to Jerusalem." They were there at the great passover. The work of destroying idols went on in Ephraim and Manasseh as well as in Judah (xxxi. 1). The last twelve years of Hezekiah's reign were not, however, it will be remembered, those which were likely to influence for good the character of his successor. His policy had succeeded. He had thrown off the yoke of the king of Assyria, and had made himself the head of an independent kingdom. But he goes a step further. The ambition of being a great potentate continued, and it was to the results of this ambition that the boy Manasseh succeeded at the age of twelve. His accession appears to have been the signal for an entire change, if not in the foreign policy, at any rate in the religious administration of the kingdom. The change which the king's measures brought about was, after all, superficial. The idolatry publicly discountenanced, was practised privately (Is. i. 29, ii. 20, lxx. 3). It was, moreover, the traditional policy of "the princes of Judah" (compare 2 Chr. xxiv. 17), to favor foreign ALLIANCES and the toleration of foreign worship, as it was that of the true priests and prophets to protest against it. It would seem, accordingly, as if they urged upon the young king that scheme of a close alliance with Babylon which Isaiah had condemned, and as the natural consequence of this, the adoption, as far as possible, of its worship, and that of other nations whom it was desirable to conciliate. The result was a debasement which had not been equalled even in the reign of Ahaz, uniting in one centre the abominations which elsewhere existed separately. Not content with sanctioning their presence in the Holy City, as Solomon and Rehoboam had done, he defiled with it the Sanctuary itself (xxxiii. 4). The worship thus introduced was predominantly Babylonian in its character (6; 2 K. xxiii. 12; Is. lxx. 3, 11; Jer. viii. 2, xix. 13, xxxii. 29; Zeph. i. 5). With this, however, there was associated the old MOLECH worship of the Ammonites. The fires were rekindled in the valley of HINNOM. The BAAL and ASHTAROTH ritual, which had been imported under Solomon from the Phenicians, was revived with fresh splendor. (ASHERAH; GROVE.) All this was accompanied by the extremest moral degradation. Every faith was tolerated but the old faith of Israel. This was abandoned and proscribed (2 Chr. xxxiii. 16, xxxv. 3). It is easy to imagine the bitter grief and burning indignation of those who continued faithful. They spoke out in words of corresponding strength. Evil was coming on Jerusalem which should make the ears of men to tingle (2 K. xxi. 12). The line of Samaria and the plummet of the house of Ahab should be the doom of the Holy City. Like a vessel that had once been full of precious ointment, but had afterward become foul, Jerusalem should be emptied and wiped out, and exposed to the winds of heaven till it was cleansed. Foremost, we may well believe, among those who thus bore their witness was the old prophet (ISAIAH), now bent with the weight of fourscore years, who had in his earlier days protested with equal courage against the crimes of the king's grandfather. On him too, according to the old Jewish tradition, came the first shock of the persecution. But the persecution did not stop there. It attacked the whole order of the true prophets, and those who followed them (Jos. x. 3, § 1; 2 K. xxi. 16). The heart and the intellect of the nation were crushed out, and there seem to have been no chroniclers left to record this portion of its history. Retribution came soon in the natural sequence of events. There are indications that the neighboring nations—Philistines, Moabites, Ammonites—who had been tributary under Hezekiah, revolted at some period in Manasseh's reign, and asserted their independence (Zeph. ii. 4–19; Jer. xlvii., xlviii., xlix.). The Babylonian alliance bore the fruits which had been predicted. The rebellion of Merodach-baladan was crushed, and then the wrath of the Assyrian king (ESAR-HADDON) fell on those who had supported him. Judea was again overrun by the Assyrian armies, and this time the invasion was more successful than that of Sennacherib. The city apparently was taken. The king himself was made prisoner and carried off to Babylon. There his eyes were opened, and he repented, and his prayer was heard, and the Lord delivered him (2 Chr. xxxiii. 12, 18). Two questions meet us at this point. (I.) Have we satisfactory grounds for believing that this statement is historically true? (II.) If we accept it, to what period in Manasseh's reign is it to be assigned? It has been urged in regard to (I.) that the silence of the writer of the books of KINGS is conclusive against the trustworthiness of the narrative of 2 CHRONICLES (Winer, Rosenmüller, Hitzig). But (1.) the silence of a writer who sums up the history of a reign of fifty-five years in nineteen verses as to one alleged event in it is surely a weak ground for refusing to accept that event on the authority of another historian. (2.) The omission is in part explained by the character of the narrative of 2 K. xxi. The writer deliberately turns away from the history of the days of shame, and not less from the personal biography of the king. (3.) The character of the writer of 2 Chronicles, obviously a Levite, and looking at the facts of the history from the Levite point of view, would lead him to attach greater importance to a partial reinstatement of the old ritual and to the cessation of persecution. (4.) There is one peculiarity in the history which is, in some measure, of the nature of an undesigned coincidence, and so confirms it. The captains of the host of Assyria take Manasseh to Babylon. The narrative fits in, with the utmost accuracy, to the facts of Oriental history. The first attempt of Babylon to assert its independence of Nineveh failed. It was crushed by Esar-haddon, and for a time the Assyrian king held his court at Babylon, so as to effect more completely the reduction of the rebellious province. There is (5.) the fact of agreement with the intervention of the Assyrian king in 2 K. xvii. 24, just at the same time. The circumstance just noticed enables us to return an approximate answer to the other question. (II.) The duration of Esar-haddon's Babylonian reign is calculated as from B.C. 680–667 (so Prof. Plumptre; but see ESAR-HADDON); Manasseh's captivity must therefore have fallen within those limits. A Jewish tradition fixes the twenty-second year of his reign as the exact date; and this, according as we adopt the earlier or the later date of his accession, would give B.C. 676 or 673. The period that followed is dwelt upon by the writer of 2 Chronicles as one of a great change for the better. The compassion or death of Esar-haddon led to his release, and he returned after some uncertain interval of time to Jerusalem. The old faith of Israel was no longer persecuted.

Foreign idolatries were no longer thrust, in all their foulness, into the Sanctuary itself. The altar of the Lord was again restored, and peace-offerings and thank-offerings sacrificed to Jehovah (2 Chr. xxxiii. 15, 16). But beyond this the reformation did not go (17). The other facts known of Manasseh's reign connect themselves with the state of the world round him. The Assyrian monarchy was tottering to its fall, and the king of Judah seems to have thought that it was still possible for him to rule as the head of a strong and independent kingdom. He fortified Jerusalem (xxvii. 3), and put captains of war in all the fenced cities of Judah. There was, it must be remembered, a special reason. Egypt was become strong and aggressive under Psammetichus. About this time we find the thought of an Egyptian alliance again beginning to gain favor. The very name of Manasseh's son, AMON = the great sun-god of Egypt, is probably an indication of the gladness with which the alliance of Psammetichus was welcomed. As one of its consequences, it involved probably the supply of troops from Judah to serve in the armies of the Egyptian king. In return for this, Manasseh, we may believe, received the help of the chariots and horses for which Egypt was always famous (Is. xxxi. 1). (CHARIOT; HORSE.) If this was the close of Manasseh's reign, we can understand how it was that on his death he was buried as Ahaz had been, not with the burial of a king in the sepulchres of the house of David, but in the garden of Uzza (2 K. xxi. 26), and that, long afterward, in spite of his repentance, the Jews held his name in abhorrence. The habits of a sensuous and debased worship had eaten into the life of the people; and though they might be repressed for a time by force, as in the reformation of Josiah, they burst out again, when the pressure was removed, with fresh violence, and rendered even the zeal of the best of the Jewish kings fruitful chiefly in hypocrisy and unreality. The intellectual life of the people suffered in the same degree. The persecution cut off all who, trained in the schools of the prophets, were the thinkers and teachers of the people. But little is added by later tradition to the O. T. narrative of Manasseh's reign. (MANASSEH, THE PRAYER OF.) There are reasons, however, for believing that there existed at some time or other, a fuller history, more or less legendary, of Manasseh and his conversion.—3. One of the descendants of Pahath-moab, who in Ezra's days put away his foreign wife (Ezr. x. 30).—4. One of the family of Hashum, who put away his foreign wife at Ezra's command (38).—5. In the Hebrew and A. V. text of Judg. xviii. 30, the name of the priest of the graven image of the Danites is given as "Jonathan, the son of Gershom, the son of Manasseh;" the last word being written in Hebrew מְנַשֶּׁה, and a Masoretic note calling attention to the "nun suspended." The Hebrew here is read, with the nun (נ = n), Mēnaahsheh = Manasseh, or, without the nun, Mōsheh = Moses. Rashi's note upon the passage is—"On account of the honor of Moses he wrote Nun to change the name; and it is written suspended to signify that it was not Manasseh but Moses." The LXX., Peshito-Syriac, and Chaldee all read "Manasseh," but the Vulgate retains the original and undoubtedly (so Mr. Wright) the true reading, Moyse (= Moses). Kennicott attributes the presence of the Nun to the corruption of MSS. by Jewish transcribers. With regard to the chronological difficulty of accounting for the presence of a grandson of Moses at an apparently late period, there is every reason to believe that the last five chapters of Judges refer to earlier events than those after which they are placed. In xx. 28 Phinehas the son of Eleazar, and therefore the grandson of Aaron, is said to have stood before the ark, and there is therefore no difficulty in supposing that a grandson of Moses might be alive at the same time, which was not long after the death of Joshua.

Ma-nas'ses [-seez] (Gr. fr. Heb. = MANASSEH). 1. MANASSEH 4 (1 Esd. ix. 33).—2. MANASSEH 2, king of Judah (Mat. i. 10). (MANASSES, PRAYER OF.)—3. MANASSEH 1, the son of Joseph (Rev. vii. 6).—4. A wealthy inhabitant of Bethulia, and husband of JUDITH 2, according to the legend (Jd. viii. 2, 7, x. 3, xvi. 22-24). JUDITH, THE BOOK OF.

Ma-nas'ses (see above), the Prayer of. 1. The repentance and restoration of MANASSEH 2 (2 Chr. xxxiii. 12 ff.) furnished the subject of many legendary stories. "His prayer unto his God" was still preserved "in the book of the kings of Israel" when the Chronicles were compiled (xxxiii. 18), and, after this record was lost, the subject was likely to attract the notice of later writers. "The Prayer of Manasseh," which is found in some MSS. of the LXX., is the work of one who has endeavored to express, not without true feeling, the thoughts of the repentant king. 2. The Greek text is undoubtedly original, and not a mere translation from the Hebrew (so Mr. Westcott). The writer was well acquainted with the LXX. But beyond this there is nothing to determine the date or place at which he lived. The allusion to the patriarchs (1, 8) appears to fix the authorship on a Jew; but the clear teaching on repentance points to a time certainly not long before the Christian era. 3. The earliest reference to the Prayer is contained in a fragment of Julius Africanus (about 221 A. D.), but it may be doubted whether the words in their original form clearly referred to the present composition. It is, however, given at length in the Apostolical Constitutions. The Prayer is found in the Alexandrine MS. 4. The Prayer was never distinctly recognized as a canonical writing, though it was included in many MSS. of the LXX. and of the Latin version, and has been deservedly retained among the APOCRYPHA in A. V. and by Luther. The Latin translation which occurs in Vulgate MSS. is not by Jerome.

Ma-nas'sites, the = the descendants of MANASSEH 1, and members of his tribe (Deut. iv. 43; Judg. xii. 4; 2 K. x. 33).

Mandrakes (Heb. pl. duddim). The duddim are mentioned in Gen. xxx. 14-16, and in Cant. vii. 13. From the former passage we learn that they were found in the fields of Mesopotamia, where Jacob and his wives were at one time living, and that the fruit was gathered "in the days of wheat-harvest," i. e. in May. From Cant. vii. 13 we learn that the plant in question was strong-scented, and that it grew in Palestine. Various conjectures have been made, but probably the mandrake (Atropa Mandragora) is the plant denoted by the Hebrew word. The LXX., Vulgate, Syriac, and Arabic versions, the Targums, the most learned of the Rabbis, and many later commentators, favor the A. V. translation. The mandrake is far from odoriferous, the whole plant being, in European estimation at all events, very fetid. But Oedmann, after quoting authorities to show that the mandrakes were prized by the Arabs for their odor, makes the following just remark:—"It is known that Orientals set an especial value on strongly-smelling things that to more delicate European senses are displeasing . . . . The intoxicating qualities of the mandrake, far from lessening its value, would rather add to it, for every one knows with what relish the Orientals use all kinds of preparations to produce intoxication." It is a matter of common belief in the East that this plant has the power to aid in the procreation of offspring. That the fruit was fit to be gathered at the time of the wheat-harvest is clear from the testimony of several travellers. Schultze found mandrake-apples on the 15th of May. Hasselquist saw them at Nazareth early in May. Thomson found mandrakes ripe on the lower ranges of Lebanon and Hermon toward the end of April.

Ma'neh. WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

Man'ger [main'jer] occurs only in connection with the birth of Christ, in Lk. ii. 7, 12, 16. The original Gr. term is phatné, which is found but once besides in the N. T., viz. Lk. xiii. 15, where it is rendered by "stall." The word in classical Greek undoubtedly = a manger, crib, or feeding-trough; but, according to Schleusner, in the N. T. it = the open court-yard attached to the ixn or khan, and enclosed by a rough fence of stones, wattle, or other slight material, into which the cattle would be shut at night, and where the poorer travellers might unpack their animals and take up their lodging, when they were either by want of room or for means excluded from the house. This conclusion is supported by the Vulgate and Peshito-Syriac, and by the customs of Palestine. (BARN.) The above interpretation is of course at variance with the traditional belief that the Nativity took place in a cave. Stanley (151 f., 434 ff.) has, however, shown how destitute of foundation this tradition is.

Ma'ni (Gr.) = BANI 4 (1 Esd. ix. 30).

Man'li-us, Ti'tus (both L., Manlius [i. e. born early in the morning (so Pott)] denoting the Roman clan to which he belonged; see TITUS). In the account of the conclusion of the campaign of Lysias (B. C. 163) against the Jews given in 2 Mc. xi., four letters are introduced, of which the last purports to be from "Quintus Memmius, and Titus Manlius, ambassadors of the Romans" (ver. 34-38), confirming the concessions made by Lysias. There can be but little doubt that the letter is a fabrication. (APOCRYPHA.) No such names occur among the many legates to Syria noticed by Polybius; and there is no room for the mission of another embassy between two recorded shortly before and after the death of Antiochus Epiphanes. If, as seems likely, the true reading is Titus Manius (not Manlius), the writer was probably thinking of the former embassy when Caius Sulpicius and Manius Sergius were sent to Syria.

Man'na (Heb. mān). The most important passages on this topic are—Ex. xvi. 14-36; Num. xi. 7-9; Deut. viii. 3, 16; Josh. v. 12; Ps. lxxviii. 24, 25; Wis. xvi. 20, 21. From these passages we learn that the manna came every morning except the Sabbath, in the form of a small round seed resemall palates; that the whole nation subsisted upon it for forty years; that it suddenly ceased when they first got the new corn of the land of Canaan; and that it was always regarded as a miraculous gift directly from God, and not as a product of nature. The natural products of the Arabian deserts and other Oriental regions, which bear the name of manna, have not the qualities or uses ascribed to the manna of Scripture. They are all condiments or medicines rather than food, produced only three or four months in the year, in small quantities, capable of being kept a long time, but just as liable to deteriorate on the Sabbath as on any other day, not supplied in double quantity on the day before the Sabbath, nor ceasing at once and for ever. The manna of Scripture we regard therefore (so Prof. Stowe) as wholly miraculous, and not in any respect a product of nature. The etymology and meaning of the word are best given by the LXX., Vulgate, and Josephus. According to all these authorities, with which the Syriac also agrees, the Heb. word mān, by which this substance is always designated in the Hebrew Scriptures, is the neuter interrogative pronoun (what?); and the name is derived from the inquiry (Heb. mān hū = what is this?), which the Hebrews made when they first saw it upon the ground. The Arabian physician Avicenna thus describes the manna which in his time was used as a medicine:—"Manna is a dew which falls on stones or bushes, becomes thick like honey, and can be bling the hoar frost; that it must be gathered early, before the sun became so hot as to melt it; that it must be gathered every day except the Sabbath; that the attempt to lay aside for a succeeding day, except on the day immediately preceding the Sabbath, failed by the substance becoming wormy and offensive; that it was prepared for food by grinding and baking; that its taste was like fresh oil, and like wafers made with honey, equally agreeable to hardened so as to be like grains of corn." The substance now called manna in the Arabian desert through which the Israelites passed, is collected in June from the tarfa or tamarisk shrub (Tamarix Gallia). According to Burckhardt it drops from the thorns on the sticks and leaves with which the ground is covered, and must be gathered early in the day, or it will be melted by the sun. The Arabs cleanse and boil it, strain it through a cloth, and put it in leathern bottles; and in this way it can be kept uninjured for several years. They use it like honey or butter with their unleavened bread, but never make it into cakes or eat it by itself. Rauwolf and some more recent travellers have observed that the dried grains of the Oriental manna were like the coriander-seed. Niebuhr observed that at Mardin in Mesopotamia, the mannas like meal on the leaves of a tree called in the East ballôt and afk or as, which he regards as a species of oak. The harvest is in July and August, and much more plentiful in wet than in dry seasons. In the valley of the Jordan Burckhardt found manna like gum on the leaves and branches of the tree gharroh, which is as large as the olive-tree, having a leaf like the poplar, though somewhat broader. Two other shrubs which have been supposed to yield the manna of Scripture, are the Alhagi Maurorum, or Persian manna, and the Alhagi Desertorum—thorny plants common in Syria, and sometimes called camel's thorn. The manna of European commerce comes mostly from Calabria and Sicily. It is gathered during the months of June and July from some species of ash (Ornus Europæa and Ornus rotundifolia), from which it drops in consequence of a puncture by an insect resembling the locust, but distinguished from it by having a sting under its body. The substance is fluid at night, and resembles the dew, but in the morning it begins to harden.—In allusion to the manna or "bread from heaven," our Saviour declares Himself "the true bread from heaven" (Jn. vi. 31 ff.). The "hidden manna" (Rev. ii. 17) symbolizes the enjoyments of the kingdom of heaven; in allusion to the manna laid up in the ark, of which the antitype is in the true temple in heaven (Ex. xvi. 33 ff.; Rev. xi. 19; compare Heb. ix. 4, 11) (Rbn. N. T. Lex.).

Ma-no'ah (Heb. a resting, rest, Ges.), the father of Samson; a Danite, native of Zorah (Judg. xiii. 2). The narrative of the Bible (xiii. 1-23), of the circumstances which preceded the birth of Samson, supplies us with very few and faint traits of Manoah's character or habits. He seems to have had some occupation which separated him during part of the day from his wife, though that was not field-work, because it was in the field that his wife was found by the angel during his absence. He was hospitable, as his forefather Abraham had been before him; he was a worshipper of Jehovah, and reverent to a great degree of fear. These faint lineaments are brought into somewhat greater distinctness by Josephus (v. 8, §§ 2, 3), on what authority we have no means of judging, though his account is doubtless founded on some ancient Jewish tradition or record. We hear of Manoah once again in connection with the marriage of Samson to the Philistine of Timnath. His father and mother remonstrated with him thereon, but to no purpose (Judg. xiv. 2, 3). They then accompanied him to Timnath, both on the preliminary visit (5, 6), and to the marriage itself (9, 10). Manoah appears not to have survived his son (xvi. 31).

Man-slay-er. The cases of manslaughter mentioned appear to be a sufficient sample of the intention of the lawgiver. a. Death by a blow in a sudden quarrel (Num. xxxv. 22). b. Death by a stone or missile thrown at random (22, 23). c. By the blade of an axe flying from its handle (Deut. xix. 5). d. Whether the case of a person killed by falling from a roof unprovided with a parapet involved the guilt of manslaughter on the owner, is not clear; but the law seems intended to prevent the imputation of malice in any such case, by preventing as far as possible the occurrence of the fact itself (xxii. 8). In all these and the like cases the manslayer was allowed to retire to a CITY OF REFUGE. (BLOOD, AVENGER OF.) Besides these the following may be mentioned as cases of homicide: a. An animal, not known to be vicious, causing death to a human being, was to be put to death, and regarded as unclean. But if it was known to be vicious, the owner also was liable to fine, and even death (Ex. xxi. 28, 31). b. A thief overtaken at night in the act might lawfully be put to death, but if the sun had risen the act of killing him was to be regarded as MURDER (Ex. xxii. 2, 3). PUNISHMENTS.

Man'tle, the A. V. translation of—1. Heb. stini-châh (Judg. iv. 18 only; margin "rug," or "blanket"). It denotes the thing with which Jael covered Sisera. It may be inferred that it was some part of the regular furniture of the tent. The clew to a more exact signification is given by the Arabic version of the Polyglott, which renders it by alca-tifah, a word explained by Dozy to mean certain articles of a thick fabric, in shape like a plaid or shawl, which are commonly used for beds by the Arabs.—2. Heb. mê'il (1 Sam. xv. 27, xxviii. 14; Ezr. ix. 3, 5; Job i. 20, ii. 12; Ps. cix. 29), in other passages of the A. V. rendered "coat," "cloak," and "robe." (DRESS, III.) This inconsistency is undesirable; but in one case only—that of Samuel—is it of importance. It is interesting to know that the garment which his mother made and brought to the infant prophet at her annual visit to the Holy Tent at Shiloh was a miniature of the official priestly tunic or robe; the same that the great prophet wore in mature years (1 Sam. xv. 27), and by which he was on one occasion actually identified by Saul (xxviii. 14).—3. Heb. ma'atpâhâh (Is. iii. 22 only), apparently some article of a lady's dress; probably an exterior tunic, longer and ampler than the internal one, and provided with sleeves (so Mr. Grove, after Schroeder; see DRESS, III.).—4. Heb. addereth (1 K. xix. 13, 19; 2 K. ii. 8, 13, 14); elsewhere translated "garment" (Gen. xxv. 25; Josh. vii. 21, 24; Zech. xiii. 14), once "robe" (Jon. iii. 6). By it, and it only, is denoted the cape or wrapper which, with the exception of a strip of skin or leather round his loins, formed, as we have every reason to believe, the sole garment of the prophet Elijah (so Mr. Grove). It was probably of sheepskin, such as is worn by the modern dervishes. Gesenius translates the Hebrew word, a wide cloak, mantle, L. pollum; Fürst, mantle, properly the wide, large overcoat in which persons wrapped themselves. BABYLONISH GARMENT; DRESS; GIRDLE.

* Man'-scripts. OLD TESTAMENT; NEW TESTAMENT.

Ma'ach (Heb. breast-band? Ges.; a poor one, Fül.), the father of ACHISH, king of Gath, with whom David took refuge (1 Sam. xxvii. 2).

Ma'on (Heb. habitation, dwelling, Ges., Fül.), a city in the mountains of Judah; a member of the same group with Carmel and Ziph (Josh. xv. 55). In the "wilderness" (DESERT 2), of Maon David and his men were lurking when the treachery of the Ziphites brought Saul upon them (1 Sam. xxiii. 24, 25). Over its pastures ranged the sheep and goats of Nabal (xxv. 2). Robinson identifies Maon with Ma'in, a lofty conical hill, about seven miles S. of Hebron. In the genealogical records of Judah in 1 Chr. ii. 45, Maon appears as a descendant of Hebron, and in its turn the "father" or colonizer of Beth-zur. In the original the name of Maon is identical with that of the MEHUNIM, and before the conquest it may possibly have been one of their towns.

Ma'on-ites (fr. Heb. = MAON), the, a people mentioned in one of the addresses of Jehovah to the repentant Israelites (Judg. x. 12). The name = MEHUNIM; but, as no invasion of Israel by this people is related before the date of the passage in question, various explanations and conjectures have been offered. The reading of the LXX. is "Midian."

Ma'ra (Heb. = MARAH, Ges.), the name which NAOMI adopted in the exclamation forced from her by the recognition of her fellow-citizens at Bethlehem (Ru. i. 20), "Call me not Naomi (pleasant), but call me Mara (bitter), for Shaddai (A. V. 'the Almighty') hath dealt very bitterly with me."

Marah (Heb. bitter, bitterness, i. e. calamity, Ges.), a place in the wilderness of Shur or Etham, three days' journey distant (Ex. xv. 22-24; Num. xxxiii. 8) from the place at which the Israelites crossed the Red Sea, and where was a spring of bitter water, sweetened subsequently by the casting in of a tree which "the Lord showed" to Moses. Burckhardt suggested that Moses made use of the berries of the plant Ghurkud. Robinson could not find that this or any tree was now known to the Arabs to possess such properties; nor would those berries have been found so early in the season (two or three weeks after the Passover). The transaction was surely miraculous, and the effect would be permanent. Hawrah, distant sixteen and a half hours from Ayoun Mousa, has been by Robinson, as also by Burckhardt, Schubert, and Wellsted, identified with it, apparently because it is the bitterest water in the neighborhood. Winer says that a still bitterer well lies E. of Marah, the claims of which Tischendorf, it appears, has supported. Lepsius prefers Wady Ghurundel. Stanley thinks that the claims may be left between this and Hawrah.

Mar-an-ath'a (1 Cor. xvi. 22), a Grecized form of the Aramaic words māran āthā = our Lord cometh. It appears to be "a weighty watchword," to impress on the disciples the truth that the Lord was at hand, and that they should be ready for His coming (Alford).

Mar'ble. Like the Gr. marmaros, the Heb. shésh, the generic term for marble, probably = almost any shining stone. The so-called marble of Solomon's architectural works, which Josephus calls white stone, may thus have been limestone—(a) from near Jerusalem; (b) from Lebanon (Jura limestone), identical with the material of the Sun Temple at Baalbec; or (c) white marble from Arabia or elsewhere. There can be no doubt that Herod, both in the Temple and elsewhere, employed Parian or other marble. The marble pillars and tesserae of various colors of the palace at Susa came doubtless from Persia itself (Esth. i. 6). ALABASTER; ARCHITECTURE; COLORS, I. 1; PALESTINE, Geology. PORPHYRE.

Mar-chesh van [-kesh-]. MONTH.

Mar'cus (L. a large hammer, Isidore of Seville; among the Romans a common first name, afterward also a surname) = the Evangelist MARK (Col. iv. 10; Phn. 24; 1 Pet. v. 18).

Mar-do-ché-us (L. Mardocheus, fr. Heb. = MOR-DECAI). 1. MORDECAI 1, the uncle of Esther (Esth. x. 1, xi. 2, 12, xii. 1-8, xvi. 13; 2 Mc. xv. 36).—2. MORDECAI 2 (1 Esd. v. 8).

Ma-re'shah (Heb. at the head, Ges.; possession, Fū.). 1. A city of Judah in the low country; named in the same group with KEILAH and NEZIB (Josh. xv. 44). If we may so interpret the notices of 1 Chr. ii. 42, Hebron itself was colonized from Mare-shah. It was one of the cities fortified and garrisoned by Rehoboam after the rupture with the northern kingdom (2 Chr. xi. 8). The natural inference is, that it commanded some pass or position of approach. "In the valley of ZEPHATHAH at Mare-shah" ZERAH 5 was met and repulsed by ASA (xiv. 9, 10). Mare-shah is mentioned once or twice in the history of the Maccabean struggles. Judas probably passed through it on his way from Hebron to avenge the defeat of Joseph and Azarias (1 Mc. v. 66). A few days later it afforded a refuge to Gorgias when severely wounded in the attack of Dositheus (2 Mc. xii. 35). It was burnt by Judas in his Idumean war, in passing from Hebron to Azotus. About the year 110 B. C. it was taken from the Idumeans by John Hyrcanus. It was in ruins in the fourth century, when Eusebius and Jerome describe it as in the second mile from Eleutheropolis. A little over a Roman mile S. S. W. of Beit Jibrin (ELEUTHEROPOLIS) is a site called Marash, which is very possibly the representative of the ancient Marashah. It was the native place of the prophet ELIEZER 6, and is one of the towns which Micah attempts to rouse to a sense of danger (2 Chr. xx. 37; Mic. i. 15). (GATH; MORESHETH-GATH).—2. Father of Hebron, and apparently = MESAHA 2 (1 Chr. ii. 42).—3. In 1 Chr. iv. 21 we find Mare-shah again named as deriving his origin from SHELAH, the third son of Judah.

Mar'i-sa (Gr.) = MARESHAH (2 Mc. xii. 35).

Mark (Gr. Markos, fr. L. MARCUS). Mark the evangelist probably = "John whose surname was Mark" (Acts xii. 12, 25). Grotius indeed maintains the contrary. But John was the Jewish name, and Mark = MARCUS, a name of frequent use amongst the Romans, was adopted afterward, and gradually superseded the other. John Mark was the son of a certain Mary, who dwelt at Jerusalem, and was probably born in that city (xii. 12). He was the cousin (so Archbishop Thomson, Robinson, &c.; A. V. "sister's son") of BARNABAS (Col. iv. 10). To Mary's house, as to a familiar haunt, Peter came after his deliverance from prison (Acts xii. 12), and there found "many gathered together praying;" and probably John Mark was converted by Peter from meeting him in his mother's house, for he speaks of "Marcus my son" (1 Pet. v. 13). The theory that he was one of the seventy disciples is without any warrant. Another theory, that the "young man having a linen cloth cast about his naked body," mentioned by Mark alone (xiv. 51, 52), was the evangelist himself, has been adopted by Townson, Olshausen, Lange, &c. The detail of facts is remarkably minute, the name only is wanting. Probably (so Archbishop Thomson) Mark suppressed his own name, whilst telling a story which he had the best means of knowing. (LAZARUS 1.) Anxious to work for Christ, he went with PAUL and BARNABAS as their "minister" on their first journey; but at Perga, turned back (Acts xii. 25, xiii. 18). On the second journey Paul would not accept him again as a companion, but Barnabas his kinsman was more indulgent; and thus he became the cause of the memorable "sharp contention" between them (xv. 36-40). Whatever was the cause of Mark's vacillation, it did not separate him forever from Paul, for we find him by the side of that apostle in his first imprisonment at Rome (Col. iv. 10; Phn. 24). In the former place a possible journey of Mark to Asia is spoken of. Somewhat later he is with Peter at BABYLON (1 Pet. v. 13). On his return to Asia he seems to have been with Timothy at Ephesus when Paul wrote to him during his second imprisonment (2 Tim. iv. 11). When we desert Scripture we find the facts doubtful and even inconsistent. The relation of Mark to Peter is of great importance for our view of his Gospel. Ancient writers with one consent make the evangelist the interpreter of the Apostle Peter. Some (Eichhorn, Bertholdt, &c.) explain this word to mean that the office of Mark was to translate into the Greek tongue the Aramaic discourses of the apostle; whilst others (Valesius, Alford, Lange, &c.) adopt the more probable view that Mark wrote a Gospel which conformed more exactly than the others to Peter's preaching, and thus "interpreted" it to the Church at large. (MARK, GOSPEL OF.) The report that Mark was the companion of Peter at Rome, is no doubt of great antiquity. Sent on a mission to Egypt by Peter, Mark there founded the Church of Alexandria, and preached in various places, then returned to Alexandria, of which Church he was bishop, and suffered a martyr's death. But none of these later details rest on sound authority (so Archbishop Thomson).

Mark (see above), Gospel of. The characteristics of this Gospel, the shortest of the four inspired records, will appear from the discussion of the various questions that have been raised about it.—I. Sources of this Gospel. The tradition that it gives the teaching of Peter rather than of the rest of the apostles, has been alluded to. (MARK.) John the Presbyter is spoken of by Papias as the interpreter of Peter. Irenæus calls Mark "interpreter and follower of Peter," and cites the opening and the concluding words of the Gospel as we now possess them (iii., x. 6). Eusebius says, on the authority of Clement of Alexandria, that the hearers of Peter at Rome desired Mark, the follower of Peter, to leave with them a record of his teaching; upon which Mark wrote his Gospel, which the apostle afterward sanctioned with his authority, and directed that it should be read in the churches. Tertullian speaks of the Gospel of Mark as being connected with Peter, and so having apostolic authority. If the evidence of the apostle's connection with this Gospel rested wholly on these passages, it would not be sufficient, since the witnesses, though many in number, are not all independent of each other. But there are peculiarities in the Gospel which are best explained by the supposition that Peter in some way superintended its composition. Whilst there is hardly any part of its narrative that is not common to it and some other Gospel, in the manner of the narrative there is often a marked character, which puts aside at once the supposition that we have here a mere epitome of Matthew and Luke. The picture of the same events is far more vivid; touches are introduced such as could only be noted by a vigilant eye-witness, and such as make us almost eye-witnesses of the Redeemer's doings. The most remarkable case of this is the account of the Gadarene demoniac (Mk. v. 3-6). To this must be added that whilst Mark goes over the same ground for the most part as the other evangelists, and especially Matthew, there are many facts thrown in which prove that we are listening to an independent witness. Thus the humble origin of Peter is made known through him (i. 16-20), and his connection with Capernaum (i. 29); he tells us that Levi was "the son of Alphaeus" (ii. 14), that Peter was the name given by our Lord to Simon (iii. 16), and Boanerges a surname added by Him to the names of two others (iii. 17); he assumes the existence of another body of disciples wider than the Twelve (iii. 32, iv. 10, 36, viii. 34, xiv. 51, 52): we owe to him the name of Jairus (v. 22), the word "carpenter" applied to our Lord (vi. 3), the nation of the "Syrophenician" woman (vii. 26); he substitutes Dalmanutha for the "Magdala" of Matthew (viii. 10); he names Bartimeus (x. 46); he alone mentions that our Lord would not suffer any man to carry any vessel through the Temple (xi. 16); and that Simon of Cyrene was the father of Alexander and Rufus (xv. 21). All these are tokens of an independent writer, different from Matthew and Luke, and in the absence of other traditions it is natural to look to Peter. One might hope that much light would be thrown on this question from the way in which Peter is mentioned in the Gospel; but the evidence is not so clear as might have been expected. On the whole, the internal evidence inclines us (so Archbishop Thomson) to accept the account that this Gospel has some connection with Peter. (INSPIRATION.)—II. Relation of Mark to Matthew and Luke. Up to this day three views are maintained with equal ardor: (a) that Mark's Gospel is the original Gospel out of which the other two have been developed (Thiersch, Herder, Storr, Ewald, &c.), (b) that it was a compilation from the other two, and therefore was written last (Griesbach, De Wette, &c.); and (c) that it was copied from Matthew, and forms a link of transition between the other two (Hilgenfeld). It is obvious that they refute one another: the same internal evidence suffices to prove that Mark is the first, and the last, and the intermediate. Let us return to the facts. The Gospel of Mark contains scarcely any events not recited by the others. There are verbal coincidences with each of the others, and sometimes peculiar words from both meet together in the parallel place in Mark. On the other hand, there are unmistakable marks of independence. The hypothesis which best meets these facts is, that whilst the matter common to all three evangelists, or to two of them, is derived from the oral teaching of the apostles, which they had purposely reduced to a common form, our evangelist writes as an independent witness to the truth, and not as a compiler; and that the tradition that the Gospel was written under the sanction of Peter, and its matter in some degree derived from him, is made probable by the evident traces of an eye-witness in many of the narratives. (GOSPELS.)—III. This Gospel written primarily for Gentiles. The evangelist scarcely refers to the O. T. in his own person. The word Law does not once occur. The genealogy of our Lord is likewise omitted. Other matters interesting chiefly to the Jews are likewise omitted; e.g. the references to the O. T. and Law in Mat. xii. 5-7, the reflections on the request of the Scribes and Pharisees for a sign. Mat. xii. 38-45; the parable of the king's son, Mat. xxii. 1-14; and the awful denunciation of the Scribes and Pharisees in Mat. xxiii. Explanations are given in some places, which Jews could not require: thus, Jordan is a "river" (Mk. i. 5; Mat. ii. 6); the Pharisees, &c., "used to fast" (Mk. ii. 18; Mat. ix. 14), and other customs of theirs are described (Mk. vii. 1-4; Mat. xv. 1, 2); "the time of figs was not yet," i. e. at the season of the Passover (Mk. xi. 13; Mat. xxi. 19); the Sadducees' worst tenet is mentioned (Mk. xii. 18); the Mount of Olives is "over against the temple" (Mk. xiii. 3; Mat. xxiv. 3); at the Passover men eat "unleavened bread" (Mk. xiv. 1, 12; Mat. xxvi. 2, 17), and explanations are given which Jews would not need (Mk. xv. 6, 16, 42; Mat. xxvii. 15, 27, 57). Matter that might offend is omitted, as Mat. x. 5, 6, vi. 7, 8. Passages abound in which the antagonism between the Pharisaic legal spirit and the Gospel comes out strongly (Mk. i. 22, ii. 19, 22, x. 5, viii. 15), which hold out hopes to the heathen of admission to the kingdom of heaven even without the Jews (xii. 9), and which put ritual forms below the worship of the heart (ii. 18, iii. 1-5, vii. 5-23, xii. 33). Mark alone preserves these words of Jesus, "The Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath" (ii. 27). From the general testimony of these and other places, whatever may be objected to an inference from one or other amongst them, there is little doubt but that the Gospel was meant for use in the first instance amongst Gentiles.—IV. Time when the Gospel was written. Nothing can be certainly determined on this point. The traditions are contradictory. Irenæus says that it was written after the death of the Apostle Peter; but in other passages (Eusebius H. E.) it is supposed to be written during Peter's lifetime. In the Bible there is nothing to decide the question. It is not likely that it dates before the reference to Mark in Col. iv. 10, where he is only introduced as a relative of Barnabas, as if this were his greatest distinction; and this epistle was written about A. D. 62. On the other hand it was written before the destruction of Jerusalem (Mk. xiii. 13, 24-30, 33, &c.). Probably, therefore, it was written between A. D. 63 and 70.—V. Place where the Gospel was written. The place is as uncertain as the time. Clement, Eusebius, Jerome, and Epiphanius, pronounce for Rome, and many moderns take the same view. Chrysostom thinks Alexandria; but this is not confirmed by other testimony.—VI. Language. The Gospel was written in Greek; of this there can be no doubt if ancient testimony is to weigh. Baronius indeed, on the authority of an old Syriac translation, asserts that Latin was the original language.—VII. Genuineness of the Gospel. All ancient testimony makes Mark the author of a certain Gospel, and that this is the Gospel which has come down to us, there is not the least historical ground for doubting. Owing to the very few sections peculiar to Mark, evidence from patristic quotation is somewhat difficult to produce. Justin Martyr, however, quotes ch. ix. 44, 46, 48, xii. 30, and iii. 17, and Irenæus cites both the opening and closing words (iii. x. 6). An important testimony in any case, but doubly so from the doubt that has been cast on the closing verses (xvi. 9-19). These verses are found in the Alexandrine, Ephrem, Beza, and many other MSS., the principal versions, &c.; but not in the Vatican and Sinaitic MSS., &c. They are rejected by Griesbach, Rosenmüller, Schulz, Fritzsche, Wieseler, Ewald, Meyer, Tischendorf, Alford, &c. Their genuineness is affirmed by Simon, Bengel, Matthæi, Eichhorn, Hug, Kuinoel, Olshausen, Ebrard, De Wette, Bleek, Lachmann, Lange, &c. (Schaff in Lange's Comm., Venables in Kitto, Ayre). (NEW TESTAMENT I, § 39.) With the exception of these few verses the genuineness of the Gospel is placed above the reach of reasonable doubt. (CANON.)—VIII. Style and Diction. The purpose of the evangelist seems to be to place before us a vivid picture of the earthly acts of Jesus. The style is peculiarly suitable to this. He uses the present tense instead of the Greek narrative aorist, almost in every chapter. Precise and minute details as to persons, places, and numbers, abound in the narrative. All these tend to give force and vividness to the picture of the human life of our Lord. On the other side, the facts are not very exactly arranged. Its conciseness sometimes makes this Gospel more obscure than the others (i. 13, ix. 5, 6, iv. 10-34). Many peculiarities of diction may be noticed; amongst them the following:—1. Hebrew (Aramaic) words are used, but explained for Gentile readers (iii. 17, 22, v. 41, vii. 11, 34, ix. 43, x. 46, xiv. 36, xv. 22, 34). 2. Latin words are very frequent. (ARMY II.; EXECUTIONER 2; MONEY; PENNY; PRETORIUM, &c.) 3. The substantive is often repeated instead of the pronoun: as (to cite from ch. ii. only) ii. 16, 18, 20, 22, 27, 28. 4. The same idea is often repeated under another expression, as i. 42, ii. 25, viii. 15, xiv. 68, &c. 5. And sometimes the repetition is effected by means of the opposite, as in i. 22, 44, and many other places. 6. Sometimes emphasis is given by simple reiteration, as in ii. 15, 19. 7. There are many words peculiar to Mark. The diction of Mark presents the difficulty that whilst it abounds in Latin words, and in expressions that recall Latin equivalents, it is still much more akin to the Hebraistic diction of Matthew than to the pure style of Luke.—IX. *Quotations from the O. —X. Contents of the Gospel. Though this Gospel has little historical matter which is not shared with some other, it would be a great error to suppose that the voice of Mark could have been silenced without injury to the divine harmony. It is the history of the war of Jesus against sin and evil in the world during the time that He dwelt as a Man among men. Its motto might well be, as Lange observes, those words of Peter: "How God anointed Jesus of Nazareth with the Holy Ghost and with power; who went about doing good, and healing all that were oppressed of the devil; for God was with Him" (Acts x. 38). The principal divisions in the Gospel are—1. John the Baptist and Jesus (i. 1-13). 2. Acts of Jesus in Galilee

(i. 14–ix. 50). 3. Teaching in Perca, where the spirit of the new kingdom of the Gospel is brought out (x. 1–34). 4. Teaching, trials, and sufferings in Jerusalem. Jesus revealing Himself as Founder of the new kingdom (x. 35–xv. 47). 5. Resurrection (xvi.).

Marriage. The topics which this subject presents to our consideration in connection with Biblical literature may be most conveniently arranged under the following five heads:—I. Its origin and history. II. The conditions under which it could be legally effected. III. The modes by which it was effected. IV. The social and domestic relations of married life. V. The typical and allegorical references to marriage.—I. The institution of marriage is founded on the requirements of man's nature, and dates from the time of his original creation. The Creator, seeing it “not good for man to be alone,” determined to form an “help meet for him” (Gen. ii. 18), and accordingly completed the work by the addition of the female to the male (i. 27). No sooner was the formation of woman effected, than ADAM recognized in that act the will of the Creator as to man's social condition. “Therefore shall a man leave his father and his mother, and shall cleave unto his wife: and they shall be one flesh” (ii. 24). From these words, coupled with the circumstances attendant on the formation of the first woman, we may evolve the following principles:—(1.) The unity of man and wife, as implied in her being formed out of man, and as expressed in the words “one flesh”; (2.) the indissolubleness of the marriage bond, except on the strongest grounds (compare Mat. xix. 9); (3.) monogamy, as the original law of marriage; (4.) the social equality of man and wife; (5.) the subordination of the wife to the husband (1 Cor. xi. 8, 9; 1 Tim. ii. 13); and (6.) the respective duties of man and wife. The introduction of sin into the world modified to a certain extent the mutual relations of man and wife. As the blame of seduction to sin lay on the latter, the condition of subordination was turned into subjection, and it was said to her of her husband, “he shall rule over thee” (Gen. iii. 16). The evil effects of the fall were soon apparent in polygamy (iv. 19), and the promiscuous intermarriage of the “sons of God” (Sethites) with the “daughters of men” (Cainites) in the days preceding the flood (vi. 2). In the post-diluvial age the usages of marriage were marked with the simplicity that characterizes a patriarchal state of society. The rule of monogamy was reestablished by the example of Noah and his sons (vii. 13). The early patriarchs selected their wives from their own family (xi. 29, xxix. 4, xxviii. 2), and the necessity for doing this on religious grounds superseded the prohibitions that afterward held good against such marriages on the score of kindred (xx. 12; Ex. vi. 20; compare Lev. xviii. 9, 12). Polygamy prevailed (Gen. xvi. 4, xxv. 1, 6, xxviii. 9, xxix. 23, 28; 1 Chr. vii. 14), but to a great extent divested of the degradation which in modern times attaches to that practice. In judging of it we must take into regard the following considerations:—(1.) that the principle of monogamy was retained, even in the practice of polygamy, by the distinction made between the chief or original wife and the secondary wives (CONCUBINES); (2.) that the motive which led to polygamy was that absorbing desire of progeny which is prevalent throughout Eastern countries, and was especially powerful among the Hebrews; and (3.) that the power of a parent over his child, and of a master over his slave, was paramount even in matters of marriage, and led in many cases to phases of polygamy that are otherwise quite unintelligible, as, e. g., to the cases where it was adopted by the husband at the request of his wife, under the idea that children born to a slave were in the eye of the law the children of the mistress (Gen. xvi. 3, xxx. 4, 9); or, again, to cases where it was adopted at the instance of the father (xxix. 23, 28; Ex. xxi. 9, 10). DIVORCE also prevailed in the patriarchal age, though but one instance of it is recorded (Gen. xxi. 14). Of this, again, we must not judge by our own standard. The Mosaic Law (LAW OF MOSES) aimed at mitigating rather than removing evils which were inseparable from the state of society in that day. Its enactments were directed (1.) to the discouragement of polygamy; (2.) to obviate the injustice frequently consequent upon the exercise of the rights of a father or a master; (3.) to bring divorce under some restriction; and (4.) to enforce purity of life during the maintenance of the matrimonial bond. The practical results of these regulations may have been very salutary, but on this point we have but small opportunities of judging. The usages themselves, to which we have referred, remained in full force to a late period. In the post-Babylonian period monogamy appears to have become more prevalent than at any previous time: indeed we have no instance of polygamy during this period on record in the Bible, all the marriages noticed being with single wives (Tob. i. 9, ii. 11; Sus. 29, 63; Mat. xviii. 25; Lk. i. 5; Acts v. 1). During the same period the theory of monogamy is set forth in Eccles. xxvi. 1–27. The practice of polygamy nevertheless still existed; Herod the Great had no less than nine wives at one time. The abuse of divorce continued unabated. Our Lord and His apostles reestablished the integrity and sanctity of the marriage-bond by the following measures:—(1.) by the confirmation of the original charter of marriage as the basis on which all regulations were to be framed (Mat. xix. 4, 5); (2.) by the restriction of divorce to the case of fornication (ADULTERY), and prohibition of remarriage in all persons divorced on improper grounds (v. 32, xix. 9; Rom. vii. 3; 1 Cor. vii. 10, 11); (3.) by the enforcement of moral purity generally (Heb. xiii. 4, &c.), and especially by the formal condemnation of fornication, which appears to have been classed among acts morally indifferent by a certain party in the Church (Acts xv. 20). Shortly before the Christian era an important change took place in the views entertained on the question of marriage as affecting the spiritual and intellectual parts of man's nature. Throughout the O. T. period marriage was regarded as the indispensable duty of every man, nor was it surmised that there existed in it any drawback to the attainment of the highest degree of holiness. In the interval between the Old and N. T. periods, a spirit of asceticism had been evolved. The Essenes were the first to propound doubts as to the propriety of marriage: some of them avoided it altogether, others availed themselves of it under restrictions. Similar views were adopted by the Therapeutæ (ALEXANDRIA), and afterward by the Gnostics (PHILOSOPHY); thence they passed into the Christian Church, forming one of the distinctive tenets of the Encratites, and finally developing into the system of monachism.—II. The conditions of legal marriage are decided by the prohibitions which the law of any country imposes upon its citizens. In the Hebrew commonwealth these prohibitions were of two kinds, according as they regulated marriage (i.) between an Israelite and a non-Israelite, and (ii.) between an Israelite and one of his own community. 1. The prohibitions relating to foreigners were based on that instinctive feeling of exclusiveness, which forms one of the bonds of every social body, and which prevails with peculiar strength in a rude state of society. The only distinct prohibition in the Mosaic Law refers to the Canaanites, with whom the Israelites were not to marry on the ground that it would lead them into idolatry (Ex. xxxiv. 16; Deut. vii. 8, 4). But beyond this, the legal disabilities to which the Ammonites and Moabites were subjected (xxiii. 3), acted as a virtual bar to intermarriage with them, totally preventing the marriage of Israelitish women with Moabites, but permitting that of Israelites with Moabite women, such as that of Mahlon with Ruth. The prohibition against marriages with the Edomites or Egyptians was less stringent, as a male of those nations received the right of marriage on his admission to the full citizenship in the third generation of proselytism (xxiii. 7, 8). There were thus three grades of prohibition—total in regard to the Canaanites on either side; total on the side of the males in regard to the Ammonites and Moabites; and temporary on the side of the males in regard to the Edomites and Egyptians, marriage with females in the two latter instances being regarded as legal. Marriages between Israelite women and proselyted foreigners were at all times of rare occurrence (Lev. xxiv. 10; 1 K. vii. 14; 1 Chr. ii. 17, 35). In the reverse case, viz. the marriage of Israelites with foreign women, probably the wives became proselytes after their marriage, as instanced in the case of Ruth (Ru. i. 16); but this was by no means invariably the case (1 K. xi. 4, xvi. 31; Ezr. ix. 2, x. 2; Neh. xiii. 23–25). Proselytism does not therefore appear to have been an essential prerequisite in the case of a wife, though it was so in the case of a husband. In the N. T. no special directions are given on this head, but the general precepts of separation between believers and unbelievers (2 Cor. vi. 14, 17) would apply with special force to the case of marriage. The progeny of illegal marriages between Israelites and non-Israelites was described under a peculiar term, mamzer (A. V. "BASTARD;" Deut. xxiii. 2).—ii. The regulations relative to marriage between Israelites and Israelites may be divided into two classes: 1. general, and 2. special. 1. The general regulations are based on considerations of relationship. The most important passage relating to these is Lev. xvii. 6–18, wherein we have first a general prohibition against marriage between a man and the "flesh of his flesh" (A. V. "near of kin," margin "remainder of his flesh"), and secondly, special prohibitions against marriage with a mother, stepmother, sister, or half-sister, whether "born at home or abroad," grand-daughter, aunt, whether by consanguinity on either side, or by marriage on the father's side, daughter-in-law, brother's wife, step-daughter, wife's mother, step-grand-daughter, or wife's sister during the life-time of the wife. An exception is subsequently made (Deut. xxv. 5) in favor of marriage with a brother's wife in the event of his having died childless (see below). Different degrees of guiltiness attached to the infringement of these prohibitions. The ground on which these prohibitions were enacted are reducible to the following three heads:—(1.) moral propriety; (2.) the practices of heathen nations; and (3.) social convenience. The first of these grounds comes prominently forward in the expressions by which the various offences are characterized, as well as in the general prohibition against approaching "the flesh of his flesh." The second motive to laying down these prohibitions was that the Hebrews might be preserved as a peculiar people, with institutions distinct from those of the Egyptians and Canaanites (Lev. xviii. 3), as well as of other heathen nations with whom they might come in contact. Marriages with half-sisters by the same father were allowed at Athens, with half-sisters by the same mother at Sparta, with full sisters in Egypt and Persia. The third ground of the prohibitions, social convenience, comes forward solely in the case of marriage with two sisters simultaneously, the effect of which would be to "vex" or irritate the first wife, and produce domestic jars. A remarkable exception to these prohibitions existed in favor of marriage with a deceased brother's wife, in the event of his having died childless. The law which regulates this has been named the "Levirate," from the Latin levir = brother-in-law. The first instance of this custom occurs in the patriarchal period, where Onan is called upon to marry his brother Er's widow (Gen. xxxviii. 8). It was confirmed by the Mosaic law (Deut. xxv. 5–9). (Boaz; HEIR.) The Levirate marriage was not peculiar to the Jews; it has been found to exist in many Eastern countries, particularly in Arabia, and among the tribes of the Caucasus. The Levirate law offered numerous opportunities for the exercise of that spirit of casuistry, for which the Jewish teachers are so conspicuous. One such case is brought forward by the Sadducees for the sake of entangling our Lord, and turns upon the complications which would arise in the world to come (the existence of which the Sadducees sought to invalidate) from the circumstances of the same woman having been married to several brothers (Mat. xxii. 23–30). The Rabbinical solution of this difficulty was that the wife would revert to the first husband: our Lord on the other hand subverts the hypothesis on which the difficulty was based, viz. that the material conditions of the present life were to be carried on in the world to come; and thus He asserts the true character of marriage as a temporary and merely human institution. Numerous difficulties are suggested, and minute regulations laid down by the Talmudical writers, the chief authority on the subject being the book of the Mishna, entitled Yebamoth. From the prohibitions expressed in the Bible, others have been deduced by a process of inferential reasoning. Thus the Talmudists added to the Levitical relationships several remoter ones, which they termed secondary, such as grandmother and great-grandmother, great-grandchild, &c.: the only points in which they at all touched the Levitical degrees were, that they added (a) the wife of the father's uterine brother under the idea that in the text the brother described was only by the same father, and (b) the mother's brother's wife, for which they had no authority. Considerable differences of opinion have arisen as to the extent to which this process of reasoning should be carried; and conflicting laws have been made in different countries, professedly based on the same original authority. But first, the legislator apparently intended to give an exhaustive list of prohibitions; for he not only gives examples of degrees of relationship, but specifies the prohibitions in cases strictly parallel, e. g. son's daughter and daughter's daughter (Lev. xviii. 10, compare also 17). Secondly, he evidently did not regard the degree as the test of the prohibition; for he establishes a different rule in regard to a brother's widow and a deceased wife's sister, though the degree of relationship is parallel. Thirdly, there must have been some tangible and even strong grounds for the distinctions noted in the degrees of equal distance; and it then becomes important to ascertain whether these grounds are of perpetual force, or arise out of a peculiar state of society or legislation. The cases to which these remarks would especially apply are, marriage with a deceased wife's sister, a niece, whether by blood or marriage, and a maternal uncle's widow. As to the first and third of these, we may observe that the Hebrews regarded the relationship between the wife and her husband's family as closer than that between the husband and his wife's family. Illustrations of this difference are (a.) that a husband's brother was subject to the Levirate law; (b.) that the nearest relative on the husband's side was his widow's gohel or avenger of blood; and (c.) that an heiress must marry a relative on her father's side. When, however, we transplant the Levitical regulations from the Hebrew to any other commonwealth, we are fully warranted in taking into account the temporary and local conditions of relationship in each, and in extending the prohibition, in conformity to the general spirit of the Law, to cases where alterations in the social or legal condition have taken place. Thus the prohibition may be extended to marriage with a brother's widow in all cases, as the Levirate law is abolished; also from the paternal to the maternal uncle's widow, as the peculiar differences between relationships on the father's and mother's side are abolished. Marriage with a deceased wife's sister is not only not prohibited, but actually permitted by the letter of the Mosaic Law; but it remains to be argued (a.) whether the permission was granted under peculiar circumstances; (b.) whether those or strictly parallel circumstances exist at the present day; and (c.) whether, if they do not exist, the general tenor of the Mosaic prohibitions would or would not justify extending the prohibition to such a relationship on the authority of the Levitical Law. We are here viewing the question simply in its relation to the Levitical Law, and omit all notice of other arguments pro and con.<sup>1</sup> As to marriage with the niece, which was also permitted by the Mosaic Law, the Jews appear to have availed themselves of the privilege without scruple (Jos. xii. 4, § 6, xvii. 1, § 3, xviii. 5, § 1; see OTHNIEL); but this marriage is now generally regarded as incestuous.—2. Among the special prohibitions we have to notice the following: (1.) The high-priest was forbidden to marry any except a virgin selected from his own people, i. e. an Israelite (Lev. xxi. 13, 14). (2.) The priests were less restricted in their choice; they were only prohibited from marrying prostitutes and divorced women (xxi. 7). (3.) Heiresses were prohibited from marrying out of their own tribe (Num. xxxvi. 5-9; compare Tob. vii. 10). (4.) Persons defective in physical powers were not to intermarry with Israelites by virtue of the regulations in Deut. xxiii. 1. (5.) In the Christian Church, bishops and deacons were prohibited from having more than one wife (1 Tim. iii. 2, 12), a prohibition of an ambiguous nature, inasmuch as it may refer (a.) to polygamy in the ordinary sense of the term, as explained by Theodoret, and most of the Fathers (and so Doddridge, Barnes, &c.); (b.) to marriage after the decease of the first wife (so Beza, Conybeare & Howson); or (c.) to marriage after divorce during the lifetime of the first wife. The probable sense is second marriage of any kind whatever, including all the three cases alluded to, but with a special reference to the two last, which were allowable in the case of the laity, while the first was equally forbidden to all (so Mr. Bevan; but Macknight, Scott, &c., suppose the apostle here referred to polygamy and the second marriage of one improperly divorced; see DIVORCE). (6.) A similar prohibition applied to those who were candidates for admission into the ecclesiastical order of widows (1 Tim. v. 9; WIDOW); in this case the words "wife of one man" can be applied but to two cases, (a.) to remariage after the decease of the husband (so Whitby, Barnes, &c.), or (b.) after divorce (so Conybeare & Howson; see above). That divorce was obtained sometimes at the instance of the wife, is implied in Mk. x. 12, and 1 Cor. vii. 11, and is alluded to by several classical writers. But St. Paul probably refers to the general question of remarriage (so Mr. Bevan). (7.) With regard to the general question of the remarriage of divorced persons, there is some difficulty in ascertaining the sense of Scripture. According to the Mosaic Law, a wife divorced at the instance of the husband might marry whom she liked; but if her second husband died or divorced her, she could not revert to her first husband, on the ground that, as far as he was concerned, she was "defiled" (Deut. xxiv. 2-4); we may infer from the statement of the ground that there was no objection to the remarriage of the original parties, if the divorced wife had remained unmarried in the interval. In the N. T. there are no direct precepts on the subject of the remarriage of divorced persons. All the remarks bearing upon the point had a primary reference to an entirely different subject, viz. the abuse of divorce. With regard to age, no restriction is pronounced in the Bible. Early marriage is spoken of with approval in several passages (Prov. ii. 17, v. 18; Is. lxii. 5), and in reducing this general statement to the more definite one of years, we must take into account the very early age at which persons arrive at puberty in Oriental countries. In modern Egypt marriage takes place in general before the bride has attained the age of sixteen, frequently when she is twelve or thirteen, and occasionally when she is only ten. The Talmudists forbade marriage in the case of a man

<sup>1</sup> The late Dr. Edward Robinson (in B. S. Series I. for 1843, pp. 231 ff.) ably exhibits the Biblical arguments on this subject, and concludes that marriage with a deceased wife's sister was valid among the Hebrews, and is equally defensible among Christians. Such a marriage is legal in

New York, Connecticut, Massachusetts, &c., but has been prohibited in some of the other States; yet it would be regarded as valid in every State if made in a State or country where no such prohibition exists.—See Kent's Comm. on American Law, third edition, II., 68, n.

under thirteen years and a day, and in the case of a woman under twelve years and a day. The usual age appears to have been higher, about eighteen years. Certain days were fixed for the ceremony of betrothal and marriage—the fourth day for virgins, and the fifth for widows. The more modern Jews similarly appoint different days for virgins and widows, Wednesday and Friday for the former, Thursday for the latter (Picart, i. 240).—III. The customs of the Hebrews and of Oriental nations generally, in regard to the preliminaries of marriage, as well as the ceremonies attending the rite itself, differ in many respects from those with which we are familiar. In the first place, the choice of the bride devolved not on the bridegroom himself, but on his relations or on a friend deputed by the bridegroom for this purpose (Gen. xxi. 21, xxiv., xxviii. 1, xxxviii. 6). It does not follow that the bridegroom's wishes were not consulted in this arrangement. As a general rule the proposal originated with the family of the bridegroom. The imaginary case of women soliciting husbands (Is. iv. 1) was designed to convey to the mind a picture of the ravages of war. The consent of the maiden was sometimes asked (Gen. xxiv. 58); but this appears to have been subordinate to the previous consent of the father and the adult brothers (xxiv. 51, xxxiv. 11). Occasionally the whole business of selecting the wife was left in the hands of a friend. The selection of the bride was followed by the espousal, which was not altogether like our "engagement," but was a formal proceeding, undertaken by a friend or legal representative on the part of the bridegroom, and by the parents on the part of the bride: it was confirmed by oaths, and accompanied with presents to the bride and her relatives. These presents were described by different terms, that to the bride by Heb. môhar (A. V. "dowry"), and that to the relations by Heb. matlân. Thus Shechem offers "never so much dowry and gift" (Gen. xxxiv. 12), the former for the bride, the latter for the relations. Mr. Bevan, with Saalschütz, denies, and Dr. Ginsburg (in Kitto), Gesenius, Fürst, &c., affirm that the môhar was a price paid down to the father for the sale of his daughter. Such a custom undoubtedly prevails in certain parts of the East at the present day, but (so Mr. Bevan) it does not appear to have been the case with free women in patriarchal times (xxi. 15; Ex. xxi. 7). It would undoubtedly be expected that the môhar should be proportioned to the position of the bride, and that a poor man could not on that account afford to marry a rich wife (1 Sam. xviii. 23). Occasionally the bride received a dowry from her father (Judg. i. 15; 1 K. ix. 16). A "settlement," in the modern sense of the term, i. e. a written document securing property to the wife, did not come into use until the post-Babylonian period; the only instance we have of one is in Tob. vii. 14, where it is described as an "instrument." The Talmudists styled it a cithûbâh (literally a writing), and have laid down minute directions as to the disposal of the sum secured, in a treatise of the Mishna expressly on that subject. The act of betrothal was celebrated by a feast, and among the more modern Jews it is the custom in some parts for the bridegroom to place a ring on the bride's finger. Some writers have endeavored to prove that the rings noticed in the O. T. (Ex. xxxv. 22; Is. iii. 21) were nuptial rings, but there is not the slightest evidence of this. The ring was nevertheless regarded among the Hebrews as a token of fidelity (Gen. xli. 42), and of adoption into a family (Lk. xv. 22). Between the betrothal and the marriage an interval elapsed, varying from a few days in the patriarchal age (Gen. xxiv. 55), to a full year for virgins and a month for widows in later times. During this period the bride elect lived with her friends, and all communication between herself and her future husband was carried on through the medium of a friend deputed for the purpose, termed the "friend of the bridegroom" (Jn. iii. 29). She was now virtually regarded as the wife of her future husband. Hence faithlessness on her part was punishable with death (Deut. xxii. 23, 24), the husband having, however, the option of "putting her away" (Mat. i. 19; Deut. xiv. 1 ff.).—In the wedding itself the most observable point is, that there were no definite religious ceremonies connected with it. It is probable, indeed, that some formal ratification of the espousal with an oath took place, as implied in some allusions to marriage (Ez. xvi. 8; Mal. ii. 14), particularly in the expression, "the covenant of her God" (Prov. ii. 17), as applied to the marriage-bond, and that a blessing was pronounced (Gen. xxiv. 60; Ru. iv. 11, 12), sometimes by the parents (Teb. vii. 13). But the essence of the marriage ceremony consisted in the removal of the bride from her father's house to that of the bridegroom or his father. The bridegroom prepared himself for the occasion by putting on a festive dress, and especially by placing on his head the handsome turban described by the term peér (Is. lxi. 10, A. V. "ornaments"; HEAD-DESS), and a nuptial crown or garland (Cant. iii. 11): he was redolent of myrrh and frankincense and "all powders of the merchant" (iii. 6). The bride prepared herself for the ceremony by taking a bath, generally on the day preceding the wedding. The notices of it in the Bible are few (Ru. iii. 8; Ez. xxiii. 40; Eph. v. 26, 27). The distinctive feature of the bride's attire was the ted'îph, or "veil"—a light robe of ample dimensions, which covered not only the face but the whole person (Gen. xxiv. 65; compare xxxviii. 14, 15). (DRESS.) This was regarded as the symbol of her submission to her husband (1 Cor. xi. 10). She also wore a peculiar girdle, named in Heb. kishkurtim, the "attire" (A. V.), which no bride could forget (Jer. ii. 32); and her head was crowned with a chaplet, which was again so distinctive of the bride, that the Heb. term callâh, "bride," originated from it. (CROWN; DIADEM.) If the bride were a virgin, she wore her hair flowing. Her robes were white (Rev. xix. 8), and sometimes embroidered with gold thread (Ps. xlv. 13, 14), and covered with perfumes (xlv. 8); she was further decked out with jewels (Is. xlix. 18, lxi. 10; Rev. xxi. 2). When the fixed hour arrived, which was generally late in the evening, the bridegroom set forth from his house, attended by his groomsmen (A. V. "companions," Judg. xiv. 11; "children of the bride-chamber," Mat. ix. 15), preceded by a band of musicians or singers (Gen. xxxi. 27; Jer. vii. 34, xvi. 9; 1 Mc. ix. 39), and accompanied by persons bearing flambeaux (2 Esd. x. 2; Mat. xxv. 7; compare Jer. xxv. 10; Rev. xviii. 23, "the light of a candle"). (LAMP; LANTERN.) Having reached the house of the bride, who with her maidens anxiously expected his arrival (Mat. xxv. 6), he conducted the whole party back to his own or his father's house, with every demonstration of gladness (Ps. xlv. 15). On their way back they were joined by a party of maidens, friends of the bride and bridegroom, who were in waiting to catch the procession as it passed (Mat. xxv. 6). The inhabitants of the place pressed out into the streets to watch the procession (Cant. iii. 11). At the house a feast was prepared, to which all the friends and neighbors were invited (Gen. xxix. 22; Mat. xxii. 1-10; Lk. xiv. 8; Jn. ii. 2), and the festivities were protracted for seven, or even fourteen days (Judg. xiv. 12; Tob. viii. 19). (BANQUET; MEALS.) The guests were provided by the host with fitting robes (Mat. xxii. 11), and the feast was enlivened with riddles (Judg. xiv. 12) and other amusements. The bridegroom now entered into direct communication with the bride, and the joy of the friend was "fulfilled" at hearing the voice of the bridegroom (Jn. iii. 29) conversing with her, which he regarded as a satisfactory testimony of the success of his share in the work. In the case of a virgin, parched corn was distributed among the guests. The last act in the ceremonial was the conducting of the bride to the bridal-chamber (Heb. heder or cheder) (Judg. xv. 1; Joel ii. 16), where a canopy (Heb. huppah or chuppah) was prepared (Ps. xix. 5; Joel ii. 16). The bride was still completely veiled, so that the deception practised on Jacob (Gen. xxix. 23) was very possible. A newly married man was exempt from military service, or from any public business which might draw him away from his home, for the space of a year (Deut. xxiv. 5): a similar privilege was granted to him who was betrothed (xx. 7). Among the modern Jews the marriage ceremony is performed by a Rabbi, who covers the bridal pair, as they stand under the canopy, with the talith or fringed wrapper which the bridegroom has on, joins their hands, pronounces over a cup of wine the benediction of alliance, and after the pair have tasted of the cup and the bridegroom has put on the bride's finger a plain gold ring, reads aloud the marriage settlement, and then pronounces over another cup of wine seven benedictions. The bridegroom and bride taste again of this cup of blessing, and when the glass is emptied it is put on the ground and the bridegroom breaks it with his foot, to remind them that Jerusalem is destroyed and trodden down of the Gentiles. With this the ceremony is concluded, amid the shouts May you be happy! (Ginsburg, in Kitto).—IV. In considering the social and domestic conditions of married life among the Hebrews, we must in the first place take into account the position assigned to women generally in their social scale. There is abundant evidence that women, whether married or unmarried, went about with their faces unveiled (Gen. xii. 14, xxiv. 16, 65, xxix. 11; 1 Sam. i. 18). Women not unfrequently held important offices. They took their part in matters of public interest (Ex. xv. 20; 1 Sam. xviii. 6, 7): in short, they enjoyed as much freedom in ordinary life as the women of our own country. If such was her general position, it is certain that the wife must have exercised an important influence in her own home. She appears to have taken her part in family affairs, and even to have enjoyed a considerable amount of independence (2 K. iv. 8; Judg. iv. 18; 1 Sam. xxv. 14, &c.). (CHILD; DAUGHTER; VOW; WOMEN.) The relations of husband and wife appear to have been characterized by affection and tenderness. At the same time we cannot but think that the exceptions to this state of affairs were more numerous than is consistent with our ideas of matrimonial happiness. One of the evils inseparable from polygamy is the discomfort arising from the jealousies and quarrels of the several wives (Gen. xxi. 11; 1 Sam. i. 6). The purchase of wives, and the small amount of liberty allowed to daughters in the choice of husbands, must inevitably have led to unhappy unions. In the N. T. the mutual relations of husband and wife are a subject of frequent exhortation (Eph. v. 22, 33; Col. iii. 18, 19; Tit. ii. 4, 5; 1 Pet. iii. 1-7). The duties of the wife in the Hebrew household were multifarious: in addition to the general superintendence of the domestic arrangements, such as cooking, from which even women of rank were not exempted (Gen. xviii. 6; 2 Sam. xiii. 8), and the distribution of food at meal-times (Prov. xxxi. 15; MEALS), the manufacture of the clothing and the various textures required in an Eastern establishment devolved upon her (xxxi. 13, 21, 22; DRESS), and if she were a model of activity and skill, she produced a surplus of fine linen shirts and girdles, which she sold, and so, like a well-freighted merchant-ship, brought in wealth to her husband from afar (xxxi. 14, 24). The Mishna thus describes a wife's duties toward her husband: "She must grind corn, and bake, and wash, and cook, and suckle his child, make his bed, and work in wool. If she brought her husband one bondswoman, she need not grind, bake, or wash; if two, she need not cook, nor suckle his child; if three, she need not make his bed, nor work in wool; if four, she may sit in her chair of state." Whatever money she earned by her labor belonged to her husband. The legal rights of the wife are noticed in Ex. xxi. 10, under the three heads of food, raiment, and duty of marriage or conjugal right. (CONCUBINE; WIDOW.)—V. The allegorical and typical allusions to marriage have exclusive reference to one subject, viz. to exhibit the spiritual relationship between God and his people. The earliest form in which the image is implied, is in the expressions "to go a whoring," and "whoredom," as descriptive of the rupture of that relationship by acts of idolatry. These expressions have by some writers been taken in their primary and literal sense, as pointing to the licentious practices of idolaters. But this destroys the whole point of the comparison, and is opposed to the plain language of Scripture. Israel is described as the false wife (Is. i. 21; Jer. iii. 1, 6, 8); Jehovah is the injured husband (Ps. lxxiii. 27; Jer. ii. 20; Hos. iv. 12, ix. 1); the other party in the adultery is specified, sometimes generally, as idols or false gods (Deut. xxxi. 16; Judg. ii. 17; 1 Chr. v. 25; Ez. xx. 80, xxiii. 80), sometimes particularly (Lev. xvii. 7, xx. 5, 6; Judg. viii. 27, 33; Num. xv. 39). The image is drawn out more at length in Ez. xxiii. and Hos. i. iii. The direct comparison with marriage is confined in the O. T. to the prophetic writings, unless we regard the CANTICLES as an allegorical work. The actual relation between Jehovah and His people is generally the point of comparison (Is. liv. 5, lxii. 4; Jer. iii. 14; Hos. ii. 19; Mal. ii. 11). In the N. T. the image of the bridegroom is transferred from Jehovah to Christ (Mat. ix. 15; Jn. iii. 29), and that of the bride to the Church (2 Cor. xi. 2; Rev. xix. 7, xxi. 2, 9, xxii. 17), and the comparison thus established is converted by St. Paul into an illustration of the position and mutual duties of man and wife (Eph. v. 23-32). The breach of the union is, as before, described as fornication or whoredom in reference to the mystical BABYLON (Rev. xvii. 1, 2, 5). (ADULTERY; HARLOT.)

MAR'S HILL. ARKOPAGUS.

Mar'se-na (Heb. fr. Pers. = worthy man, Benfey, Ges.), one of the seven princes of Persia. "wise men which knew the times," saw the king's face and sat first in the kingdom (Esth. i. 14).

Martha (Gr. fr. Aram. fem. of māré, lord, = lady [so Prof. Plumptre]), a woman of BETHANY, sister of LAZARUS and Mary. The facts recorded in Lk. x. and Jn. xi. indicate that Martha possessed a character devout after the customary Jewish type of devotion, sharing in Messianic hopes, and accepting Jesus as the Christ; sharing also in the popular belief in a resurrection (Jn. xi. 24), but not rising, as her sister (MARY, SISTER OF LAZARUS) did, to the belief that Christ was making the eternal life to belong, not to the future only, but to the present. When she first comes before us in Lk. x. 38, as receiving her Lord into her house, she loses the calmness of her spirit, is "cumbered with much serving," is "careful and troubled about many things." She needs the reproof "one thing is needful;" but her love, though imperfect in its form, is yet recognized as true, and she too, no less than Lazarus and Mary, has the distinction of being one whom Jesus loved (Jn. xi. 3). Her position here, it may be noticed, is obviously that of the elder sister, the head and manager of the household. It has been conjectured that she was the wife or widow of "Simon the leper" of Mat. xxvi. 6 and Mk. xiv. 8. (SIMON 7.) The same character shows itself in Jn. xi. The same spirit of complaint that she had shown before finds utterance again (ver. 21), but there is now, what there was not before, a fuller faith at once in His wisdom and His power (ver. 22). And there is in that sorrow an education for her as well as for others. She rises from the formula of the Pharisee's creed to the confession which no "flesh and blood," no human traditions, could have revealed to her (ver. 24-27). Her name appears once again in the N. T. She is present at the supper at Bethany as "serving" (Jn. xii. 2). The old character shows itself still, but it has been freed from evil. She is no longer "cumbered," no longer impatient. Activity has been calmed by trust. When other voices are raised against her sister's overflowing love, hers is not heard among them.

* Mar'tyr, the L. and Eng. form of the Gr. martur or martus, generally and literally translated "witness" (Mat. xviii. 16, xxvi. 65; Acts xxii. 15, &c.), but three times "martyr" in the A. V. (xxii. 20; Rev. ii. 13, xvii. 6). The "witnesses" to the Gospel might have to suffer death for their testimony, and hence arises the ecclesiastical use of the Greek word, corresponding to our present sense of the English word "martyr."

Mā'ry (Gr. Maria, fr. Heb. = MIRIAM) the Wife of Cleo-phas. So in A. V. of Jn. xix. 25, but accurately "the Mary of CLOPAS" or "Clopas's Mary." In this passage we read that "there stood by the cross of Jesus His mother, and His mother's sister, Mary of Clopas (A. V. 'Mary the wife of Cleophas'), and Mary Magdalene." The same group of women is described in Mat. xxvii. 56 as consisting of "Mary Magdalene, and Mary the mother of James and James, and the mother of Zebedee's children;" and in Mk. xv. 40 as "Mary Magdalene, and Mary the mother of James the Little (A. V. 'the less') and of James and Salome." From a comparison of these passages, it appears that Mary of Clopas, and Mary of James the Little and of James, are the same person, and the sister of Mary the Virgin. There is an apparent difficulty in the fact of two sisters seeming to bear the name of Mary. To escape this difficulty, it has been suggested (1.) that the two clauses "his mother's sister" and "Mary of Clopas" are not in apposition, but four persons were present, viz. the mother of Jesus, her sister (Wieseler makes this sister = Salome), Mary of Clopas, Mary Magdalene; (2.) that "sister" here = cousin. But the fact of two sisters having the same name, though unusual, is not singular. Genealogical tables give a pair of Antonias, and a pair of Octavias, daughters of the same father, in one case of different mothers, in the other of the same mother, also two Cleopatras. (ONIAS 3, 4; HEROD PHILIP 1, 2.) MIRIAM, the sister of Moses, may have been the holy woman after whom Jewish mothers called their daughters, just as Spanish mothers not unfrequently give the name of Mary to their children, male and female alike, in honor of Mary the Virgin. This is on the hypothesis that the two names are identical, but on a close examination of the Greek text we find it is possible that this was not the case. Mary the Virgin is in Gr. Mariam (so Mr. Meyrick), her sister is Maria. Mary of Clopas was probably elder sister of the Lord's mother, and may have married Clopas or ALPHEUS while her sister was still a girl. She had (so Mr. Meyrick) four sons, and at least three daughters. The names of the daughters are unknown; those of the sons are James, James, Jude, Simon, two of whom became enrolled among the twelve apostles (but see JAMES; JUDE), and a third (SIMON 4) may have succeeded his brother in the charge of the Church at Jerusalem. Of James and the daughters we know nothing. Mary herself is brought before us for the first time on the day of the Crucifixion—in the parallel passages already quoted from Matthew, Mark, and John. In the evening of the same day we find her sitting desolately at the tomb with Mary Magdalene (Mat. xxvii. 61; Mk. xv. 47), and at the dawn of Easter morning she was again there with sweet spices, which she had prepared on the Friday night (Mat. xxviii. 1; Mk. xvi. 1; Lk. xxiii. 56) (so Mr. Meyrick; see MARY MAGDALENE), and was one of those who had "a vision of angels, which said that He was alive" (Lk. xxiv. 23). These are all the glimpses that we have of her. Clopas or Alpheus is not mentioned at all, except as designating Mary and James. Probably he was dead before the ministry of our Lord commenced. Joseph, the husband of Mary the Virgin, was probably likewise dead; and the two widowed sisters, as was natural both for comfort and for protection, were in the custom of living together in one house.

Mā'ry (see above) Mag-da-le-ne [as an English word often pronounced mag'da-lene] (see MAGDALENE and below). Four different explanations have been given of this name. (1.) The most natural, that she came from the town of MAGDALA. The statement, that the women with whom she journeyed followed Jesus in Galilee (Mk. xv. 41), agrees with this notion. (2.) Another explanation has been found in the fact that the Talmudic writers in their calumnies against the Nazarenes make mention of a Miriam Megaddela, and explain it as = the twiner or plaiter of hair. (3.) Either seriously, or with the patristic fondness for paronomasia, Jerome sees in her name, and in that of her town, the old Migdol (= a watch-tower), the steadfastness of her faith. (4.) Origen sees in her name (fr. Heb. gadal = to be great) a prophecy of her spiritual greatness as having ministered to the Lord, and been the first witness of His resurrection.—I. She comes before us first in Lk. viii. 2, among the women who "ministered unto Him of their substance." All appear to have occupied a position of comparative wealth.

With all the chief motive was that of gratitude for their deliverance from "evil spirits and infirmities." Of Mary it is said specially that "seven devils went out of her," and the number indicates, as in Mat. xii. 45, and the "Legion" of the Gadarene demoniac (Mk. v. 9), a possession of more than ordinary malignity. We must think of her accordingly, as having had, in their most aggravated forms, some of the phenomena of mental and spiritual disease which we meet with in other DEMONIACS, the wretchedness of despair, the divided consciousness, the preternatural frenzy, the long-continued fits of silence. From that state of misery she had been set free by the presence of the Healer, and, in the absence, as we may infer, of other ties and duties, she found her safety and her blessedness in following Him. It will explain much that follows if we remember that this life of ministration must have brought Mary Magdalene into the closest companionship with Salome the mother of James and John (Mk. xv. 40), and even also with Mary the mother of the Lord (Jn. xix. 25). The women who thus devoted themselves are not prominent in the history: we have no record of their mode of life, or abode, or hopes or fears during the few momentous days that preceded the crucifixion. They "stood afar off, beholding these things" (Lk. xxiii. 49) during the closing hours of the Agony on the Cross. Mary Magdalene, Mary the mother of the Lord, and the beloved disciple were at one time not afar off, but close to the cross, within hearing. The same close association which drew them together there is seen afterward. She remains by the cross till all is over, waits till the body is taken down, and wrapped in the linen-cloth and placed in the garden-sepulchre of Joseph of Arimathea (Mat. xxvii. 61; Mk. xv. 47; Lk. xxiii. 55). The Sabbath that followed brought an enforced rest, but no sooner is the sunset over than she, with Salome and Mary the mother of James, "brought sweet spices that they might come and anoint" the body (Mk. xvi. 1) (so Prof. Plumptre; see MARY OF CLEOPHAS). The next morning accordingly, in the earliest dawn (Mat. xxviii. 1; Mk. xvi. 2) they come with Mary the mother of James, to the sepulchre. Mary Magdalene had been to the tomb and had found it empty, had seen the "vision of angels" (Mat. xxviii. 5; Mk. xvi. 5). She went with her cry of sorrow to Peter and John, "they have taken away the Lord out of the sepulchre, and we know not where they have laid Him" (Jn. xx. 1, 2). But she returns there. She follows Peter and John, and remains when they go back. The one thought that fills her mind is still that the body is not there (13). This intense brooding over one fixed thought was, we may venture to say, to one who had suffered as she had suffered, full of special danger, and called for a special discipline. The utter stupor of grief is shown in her want of power to recognize at first either the voice or the form of the Lord to whom she had ministered (14, 15). At last her own name uttered by that voice as she had heard it uttered, it may be, in the hour of her deepest misery, recalls her to consciousness; and then follows the cry of recognition, with the strongest word of reverence which a woman of Israel could use, "Rabboni," and the rush forward to cling to His feet. That, however, is not the discipline she needs. Her love had been too dependent on the visible presence of her Master. She had the same lesson to learn as the other disciples. Though they had "known Christ after the flesh," they were "henceforth to know Him so no more." She was to hear that truth in its highest and sharpest form. "Touch Me not, for I am not yet ascended to My Father." For a time, till the earthly affection had been raised to a heavenly one, she was to hold back. When He had finished His work and ascended to the Father, there should be no barrier to the fullest communion that the most devoted love could crave.

—II. What follows will show how great a contrast there is between the spirit in which the evangelist wrote and that which shows itself in the later traditions. Out of these few facts there rise a multitude of wild conjectures; and with these there has been constructed a whole romance of hagiology. The questions which meet us connect themselves with the narratives in the four Gospels of women who came with precious ointment to anoint the feet or the head of Jesus. Although the opinion seems to have been at one time maintained, few would now hold that Mat. xxvi. and Mk. xiv. are reports of two distinct events. The supposition that there were three anointings found favor with Origen and Lightfoot, but is improbable. We are left to the conclusion adopted by the great majority of interpreters, that the Gospels record two anointings, one in some city unnamed (Capernaum or Nain?) during our Lord's Galilean ministry (Lk. vii.), the other at Bethany, before the last entry into Jerusalem (Mat. xxvi.; Mk. xiv.; Jn. xii.). We come, then, to the question whether in these two narratives we meet with one woman or with two. The one passage adduced for the former conclusion is Jn. xi. 2. There is but slender evidence for the assumption that the two anointings were the acts of one and the same woman, and that woman the sister of Lazarus. There is, if possible, still less for the identification of Mary Magdalene with the chief actor in either history. (1.) When her name appears in Lk. viii. 3 there is not one word to connect it with the history that immediately precedes. (2.) The belief that Mary of Bethany (MARY, SISTER OF LAZARUS) and Mary Magdalene are identical is yet more startling. Not one single circumstance, except that of love and reverence for their Master, is common. The epithet Magdalene, whatever may be its meaning, seems chosen for the express purpose of distinguishing her from all other Marias. No one evangelist gives the slightest hint of identity. Nor is this lack of evidence in the N. T. itself compensated by any such weight of authority as would indicate a really trustworthy tradition. Two of the earliest writers who allude to the histories of the anointing—Clement of Alexandria and Tertullian—say nothing to imply that they accepted it. The language of Irenæus is against it. Origen discusses the question fully, and rejects it. He is followed by the whole succession of the expositors of the Eastern Church. In the Western Church, however, the other belief began to spread. The services of the feast of St. Mary Magdalene were constructed on the assumption of its truth. Well-nigh all ecclesiastical writers, after Gregory the Great, take it for granted. The translators under James I. adopted the received tradition. Since that period there has been a gradually increasing agreement against it. Calvin, Grotius, Hammond, Casaubon, Bengel, Lampe, Greswell, Alford, Wordsworth, Stier, Meyer, Ellicott, Olshausen, &c., agree in rejecting it. The mediæval tradition has found defenders in Baronius, the writers of the Acta Sanctorum, Maldonatus, Bishop Andrewes, Lightfoot, Isaac Williams, and Dr. Pusey. The substance of the legend is, that at some time before the commencement of our Lord's ministry, Mary of Bethany fell from her purity and sank into the depths of shame. Her life was that of one possessed by the "seven devils" of uncleanness. From the city to which she then went, or from her harlot-like adornments, she was known by the new name of Magdalene. Then she hears of the Deliverer, and repents, and loves, and is forgiven. Then she is received at once into the fellowship of the holy women and ministers to the Lord, and is received back again by her sister and dwells with her, and shows that she has chosen the good part. The death of Lazarus and his return to life are new motives to her gratitude and love; and she shows them, as she had shown them before, anointing no longer the feet only, but the head also of her Lord. She watches by the cross, and witnesses the resurrection. Then (the legend goes on), after some years of waiting, she goes with LAZARUS, &c., to Marseilles. They land there; and she, leaving Martha to more active work, retires to a cave in the neighborhood of Arles, and there leads a life of penitence for thirty years. When she dies a church is built in her honor, and miracles are wrought at her tomb. Such was the full-grown form of the Western story. In the East there was a different tradition. Nicophorus states that she went to Rome to accuse Pilate for his unrighteous judgment; Modestus, that she came to Ephesus with the Virgin and St. John, and died and was buried there. The Emperor Leo the Philosopher (about 890) brought her body from that city to Constantinople.

Mary (see above), Mother of Mark (see MARK). The woman known by this description must have been among the earliest disciples. We learn from Col. iv. 10 that she was sister (or aunt; see MARK) to Barnabas, and it would appear from Acts iv. 37, xii. 12, that, while Barnabas gave up his lands and brought the proceeds of the sale into the common treasury of the Church, she gave up her house to be used as one of its chief places of meeting. The fact that Peter goes to that house on his release from prison, indicates that there was some special intimacy between them, and this is confirmed by the language which he uses toward Mark as being his "son" (1 Pet. v. 13). She, too, if an own sister or a father's sister to Barnabas, must have been like him of the tribe of Levi, and may have been connected, as he was, with Cyprus (Acts iv. 36).

Mary (see above), Sister of Laz'arus (see LAZARUS). The facts strictly personal to her are but few. She and her sister MARTHA appear in Lk. x. 40, as receiving Christ in their house. Mary sat listening eagerly for every word that fell from the Divine Teacher. She had chosen the good part, the life that has found its unity, the "one thing needful," in rising from the earthly to the heavenly, no longer distracted by the "many things" of earth. The same character shows itself in Jn. xi. Her grief is deeper but less active. Her first thought when she sees the Teacher in whose power and love she had trusted, is one of complaint. But the great joy and love which her brother's return to life calls up in her, pour themselves out in larger measure than had been seen before. The treasured alabaster-box of ointment is brought forth at the final feast of Bethany (xii. 8). Of her after-history we know nothing. The ecclesiastical traditions about her are based on the unfounded hypothesis of her identity with MARY MAGDALENE.

Mary (Gr. Maria [Mat. i. 16, 18, ii. 11, &c.] and Mariam [Mat. i. 20, xiii. 55, &c.], both fr. Heb. = MIRIAM) the Virgin. There is no person perhaps in sacred or profane literature, around whom so many legends have been grouped as this Mary; and there are few whose authentic history is more concise. We shall divide her life into three periods. I. The period of her childhood, up to the time of the birth of our Lord. II. The period of her middle age contemporary with the Bible record. III. The period subsequent to the Ascension.—I. The childhood of Mary, wholly legendary. Joachim and Anna were both of the race of David. The abode of the former was Nazareth; the latter passed her early years at Bethlehem. They lived piously in the sight of God, and faultlessly before man, dividing their substance into three portions, one of which they devoted to the service of the Temple, another to the poor, and the third to their own wants. And so twenty years of their lives passed silently away. But they were childless. At the end of this period Joachim went to Jerusalem with some others of his tribe, to make his usual offering at the Feast of the Dedication. And the high-priest scorned Joachim, and drove him roughly away, asking how he dared to present himself in company with those who had children, while he had none. And Joachim was shamed before his friends and neighbors, and he retired into the wilderness and fixed his tent there, and fasted forty days and forty nights. And at the end of this period an angel appeared to him, and told him that his wife should conceive, and should bring forth a daughter, and he should call her name Mary. Anna meantime was much distressed at her husband's absence, and being reproached by her maid Judith with her barrenness, she was overcome with grief of spirit. And two angels appeared to her, and promised her that she should have a child who should be spoken of in all the world. And Joachim returned joyfully to his home, and when the time was accomplished Anna brought forth a daughter, and they called her name Mary. Now the child Mary increased in strength day by day, and at nine months of age she walked nine steps. And when she was three years old her parents brought her to the Temple, to dedicate her to the Lord. Then Mary remained at the Temple until she was twelve or fourteen years old, ministered to by the angels, and advancing in perfection as in years. At this time the high-priest commanded all the virgins that were in the Temple to return to their homes and to be married. The legend now tells of the unwilling betrothal of JOSEPH 11 to Mary, the Annunciation, the marriage, and the birth of Jesus in a form distorted from the simple narrative of the Gospel (Mat. i.; Lk. i., ii.).—II. The real history of Mary. We are ignorant of the name and occupation of Mary's parents (so Mr. Meyrick). If the genealogy given by Luke is that of Mary (Greswell, &c.), her father was Heli. If Jacob and Heli were the two sons of Matthan or Matthat, and if Joseph, the son of the younger brother, married his cousin, the daughter of the elder brother (Lord A. C. Hervey), her father was Jacob. (GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST.) She was, like Joseph, of the tribe of Judah, and of the lineage of David (Ps. cxxii. 11; Lk. i. 32; Rom. i. 8). She had a sister, named probably like herself, Mary (Jn. xix. 25; MARY OF CLEOPHAS), and she was connected by marriage (Lk. i. 36) with ELISABETH, who was of the tribe of Levi and of the lineage of Aaron. This is all that we know of her antecedents. In the summer of B. C. 5 (JESUS CHRIST), Mary was living at Nazareth, probably at her parents'—possibly at her elder sister's—house, not having yet been taken by Joseph to his home. She was at this time betrothed to Joseph, and was therefore regarded by the Jewish law and custom as his wife, though he had not yet a husband's rights over her. (MARRIAGE.) At this time the angel Gabriel came to her with a message from God, and announced to her that she was to be the mother of the long-expected Messiah. The scene as well as the salutation is very similar to that recounted in Dan. x. 18, 19. Gabriel proceeds to instruct Mary that by the operation of the Holy Ghost the everlasting Son of the Father should be born of her. He further informs her that her relative Elisabeth was within three months of being delivered of a child. The angel left Mary, and she set off to visit Elisabeth either at Hebron or Juttah (Lk. i. 39), where the latter lived with her husband Zacharias. Immediately on her entrance into the house she was saluted by Elisabeth as the mother of her Lord, and had evidence of the truth of the angel's saying with regard to her cousin. She embodied her feelings of exultation and thankfulness in the hymn (Lk. i. 46-55) known under the name of the Magnificat (from the first word of it in the Vulgate [L. = "doth magnify"]). The hymn is founded on Hannah's song of thankfulness (1 Sam. ii. 1-10). Mary returned to Nazareth shortly before the birth of John the Baptist, and continued living at her own home. In the course of a few months Joseph became aware that she was with child, and determined on giving her a bill of divorce, instead of yielding her up to the law to suffer the penalty which he supposed that she had incurred. (ADULTERY.) Being, however, warned and satisfied by an angel who appeared to him in a dream, he took her to his own house. It was soon after this, as it would seem, that Augustus's decree was promulgated, and Joseph and Mary travelled to Bethlehem to have their names enrolled in the registers (B. C. 4) by way of preparation for the TAXING, which, however, was not completed till ten years afterward (A. D. 6), in the governorship of Quirinus (CYRENIUS). They reached Bethlehem, and there Mary brought forth the Saviour of the world, and humbly laid him in a manger. The visit of the shepherds, the circumcision, the adoration of the wise men, and the presentation in the Temple, are rather scenes in the life of Christ than in that of his mother. (JESUS CHRIST.) The presentation in the Temple might not take place till forty days after the birth of the child (Lev. xii.). The poverty of Mary and Joseph, it may be noted, is shown by their making the offering of the poor. The song of Simeon and the thanksgiving of Anna, like the wonder of the shepherds and the adoration of the magi, only incidentally refer to Mary. One passage alone in Simeon's address is specially directed to her, "Yea a sword shall pierce through thy own soul also." These words are commonly referred to the pangs of grief which she experienced on witnessing the sufferings of her Son on the cross. In the flight into Egypt, Mary and the babe had the support and protection of Joseph, as well as in their return from thence, in the following year, on the death of Herod the Great (B. C. 3). It may be that the holy family at this time took up their residence in the house of Mary's sister, the wife of Clopas (MARY OF CLEOPHAS). Henceforward, until the beginning of our Lord's ministry—i. e. from B. C. 3 to A. D. 26—we may picture Mary to ourselves as living in Nazareth, in a humble sphere of life. Two circumstances alone, so far as we know, broke in on the otherwise even flow of her life. One of these was the temporary loss of her Son when he remained behind in Jerusalem, A. D. 8. The other was the death of Joseph. The exact date of this last event we cannot determine, but it was probably (so Mr. Meyrick, the original author of this article) not long after the other. From the time at which our Lord's ministry commenced, Mary is withdrawn almost wholly from sight. Four times only is the veil removed which is thrown over her. These four occasions are,—1. The marriage at Cana of Galilee (Jn. ii.). 2. The attempt which she and his brethren made "to speak with him" (Mat. xii. 46; Mk. iii. 21, 31; Lk. viii. 19). 3. The Crucifixion. 4. The days succeeding the Ascension (Acts i. 14). If to these we add two references to her, the first by her Nazarene fellow-citizens (Mat. xiii. 54, 55; Mk. vi. 1-3), the second by a woman in the multitude (Lk. xi. 27), we have specified every event known to us in her life. It is noticeable that, on every occasion of our Lord's addressing her, or speaking of her, there is a sound of reproof in his words, with the exception of the last words spoken to her from the cross.—1. The marriage at Cana in Galilee took place in the three months between the baptism of Christ and the passover of the year 27. When Jesus was found by his mother and Joseph in the Temple in the year 8, we find him repudiating the name of "father" as applied to Joseph (Lk. ii. 48, 49). Now, in like manner, at His first miracle which inaugurates His ministry, He solemnly withdraws Himself from the authority of His earthly mother.—2. Capernaum (Jn. ii. 12) and Nazareth (Mat. iv. 13, xiii. 54; Mk. vi. 1) appear to have been the residence of Mary for a considerable period. The next time that she is brought before us we find her at Capernaum. It is the autumn of the year 28, more than a year and a half after the miracle wrought at the marriage-feast in Cana. Mary was still living with her sister, and her nephews and nieces (BROTHER; JAMES), James, Joseph, Simon, Jude, and their three sisters (Mat. xiii. 55); and she and they heard of the toils which He was undergoing, and they understood that He was denying Himself every relaxation from His labors. Their human affection conquered their faith. They therefore sent a message, begging Him to allow them to speak to Him. Again He reproves. Again He refuses to admit any authority on the part of His relatives, or any privilege on account of their relationship.—3. The next scene in Mary's life brings us to the foot of the cross. She was standing there with her sister Mary and Mary Magdalene, and Salome, and other women, having no doubt followed her Son as she was able throughout the terrible morning of Good Friday. It was about three o'clock in the afternoon, and He was about to give up His spirit. Standing near the company of the women was St. John; and, with almost His last words, Christ commended His mother to the care of the disciple whom Jesus loved. "Woman, behold thy son." And from that hour St. John took her to his own abode (Jn. xix. 25-27).—4. A veil is drawn over her sorrow and over her joy which succeeded that sorrow. Medieval imagination has supposed, but Scripture does not state, that her Son appeared to Mary after His resurrection from the dead. She was doubtless living at Jerusalem with John, cherished with the tenderness specially needed, and undoubtedly found preëminently in St. John. We have no record of her presence at the Ascension, or at the descent of the Holy Spirit on the day of Pentecost. We read that she remained steadfast in prayer in the upper room at Jerusalem with Mary Magdalene and Salome, and those known as the Lord's brothers and the apostles. This is the last view that we have of her. Holy Scripture leaves her engaged in prayer. From this point forward we know nothing of her. Probably the rest of her life was spent in Jerusalem with St. John (see Epiphanius, Har. 78). According to one tradition the beloved disciple would not leave Palestine until she had expired in his arms. Other traditions make her journey with St. John to Ephesus, and there die in extreme old age. In the fifth century some believed that she was buried at Ephesus; others, at Gethsemane.—5. The character of Mary is not drawn by any of the evangelists, but some of its lineaments are incidentally manifested in the fragmentary record given of her. It is clear from Luke, though without any such intimation we might rest assured of the fact, that her youth had been spent in the study of the Holy Scriptures, and that she had set before her the example of the holy women of the O. T. as her model. This would appear from the Magnificat (Lk. i. 46 ff.). Her faith and humility exhibit themselves in her immediate surrender of herself to the Divine will, though ignorant how that will should be accomplished (i. 38); her energy and earnestness in her journey from Nazareth to Hebron (39); her happy thankfulness, in her song of joy (48); her silent musing thoughtfulness, in her pondering over the shepherds' visit (ii. 19), and in her keeping her Son's words in her heart (51), though she could not fully understand their import. Her humility is seen in her drawing back, yet without anger, after receiving reproof at Cana (Jn. ii. 5), and in the remarkable manner in which she shuns putting herself forward through the whole of her Son's ministry, or after His removal from earth. Once only does she attempt to interfere with His freedom of action (Mat. xii. 46; Mk. iii. 31; Lk. viii. 19); and even here she seems to have been roused by a woman's and a mother's feelings of affection and fear for Him whom she loved. In a word, so far as Mary is portrayed to us in Scripture, she is, as we should have expected, the most tender, the most faithful, humble, patient, and loving of women, but a woman still.—III. Her after-life, wholly legendary. The legends of Mary's childhood may be traced back as far as the third or even the second century. Those of her death are probably later. The chief legend was for a length of time considered to be a veritable history, written by Melito Bishop of Sardis in the second century. We give the substance of the legend: When the apostles separated in order to evangelize the world, Mary continued to live with St. John's parents in their house near the Mount of Olives, and every day she went out to pray at the tomb of Christ, and at Golgotha. Afterward she went and dwelt with three holy virgins at Bethlehem. And in the twenty-second year after the ascension of the Lord, Mary felt her heart burn with an inexpressible longing to be with her Son; and behold an angel appeared to her, announced that her soul should be taken up from her body on the third day, placed a palm-branch from paradise in her hands, and desired that it should be carried before her bier. And Mary besought that the apostles might be gathered round her before she died, and the angel replied that they should come. All the apostles, living and dead, were accordingly snatched away in a bright cloud, and found themselves at Bethlehem. Angels and powers without number descended from heaven and stood round about the house. The people of Bethlehem brought their sick to the house, and they were all healed. The news of these things was carried to Jerusalem, and the king sent to Bethlehem to seize Mary, but the Holy Spirit had taken her and the disciples in a cloud to Jerusalem. Then, on the sixth day of the week, the Holy Spirit commanded the apostles to take up Mary, and to carry her from Jerusalem to Gethsemane. The angel Gabriel announced that on the first day of the week Mary's soul should be removed from this world. On the morning of that day there came Eve and Anne and Elisabeth, and kissed Mary and told her who they were: came Adam, Seth, Shem, Noah, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, David, and the rest of the old fathers: came Enoch and Elias and Moses: came twelve chariots of angels innumerable: and then appeared the Lord Christ in His humanity. Mary prayed. After her prayer was finished her face shone with marvellous brightness, and she stretched out her hands and blessed them all; and her Son put forth His hands and received her pure soul, and bore it into His Father's treasure-house. The apostles carried her body to the valley of Jehoshaphat, to a place which the Lord had told them of, and John went before and carried the palm-branch. They placed her in a new tomb. Suddenly there appeared the Lord Christ, surrounded by a multitude of angels, and commanded Michael the archangel to bring down Mary's soul. Gabriel rolled away the stone, and the Lord said, "Rise up, my beloved, thy body shall not suffer corruption in the tomb." Immediately Mary arose and bowed herself at His feet and worshipped; and the Lord kissed her and gave her to the angels to carry her to paradise. But Thomas was not present with the rest. He arrived just after all these things were accomplished, and descended to see the sepulchre in which they had laid his Lady: "For ye know," said he, "that I am Thomas, and unless I see I will not believe." Then Peter arose in haste and wrath, and the other disciples with him, and they opened the sepulchre and went in; but they found nothing therein save that in which her body had been wrapped. Then Thomas confessed that he too, borne in the cloud from India, had seen her holy body carried by the angels with great triumph into heaven; and that on his crying to her for her blessing, she had bestowed on him her precious girdle, which when the apostles saw they were glad. Then the apostles were carried back each to his own place.—IV. Jewish traditions respecting her. The book called Toldoth Jesu (fr. Heb. generations [or family history] of Jesus), proved by Ammon to be a composition of the thirteenth century, makes Mary the wife of Johanan at Bethlehem, deceived in the dark by Joseph Pandera, who pretended to be her husband, and afterward giving birth at Babylon to a son Jehoshua, who discovered the art of working miracles by stealing the knowledge of the sacred name from the Temple, but being defeated by the superior art of one Judas, was crucified and his body hidden under a water-course (Mr. Eawtrej, in Kitto). In the Gospel of Nicodemus, otherwise called the Acts of Pilate, we find the Jews represented as charging our Lord with illegitimate birth. The date of this Gospel is about the end of the third century. Stories to the same effect may be found in the Talmud—not in the Mishna, which dates from the second century, but in the Gemara, which is of the fifth or sixth.—V. Acham- medan traditions. Mohammed and his followers appear to have gathered up the floating Oriental traditions which originated in the legends of Mary's early years, given above, and to have drawn from them and from the Bible indifferently. He is reported to have said that many men have arrived at perfection, but only four women; and that these are, Asia the wife of Pharaoh, Mary the daughter of Amram (Mohammed appears to have confounded Miriam the sister of Moses with Mary the mother of our Lord), his first wife Khadjjah, and his daughter Fâtima. The Immaculate Conception was a Mohammedan doctrine six centuries before any Christian theologians or schoolmen maintained it.—VI. Emblems. There was a time in the history of the Church when all the expressions used in Canticles were applied at once to Mary. Consequently all the Eastern metaphors of King Solomon have been hardened into symbols, and represented in pictures or sculpture, and attached to her in popular litanies. The same method of interpretation was applied to certain parts of Revelation.—VII. Worship of the Blessed Virgin. What was its origin? Certainly not the Bible. There is not a word there from which it could be inferred; nor in the Creeds; nor in the Fathers of the first five centuries. Whence, then, did it arise? Mr. Meyrick finds the germ of it in the apocryphal legends of her birth and of her death given above. Some of the legends of her birth are as early as the second or third century, the production of the Gnostics, and unanimously rejected by the Church of the first five centuries as fabulous and heretical. Down to the time of the Nestorian controversy the worship of the Blessed Virgin was apparently wholly external to the Church, and regarded as heretical. But the Nestorian controversies produced a great change of sentiment. Nestorius had maintained, or at least it was the tendency of Nestorianism to maintain, not only that our Lord had two natures, the divine and the human (which was right), but also that He was two persons, in such sort that the child born of Mary was not divine, but merely an ordinary human being, until the divinity subsequently united itself to Him. This was condemned by the Council of Ephesus in A. D. 431; and the Greek title Theotokos (= God-bearing), loosely translated Mother of God, was sanctioned. The object of the council and of the Anti-Nestorians was not to add honor to the mother, but to maintain the true doctrine with respect to the Son. Nevertheless the result was to magnify the mother, and, after a time, at the expense of the Son. The legends too were no longer treated so roughly as before. The Gnostics were not now objects of dread. Nestorians, and afterward Iconoclasts, were objects of hatred. The old fables were winked at, and thus they became the mythology of Christianity, universally credited among the southern nations of Europe. From this time the worship of Mary grew apace. We learn the present state of the religious regard in which she is held throughout Southern Europe from St. Alfonso de' Liguori, whose every word is vouched for by the whole weight of his Church's (Roman Catholic) authority. Mary is Queen of Mercy and Mother of all mankind; our Life; our Protectress in death; the Hope of all; our only Refuge, Help, and Asylum; the Propitiatory of the whole world; our Patroness; Queen of Heaven and Hell; the Mediatrix of grace; the Helper of the Redemption; the Coöperator in our Justification; a tender Advocate; Omnipotent; the Way of Salvation; the Mediatrix of angels; the Mediator; the Intercessor; the Redeemer; the Saviour, &c. (Gloria of Mary, London, 1852). Thus in the worship of the Blessed Virgin there are two distinctly-marked periods. The first is that which commences with the apostolic times, and brings us down to the close of the fifth century in which the Council of Ephesus was held, during which time the worship of Mary was confined to Gnostic and Collyridian heretics. The second period commences with the sixth century, when it began to spread within the Church; and, in spite of the shock given it by the Reformation, has continued to spread (see IX. below).—VIII. Her Assumption or Ascent to Heaven. Not only religious sentiments, but facts grew up in exactly the same way. At the end of the fifth century there existed a book, De Transitu Virginis Mariae (L. = Of the Transit [or Passage] of the Virgin Mary), which was condemned by Pope Gelasius as apocryphal. This book is without doubt the oldest form of the legend. Down to the end of the fifth century the story of the Assumption was distinctly looked upon by the Church as belonging to the heretics and not to her. But then came the change of sentiment already referred to, consequent on the Nestorian controversy. About the same time, probably, or rather later, an insertion (now recognized on all hands to be a forgery) was made in Eusebius's Chronicle, that "in the year A. D. 48 Mary the Virgin was taken up into heaven, as some wrote that they had had it revealed to them." The first writers within the Church, in whose extant writings we find the Assumption asserted, are Gregory of Tours in the sixth century, who has merely copied Melito's book, De Transitu; Andrew of Crete, who probably lived in the seventh century; and John of Damascus, who lived at the beginning of the eighth century. The last of these authors refers to the Euthymiac history as stating that Marcian and Pulcheria being in search of the body of St. Mary, sent to Juvenal of Jerusalem to inquire for it. Juvenal tells them the legend (see above, III.). The fact of the Assumption is stereotyped in the Breviary Services for August 15. Here again we see a legend originated by heretics, and remaining external to the Church till the close of the fifth century, creeping into the Church during the sixth and seventh centuries, and finally ratified by the authority both of Rome and Constantinople.—IX. Her Immaculate Conception. Similarly with regard to the sinlessness of Mary, which has issued in the dogma of the Immaculate Conception. Down to the close of the fifth century the sentiment with respect to her was that Mary was born in original sin was liable to actual sin, and fell into sins of infirmity. At this time the change of mind before referred to, as originated by the Nestorian controversies, was spreading within the Church; and it became more and more the general belief that Mary was preserved from actual sin by the grace of God. This opinion had become almost universal in the twelfth century. And now a further step was taken. It was maintained by St. Bernard that Mary was conceived in original sin, but that, before her birth, she was cleansed from it, like John the Baptist and Jeremiah. This was the sentiment of the thirteenth century. Early in the fourteenth century died J. Duns Scotus, the first theologian or schoolman who threw out as a possibility the idea of an Immaculate Conception, which would exempt Mary from original as well as actual sin. From this time forward there was a struggle between the maculate and immaculate conceptionists, which led at length to the Pope's decree of December 8, 1854, that Mary was not conceived or born in original sin, but has been wholly exempt from all sin, original and actual, in her conception and birth, throughout her life, and in her death. JAMES.

Mary (Gr. Mariam in the Received Text, Maria in Lachmann; see above), a Roman Christian greeted by St. Paul in Rom. xvi. 6 as having toiled hard for him. Nothing more is known of her.

Mas'a-loth (L. fr. Heb.; see below), a place in ARBELLA, which Bacchides and Alcimus besieged and took with great slaughter on their way from the north to Gilgal (1 Mc. ix. 2). The name Masaloth is omitted by Josephus, nor has any trace of it been since discovered; but the word may, as Robinson suggests, be from Hebrew = steps or terraces. In that case it was probably a name given to the remarkable caverns still existing on the northern side of the Wady el-Hamdn, N. W. of Tiberias, and now called Ku'at Ibn Ma'dn.

Mas'chil [-kil] (Heb., see below), the title of thirteen Psalms: xxxii., xlii., xlv., xlv., lii.-lv., lxxiv., lxxviii., lxxxviii., lxxxix., cxlii. In the Psalm in which it first occurs as a title, the root of the word is found in another form (Ps. xxxii. 8), "I will instruct thee," from which circumstance, it has been inferred, the title was applied to the whole Psalm as didactic (so A. V. margin, Hengstenberg, Tholuck, J. A. Alexander, &c.). But since "Maschil" is affixed to many Psalms which would scarcely be classed as didactic, Gesenius (or rather Roediger) explains it as = any sacred song, relating to divine things, whose end it was to promote wisdom and piety. Ewald regards Ps. xlvii. 7 (A. V. "sing ye praises with understanding," Heb. maschil) as the key to the meaning of Maschil, which in his opinion is a musical term, denoting a melody requiring great skill in its execution. The objection to the explanation of Roediger is, that it is wanting in precision, and would allow the term "Maschil" to be applied to every Psalm. The suggestion of Ewald has most to commend it (so Mr. Wright).

Mash (Heb. a drawing out or drawn out = ME-SHECH, Sim.), a son of Aram. (Gen. x. 23); = "ME-SHECH" in 1 Chr. i. 17. As to the geographical position of Mash, Josephus connects the name with Mæne in lower Babylonia, on the shores of the Persian Gulf. The more probable opinion is that adopted by Bochart, &c., that the name Mash is represented by the Mons Masius of classical writers, a range which forms the northern boundary of Mesopotamia, between the Tigris and Euphrates. Kalisch connects the names of Mash and Mysia: this is, to say the least, extremely doubtful.

Ma'shal (Heb.) = MISHEAL or MISHAL (1 Chr. vi. 74).

Ma-si'as (Gr.), one of Solomon's servants, whose descendants are said to have returned with Zorobabel (1 Esd. v. 34); not in Ezra and Nehemiah.

Mas'man (Gr.) = SHEMAIAH (1 Esd. viii. 43; compare Ezr. viii. 16).

Ma-so'ra, Mā-so'rah. OLD TESTAMENT.

Mas'pha (Gr. = MIZPEH). 1. A place opposite to Jerusalem, at which Judas Maccabeus and his followers assembled themselves to bewail the desolation of the city and the sanctuary (1 Mc. iii. 46); no doubt = MIZPEH of Benjamin.—2. One of the cities taken from the Ammonites by Judas Maccabeus in his campaign on the E. of Jordan (v. 35); probably = MIZPEH of Gilead.

Ma'se-kah (Heb. vineyard of noble vines, Ges.; place of vines, Fül.), an ancient place, the native spot of Samlah, king of the Edomites (Gen. xxxvi. 36; 1 Chr. i. 47); site unknown.

Mas'sa (Heb. a lifting up, utterance, burden, Ges.), a son of Ishmael (Gen. xxy. 14; 1 Chr. i. 30). His descendants were not improbably the Masani, who are placed by Ptolemy in the east of Arabia, near the borders of Babylonia.

Mas'sah (Heb. temptation), a name given to the spot, also called MERIBAH, where the Israelites tempted Jehovah (Ex. xvii. 7; Ps. xcv. 8, 9; Heb. iii. 8).

Mas'-as (Gr.) = MAASEIAH 3 (1 Esd. vi. 12).

* Mast. SHIP.

* Mast'er. LORD; RABBI; SERVANT; SLAVE.

Mast'ich [-tik] (fr. Gr.) tree occurs only in the Apocrypha (Sus. 54), where the name of the A. has "lentisk." There is no doubt that the Greek word is correctly rendered, as is evident from the description of it by Theophrastus, Pliny, Dioscorides, and other writers. The fragrant resin known in the arts as "mastich," and obtained by incisions made in the trunk in August, is the produce of this tree, whose scientific name is Pistacia Lentiscus. It is used with us to strengthen the teeth and gums, and was so applied by the ancients, by whom it was much prized on this account, and for its many supposed medical virtues. It is extensively used in the preparation of spirits, as a sweetmeat, as an antispasmodic in medicine, and as an ingredient in varnishes. Both Pliny and Dioscorides state that the best mastich comes from Chios (Scio). Tournefort says these trees are very wide-spread and circular, ten or twelve feet tall. They are common on the shores of the Mediterranean.

Math-a-ni'as (fr. Gr.) = MATTANIAH, a descendant of Pahath-moab (1 Esd. ix. 31; compare Ezr. x. 30).

Ma-thu'sa-la (fr. Gr. form of Heb.) = METHUSELAH, the son of Enoch (Lk. iii. 37).

Ma'tred (Heb. propelling, Ges.), a daughter of Mezahab, and mother of Mehetabel, who was wife of Hadar (or Hadad) of Pau, king of Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 39; 1 Chr. i. 50).

Ma'tri (Heb. rain of Jehovah, Ges.), a family of Benjamin, to which King Saul belonged (1 Sam. x. 21).

Mat'tan (Heb. a gift, Ges.). 1. The priest of Baal slain before his altars in the idol temple at Jerusalem (2 K. xi. 18; 2 Chr. xxiii. 17). He probably accompanied Athaliah from Samaria.—2. Father of Shephatiah (Jer. xxxviii. 1).

Mat'ta-nah (Heb. a gift, present, Ges.), a station in the latter part of the wanderings of the Israelites (Num. xxi. 18, 19); probably S. E. of the Dead Sea, but not yet discovered. WILDERNESS OF THE WANDERING.

Mat-ta-ni'ah (fr. Heb. = gift of Jehovah, Ges.). 1. The original name of ZEDEKIAH, king of Judah, changed when Nebuchadnezzar placed him on the throne instead of his nephew Jehoiachin (2 K. xxiv. 17).—2. A Levite singer of the sons of Asaph (1 Chr. ix. 15). He is described as the son of Micah, Micha (Neh. xi. 17, 22), or Michaiah (xii. 35), and after the return from Babylon lived in the villages of the Netophathites (1 Chr. ix. 16) or Netophathi (Neh. xii. 28), which the singers had built in the neighborhood of Jerusalem (29). As leader of the Temple-choir after its restoration (xi. 17, xii. 8) in the time of Nehemiah, he took part in the musical service at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (xii. 25, 35). We find him among the Levites of the second rank, "keepers of the thresholds," an office which fell to the singers (compare 1 Chr. xv. 18, 21). Mr. Wright and Dr. Alexander (in Kitto) suppose Mattaniah in Neh. xii. 35 should be connected with ver. 36, in which are enumerated his "brethren" alluded to in ver. 8. Dr. Alexander supposes a name omitted after "Shemaiah, the son of," and before "Mattaniah" in ver. 35.—3. A descendant of Asaph, and ancestor of Jehaziel the Levite in Jehoshaphat's reign (2 Chr. xx. 14).—4. One of the sons of Elam (Ezr. x. 26). He and the three following had married foreign wives, but put them away in Ezra's time.—5. One of the sons of Zattu (27). (See 4.)—6. A descendant of Pahath-moab (30). (See 4.)—7. One of the sons of Bani (37). (See 4 above.)—8. A Levite, father of Zaccur, and ancestor of Hanan who had charge of the offerings for the Levites in Nehemiah's time (Neh. xiii. 13).—9. One of the fourteen sons of Heman; chief of the ninth division of musicians or singers in the Temple-service as appointed by David (1 Chr. xxv. 4, 16).—10. A descendant of Asaph, the Levite minstrel. He assisted in the purification of the Temple in the reign of Hezekiah (2 Chr. xxix. 13).

Mat'ti-tha (Gr. fr. Heb. = MATTATHIAH, Ges.), son of Nathan, and grandson of David in the genealogy of our Lord (Lk. iii. 31).

Mat'ti-thah (Heb. = MATTATHIAH, Ges.), a descendant of Hashum, who put away his foreign wife in Ezra's time (Ezr. x. 33).

Mat-ta-thi'as (Gr. fr. Heb. = MATTATHIAH, Ges.). 1. MATTATHIAH 4, who stood at Ezra's right hand when he read the Law to the people (1 Esd. ix. 43; compare Neh. viii. 4).—2. Father of the MACCABEES (1 Mc. ii. 1, 14, 16, 17, 19, 24, 27, 39, 45, 49, xiv. 29).—3. Son of Absalom, and captain under Jonathan Maccabeus; probably brother of JONATHAN 14 (xi. 70, compare xiii. 11).—4. Son of Simon Maccabeus; treacherously murdered, with his father and brother, by Ptolemy, the son of Abubus (xvi. 14).—5. One of the three envoys sent by Nicanor to treat with Judas Maccabeus (2 Mc. xiv. 19).—6. Son of Amos, in the genealogy of Jesus Christ (Lk. iii. 25).—7. Son of Semei, in the same catalogue (ver. 26).

Mat'te-nai, or Mat-te-na'i (Heb. = MATTANIAH, Ges.). 1. One of the family of Hashum, who in Ezra's time had married a foreign wife (Ezr. x. 33).—2. A descendant of Bani, who put away his foreign wife at Ezra's command (ver. 37).—3. A priest in the days of Joiakim, the son of Jeshua (Neh. xii. 19).

Mat'than (Gr. fr. Heb. = MATTAN, Rbd., N. T. Lex.), son of Eleazar, and grandfather of Joseph "the husband of Mary" (Mat. i. 15); according to Lord A. C. Hervey = MATTHAT in Lk. iii. 24. GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST.

Mat-ta-ni'as (Gr.) = MATTANIAH, one of the descendants of Elam (1 Esd. ix. 27; compare Ezr. x. 26).

Mat'that (Gr. fr. Heb. = MATTITHIAH, Fñ.). 1. Son of Levi and grandfather of Joseph (Lk. iii. 24); = MATTIAN? (GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST).—2. Also the son of a Levi, and a progenitor of Joseph (ver. 29).

Mat-the'los (fr. Gr.) = MAASEIAH 1 (1 Esd. ix. 19).

Mat'thew [math'thu] (fr. L. Matthæus; Gr. Matthaios; both fr. Heb. = MATTATHIAS, Ges.), the Apostle and Evangelist, = LEVI (Lk. v. 27-29) the son of a certain ALPHEUS (Mk. ii. 14). His call to be an apostle is related by all three evangelists in the same words, except that Mat. ix. 9 gives the former, and Mk. ii. 14 and Lk. v. 27 the latter name. The publicans, properly so called (L. publicani), were persons who farmed the Roman taxes, and were usually, in later times, Roman knights, and persons of wealth and credit. They employed under them inferior officers, natives of the province where the taxes were collected, called properly portitores (L. = receivers of customs), to which class Matthew no doubt belonged. (PUBLICAN.) Eusebius mentions that after our Lord's ascension Matthew preached in Judea (some add for fifteen years), and then went to foreign nations. To the lot of Matthew it fell to visit Ethiopia, says Socrates Scholasticus. But Ambrose says that God opened to him the country of the Persians; Isidore the Macedonians; and others the Parthians, the Medes, the Persians of the Euphrates. Nothing whatever is really known. Hieracleon, the disciple of Valentinus, describes him as dying a natural death, which Clement of Alexandria, Origen, and Tertullian seem to accept: the tradition that he died a martyr, be it true or false, came in afterward.

Mat'thew (see above), Gospel of (see GOSPELS). The Gospel which bears the name of St. MATTHEW was written by the apostle, according to the testimony of all antiquity.—I. Language in which it was written. We are told on the authority of Papias, Irenæus, Pantenus, Origen, Eusebius, Epiphanius, Jerome, and many other Fathers, that the Gospel was first written in Hebrew, i. e. Aramaic, the vernacular language of Palestine. (SEMITIC LANGUAGE.) (a.) Papias of Hierapolis (in the first half of the second century) says, "Matthew wrote the divine oracles in the Hebrew dialect; and each interpreted them as he was able." (b.) Irenæus says that "whilst Peter and Paul were preaching at Rome and founding the Church, Matthew put forth his written Gospel among the Hebrews in their own dialect." (c.) According to Eusebius, Pantenus "is reported to have gone to the Indians" (i. e. to the S. of Arabia?), "where it is said that he found the Gospel of Matthew already among some who had the knowledge of Christ there, to whom Bartholomew, one of the apostles, had preached, and left them the Gospel of Matthew written in Hebrew, which was preserved till the time referred to." This story reappears in two different forms:—Jerome and Rufinus say that Pantænus brought back with him this Hebrew Gospel; and Nicephorus asserts that Bartholomew dictated the Gospel of Matthew to the inhabitants of that country. (d.) Origen says, "As I have learned by tradition concerning the four Gospels, which alone are received without dispute by the Church of God under heaven: the first was written by St. Matthew, once a tax-gatherer, afterward an apostle of Jesus Christ who published it for the benefit of the Jewish converts, composed in the Hebrew language." (e.) Eusebius (H. E. iii. 24) gives as his own opinion the following: "Matthew having first preached to the Hebrews, delivered to them, when he was preparing to depart to other countries, his Gospel, composed in their native language." Other passages to the same effect occur in Cyril, Epiphanius, Jerome, who mentions the Hebrew original in seven places at least of his works, and from Gregory of Nazianzus, Chrysostom, Augustine, and other later writers. From all these there is no doubt that the old opinion was that Matthew wrote in the Hebrew language. So far all the testimony is for a Hebrew original.—But there are arguments of no mean weight in favor of the Greek. 1. The numerous quotations from the O. T. in this Gospel are of two kinds: those introduced into the narrative to point out the fulfilment of prophecies, &c.; and those where in the course of the narrative the persons introduced, and especially our Lord Himself, make use of O. T. quotations. Between these two classes a difference of treatment is observable. In the latter class, where the citations occur in discourses, the LXX. is followed. The quotations in the narrative, however, do not follow the LXX., but appear to be a translation from the Hebrew text. A mere translator could not have done this. But an independent writer, using the Greek tongue, and wishing to conform his narrative to the oral teachings of the apostles, might have used for the quotations the well-known Greek O. T. used by his colleagues. 2. But this difficulty is to be got over by assuming a high authority for this translation, as though made by an inspired writer; and it has been suggested that this writer was Matthew himself (Bengel, Olshausen, Lee, &c.), or at least that he directed it (Guericke), or that it was some other apostle (Gerhard), or James, the brother of the Lord, or John, or the general body of the apostles, or that two disciples of St. Matthew wrote, from him, the one in Aramaic, and the other in Greek! 3. The original Hebrew, of which so many speak, no one of the witnesses ever saw (Jerome is no exception); and so little store has the Church set upon it that it has utterly perished. 4. It is certain that a gospel, not the same as our canonical Matthew, sometimes usurped the apostle's name; and some of the witnesses we have quoted appear to have referred to this in one or other of its various forms or names. The Nazarenes and Ebionites possessed each a modification of the same Gospel, which no doubt each altered more and more as their tenets diverged, and which bore various names—the Gospel of the twelve apostles, the Gospel according to the Hebrews, the Gospel of Peter, or the Gospel according to Matthew. Enough is known to decide that the Gospel according to the Hebrews was not identical with our Matthew; but it had many points of resemblance to the synoptical gospels, and especially to Matthew. What was its origin it is impossible to say: it may have been a description of the oral teachings of the apostles, corrupted by degrees; it may have come in its early and pure form from the hand of Matthew, or it may have been a version of the Greek Gospel of St. Matthew, as the evangelist who wrote especially for Hebrews. Is it impossible that, when the Hebrew Matthew is spoken of, this questionable document, the Gospel of the Hebrews, was really referred to? Observe that all accounts of it are at second hand (with a notable exception); no one quotes it. All that is certain is, that Nazarenes, or Ebionites, or both, boasted that they possessed the original Gospel of Matthew. Jerome is the exception; and him we can convict of the very mistake of confounding the two, and almost on his own confession. Erasmus, Calvin, Le Clerc, Lightfoot, Wetstein, Lardner, Hales, Hug, De Wette, Stuart, Fritzsche, Credner, Thiersch, Alford, and many others, have pronounced for a Greek original. Simon, Mill, Michaelis, Marsh, Eichhorn, Storr, Olshausen, Davidson, Tregeles, Westcott, &c., advocate a Hebrew original.—II. Style and Diction. 1. Matthew uses the expression, "that it might be fulfilled which was spoken of the Lord by the PROPHET" (i. 22, ii. 15). In ii. 5, and in later passages of Matthew it is abbreviated (ii. 17, iii. 3, iv. 14, viii. 17, xii. 17, xiii. 14, 35, xxi. 4, xxvi. 56, xxvii. 9). 2. The reference to the Messiah under the name "Son of David," occurs in Matthew eight times; and three times each in Mark and Luke. 3. Jerusalem is called "the holy city," "the holy place" (iv. 5, xxiv. 15, xxvii. 55). 4. The Greek phrase αἰωνία του αἰῶνος, A. V. "the end of the world," is used five times; in the rest of the N. T. only once, in Heb. ix. 26. 5. The phrase "kingdom of heaven," about thirty-three times; other writers use "kingdom of God," which is found also in Matthew. 6. "Heavenly Father," used about six times; and "Father in heaven" about sixteen, and without explanation, point to the Jewish mode of speaking in this Gospel. For other more minute verbal peculiarities, see Credner, Introduction (in German).—III. Citations from the Old Testament. The following list is nearly complete:

—IV. Genuineness of the Gospel. Some critics, admitting the apostolic antiquity of a part of the Gospel, apply to Matthew, as they do to Luke, the gratuitous supposition of a later editor or compiler, who, by augmenting and altering the earlier document, produced our present Gospel. We are asked to believe that in the second century for two or more of the Gospels, new works, differing from them both in matter and compass, were substituted for the old, and that about the end of the second century our present Gospels were adopted by authority to the exclusion of all others, and that henceforth the copies of the older works entirely disappeared. Passages from Matthew are quoted by Justin Martyr, by the author of the letter to Diognetus, by Ilegesippus, Irenæus, Tatian, Athenagoras, Theophilus, Clement, Tertulian, and Origen. It is not merely from the matter but the manner of the quotations, from the calm appeal as to a settled authority, from the absence of all hints of doubt, that we regard it as proved that the book we possess had not been the subject of any sudden change. The citations of Justin Martyr, very important for this subject, have been thought to indicate a source different from the Gospels which we now possess; and by the Greek apomnêmonemata (memoirs), he has been supposed to indicate that lost work. Space is not given here to show that the remains referred to are the Gospels which we possess, and not any one book; and that though Justin quotes the Gospels very loosely, so that his words often bear but a slight resemblance to the original, the same is true of his quotations from the LXX. The genuineness of the two first chapters of the Gospel of Matthew has been questioned, but is established on satisfactory grounds. 1. All the old MSS. and versions contain them; and they are quoted by the Fathers of the second and third centuries. Celsus also knew ch. ii. 2. Their contents would naturally form part of a Gospel intended primarily for the Jews. 3. The commencement of ch. iii. is dependent on ii. 23; and in iv. 13 there is a reference to ii. 23. 4. In constructions and expressions they are similar to the rest of the Gospel. Prof. Norton disputes the genuineness of these chapters upon the ground of the difficulty of harmonizing them with Luke's narrative, and upon the ground that a large number of the Jewish Christians did not possess them in their version of the Gospel. But the difficulties in the harmony are all reconcilable (GOSPELS), and the treatment of Luke (LUKE, GOSPEL OF, I.) by Marcion suggests how the Jewish Christians dropped out of their version an account which they would not accept. On the whole, we have for the genuineness and apostolic origin of our Greek Gospel of Matthew the best testimony that can be given (so Archbishop Thomson, original author of this article). (CANON; INSPIRATION.)—V. Time when the Gospel was written. Nothing can be said on this point with certainty. Some of the ancients think that it was written in the eighth year after the Ascension (Theophylact and Euthymius); others in the fifteenth (Nicephorus); whilst Irenæus says, that it was written "when Peter and Paul were preaching in Rome," and Eusebius at the time when Matthew was about to leave Palestine. The most probable supposition is that it was written between A. D. 50 and 60; the exact year cannot even be guessed at.—VI. Place where it was written. Probably in Palestine.—VII. Purpose of the Gospel. The Gospel itself tells us by plain internal evidence that it was written for Jewish converts, to show them in Jesus of Nazareth the MESSIAH of the O. T. whom they expected. Jewish converts over all the world seem to have been intended, and not merely Jews in Palestine. It is pervaded by one principle, the fulfilment of the Law and of the Messianic prophecies in the person of Jesus.—VIII. Contents of the Gospel. There are traces in this Gospel of an occasional superseding of the chronological order. Its principal divisions are—1. Introduction to the ministry of Jesus (i.-iv.). 2. The laying down of the new Law for the Church in the Sermon on the Mount (v.-vii.). 3. Events in historical order, showing Him as the worker of Miracles (viii., ix.). 4. Appointment of apostles to preach the kingdom (x.). 5. Doubts and opposition excited by His activity—in John's disciples, in sundry cities, in the Pharisees (xi., xii.). 6. Parables on the nature of the kingdom (xiii.). 7. Similar to 5. Effects of His ministry on His countrymen, on Herod, the people of Gennesaret, Scribes and Pharisees, and on multitudes whom He feeds (xiii. 53-xvi. 12). 8. Revelation to His disciples of His sufferings. His instructions to them thereupon (xvi. 13-xviii. 35). 9. Events of a journey to Jerusalem (xix., xx.). 10. Entrance into Jerusalem, and resistance to Him there, and denunciation of the Pharisees (xxi.-xxiii.). 11. Last discourses; Jesus as Lord and Judge of Jerusalem, and also of the world (xxiv., xxv.). 12. Passion and Resurrection (xxvi.-xxviii.).

Mat-thi'as [mat-] (Gr. and L. fr. Heb. = MATTHIAH, Ges.). 1. MATTATHIAH (1 Esd. ix. 33).—2. The apostle elected to fill the place of the traitor Judas (Acts i. 26). All beyond this that we know of him for certainty is that he had been a constant attendant upon the Lord Jesus during the whole course of His ministry; for such was declared by St. Peter to be the necessary qualification of one who was to be a witness of the Resurrection. After St. Peter's address, the whole assembled body of the brethren proceeded to nominate two, viz. Joseph surnamed Barnabas, and Matthias, who answered the requirements of the apostle: the subsequent selection between the two was referred in prayer to Him who knew the hearts of men; then Matthias was selected by lot. It is said that he preached the Gospel and suffered martyrdom in Ethiopia. Cave believes it was rather in Cappadocia.

Mat-ti-thl'ah (fr. Heb. = gift of Jehovah, Ges., Fù.; = MATTHIAS, MATTATHIAS, MATTHEW, MATTHAY, MATTATHAN, &c.). 1. A Levite, the first-born of Shalum the Korhite, who presided over the offerings made in the pans (1 Chr. ix. 31; compare Lev. vi. 20, &c.).—2. One of the Levites of the second rank under Asaph, appointed by David to minister before the ark in the musical service (1 Chr. xvi. 5) (see 4 below).—3. One of the family of Nebo, who had married a foreign wife in Ezra's time (Ezr. x. 43).—4. Probably a priest, who stood at the right hand of Ezra, when he read the Law to the people (viii. 41).—5. A Levite, probably = No. 2 (1 Chr. xv. 18, 21); one of Jeduthun's six sons; leader of the fourteenth division of the Temple-choir (xxv. 3, 21).

Mat'tek, the A. V. translation of—1. Heb. kerēb or cherēb (2 Chr. xxiv. 6, margin "maul"), usually translated "sword." (ARMS, I. 1.) Gesenius and Fürst translate the Hebrew reshēb or textual reading in this verse "he searched their houses," instead of "with their mattocks."—2. Heb. mo-hirēshāh or machārēshāh (1 Sam. xiii. 20, 21). A closely-related Hebrew word (maharēsheth or machēresheth) is translated "share" in verse 20; and the Hebrew word translated "mattock" in verse 21 may be the plural of either. Gesenius supposes one of them perhaps = plough-share, and the other = coulter. Fürst makes this in verse 20 = sickle; the kindred word (= "share" in A. V. verse 20) he makes = spade, mattock, coulter, and regards the latter as occurring also in verse 21, where the A. V. has "mattocks."—3. Heb. ma'dér = a weeding-hook, hoe, Ges. (Is. vii. 25). The tool used in Arabia for loosening the ground, described by Niebuhr, answers generally to our mattock or grubbing-axe, i. e. a single-headed pick-axe. The ancient Egyptian hoe was of wood, and answered for hoe, spade, and pick. AGRICULTURE.

Maul (i. e. a hammer; a variation of mall, from L. malleus), a word employed by our translators to render the Hebrew méphitá. The Hebrew and English alike occur in Prov. xxv. 18 only. But a derivative from the same root, and differing but slightly in form, viz. mappéts, is found in Jer. li. 20, and is there translated "battle-axe." Probably some heavy warlike instrument, a mace or club, is alluded to. ARMS, I. 2, c, h; AXE; MATTOCK 1.

Ma-uzzim (Heb. pl. = fortresses, Ges., Fü.). The marginal note to the A. V. of Dan. xi. 38, "the God of forces," gives, as the equivalent of the last word, "Mauzzim, or God's protectors, or munitions." The Geneva version renders the Hebrew as a proper name both in Dan. xi. 38 and 39, where the word occurs again (margin of A. V. "munitions"). The Greek version of Theodotion and the Vulgate treat it as a proper name. There can be little doubt (so Mr. Wright) that "Mauzzim" is to be taken in its literal sense of fortresses, just as in Dan. xi. 19, 39; the god of fortresses being then the deity who presided over strongholds. But beyond this it is scarcely possible to connect an appellation so general with any special object of idolatrous worship. Calvin suggested that it denoted Munitions, the strongest of all powers. By others it has been supposed to be Mars. The opinion of Gesenius is more probable, that the god of fortresses = Jupiter Capitolinus, for whom Antiochus built a temple at Antioch. Layard (Nin. ii. 456), after describing Hera, the Assyrian Venus, as "standing erect on a lion, and crowned with a tower or mural coronet, which, we learn from Lucian, was peculiar to the Semitic figure of the goddess," adds in a note, "May she be connected with the 'El Maozem,' the deity presiding over bulwarks and fortresses, the 'god of forces' of Dan. xi. 38?"

* Maz-za-loth (Heb.). See MAZZAROTH.

Maz-za-roth (Heb., see below). The margin of the A. V. of Job xxxviii. 32 gives "the twelve signs" as the equivalent of "Mazzaroth," and this is probably its true meaning (so Mr. Wright). The Peshito-Syriac renders it by "the wain" or "Great Bear." Fürst understands by Mazzaroth the planet Jupiter, the same as the "star" of Am. v. 26. On referring to 2 K. xxiii. 5, we find the word mazzáloth (A. V. "the planets"), differing only from Mazzaroth in having the liquid l for r, and rendered in the margin "the twelve signs," as in the Vulgate. In later Jewish writings mazzáloth are the signs of the Zodiac. In consequence of this, Rashi, and the Hebrew commentators generally, identify mazzaroth and mazzáloth, though their interpretations vary.

Me'd'ow [med'do], the A. V. translation of—1. Heb. dhú or áchú (Gen. xli. 2, 18). It appears to be an Egyptian term. Its use in Job viii. 11 (A. V. "flag") seems to show that it is not a "meadow," but some kind of reed or water-plant. (FLAG 1.) But as during high inundations of the Nile—such inundations as are the cause of fruitful years—the whole of the land on either side is a marsh, and as the cultivation extends up to the very edge of the river, may it not denote the herbage of the growing crops? 2. Heb. ma'árah (Judg. xx. 33 only, "the meadows of Gibeah"). Gesenius, the Targum, and Kimchi translate a naked place, i. e. a field or plain without trees and dwellings; Fürst translates forest. The most plausible interpretation (so Mr. Grove) is that of the Peshito-Syriac, which by a slight difference in the vowel-points makes the word me'arah = the cave.

Me'ah (Heb. a hundred), the Tower of, one of the towers of the wall of Jerusalem when rebuilt by Nehemiah (Neh. iii. 1, xii. 39). It stood between the tower of Hananeel and the sheep-gate, and probably somewhere at the N. E. part of the city.

* Meal (Gen. xviii. 6, &c.). BREAD; CORN; FOOD; MILL.

Meals. Our information on this subject is but scanty: the early Hebrews do not seem to have given special names to their several meals, for the Hebrew terms ácal and áruháh or áruháh, translated "dine" and "dinner" in the A. V. (Gen. xliii. 16; Prov. xv. 17), are in reality general expressions, which might more correctly be rendered "eat" and "portion of food." In the N. T. we have the Greek terms ariston and deipnon, which the A. V. renders respectively "dinner" and "supper" (Lk. xiv. 12; Jn. xxi. 20, &c.), but which are more properly "breakfast" and "dinner." The Greek deipnon is also translated "feast" (Mat. xxiii. 6; Mk. xii. 39; Lk. xx. 46). There is some uncertainty as to the hours at which the meals were taken: the Egyptians undoubtedly took their principal meal at noon (Gen. xliii. 16): laborers took a light meal at that time (Ru. ii. 14; compare verse 17); and occasionally that early hour was devoted to excess and revelling (1 K. xx. 16). It has been inferred from those passages (somewhat too hastily, Mr. Bevan thinks) that the principal meal generally took place at noon: the Egyptians still make a substantial meal at that time; but there are indications that the Jews rather followed the custom that prevails among the Bedouins, and made their principal meal after sunset, and a lighter meal at about nine or ten o'clock in the morning (Gen. xix. 1-3; Ex. xvi. 12, xviii. 12, 14; Ru. iii. 7; Jn. xxi. 4, 12). (PASSOVER.) Robinson, N. T. Lex., makes ariston = breakfast, lunch, taken about the middle of the day; the principal meal being the deipnon = dinner, taken late in the afternoon or early in the evening, after the heat and business of the day were over. The posture at meals varied at various periods: there is sufficient evidence that the old Hebrews were in the habit of sitting (Gen. xxvii. 19; Judg. xix. 6; 1 Sam. xvi. 11, xx. 5, 18, 24; 1 K. xiii. 20), but it does not hence follow that they sat on chairs (the chair was not unknown to the Hebrews); they may have squatted on the ground, as was the occasional, though not perhaps the general custom of the ancient Egyptians. The table was in this case but slightly elevated above the ground, as is still the case in Egypt. As luxury increased, the practice of sitting was exchanged for that of reclining: the first intimation of this occurs in Amos (iii. 12, vi. 4). The custom may have been borrowed from the Babylonians and Syrians, among whom it prevailed at an early period (Esth. i. 6, vii. 8). In the time of our Saviour, reclining was the universal custom, as is implied in the

Reclining at Table.—From Montfaucon's Antiquities.—(Fairbairn)

Greek terms anakeimai, katukeimai, anaklinomai, &c., used for "sitting at meat," as the A. V. incorrectly has it. The couch itself is only once mentioned (Mk. vii. 4; A. V. "tables;" Greek plural of klinē usually translated "BED"), but there can be little doubt that the Roman tridinium (see below) had been introduced, and that the arrangements of the table resembled those described by classical writers. Generally speaking, only three persons reclined on each couch, but occasionally four or even five. The couches were provided with cushions on which the left elbow rested in support of the upper part of the body, while the right arm remained free; a room provided with these was described (in Greek) as estrōmenon, literally spread (Mk. xiv. 15, A. V. "furnished"). As several guests reclined on the same couch, each overlapped his neighbor, as it were, and rested his head on or near the breast of the one who lay behind him: he was then said to the fourth being left open for the servants to bring up the dishes. Some doubt attends the question whether the females took their meals along with the males. The cases of Ruth amid the reapers (Ru. ii. 14), of Elkanah with his wives (1 Sam. i. 4), of Job's sons and daughters (Job i. 4), and the general intermixture of the sexes in daily life, make it more than probable that they did so join; at the same time, as the duty of attending upon the guests devolved upon them (Lk. x. 40), they probably took a somewhat irregular and briefer repast. (See also Deut. xvi. 11, 14; Esth. i. 9; WOMAN.) Before commencing the meal, the guests washed their hands. This custom was founded on natural de-

Washing before or after a meal.—(From Lane's Modern Egyptians.)

"lean on the bosom" of his neighbor (Jn. xiii. 23, xxi. 20; ABRAHAM'S BOSOM). The ordinary arrangement of the couches was in three sides of a square, corum; not only was the hand the substitute for our knife and fork, but the hands of all the guests were dipped into one and the same dish. Another preliminary step was the grace or blessing, of which we have but one instance in the O. T. (1 Sam. ix.

19), and more than one pronounced by our Lord himself in the N. T. (Mat. xv. 86; Lk. ix. 16; Jn. vi. 11). The mode of taking the food differed in no material point from the modern usages of the East; generally there was a single dish into which each guest dipped his hand (Mat. xxvi. 23); occasionally separate portions were served out to each (Gen. xliii. 84; Ru. ii. 14; 1 Sam. i. 4). A piece of bread was held between the thumb and two fingers of the right hand, and was dipped either into a bowl of melted grease (in which case it was termed in Gr. psômon = "a sop," Jn. xiii. 26), or into the dish of meat, whence a piece was conveyed to the mouth between the layers of bread. To pick out and hand over to a friend a delicate morsel is esteemed a compliment, and to refuse such an offering is regarded as contrary to good manners. Judas dipping his hand in the same dish with our Lord was showing especial friendliness and intimacy. At the conclusion of the meal, grace was again said in conformity with Deut. vii. 10, and the hands were again washed. Thus far we have described the ordinary meal: on state occasions more ceremony was used, and the meal was enlivened in various ways. Such occasions were numerous, in connection partly with public (FESTIVALS, &c.), partly with private events. (BANQUETS.) On these occasions a sumptuous repast was prepared; the guests were previously invited (Esth. v. 8; Mat. xxii. 3), and on the day of the feast a second invitation was issued to those that were bidden (Esth. vi. 14; Prov. ix. 3; Mat. xxii. 3). The visitors were received with a kiss (Tob. vii. 6; Lk. vii. 45); water was produced for them to wash their feet with (vii. 44); the head, the beard, the feet, and sometimes the clothes, were perfumed with ointment (Ps. xxiii. 5; Am. vi. 6; Lk. vii. 38; Jn. xii. 3); on special occasions robes were provided (Mat. xii. 11); and the head was decorated with wreaths (Is. xxviii. 1; Wis. ii. 7, 8; Jos. xix. 9, § 1). The regulation of the feast was under the superintendence of a special officer, named in Gr. architriklinos (Jn. ii. 8, 9, A.V. "ruler of the feast," "governor of the feast"), whose business it was to taste the food and the liquors before they were placed on the table, and to settle about the toasts and amusements; he was generally one of the guests (Ecclus. xxxii. 1, 2), and might therefore take part in the conversation. The places of the guests were settled according to their respective rank (Gen. xliii. 83; 1 Sam. ix. 22; Lk. xiv. 8; Mk. xli. 39; Jn. xiii. 23); portions of food were placed before each (1 Sam. i. 4; 2 Sam. vi. 19; 1 Chr. xvi. 3), the most honored guests receiving either larger (Gen. xliii. 34; compare Hdt. vi. 57) or more choice (1 Sam. ix. 24; compare Homer, Il. vii. 321) portions than the rest. The meal was enlivened with music, singing, and dancing (2 Sam. xix. 35; Ps. lxxix. 12; Is. v. 12; Am. vi. 5; Ecclus. xxxii. 8-6; Mat. xiv. 6; Lk. xv. 23), or with riddles (Judg. xiv. 12); and amid these entertainments the festival was prolonged for several days (Esth. i. 3, 4). Me-a'ul (fr. Gr.) = MEHUXIM (1 Esd. v. 31).

Me-a'rah (Heb., see below), a place named in Josh. xiii. 4 only. Its description is "Mearah, which is to (i. e. belongs to; the A. V. 'beside' is erroneous) the Zidonians." The word me'arah in Hebrew = a cave, and it is commonly assumed that the reference is to some remarkable cavern in the neighborhood of Zidon or Sidon. Richard suggests that Mearah may be = Meroth, a village named by Josephus (iii. 8, § 1), as forming the limit of Galilee on the W. Robinson (ii. 474) suggests that Mearah may be at 'Adlân, a ruined site about half-way between Tyre and Sidon, in the cliffs near which are numerous sepulchral grottoes.

Measures [mez-]. WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

Meat. It does not appear that the word "meat" is used in any one instance in the A. V., of either the O. or N. T., in the sense which it now almost exclusively bears of animal food. The latter is denoted uniformly by "flesh." 1. The only possible exceptions to this assertion in the O. T. are:—(a.) Gen. xxvii. 4, &c., "savory meat (perhaps = dainties);" (b.) xlv. 23, "corn and bread and meat (= food, 'victual,' 2 Chr. xi. 23)." 2. The only real and inconvenient ambiguity caused by the change which has taken place in the meaning of the word is in the case of the "MEAT-OFFERING," which consisted solely of flour, or corn, and oil. 3. Several Hebrew words are translated in the A. V. by "meat;" but none of them present any special interest except lehem or lechem (= "BREAD") (Num. xxviii. 24; 1 Sam. xx. 24, 27, 34; Job vi. 7, xx. 14, &c.), and tereph (Ps. cxi. 5, margin "prey;" Prov. xxxi. 15; Mal. iii. 10), usually translated "prey" (Gen. xlix. 9; Num. xxiii. 24, &c.), once "spoil" (Job xxix. 17). 4. In the N. T. several Greek words are thus rendered, the most common being brôma (Jn. iv. 34; Rom. xiv. 15, 20; 1 Cor. viii. 8, 13, &c.), brôsis (Jn. iv. 32; Rom. xiv. 17, &c.), and trophê (Mat. iii. 4; Acts xxvii. 38 ff.; Heb. v. 12, 14, &c.), each of which = whatever can be eaten or can nourish the frame.

Meat-offering. The Heb. minhâh or minchâh originally = a gift of any kind; and appears to be used generally = a gift from an inferior to a superior, whether God or man. Afterward this general sense became attached to "CORBAN;" and minhâh or minchâh was restricted to an unbloody offering. The law or ceremonial of the meat-offering is described in Lev. ii. and vi. 14-23. It was composed of fine flour, seasoned with salt, and mixed with oil and frankincense, but without leaven; and generally accompanied by a drink-offering of wine. A portion of it, including all the frankincense, was to be burnt on the altar as a "memorial;" the rest belonged to the priest; but the meat-offerings offered by the priests themselves were to be wholly burnt. Its meaning appears to be exactly expressed in the words of David (1 Chr. xxix. 10-14), "Of Thine own have we given Thee." It recognized the sovereignty of the Lord and His bounty in giving all earthly blessings, by dedicating to Him the best of His gifts. This meaning involves neither of the main ideas of sacrifice—the atonement for sin and self-dedication to God. It takes them for granted, and is based on them. Accordingly, the meat-offering, properly so called, seems always to have been a subsidiary offering, needing to be introduced by the SIN-OFFERING, which represented the one idea, and forming an appendage to the BURNT-OFFERING which represented the other. The unbloody offerings offered alone did not properly belong to the regular meat-offering. They were usually substitutes for other offerings (compare Lev. v. 11; Num. v. 15). SACRIFICE.

Me-bun'al (Heb. a set up, erected, strong one, Fū.), in 2 Sam. xxiii. 27 only, the name of one of David's "valiant men," elsewhere called SIBBECHAI (xxi. 18; 1 Chr. xx. 4) or SIBBECAI (xi. 29, xxvii. 11). The reading "Sibbechai" is evidently the true one (so Mr. Wright).

Me-cherath-lite (fr. Heb.), the, = the native or inhabitant of a place called Mechorah, otherwise unknown (so Gesenius, Fürst) (1 Chr. xi. 36). In 2 Sam. xxiii. 34, the name appears, with other variations, as "the Maachathite." Kennicott concludes that the latter is the more correct.

Me'dad (fr. Heb. = love, Ges., Fū.). ELDAD.

Med'an (Heb. strife, contention), a son of ABRAHAM and KETURAH (Gen. xxv. 2; 1 Chr. i. 32), whose name and descendants have not been traced beyond this record. It has been supposed, from the similarity of the name, that the tribe descended from Medan was the same as, or a portion of, Midian. There is, however, no ground for this theory beyond its plausibility. The mention of "Ishmaelite" as a convertible term with "Midianite," in Gen. xxxvii. 28, 36, is remarkable; but the Midianite of the A. V. in verse 36 is Me'lanite in the Hebrew.

Med'-ba (Heb. waters of quiet), a town on the E. of Jordan, first alluded to in Num. xxi. 30. Here it seems to denote the limit of the territory of Heshbon. It next occurs in the enumeration of the country divided amongst the Transjordanic tribes (Josh. xiii. 9), as giving its name to a district called "the plain of Medeba." (PLAIN 4.) This district fell within the allotment of Reuben (ver. 16). At the time of the Conquest Medeba belonged to the Amorites, apparently one of the towns taken from Moab by them. When we next encounter it, four centuries later, it is again in the hands of the Moabites, or of the Ammonites (1 Chr. xix. 7). In the time of Ahaz Medeba was a sanctuary of Moab (Is. xv. 2). In the Maccabean times it had returned into the hands of the Amorites, who most probably = the Jambri in 1 Mc. ix. 36. About 110 B. C. it was taken after a long siege by John Hyrcanus. In Christian times it was a noted bishopric. Medeba (now Madeba) is in the pastoral district of the Belka, four miles S. E. of Heshbon, and like it lying on a rounded but rocky hill. A large tank, columns, and extensive foundations are still to be seen.

Asia in the times anterior to the establishment of the kingdom of Cyrus, and one of the most important tribes composing that kingdom. The title by which they appear to have known themselves was Mada.—1. Primitive History. It may be gathered from the mention of the Medes (MADAI) by Moses, among the races descended from JAPHETH, that they were a nation of very high antiquity. Berosus says that the Medes conquered Babylon at a very remote period (about B. C. 2458), and that eight Median monarchs reigned there consecutively 224 years. There are independent grounds for thinking that an Aryan element existed in the population of the Mesopotamian valley, side by side with the Cushite and Shemitic elements, at a very early date. It is therefore not at all impossible (so Rawlinson, the original author of this article) that the Medes may have been the predominant race there for a time, as Berosus states, and may afterward have been overpowered and driven to the mountains. The term Aryans, applied to the Medes in the time of Herodotus, connects them with the early Vedic settlers in Western Hindustan. 2. Connection with Assyria. The deepest obscurity hangs, however, over the whole history of the Medes from the time of their bearing sway in Babylonia (B. C. 2458–2234) to their first appearance in the cuneiform inscriptions among the enemies of ASSYRIA, about B. C. 880. They then inhabit a portion of the region which bore their name down to the Mohammedan conquest of PERSIA; but whether they were recent immigrants into it, or had held it from a remote antiquity, is uncertain. However, it is certain that at first, and for a long series of years, they were very inferior in power to the great empire established upon their flank. They were under no general or centralized government, but consisted of various petty tribes, each ruled by its chief, whose dominion was over a single small town and perhaps a few villages. The Assyrian monarchs ravaged their lands at pleasure, and took tribute from their chiefs; while the Medes could in no way retaliate upon their antagonists. Media, however, was strong enough, and stubborn enough, to maintain her nationality throughout the whole period of the Assyrian sway, and was never absorbed into the empire.—3. Median History of Herodotus. Herodotus represents the decadence of Assyria as greatly accelerated by a formal revolt of the Medes, following upon a period of contented subjection, and places this revolt more than 218 years before the battle of Marathon, or a little before B. C. 708. Ctesias placed the commencement of Median independence as far back as B. C. 675. No one now defends this latter statement, which alike contradicts the Hebrew records and the native documents. According to Herodotus, the Medes, when they first shook off the yoke, established no government. Quarrels were settled by arbitration, and a certain Deioces, having obtained a reputation in this way, contrived after a while to get himself elected sovereign. He was succeeded by his son Phraortes, an ambitious prince, who directly after his accession began a career of conquest, reduced nation after nation, and finally perished in an expedition against Assyria, after he had reigned twenty-two years. Cyaxares, the son of Phraortes, then mounted the throne. After a desperate struggle during twenty-eight years with the Scythians, Cyaxares succeeded in recovering his former empire, whereupon he resumed the projects which their invasion had made him temporarily abandon. He conquered the Assyrians, and engaged in a war with Alyattes, king of Lydia, the father of Cræsus, with whom he long maintained a stubborn contest. This war was terminated at length by the formation of an alliance between the two powers. Cyaxares, soon after this, died, having reigned in all forty years. He was succeeded by his son ASTYAGES.—4. Its imperfections. The Median History of Herodotus has been accepted as authentic by most modern writers. That the story of Deioces is a romance has been acknowledged. That the chronological dates are improbable, and even contradictory, has been a frequent subject of complaint. Recently it has been shown (Rawlinson, Herodotus) that the whole scheme of dates is artificial, and that the very names of the kings, except in a single instance, are unhistorical. The cuneiform records of Sargon, Sennacherib, and Esar-haddon clearly show that the Median kingdom did not commence so early as Herodotus imagined. These three princes, whose reigns cover the space extending from B. C. 720 to B. C. 660, all carried their arms deep into Media, and found it, not under the dominion of a single powerful monarch, but under the rule of a vast number of petty chieftains. It cannot have been till near the middle of the seventh century B. C. that the Median kingdom was consolidated, and became formidable to its neighbors. How this change was accomplished is uncertain: most probably about this time a fresh Aryan immigration took place from the countries E. of the Caspian, and the leader of the immigrants established his authority over the scattered tribes of his race, settled previously in the district between the Caspian and Mount Zagros. There is good reason to believe that this leader was the great Cyaxares. The Deioces and Phraortes of Herodotus are thus removed from the list of historical personages altogether.—5. Development of Median power, and formation of the Empire. It is evident that the development of Median power kept pace with the decline of Assyria, of which it was in part an effect, in part a cause. Cyaxares must have been contemporary with the later years of that Assyrian monarch who passed the greater portion of his time in hunting-expeditions in Susiana. In order to consolidate a powerful kingdom in the district E. of Assyria, it was necessary to bring into subjection a number of Scythic tribes. The struggle with these tribes may be the real event represented in Herodotus by the Scythic war of Cyaxares, or possibly his narrative may contain a still larger amount of truth. His capture of Nineveh and conquest of Assyria are facts which no skepticism can doubt; and the date of the capture may be fixed with tolerable certainty to the year B. C. 625. It was undoubtedly after this that Cyaxares endeavored to conquer Lydia. It is surprising that he failed, more especially as he seems to have been accompanied by the forces of the Babylonians, who were perhaps commanded by Nebuchadnezzar on the occasion.—6. Extent of the Empire. The limits of the Median empire cannot be definitely fixed. From N. to S. its extent was in no place great, since it was certainly confined between the Persian Gulf and the Euphrates on the one side, the Black and Caspian Seas on the other. From E. to W. it had, however, a wide expansion, since it reached from the Halys at least as far as the Caspian Gates, and possibly further. It comprised Persia, Media Magna (MEDIA), North Media, Matiene or Media Mattiana, Assyria, Armenia, Cappadocia, the tract between Armenia and the Caucasus, the low tract along the S. W. and

S. of the Caspian, and possibly some portion of Hyrcania, Parthia, and Sagartia. It was separated from Babylonia either by the Tigris, or more probably by a line running about half-way between that river and the Euphrates. Its greatest length may be reckoned at 1,500 miles from N. W. to S. E., and its average breadth at 400 or 450 miles. Its area would thus be about 600,000 square miles, or somewhat greater than that of modern Persia.—7. Its character. With regard to the nature of the government established by the Medes over the conquered nations, we possess but little trustworthy evidence. Herodotus in one place compares, somewhat vaguely, the Median with the Persian system (i. 134); but it is perhaps most probable that the Assyrian organization was continued by the Medes, the subject-nations retaining their native monarchs, and merely acknowledging subjection by the payment of an annual tribute. This seems certainly to have been the case in Persia. The satrapial organization was apparently a Persian invention, begun by Cyrus, continued by Cambyzes, his son, but first adopted as the regular governmental system by Darius Hystaspis.—8. Its duration. Of all the ancient Oriental monarchies the Median was the shortest in duration. It commenced, as we have seen, after the middle of the seventh century B. C., and it terminated B. C. 558.—9. Its final overthrow. The conquest of the Medes by a sister-Iranic race, the Persians, under their native monarch CYRUS, is another of those indisputable facts of remote history, which make the inquirer feel that he sometimes attains to solid ground in these difficult investigations. After many partial engagements, a great battle was fought between the two armies, and the result was the complete defeat of the Medes, and the capture of their king, Astyages, by Cyrus.—10. Position of Media under Persia. The treatment of the Medes by the victorious Persians was not that of an ordinary conquered nation. According to some writers (as Herodotus and Xenophon) there was a close relationship between Cyrus and the last Median monarch, who was therefore naturally treated with more than common tenderness. The two nations were closely akin; they had the same Aryan or Iranic origin, the same early traditions, the same language, nearly the same religion, and ultimately the same manners and customs, dress, and general mode of life. Medes were advanced to stations of high honor and importance under Cyrus and his successors. The Median capital (Ecbatana) was at first the chief royal residence. On the first convenient opportunity Media rebelled, elevating to the throne a certain Phraortes (Fravartish). Darius Hystaspis, in whose reign this rebellion took place, had great difficulty in suppressing it.—11. Internal divisions. According to Herodotus the Median nation was divided into six tribes, called Busæ, the Paretaceni, the Struchates, the Arizanti, the Budii, and the Magi. It is doubtful, however, in what sense these are to be considered as ethnic divisions. We may perhaps assume, from the order of Herodotus's list, that the Busæ, Paretaceni, Struchates, and Arizanti were true Medes, of genuine Aryan descent, while the Budii and Magi were foreigners admitted into the nation.—12. Religion. The original religion of the Medes must have been that simple creed which is placed before us in the earlier portions of the Zend-avesta. (PERSIANS.) Its peculiar characteristic was Dualism, the belief in the existence of two opposite principles of good and evil, nearly if not quite on a par with one another. Ormazd, the good demon, and Ahriman, the evil demon, were both self-caused and self-existent, both indestructible, both potent to work their will. Besides Ormazd, the Aryans worshipped the sun and moon, under the names of Mithra and Homa; and they believed in the existence of numerous spirits or genii, some good, some bad, the subjects and ministers respectively of the two powers of Good and Evil. Their migration brought them into contact with the fire-worshippers of Armenia and Mount Zagros, among whom Magianism had been established from a remote antiquity. (MAGI.) The result was either a combination of the two religions, or in some cases an actual conversion of the conquerors to the faith and worship of the conquered. So far as can be gathered from the scanty materials in our possession, the latter was the case with the Medes.—13. Manners, customs, and national character. The customs of the Medes are said to have nearly resembled those of their neighbors, the Armenians and the Persians; but they were regarded as the inventors, their neighbors as the copyists. They were brave and warlike, excellent riders, and remarkably skillful with the bow. The flowing robe, so well known from the Persepolitan sculptures, was their native dress, and was certainly among the points for which the Persians were beholden to them. As troops they were considered little inferior to the native Persians, next to whom they were usually ranged in the battle-field.—14. References to the Medes in Scripture. The references to the Medes in the canonical Scriptures are not very numerous, but striking. We first hear of certain "cities of the Medes," in which the captive Israelites were placed by "the king of Assyria" on the destruction of Samaria, B. C. 721 (2 K. xvii. 6, xviii. 11). This implies the subjection of Media to Assyria at the time of Shalmaneser, or of Sargon, his successor, and accords very closely with the account given by the latter of certain military colonies which he planted in the Median country. Soon afterward Isaiah prophesies the part which the Medes shall take in the destruction of Babylon (Is. xiii. 17, xvi. 2); which is again still more distinctly declared by Jeremiah (li. 21 and 23), who sufficiently indicates the independence of Media in his day (xxv. 25). Daniel relates the fact of the Medo-Persic conquest (v. 28, 31), giving an account of the reign of DARIUS THE MED, who appears to have been made viceroy by Cyrus (vi. 1-28). In Ezra (vi. 2-5) we have a mention of Achmetha (ECBATANA), "the palace in the province of the Medes," where the decree of Cyrus was found—a notice which accords with the known facts that the Median capital was the seat of government under Cyrus, but a royal residence only and not the seat of government under Darius Hystaspis. Finally, in Esther, the high rank of Media under the Persian kings, yet at the same time its subordinate position, are marked by the frequent combination of the two names in phrases of honor, the precedence being in every case assigned to the Persians. In the Apocrypha the Medes occupy a more prominent place. The chief scene of one whole book (TOBIT) is Media; and in another (JUDITH) a very striking portion of the narrative belongs to the same country. The mention of Rhages (RAGES) in both narratives as a Median town and region of importance is geographically correct; and it is historically true that Phraortes (ΑΡΦΑΞΑΔ 2) suffered his overthrow in the Rhagian district.
